

756

This is a translation of the MS. in the library of the Royal Irish Academy, extending from the year
A.D. 1172 to 1616.

The Four Masters were Michael O'Clery, Conary
O'Clery, Cucogry O'Clery, and Ferfeasa O'Mulconry.
Their work is the most complete and authentic record in existence on early Irish history.

THE ANNALS of the
FOUR MASTERS

Oliver

THE ANNALS OF IRELAND,

TRANSLATED FROM

THE ORIGINAL IRISH

OF

THE FOUR MASTERS.

BY OWEN CONNELLAN, ESQ.,

IRISH HISTORIOGRAPHER TO THEIR LATE MAJESTIES GEORGE IV. AND WILLIAM IV., AUTHOR OF A GRAMMAR OF THE IRISH LANGUAGE, ETC.

WITH

A N N O T A T I O N S

BY PHILIP MAC DERMOTT, ESQ., M.D., AND THE TRANSLATOR.

DUBLIN:
PUBLISHED BY BRYAN GERAGHTY, 8, ANGLESEA-STREET.
MDCCCXLVI.

DUBLIN:
PRINTED BY WILLIAM JOSEPH WILSON,
HAWKINS'-STREET.

JA905
A6C
TO

SIR WILLIAM BETHAM,

KNIGHT ATTENDANT ON THE MOST ILLUSTRIOUS ORDER OF ST. PATRICK,

Ulster King of Arms,

VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE ROYAL DUBLIN SOCIETY, MEMBER OF THE ROYAL IRISH ACADEMY, FELLOW OF THE SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES OF LONDON,

AND OF

THE ASIATIC SOCIETY,

MEMBER OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF SCIENCES OF LISBON,

AND

THE ROYAL SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES OF COPENHAGEN, &c.

AUTHOR OF THE

IRISH ANTIQUARIAN RESEARCHES; THE GAEL AND CIMBRI; ETRURIA CELTICA; HISTORY OF THE CONSTITUTION OF ENGLAND AND IRELAND, &c. &c.

Whose various Works on Irish, British, Gaulic, and Etruscan Antiquities, particularly his learned Analysis of the Ancient Languages of Ireland, Britain, Gaul, and Etruria, have obtained for him an European reputation, and made his name known and respected, as a most eminent Antiquary, as well among the Archæologists of the Continent, as the Literati of these Kingdoms; a man to whom Irishmen are so much indebted, for his liberal and enlightened encouragement, and love of Irish Literature, the present publication, as well as many others, being enriched by many materials furnished from his valuable Library; and through whose disinterested patronage the Publisher has been mainly enabled to present to his countrymen the far-famed

ANNALS OF THE FOUR MASTERS:

To him, therefore, this Work is, on behalf of the Irish people, as a small tribute of esteem and regard, justly and most respectfully

INSCRIBED BY

The Publisher.

2759

P R E F A C E .

THE ANNALS OF THE FOUR MASTERS being now published for the first time, there are some particular points which require explanation. The copy from which this translation has been made, has been accurately compared with that in the possession of Sir William Betham, which was transcribed by the translator from the original autograph MS. in the Library of the Royal Irish Academy, and is therefore perfectly authentic. Mr. Connellan the translator was eminently qualified for his arduous task, being one of the best Irish Scholars of the present day, having extensive experience in transcribing and translating ancient Irish MSS. for a period of more than twenty years, and had the honor of being appointed Irish Historiographer to their late Majesties George IV. and William IV. in the Royal Irish Academy. The copious Annotations to the Annals have been compiled by Philip Mac Dermott, Esq., M. D., assisted by Mr. Connellan, with valuable materials from the library of Sir William Betham. These Annotations are admitted to contain extensive and accurate information on Irish History and Antiquities ; and, together with the translation, have stood, and will be found to stand the test of learned and candid criticism. In a work published in Numbers as these Annals have been, it was difficult to arrange the materials given in the historical and topographical Notes, which have no immediate reference to the text, as it was necessary that each Number should be noted with the matter that was prepared at the time, whereas, in a Book brought out all at once, any arrangement can be adopted. Independent of the Annals, the Notes will be found to contain a great mass of materials, and much interesting and important information, not hitherto published, together with collections from various sources, rare Books and Manuscripts ; the whole forming a Compendium of Irish History, from the earliest ages to the English Invasion, with continued illustrations, to the end of the Annals in the 17th century, the great object of the present publication being to present to the Irish people as much as possible of their own History, at a moderate cost, and make it accessible to all.

With respect to the arrangement of the Annotations, it is recommended to read, rather as an Introduction to the Annals, all the Notes which have apparently no immediate reference to the text of the Four Masters, such as the articles on the various ancient Colonies that peopled Ireland, and on the History and Kings of the early ages; on the Danish Wars, on Antiquities and Topography; for, by first reading those accounts of the ancient History before the English Invasion, the matters recorded in the Annals will be elucidated, and more easily understood, and as the Anglo-Norman Invasion immediately followed the Danish Wars, they both form part of one chain of events; hence the wars of the Anglo-Normans in this country, will be more clearly comprehended by first getting an account of the Danes and Norwegians, who were the ancestors of the Normans of France who conquered England, and afterwards, under the name of Anglo-Normans, or English, came here with Strongbow and his followers, and make such a remarkable figure in Irish History; therefore, it was considered important to elucidate these affairs, which was the more particularly required, until the first part of the Four Masters can be published at some future time.

The Topography of ancient Ireland, of which an account is given in the Introduction to these Annals, forms a peculiar feature in this work; it was written about 450 years ago, but is now for the first time translated from the original Irish, and published in these Notes with copious explanations and additions. These Topographies of O'Dugan and O'Heerin may be considered as a sort of "Domesday-Book" of Irish History, containing an account of the rank, titles, and territories of the Irish Princes, Lords, and Chiefs, in the 12th, 13th and 14th centuries, thus forming a most important record, and affording invaluable information on the ancient families, and great landed proprietors. In the additions to those topographical works, ample accounts are given of the rank, genealogies, and possessions, not only of the Irish Princes and Chiefs, but of the Nobility, and families of note of English descent in Ireland, with memoirs of many eminent Irish and English historical characters; the Annotations also contain a comprehensive outline of the History of each of the five Provinces or Kingdoms, Meath, Ulster, Connaught, Leinster, and Munster, which constituted the Irish Pentarchy, together with a condensed account of the History and Antiquities of every county, and of the Ancient Literature of each of the Provinces. It is to be observed that the numerous passages in parenthesis are not in the Irish of the Four Masters, but are additions explanatory of the text, and thus introduced to avoid the inconvenience of a great number of small notes, which would otherwise be required. The Index is condensed, but at the same time sufficiently comprehensive, and will be found to contain copious references to all the names of persons, places of note, and remarkable matters recorded either in the Text or Notes.

The Publisher, grateful for the extensive patronage conferred on this Work by the Public, the friends of Irish Literature, and his numerous and highly respectable Subscribers, amounting to more than seven hundred, whose names he regrets he had not an opportunity of publishing, begs respectfully to state, that he has it in contemplation to bring out the first part of the Four Masters, and some other ancient Irish Annals, on receiving adequate public encouragement for the great expenditure required ; and to meet the wishes of learned men, and friends of Irish literature, he purposes, on receiving the names of a sufficient number of Subscribers, to give an accurate lithographic fac-simile copy of the Irish MS. of these Annals, the best means by which the Irish text can, in a perfect form, be handed down to posterity. It is generally admitted that, as to embellishments, execution and typography, the present publication is one of the best that has hitherto issued from the Irish press ; and the Map, the Illuminated Title-page, and ancient Irish Ornamental Letters, of which an account is given at the end, form remarkable features in this Book. The Publisher is happy to have been enabled, through great exertions, to complete this national work, composed by the illustrious and learned O'Clerys, and to present to his countrymen, as a rare production of Irish genius and patriotism, these faithful Annals, after they had been buried in libraries, and lost to the literary world for more than two hundred years ; and he confidently hopes, that his future undertakings in Irish literature will receive the support of all patriotic and enlightened Irishmen.

To complete the present publication in the best manner, excessive labour has been encountered, and great expenditure incurred, but no trouble or cost has been spared to render the work as perfect as possible, and a copy of it should be found in the public and private Libraries of the United Kingdom, for without these Annals the real history of Ireland must remain unknown, as they contain, together with full historical memoirs of the Anglo-Normans and English in Ireland, by far the most copious and accurate accounts, and interesting information ever published on the Milesian Irish, their Kings, Princes, Chiefs, and Clans—their laws, manners, and customs—their religious, literary, and charitable institutions, Colleges, Churches, Monasteries, and Houses of Hospitality—their Bards, Brehons, eminent Ecclesiastics, and learned men—their Music and Minstrels—their arts of War and Peace ; but are particularly rich in accounts of their military affairs, their forces and arms, their heroes and warriors, their battles and victories ; and, altogether, furnish a full and impartial record of the most important events in the entire range of Irish History.

The writers candidly reveal the vices as well as the virtues of their countrymen, and demonstrate the defects, with the good qualities, in the Celtic character, the same as that of the Celts of ancient Gaul and other countries, shewing the peculiarities of a remarkable race, so spirited, bold, brilliant, enthusiastic, and fond of fame, but prone to fierce feuds and dissensions amongst themselves, impetuous, rash, violent, wanting caution, coolness and calculation, greater talkers than thinkers—valiant, social, generous, high-minded, hospitable and humane, but too easily excited, passionate, and proud, every page of the Annals of our country exhibiting what Byron designated “The magnificent and fiery spirit of her sons.” The fierce wars of many centuries, with the Danes, Anglo-Normans, and English, must have greatly deteriorated the national character of the Irish, prevented the development of their virtues, and retarded all civilization; for rapine, anarchy, and internal discord, constantly prevailed during these sanguinary contests, which were incessantly continued for a period of more than seven hundred years, through which the Milesians fought for their national independence, against powerful foreign foes; and these Annals present a faithful picture of a people who, amidst all these adverse circumstances, were still renowned for their religious zeal, their love of literature, their hospitality, and feats of arms.

INTRODUCTION.

IN publishing for the first time, the Annals of the Four Masters, it will be necessary to give some account of that celebrated work and its authors. The Annals were composed chiefly by the O'Clerys, a very learned family, who were hereditary historians to the O'Donnells, Princes of Tyrconnel, now the county of Donegal. The O'Clerys had from the O'Donnells extensive grants of lands in Donegal, and resided at their Castle of Kilbarron, the romantic ruins of which still remain on the shore of the Atlantic near Ballyshannon. Michael O'Clery, Cucogry or Peregrine O'Clery, and Conary O'Clery, together with Peregrine O'Duigenan, a learned antiquary of Kilonan, in the county of Roscommon, were the four principal compilers: hence the work was called, The Annals of the Four Masters. The Annals are also quoted by various authors as The Annals of Donegal, from their being composed in the Franciscan Monastery of Donegal. There were, besides the above-named authors, two other eminent antiquaries and chronologers, who assisted in the compilation of the Annals; namely, Fearfeasa O'Mulconaire or O'Conery, and Maurice O'Conery, both of the county Roscommon, of the ancient and learned family of the O'Mulconaires, who were hereditary historians to the Kings of Connaught. But the chief author of the Annals was Michael O'Clery, a sketch of whose life and literary labours will not prove uninteresting. He was a native of Donegal, and born about the year 1580. Distinguished at an early age for his abilities, application, and piety, he retired to the Irish Franciscan Monastery at Louvain, where his knowledge of the Irish language and history attracted the attention of his countryman, the learned Hugh Ward, then a Lecturer at Louvain and guardian of its monastery. Ward, fully appreciating the character of O'Clery, determined to avail himself of his assistance and abilities to put into execution a project he had long formed, of rescuing from oblivion the Annals and Antiquities of his native land. Actuated by a spirit of patriotism and love of literature, O'Clery eagerly embraced the proposal, returned to Ireland, commenced his labours, and collected a vast number of ancient documents, which he transmitted to his friend at Louvain; but the lamented death of Ward put a stop for a time to his noble intentions. The learned John Colgan, also a native of Donegal, then at Louvain, afterwards made ample use of these manuscripts when compiling his Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ, and Trias Thaumaturga, those great works on the Irish Saints. O'Clery continued his collection for a period of fifteen years, travelled through all parts of Ireland, and got together all the ancient records, civil and ecclesiastical, that could be obtained, and then spent many years in arranging for publication this vast mass of materials.

Amongst the collection enumerated as used in the compilation of the Annals of the Four Masters, are mentioned the following. The Annals of Tigernach, by the learned Abbot of Clonmacnois, and the Book of Clonmacnois. The Annals of Innisfallen, composed by the learned monks of that Abbey. The Book of the Mac Bruadins, hereditary historians to the O'Briens and other tribes of Thomond. The Annals of Ulster, by Cathal Mac Guire, and Roderick O'Cassidy, celebrated antiquaries in the diocese of Clogher. The Book of Conquests. The Book of the Mac Fiebises, the learned antiquaries of Leacan, in Tireragh, county of Sligo. The Book of the O'Conrys, hereditary historians to the Kings of Connaught. The Book of the O'Duigenans of Kilonan, in Roscommon. The Book of the Island of All Saints in Loughree, and many others.

After a life spent in the service of literature and of his country, Michael O'Clery died at the Monastery of Donegal, in the year 1643, and left to posterity the reputation of a truly great and learned man.*

The Annals of the Four Masters commence at the earliest period of Irish history, and are carried down to A.D. 1616. The learned and Rev. Doctor Charles O'Connor, Librarian to the Duke of Buckingham, at Stowe, in his great work, "Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores Veteres," translated into Latin, and published with the original Irish, in the year 1824, part of those Annals, namely, to the English invasion, A.D. 1172. But the chief and more interesting portion of the work has never yet been published.

The present publication will comprise the Annals from A.D. 1171, to their termination in A.D. 1616, a period of 444 years, containing an ample account of the English invasion, and embracing by far the most important events in the whole range of Irish History.

The Annals have been carefully translated from the original Irish by Owen Connellan, Esq., Irish Historiographer to their late Majesties, George IV., and William IV., and author of a Grammar of the Irish language, &c. Copious explanatory notes are added by the Translator, and by several eminent Irish Antiquaries. Some short elucidations of the text are given in brackets. The notes will be found very valuable and comprehensive, from the assistance afforded by Sir William Betham, Ulster King of Arms, who with his usual liberality, as a patron of Irish literature, has given free access to his extensive Library, containing by far the best collection of Irish MSS., in any private hands in the kingdom, and also rich in rare Latin and English MSS. on Irish History.

In the course of the work, the notes will embody the Topographies of O'Dugan and O'Heerin, translated from the original Irish transcripts, and never before published.

John O'Dubhagáin, or O'Dugan, was the learned historian of the O'Kellys, Princes of Hy-Maine, and died A.D. 1372. O'Dugan commences his Topography thus: "Triallam timcheall na Fodla;" that is, "Let us travel over Fodla," (i. e. Ireland). And again he says: "Ni bhia duine gan duithchidh;" "No man shall be without his estate." He gives a full account of all the Chiefs and Clans of Leath Coinn (that is, of the Kingdoms of Meath, Ulster, and Connaught), and the territories they possessed at the time of the English invasion in the twelfth century.

Giolla-na-Naomh O'Huidhrin, or O'Heerin, another learned historian, who died A. D. 1420, wrote a continuation of O'Dugan's Topography, commencing thus: "Tuilleadh feasa air Eirinn oigh;" "An addition of Knowledge on sacred Erin."

* Accounts of the O'Clerys, and other writers of the Annals of the Four Masters, are found in the works of Ware, Wadding and Colgan, and in O'Reilly's Irish Writers.

O'Heerin in his work gives an account of all the Chiefs and Clans of Leath Mogha (that is, of Leinster and Munster), and the territories they possessed in the twelfth century.

Both these works are very valuable and authentic, and furnish a complete Topography of ancient Ireland, never published till now, though absolutely necessary to be known, either for the elucidation of the Annals of the Four Masters, or of any other work on Irish History. Some of the notes are unavoidably long; for otherwise a full and satisfactory account could not be given of the ancient Clans and their territories, as mentioned in those Topographies. Therefore these notes will be found clearly to elucidate all old names of places and obscure passages in the text of the Four Masters, and will also contain descriptions of all the former territorial divisions of Ireland, and of every county, with an account of their ancient and modern possessors.

The Ecclesiastical divisions will likewise be given, with an account of ancient Bishops' Sees, and the territories comprised in each Diocese.

With the last number will be given a valuable Map, accompanied with explanations showing the ancient divisions of Ireland, and the territories possessed by the Irish Chiefs and Clans, together with the chief families of Anglo-Irish Proprietors in subsequent times.

A copious Index will also be added—containing references to every remarkable matter mentioned throughout the Work, either in the text or notes.

To render these Annals one of the most important works ever published on Irish History and Antiquities, no trouble has been spared, or no available information neglected, and great expense has been incurred. All the best authorities, ancient and modern, have been consulted in the explanations of the text, and compilation of the notes; and amongst the numerous authentic sources from which information has been collected the following may be mentioned: O'Connor's Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores Veteres, and the dissertations of Charles O'Connor on the History of Ireland; O'Flaherty's Ogygia; Vallancey's Collectanea; the Histories of Ireland, by Keating, O'Halloran, Mac Geoghegan, and Moore; the Works of Ware, Usher, Colgan, De Burgo, and Lanigan; Harris's Hibernica; the Tracts of Sir John Davies; Cox's Hibernia Anglicana; Pacata Hibernia; the History and Annals of Ireland by Cambrensis, Camden, Holinshed, Hanmer, Campion, Temple, Borlase, Curry, and Leland; the Topographies of O'Brien, Seward, Lewis, and others; the various Surveys of Ireland, with all the County Histories that have been published; various ancient Maps, as those of Ortelius, Petty, and others; State Papers, Public Records, Inquisitions, and Peerages; together with numerous Irish Manuscripts, and many valuable documents in public and private collections.

The Publisher respectfully submits the Work to the consideration of his countrymen, as an impartial record of important events, consisting only of historical facts, free from all political or sectarian opinions; and he confidently expects that these Annals, without which the genuine History of Ireland must remain unknown, will prove as acceptable as they will be found interesting to Irishmen of every class and of every creed.

Dublin, January 1st, 1845.

BRYAN GERAGHTY.

DEDICATION TO FERGALL O'GARA, M.P. &c.

I INVOKE the Almighty God that he may pour down every blessing, corporal and spiritual, on Fergall O'Gara, lord of Moy O'Gara and Coolavin, one of the two knights elected to represent the county of Sligo in the parliament held in Dublin, this present year of our Lord, 1634.

In every country enlightened by civilization, and confirmed therein through a succession of ages, it has been customary to record the events produced by time. For sundry reasons nothing was deemed more profitable and honourable than to study and peruse the works of ancient writers, who gave a faithful account of the chiefs and nobles who figured on the stage of life in the preceding ages, that posterity might be informed how their forefathers employed their time, how long they continued in power, and how they finished their days.

I, Michael O'Clery, poorbrother of the order of St. Francis, (though ten years employed, under obedience to my several provincials, in collecting materials for our Irish Hagiology,) have waited on you, noble Fergall O'Gara, as I was well acquainted with your zeal for the glory of God, and the honour of your country. I perceived the anxiety you suffer from the cloud which at present hangs over our ancient Milesian race; a state of things which has occasioned the ignorance of many, relative to the lives of saints, archbishops, bishops, abbots, and other dignitaries of the church; the general ignorance also of our civil history, and of the monarchs, provincial kings, lords, and chieftains, who flourished in this country through a succession of ages, with equal want of knowledge of the synchronism necessary for throwing light on the transactions of each. In consequence of your uneasiness on this subject I have informed you that I entertained hopes of joining to my own labours the assistance of the antiquaries I held most in esteem, for compiling a body of Annals, wherein those matters should be digested under their proper heads; judging that should such a compilation be neglected at present, or consigned to a future time, a risk might be run that the materials for it would never again be brought together. In this idea I have collected the most authentic Annals I could find in my travels through the kingdom, (and, indeed, the task was difficult,) from which I have compiled this work, which I now commit to the world under your name and patronage; for you it was who set the antiquaries to work, and most liberally paid them for their labour, in arranging and transcribing the documents before them, in the Convent of Donegal, where the fathers of that house supplied them with necessary refreshments. In truth every benefit derivable from our labours is due to your protection and bounty; nor should it excite jealousy or envy that you stand foremost in this, as in other services which you have rendered your country; for by your birth you are a descendant of the race of Heber, son of Milesius, which gave Ireland thirty monarchs, and sixty-one of which race died in the odour of sanctity. To Teige, the son of Kian, son of Oilioll Olum, (who died king of Munster, A.D. 260,) from whom eighteen of those saints sprung, your pedigree can be accurately traced from one generation to another. The posterity of that Teige have had great establishments in every part of Ireland, viz. :—The race of Cormac Galeng, in Leiny of Connaught, from whom you are descended, as well as the two O'Haras of the Routes ; also the O'Carrolls of Ely, O'Maghers of Hy Cairin, and the O'Conors of Kianactha of Glengiven, (in the county of Derry.) In proof of your noble extraction, here follows your genealogy :—

FERGAL O'GARA, thou art the son of Teige, son of
 Oilioll, son of Dermot, son of Owen, son of Dermot, son of
 Owen, son of Tomaltach Oge, son of Tomaltach More, son of Dermot, son of Raighne, son of Congalach, son of Dunslevey, son of Roderick, son of Dunslevey, son of Concobar, son of Ruairc, son of Gadhra, from whom the O'Garas have derived the name, who was the son of Glethneachan, son of Saorgas, son of Bece, son of Flaithios, son of Taichleach, son of Cinnfaola, son of Dermot, son of Fionnbhar, son of Brenann, son of Nadfraoich, son of Fideoin, son of Fiodcuire, son of Art Curb, son of Niadhcurb, son of Lui, from whom Leiny,* or Leiny, derived its name, who was the son of Teige, son of Kian, son of Oilioll Olum, son of Modha Nuadhat, son of

Modha Neid, son of Dere Mac Dergtheinidh, son of Enda Monchaoin, son of Loich More, son of Mofebis, son of Muiredhach Muchna, son of Eachaidh Garbh, son of Duach Dalta Deadhaidh, son of Cairpre Lusk, son of Ionadmar, son of Niasedhaman, son of Adamar Foltchain, son of Fearcurb, son of Modha Curb, son of Cobhthach Caomh, son of Reachta Righdearg, son of Lughaidh Laigheach, son of Eachdach, son of Oilioll, son of Art, son of Lughaidh Lamhdearg, son of Eachaidh Uaircheas, son of Lughaidh Iardhuinn, son of Enda dearg, son of Duach fionn, son of Sedna Ionnaireadh, son of Breasrigh, son of Art Imligh, son of Feidhlimidh, son of Rothechtach, son of Roan Righ Ailigh, son of Failbe Iolcoraidh, son of Caisced Coimhgnidh, son of Fal Deargdoid, (or of the red finger rings,) son of Muineamon, son of Casclothach, son of Fear Arda, son of Rotheachtagh, son of Rossa, son of

* The barony of Lieny in the county of Sligo, and also an ancient district in the county of Westmeath, now the parish of Leney.

Glass, son of Nuadat Deglam, son of Eachaidh Faobharglass, son of Connaol, son of Eimhear Fionn, son of Milesius of Spain, son of Bile, son of Breogan, son of Bratha, son of Deaatha, son of Earchad, son of Aldoid, son of Nuadhad, son of Ninual, son of Eimhear glass, son of Agnon fionn, son of Lamh fionn, son of Agnamhan. &c.

On the 22nd January, 1632, this work was undertaken in the convent of Donegal, and was finished in the same convent on the 10th day of August, 1636, being the 11th year of the reign of Charles, King of England, France, Scotland, and Ireland.

I am thine affectionate friend,

Brother MICHAEL O'CLERY.

TESTIMONIALS.

THE Fathers of the Franciscan Order, subscribers hereunto, do certify that Fergal O'Gara was the nobleman who prevailed on Brother Michael O'Clery to bring together the antiquaries and chronologers, who compiled the following Annals, (such as it was in his power to collect,) and that Fergal O'Gara, aforesaid, rewarded them liberally for their labour.

This collection is divided into two parts, and from the beginning to the end has been transcribed in the Convent of the Brothers of Donegal, who supplied the transcribers with the necessary viands for their maintenance. The first volume was begun in the same Convent, A.D. 1632, when Father Bernardine O'Clery was guardian thereof.

The antiquaries and chronologers who were the collectors and transcribers of this work we attest to be Brother Michael O'Clery ; Maurice O'Maolconery, the son of Torna, who assisted during a month ; Ferfesa O'Maolconery, the son of Loghlin, (and both those antiquaries were of the county of Roscommon;) Cucogry (Peregrine) O'Clery, of the county of Donegal ; Cucogry O'Duigenan, of the county of Leitrim ; and Conary O'Clery, of the county of Donegal.

The old books they collected were the Annals of Clonmacnois, an abbey consecrated by St. Kiaran, son of the Carpenter ; the Annals of the Island of Saints, on Lough Ribh, (now Lough Ree, or that part of the Shannon between Athlone and Lanesborough) ; the Annals of Senat Mac Magnus, on Lough Erne, (in the county of Fermanagh) ; the Annals of the O'Maolconerys ; and the Annals of Kilronan, (a parish in the county of Roscommon) compiled by the O'Duigenans. These antiquaries had also procured the Annals of Leacan, compiled by the Mac Firbises, (after having transcribed the greater part of the first volume,) and from those Annals they supplied what they thought proper in the blanks they left for any occasional information they could obtain. The Annals of Clonmacnois and those of the Island of Saints came down no farther than the year of our Lord 1227.

The second part of this work commences with the year of our Lord 1208, and began to be transcribed in the present year 1635, when Father Christopher Dunlevy was guardian; and these Annals were continued down to the year 1608, when Father Bernardine O'Clery was for the second time elected guardian.

Brother Michael O'Clery above-mentioned, Cucogry O'Clery, and Conary O'Clery, were the transcribers of the Annals from 1332 to 1608. The books from which they transcribed were ; the greater part of O'Maolconery's book, ending with 1505 ; the Book of the O'Duigenans, aforesaid, from the year 900 to 1563 ; the Book of Senat Mac Magnus, ending with 1533 ; a part of the Book of Cucogry the son of Dermot, son of Teige Cam O'Clery, from the year 1281 to 1537 ; the Book of Maoilin Oge Mac Bruadin from the year 1588 to 1603 ; and the Book of Lughaigh O'Clery, from 1586 to 1602. All those books we have seen in the hands of the antiquaries who have been the compilers of the present work ; together with other records too numerous to be mentioned. In proof of what we have here set forth, we have hereunto annexed our signs manual, in the Convent of Donegal, on the 10th day of August, in the year of our Lord 1636.

Frater BERNARDINUS O'CLERY,

Guardianus Dungalensis.

Brother MAURICE DUNLEVY.

Brother MAURICE DUNLEVY.

O'DONNELL, (Prince of Tirconnell.)

ANNALS OF THE FOUR MASTERS.

A.D. 1171.

DETRUS O'MORDHA, (or O'Moore,) bishop of Clonfert Brenan,¹ originally a pious monk, was drowned in the Shannon on the 27th December.

Sadhbh (or Sabina,) daughter of Glunaiam Mae Murrogh, coarb² to Saint Bridget, died after penance.

The Cloiteach of Tealachard,³ which was crowded with people, was burned by Tiarnan O'Rourke.

Dermot Mae Murrogh, king of Leinster, who had spread terror throughout Ireland, after putting the English in possession of the country, committing excessive evils against the Irish people, and plundering and burning many churches, among which were Kells, Clonard,⁴ &c., died this year of an intolerable and uncommon disease.⁵ He became putrid while living, by the miracles of God, through the intervention of Columkille, Finnenn, and other saints of Ireland, for having violated and burned their churches. He died at Ferns without making a will, without penance, without the eucharist, and without extreme unction, as his evil deeds deserved.⁶

Maoleron Mae Gille Sechnaill, lord of Deisgeart Breagh⁷ died.

Tailtiu, daughter of Conor O'Melaghlin, the wife of Iovar O'Casey, lord of Saitne,⁸ died.

Donal, the grandson of Rory O'Mulloy, lord of Fercall,⁹ was slain by the people of Munster.

Donal O'Fogarty, lord of south Ely,¹⁰ was killed by Donal, son of Donagh, lord of Ossory:¹¹ he had committed slaughter in the two Elys, where three hundred and twenty persons fell.

A piratical fleet from Uladh¹² entered Tyrone and carried away a great number of cattle.

Niall, son of Mac Loughlin, marched with the Kinel Owen¹³ into Uladh, to plunder it. Many were slain by them; and they carried away an immense prey of cattle. Niall afterwards took hostages from Oriel.¹⁴

Manus Mae Dunslevy O'Heoghy,¹⁵ with a party

1. Brenan.—St. Brendan founded in A.D. 553, the monastery of Cluain Fearta or Clonfert, in which originated the diocese of the same name, in the barony of Longford, county of Galway, and of which he was first abbot or bishop, and died in A.D. 577.

2. Comharba, or coarb of St. Bridget.—That is, the successor of St. Bridget, or abbess of Kildare. The word coarb is applied to the successor or representative of the patron saint, or original founder of a monastery, priory, or any ecclesiastical establishment; or successor of a bishop, as the coarb of St. Patrick, that is, the successor or representative of St. Patrick at Armagh, as applied to the primates. The term Comorban is applied in the same sense by many writers.

3. Cloiteach thealcha airid; or the round tower of Tullaghard.—In a M.S. in the library of Sir William Betham, this place is mentioned as Tullaghard, near Trim, in the county of Meath.

4. Cluan Eraird, or Clonard, now a post town in the parish of the same name, in the barony of Moyfenragh, county of Meath, the original seat of the diocese of Meath, celebrated for its monastery and famous college, founded by St. Finnenn, abbot of the same monastery, and general lecturer (or reader) to the saints of Ireland, who died in A.D. 548.

5. This disease is supposed to have been the morbus pedicularis of medical writers.

6. Every Irishman, no doubt, is aware that the English invasion was accomplished through the agency of Dermot Mac Murrogh, king of Leinster, who seduced Dearvorgail, the wife of Tiarnan O'Rourke, prince of Brefney. On account of this act Roderick O'Conor, monarch of Ireland, invaded the territory of Dermot in the year 1167, and put him to flight. King Dermot was obliged, after many defeats, to leave Ireland in 1168, throw himself at the feet of Henry II., and crave his assistance, offering to become his liegeman. The English king, having received Dermot's oath of allegiance, granted by letters patent a general license to all his subjects to aid king Dermot in the recovery of his kingdom. Dermot then engaged in his cause Richard de Clare, earl of Pembroke, commonly called Strongbow, to whom he afterwards gave his daughter Eva in marriage; and through his influence an army was raised, headed by Robert Fitzstephen, Myler Fitzhenry, Harvey de Monte-Marisco, Maurice Prendergast, Maurice Fitzgerald, and others, with which in May, 1169, he landed in Bannow-bay, near Wexford, which they soon reduced together with the adjoining counties. In 1170 earl Strongbow landed at Waterford with a large body of followers, and laid siege to that city which he took. He then joined king Dermot's forces, marched for Dublin, and having defeated the monarch Roderick, entered the city, and after great slaughter made himself master of it.

of Ultonians, preyed Cul-an-tuaiseirt: he plundered Cuil Rathain (or Coleraine) and other churches. A small body of the Kinel Owen, commanded by Conor O'Cathain (or O'Kane,) overtook them, and a battle ensued, in which the Ultonians were defeated, with the loss of twenty-one King Dermot died in his castle at Ferns about the 65th year of his age. His character is drawn by various writers in the darkest colours; he was rapacious, fierce, cruel, vindictive, and of violent passions; though to gain popularity he endeavoured to conciliate the lower classes of the people. It appears he was a man of great stature and strength of body, and possessed of much personal bravery. Holingshed says, "he was a man of tall stature and of a large and great body, a valiant and bold warrior in his nation; from his continual shouting his voice was hoarse; he rather chose to be feared than to be loved, and was a great oppressor of his nobility; to his own people he was rough and grievous, and hateful unto strangers; his hand was against all men, and all men against him."

7. Deisceart Breagh.—Now the parish of Dysart in Westmeath, which, according to O'Dugan, (who died A.D. 1372,) in his topographical poem, was the property of O'Giolla Seachlin.

8. Saitne or Saithe.—This was one of the establishments referred to by Michael O'Clery in his dedication to Fergal O'Gara, as possessed by the descendants of Teige, son of Kian, son of Oilíoll Olum. According to O'Dugan, this district was the property of the O'Caseys, a clan in the county of Westmeath, where O'Dugan has fixed this district. This place is now traceable under the name Sonagh, the property of sir Hugh Morgan Tuíte, Bart., where one of the castles of De Lacy stood, who conferred the property on the Tuíte family.

9. Fear Ceall, or Fercall.—The lordship of O'Maolmnaidh or O'Mulloy, which O'Dugan places in the ancient kingdom of Meath, and which comprised the present baronies of Ballycowen, Ballyboy, and Fercall, or Elgish, in the King's county.

10. Ely, or Ely.—Ely O'Fogarty, or South Ely, now the barony of Eliogarty, in the county of Tipperary; and Ely O'Carroll lay in the south of the King's county, west of Slieve Bloom, or that portion of the county beyond the boundary of the ancient kingdom of Meath.

11. Lord of Ossraighe or Ossory.—Mae Giolla Phadraic was lord or prince of Ossory; and his ancient principality extended through the whole country between the rivers Nore and Suir, being bounded on the N. and E. by the Nore, and on the W. and S. by the Suir. The princes of Ossory make a considerable figure in Irish history, and one in particular, Donal M'Giolla Phadraic, distinguished himself in the wars with Strongbow and the English. At an early period they were dispossessed of part of their patrimony by the kings of Cashel; and the southern parts of their territories were occupied by the Butlers, afterwards earls of Ormond, and other English adventurers; but the northern parts remained with the original proprietors, who, on their connection with the English, changed their name to Fitzpatrick, and took the titles of earls of Upper Ossory. A full account of the county of Kilkenny and the clans of Ossory will be given in a future note.

12. Uladh, or Ulidia.—Ulidia comprised the present county of Down, and a part of the county of Antrim. It was also called Dal Araidhe, which took its name from Fiacha Araidhe, king of Ulster in the third century, and was latinised into Dalaradia. In a future number a full account of this territory and its clans will be given.

13. Cenel-Eoghain, or Kinel-Owen.—That is, the descendants of Owen, whose territory was called Tir-Eoghain, anglicised to Tyrone, with parts of the counties of Derry and Antrim, and which derived its name from Owen, the fifth son of Niall of the nine hostages, monarch of Ireland, in the fourth century, ancestor to the O'Neills, princes of Tyrone. Tir Chonaill, now the present county of Donegal, derived its name from his brother Conall Gulban, the ancestor of St. Columkille, and of the O'Donnells, princes of Tyrconnell. The people of those two territories chiefs and sons of chiefs, and a large portion of their army. Manus himself was wounded in the engagement, and fled from the field. He was afterwards slain by his brother, Dunslevy, aided by Giolla Aongus, son of Gillespy, a prior of monks, at Down, after having committed many depredations.

are generally designated in the annals under the denominations of Cenel-Eoghain, or the clan of Owen, and Cinel Conaill, or the clan of Connell. The Mae Loughlins were the senior branch of the O'Neills. In the course of these notes a full account will be given of Tyrone and Tyrconnell, and of the various clans who possessed those territories.

14. Orgialla.—The ancient kingdom or principality of Orgiall, comprised an extensive territory in Ulster, and was called by Ware, Usher, Colgan, and other Latin writers, Orgallia and Eryallia; and by the English Oriel and Uriel. In the beginning of the fourth century three warlike princes, called the three Collas, sons of Eochy Doimhleán, son of Cairbre Lifechar, monarch of Ireland, of the race of Heremon, made a conquest of a great part of Ulster, which they wrested from the old possessors, princes of the race of Ir, called the Clanna Rory, or Rudericians. The three Collas in the great battle of Achalethderg in Fearnuighe, in Dalaradia, on the borders of Down and Antrim, A.D. 332, defeated the forces of Fergus, king of Ulster, who was slain; and the victors burned to the ground Eamhain Macha or Emania, (near the present city of Armagh,) the famous palace of the Ultonian kings, which had stood for six centuries, and had been long celebrated by the Irish bards. The place where this battle was fought is called also Carn Achy-Leth-Derg, and is now known as the parish of Aghaderg, in the barony of Iveagh, county of Down, where there still remains a huge Carn of loose stones near Loughbrickland. The sovereignty of Ulster thus passed from the race of Ir to the race of Heremon. The names of the three chiefs were Colla Uais, or Colla the noble, Colla Meann, or Colla the famous, and Colla-da-Chrich, or Colla of the two territories. Colla Uais became monarch of Ireland A.D. 327, and died A.D. 332. The territory conquered by the three Collas comprised according to Usher, O'Flaherty, and others, the present counties of Louth, Monaghan, and Armagh, and obtained the name of Oirgiall, as stated by O'Halloran, from the circumstance of the Collas having stipulated with the monarch of Ireland, for themselves and their posterity, that if any chiefs of the clan Colla should be at any time demanded as hostages, and if shackled, their fetters should be of gold: thus, from the Irish or, gold, and giall, a hostage, came the name orgialla. The term Oriel, or Uriel, was in general confined by the English to the present county of Louth, which in former times was part of Ulster; that province extending to the Boyne at Drogheda. We find in Colgan and Mae Geoghegan, that the O'Carrolls, a noble clan of the race of the Dal Fiatachs, were at the time of St. Patrick, kings of Orgiall, or that part of it comprising the county of Louth. The Dal Fiatachs or Dalfiataeians, who founded many powerful families in Ulster, particularly in Dalaradia or Down, were descended from Fiatach Fionn, monarch of Ireland at the commencement of the second century, of the race of Heremon. The O'Carrolls continued kings of Orgiall, down to the twelfth century, when they were dispossessed by the Anglo-Normans under John de Courcy. Donogh O'Carroll, prince of Orgiall, the last celebrated head of this race, founded the great Abbey of Mellifont in Louth, in the twelfth century. The territory of Louth is mentioned in the earliest times under the names of Magh Muirtheimhne, or the Plain of Muirtheimhne, so called from Muirtheimhne, son of Breogan, uncle of Milesius, who possessed it. Part of the territory of Louth and Armagh was called Cualgne, from Cualgne, another son of Breogan, who, according to our old Annalists, was killed there in a battle between the Milesians and the Tuatha-De-Danans, about a thousand years before the christian era. Sliabh Cualgne, now Slieve Gullion mountain in Armagh, acquired its name from the same person. Louth was in ancient times also called Machaire Chonaill, or the Plain of Conall, from Conall Cearnach, or Conall Tiarnan O'Rourke, with the men of Brefne,¹⁶ plundered the people of Saithne, slew great numbers of them, and carried away an immense booty in cattle.

Another predatory excursion was made by Tiaran O'Rourke, into Deisceart Breagh, on which the Victorious, the renowned warrior, who was chief of the Red Branch knights of Ulster, about the commencement of the Christian era, and whose descendants possessed this territory. (It may be here remarked that the celebrated hero of Ossian's poems, Cuchulin, the relative and cotemporary of Couall Cearnach, had his residence at Dun-Dealgan, now Dundalk.) The descendants of Conall Cearnach were the Magennises, lords of Iveagh, in Dalaradia, or county of Down, the O'Moras, or O'Moores princes of Leix, in Kildare and Queen's county, and others. Amongst the other chief clans who possessed Louth were the Mac Canns, Mac Cartans, O'Kellys, O'Moores, O'Callaghans, O'Carraghars, Mac Colmans, Mac Campbells, Mac Ardells, Mac Kennys, O'Devins, O'Markys, O'Branagans, Mac-Scanlons, and others.

In the reign of king John, A.D. 1210, Louth was formed into a county, and acquired its name from the town of Louth, in Irish Lugh Mhagh. In the Inquisitions the county is called Lovidia. The chief Anglo-Norman or British families settled in Louth were the De Lacys, De Verdons, De Gernons, De Pepards, De Flemings, barons of Slane; the Beliefs of Barmeach, who had formerly the title of barons of Duleek; the De Berminghams, earls of Louth, a title afterwards possessed by the Pluukets, a great family of Danish descent; the Taaffies, earls of Carlingford; the Balls, Brabazons, Darcys, Dowdals, and Clintons, the Dromigools of Danish descent, &c.; the Fortescues now earls of Claremont, and in more modern times, the family of Gorges, barons of Dundalk; and the Fosters, viscounts Ferard, and barons of Oriel.

The posterity of the three Collas, called clan Colla, founded many powerful clans and noble families in Ulster and other parts of Ireland. From Colla Uais were descended the Mac Donnells, earls of Antrim in Ireland, and lords of the Isles in Scotland; also the Mac Rorays, a great clan in the Hebrides, and also many families of that name in Ulster, anglicised to Rogers.

From Colla da Chrich, were descended the Mac Mahons, princes of Monaghan, lords of Ferney, and barons of Dartree, at Conagh, where they had their chief seat. The Mac Mahons were sometimes styled princes of Orgiall. An interesting account of the Mac Mahons, of Monaghan, is given by sir John Davis, who wrote in the reign of James the First. It may be observed that several of the Mac Mahons in former times changed the name to Mathews. The other chief clans of Monaghan were the Mac Kennas, chiefs of Truagh; the Mac Cabes; the Mac Neneys, anglicised to Bird; the Mac Ardells; Mac Cassidys; O'Duffys, and O'Corrrys; the O'Cosgras, Mac Cuskers or Mac Oscars, changed to Cosgraves, who possessed, according to O'Dugan, a territory called Fearra Rois, which comprised the district about Carrickmacross in Monaghan, with the parish of Clonkeen, adjoining, in the county of Louth; the Boylans of Dartree; the Mac Gil Michaels, changed to Mitchell; the Mac Donnells; the O'Connells, and others.

This part of Orgiall was overrun by the forces of John de Courcy in the reign of king John, but the Mac Mahons maintained their national independence to the reign of Elizabeth, when Monaghan was formed into a county, so called from its chief town Muineachan, that is, the Town of Monks. The noble families now in Monaghan, are the Dawsons, barons of Cremorne; the Westenras, lords Rossmore; and the Blayneys, lords Blaney. The other chief landed proprietors are the families of Shirly, Lesley, Coote, Corry, and Hamilton.

From Colla-da-Chrich were also descended the Mac Guires, lords of Fermanagh, and barons of Enniskillen; the O'Flanagans of Fermanagh; the O'Hanlons, chiefs of Hy-Meith-Tire, now the barony of Orior in Armagh, who held the office of hereditary regal standard-bearers of Ulster; the Mac Cathans or Mac Canns of Clan Breasail, in Armagh; the O'Kellys, princes of Hy Maine, in the counties of Galway and Roscommon; and the O'Madagans or occasion he slew Giollu Enain Mac Lughadha, chief of Cuirene,¹⁷ and Mac Gilleseachnail, chief of Deisceart Breagh. O'Lamhduibh was slain on that occasion by the men of Meath. Donal Breaghagh (O'Mclaghlin) lord of East Meath, gave hostages to Tiarnan O'Rourke.

O'Maddens, chiefs of Siol Anmchadha or Silanchia, now the barony of Longford, in the county of Galway.

Colla Meann's posterity possessed the territory of Modhorn, that is, the districts about the mountains of Mourne.

That part of Orgiall, afterwards forming the county of Armagh, was possessed, as already stated, partly by the O'Hanlons and Mac Canns, and partly by the O'Neills, O'Larkins, O'Duvans, and O'Garveys of the Clanna Rory, who according to O'Brien, possessed the Craobh Ruadh, or territory of the famous Red Branch knights of Ulster; O'Hanrathys of Hy-Meith Macha; O'Donegans of Breasal Magha; and others.

The native chiefs held their independence down to the reign of Elizabeth, when Armagh was formed into a county A.D. 1586, by the lord deputy, sir John Perrott. In Pynnar's Survey of Ulster, in the reign of James the First, the following are given as the chief families of British settlers, viz:—the Atchesons, Brownlows, Powells, St. Johns, Hamiltons, Copes, Rowllstons, &c. The noble families now in Armagh, are the Atchesons, earls of Gosford; the Caulfields, earls of Charlemont; and the Brownlows, barons of Lurgan. The Hamiltons in former times had the title of earls of Clanbrassil.

In the ancient ecclesiastical divisions the territory of Orgiall was comprised within the diocese of Clogher; but in the 13th century the county of Louth was separated from Clogher and added to the diocese of Armagh. In early times there were bishops' sees at Clones and Louth, which sees were afterwards annexed to Clogher. In the early writers we find the bishops of Clogher frequently styled bishops of Orgiall and Ergallia. At present the diocese of Clogher comprises the whole of Monaghan, the greater part of Fermanagh, parts of Donegal and Tyrone, and a small portion of Louth.

The see of Armagh, founded by St. Patrick in the 5th century, became the seat of an archdiocese, and the metropolitan see of all Ireland. The diocese of Armagh comprehends the greater part of that county, with parts of Louth, Meath, Tyrone, and Londonderry, and has ecclesiastical jurisdiction over the sees of Meath, Ardagh, Kilmore, Clogher, Raphoe, Derry, Down and Connor, and Dromore.

15. Mac Duinsleibhe O'Heochada, or Mac Dunslevey O'Heoghy.—The Mac Dunsleveys were princes of Uladh or Ulidia, now the county of Down, and of the Clanna Rory of the race of Ir. The name of Roderick Mac Dunslewy, prince of Ulidia, frequently occurs in the account of the wars with John de Courcy, when the latter invaded Ulster. The name is derived from Dun a fortress, and Sleibhe, of the mountain, from the circumstance of one of the chiefs having his fortress at the mountains of Mourne. The Annalists add the name O'Heoghy, which was the original name of the family, and is still found in that country under the name of Haughey and Hoey; and the name Mac Dunslewy is also found in various parts of Ireland. This name has undergone various mutations, as Ulltach and Ulltachan in Irish, always anglicised Dunslewy, the word Ulltach shewing the origin of the family from Ulidia. Some of this clan also call themselves Nultys and Mac Nultys, which is a modification of the same name.

16. Brefne.—Brefney was divided into two principalities, viz., Brefney O'Rourke, or West Brefney, comprising the present county of Leitrim, with the barony of Tullaghagh, and part of Tullagh-onoh, in the county of Cavan; and Brefney O'Reilly, or East Brefney, now the county of Cavan; the river at Ballyconnell being the boundary between Brefney O'Rourke and Brefney O'Reilly. In a future number a full account will be given of these two territories, and all their clans.

17. Cuirene, or Machaire Cuirene.—This district comprised the present barony of Kilkenny West, in the county of Westmeath, which, according to O'Dugan and Dr. O'Brien, was the lordship of O'Tolarg.

The people of *Ily Maine*¹⁸ plundered Ormond on seven different expeditions from Palm Sunday to Low Sunday.

The church of St. Cianan of Duleek¹⁹ was plundered by the knights of Miles de Cogan. Some of them were slain on the day following by the Danes of Dublin, in revenge of their dishonour of St. Cianan.

A battle was fought at Dublin between Miles de Cogan and Asgal, son of Reginald, king of the Danes in Ireland; many fell on both sides of the English knights and Danes of Dublin, among whom was Asgal himself, John, a Norwegian from the Orkney Isles, and many others.

Roderick O'Connor, Tiarnan O'Rourke, and Murchad O'Carroll, marched with an army to Dublin to besiege the city, then in the possession of earl Strongbow and Miles de Cogan. They remained there for a fortnight, during which time many fierce engagements took place. The king marched through Leinster with the cavalry of Brefney and Oriel, and burned the corn of the English. While Roderick was thus engaged, earl Strongbow and Miles de Cogan attacked the camp of the northern Irish, slew many soldiers, and captured their provisions, armour, and horses.

The son of Cormac Mac Carthaigh (or Mac Carthy) defeated the Danes of Limerick, and slew many of them, including Foirne, son of Giolla Cainidh, and Torcar, son of Treni; he also burned the market-place and half the fortress.

18. Ith-Maine or Ily Maine.—The principality of the O'Kellys, a large territory comprised within the present counties of Galway and Roscommon, and extending from the Shannon at Lanesborough to the county of Clare, and from Athlone to Atheury in the county of Galway.

19. Duleek.—In the original Doimhliag, (that is, a house of stone,) was founded by St. Cianan, who died A.D. 489. This village which was formerly a parliamentary borough, lies in the parish of the same name about five miles S.W. of Drogheda. Duleek had in early times a famous monastery, and was the seat of a small diocese, afterwards united to the see of Meath.

20. Tanist of Brefney.—"A successor was nominated for the prince in his life-time to fill the throne after his demise. As suppose his son or brother, or the most respectable relation, they denominated him Coimree, a word translated from the finger on which the ring is worn, which comes nearest to the middle finger in situation and length. Thus Tanist, (or the heir apparent,) second to the prince in rank and authority, and from this the title of Tanistry-law is derived by Davis and Ware. Each of the other candidates of the family is called Riogh Damhna, (or heir presumptive) which is royal, that is, a subject qualified to receive the royal form. But if he was attached to any liberal or mechanical art, he was denominated Adhbhar only, which also denoted matter, (or material for a king or chief); that is, a matter disposed to be instructed in the rudiments of such an art."—O'Flaherty's Ogygia.

Tiarnan O'Rourke at the head of the men of Brefney and Oriel, marched a second time to Dublin, and attacked Miles de Cogan and his knights, but he was defeated with the loss of his son Hugh, Tanist²⁰ of Brefney, the grandson of Dermot O'Quinn, and many others.

A party of Siol Murray²¹ went on a predatory excursion into Thomond,²² they plundered Sir-taghan O'Lidiudha (Liddy,) and slew himself in a battle.

Siol Anmchadha,²³ and Muintir Cionaeth,²⁴ plundered Ely and took away a large prey in cattle.

The earl's son having gone out on a predatory excursion, plundered the churches of the plain of Leinster and a large portion of Ily Faolain, (or O'Byrne's country.)

The people of West Connaught²⁵ and a party of Siol Murray plundered the west of Corcomroe,²⁶ and carried away an immense prey in cattle.

The earl's people went on a predatory excursion and plundered Clnain Conaire, Galam, and Lathraeh Briuin, (in the county of Kildare.)

The daughter of O'Heoghy, wife of Murchad O'Carroll, lord of Oriel, died.

The Connaught squadron remained on the Shannon and on Lough Derg Deire²⁷ from November to May.

Donnell Breaghagh (O'Melaghin) concluded a peace with Tiarnan O'Rourke; and the people of East Meath submitted to him.

21. Siol Muireadhaigh or Murray.—The descendants of Muireadhaeh Muilleathan, king of Connaught, who died A.D. 700. The O'Conors were chiefs of this territory, and many of them were kings of Connaught. An account of this territory, and all its clans will be given in a future number.

22. Thomond.—Tuadh Mumhan or North Munster, which formed in ancient times a kingdom in itself, and of which a full account will appear in a future number.

23. Siol Anmchadha.—Now the barony of Longford, in the county of Galway, and the parish of Lismagh, on the other side of the Shannon in the King's county, of which according to O'Dugan, O'Madagain, (O'Madden,) and O'Huallachain, were chiefs.

24. Muintir Cionaeth.—The family of O'Kenny, or as they are now called, Kenny, were, according to O'Dugan, chiefs of Clann Laitheamhain, conjointly with the family of O'Finnegan: their district lay in the west of the county of Roscommon, along the Shannon.

25. West Connaught or Iar Connacht.—Now Connemara in the west of the county of Galway, of which O'Flaherty was principal chief. This territory was bounded on the east by Lough Corrib and Lough Mask, and on the west by the Atlantic Ocean; and comprised the baronies of Moycullen and Ballinahinch, and the half barony of Ross.

26. Corcomroe.—In the original Coreumdruadh, or Corcomdruadh, east and west. This territory derived its name from Core

Henry the Second, king of England, duke of Normandy, earl of Anjou, and lord of many other countries, came to Ireland this year with a fleet of two hundred and forty ships, and landed at Waterford.²³

A.D. 1172.

Brighdein O'Kane, coarb of St. Maedhog,¹ died.

Giolla Aodha O'Muidhin (O'Mugin) of the people of Lough Con, bishop of Cork, died. He was distinguished for his piety, continence, and wisdom.

Tigearnagh O'Maoileoin, (Malone) coarb of St. Kieran² at Clonmaenois, died.

Tiarnan O'Rourke, lord of Brefney and Conmaicne,³ for a long time a very powerful chieftain, was treacherously slain at Tlaghtgha⁴ by Hugo de Lacy and Donal, son of Annadh O'Rourke, one of his own tribe. He was beheaded and ignominiously carried to Dublin; his head was placed over the town-gate, and his body was gibbeted with his feet upwards, on the north side of the city, a woful spectacle to the Irish.⁵

Donal O'Ferrall, chief of Conmaicne, was slain by the people of the king of England.

Maolmaire Mac Murchadha, chief of Muintir Birne, was slain by Hugh Mac Aengusa (or Magen-nis, and by the Clan Hugh, (the tribe name of the Magennises,) of Ulidia.

Dermod O'Caolaidhe (Keely,) died.

The Kinel Owen were defeated by Flaithbheartach O'Maoldoraidh⁶ and the people of Tirconnell, who committed great slaughter among them by the miracles of God, through the intervention of St. Patriek and St. Columkille, whose churches they plundered.

The fourth visitation of the entire province of Connaught, and as far as Armagh, was made by Giolla-Mae-Liag (Gelasius,) coarb of St. Patriek, and primate of Ireland. (He died in A.D. 1174, in the 87th year of his age.)

Mae Gillepseoir (Mac Gillespy,) chief of the Clan Aeilabra, Brehon (or judge) of the tribe of Monaig, was treacherously slain by Dunslevy O'Heoghaidh, king of Ulidia; the Ulidian nobles, who were the sureties between them, were the persons who slew him.

The people of Anghaile (Anally,) and Muintir Megiollgain, were treacherously plundered by the son of Annadh O'Rourke and the English, who took much cattle and booty. They afterwards marched to Ardagh of bishop Mel, plundered all the country, and slew Donal O'Ferrall, chief of Anally.⁷

Feardoid, third son of Fergus, by Meadhbh or Maud, queen of Connaught, in the beginning of the Christian era, from whom descended O'Loughlin of Burren, and O'Conor Corcomroe, lords of the baronies of Burren and Corcomroe, in the county of Galway.

27. An expansion of the Shannon in the county of Tipperary.

28. Henry II. landed at Waterford on St. Luke's day, the 18th of October, A.D. 1171, with an army consisting of 500 knights, and about 4000 men at arms.—Lanigan.

1. St. Maedhog was the founder of the monastery of Ferns, which afterwards became the seat of a diocese, of which he was first bishop. He died on the 31st of January, A.D. 632, and was interred at Ferns. He was a native of Brefney, where he founded monasteries and churches at Dromlane and Rosinver. His original name was Aodh Og, that is, Young Hugh, to which, after he became a celebrated ecclesiastic or saint, was prefixed the pronoun Mo or "My," a title of respect in those days, precisely as at present used in the address "My Lord."

2. St. Kieran, who founded the monastery of Clonmacnois, afterwards a bishops' see, in the parish of the same name, in the barony of Garrycastle, King's county, died on the 9th of September, A.D. 459.

3. Conmaicne.—There were several districts of this name in Connaught, the inhabitants of which were called Conmaicne, or the descendants of Conmac, one of the three sons of queen Maud of Connaught, whom she bore at one birth for Fergus Mac Roy, the exiled king of Ulster, about the beginning of the Christian era. This place was designated Conmaicne of Moyrein, in Brefney O'Rourke, which, according to O'Flaherty, extended into the county of Longford. Under the date A.D. 1475 it is stated that Fenagh, in the barony of Leitrim, and county of Leitrim, lay in Moyrein, and by some authorities Conmaicne of Moyrein and Muintir Eoluis were considered identical. The Mac Rannalls, (anglicised to Reynolds) were the principal chiefs of Muintir Eoluis, which territory comprised the southern part of the county of Leitrim, and extended from Slieve-an-Iarain and Lough Allen, to Slieve Carbury, west of Balona, in the county of Longford, and contained the castles of Rinn, Lough Scur, and Leitrim, (See Annals under the year 1490,) and the monasteries of Fenagh, Mohill, and Cloon. Under the year 1562 it is stated that the power of O'Rourke extended from Caladh, in the territory of Hy Maine, (in the county of Roscommon) to Droghda, or Droos, on the borders of Leitrim, Donegal, and Sligo, and from Granard in Taffa or Teffia, in the county of Longford, to the strand of Eohuile, in the barony of Tireragh, and county of Sligo, near Ballysadare; and it may therefore be inferred that Conmaicne of Moyrein extended as far as Granard. It is stated however, under the present year 1172, that Donal O'Ferrall, of the Anally family, was chief of Conmaicne, or that portion of Longford adjoining the county of Leitrim.

4. Tlaghtgha.—A hill near Athboy, in the barony of Lune, county of Meath. Mr. Hardiman, in his Statute of Kilkenny, states that this is now called the Hill of Ward, between Athboy and Trim. It is stated by O'Flaherty that a fire temple of the Druids stood here in the time of paganism, and that in the reign of Tuathal Teachtmair, monarch of Ireland in the second century, solcunn conventions were held here every year on the night of the last day of October, or the feast of Samhain, to appease the gods by immolating victims and raising fires.

5. The Kingdom of Meath.—Tiarnan O'Rourke, prince of Brefney, was married to the daughter of Murtagh O'Melaghlin, king of Meath. The ancient kingdom of Meath was formed in the second century by Tuathal Teachtmair, (or Tuathal the Acceptable,) who was monarch of Ireland from A.D. 130 to A.D. 160, by the combination of a portion from each of the then four provinces or king-

A general synod of Ireland, both of the clergy and chief laity, was held at Tuam in Connaught, at which Rory O'Connor and Cadhla O'Duffy, archbishop of Tuam, presided; three churches were consecrated.

A.D. 1173.

Murragh O'Cobhthaidh (Coffey,) bishop of Derry and Raphoe, died. He was a man of pure chastity, a precious stone, a transparent gem, a brilliant star, a treasury of wisdom, and chief conservator of the canons of the church; after bestowing food and raiment on the poor and needy, doms, and their annexation to Meath: hence it became a Cuigeadh, or fifth province, which term was afterwards and has been to the present applied to a province. The Irish name is Midhe, or, according to some authorities, Meidhe, which signifies a neck, because it was formed by a portion or neck taken from each of the four provinces. Others derive it from Midhe, who was chief Druid to Nemedius, and by whom the first sacred fire was kindled in Ireland at Uisneach. By the Latin writers it is written Midia and Medina. According to Keating, Meath contained eighteen territories called Triochas, thirty townlands in each territory, twelve ploughlands in each townland, and a hundred and twenty acres in each ploughland. He describes its boundaries as extending from the Shannon eastward to Dublin, and from Dublin to the river Righ, (now the Rye water, which falls into the Liffey at Leixlip,) then by a line drawn through Kildare and the King's county to Birr, from the Righ westward to Chun Conrach, from thence to French-Mill's ford, and to the Cmar (or junction) of Clonard, (on the southern border of Meath,) thence to Tochar Cairbre, (the bog pass of Carberry, in the barony of Carberry, and county of Kildare,) thence to Geashill, (King's county,) to Drumchuillin, (a parish in the barony of Eglish, and King's county,) and to the river called Athlain Chara (probably the Little Brosna, or the river flowing into the Shannon from Lough Couragh, between Frankford and Birr,) thence by the Shannon northwards to Athlone, and Lough Ribh (or Lough Ree, a part of the Shannon between Westmeath and Anally or Longford on one side, and Roscommon on the other,) and finally thence to Drogheda, being bounded on the north by Brefney and Orgiull. Thus the ancient kingdom of Meath comprised the present counties of Meath and Westmeath, with parts of Dublin, Kildare, King's county, the greater part of Longford, and small portions of Brefney and Orgiull on the borders of the present counties of Cavan and Louth.

The great plain of Meath which included the greater parts of the present counties of Meath and Dublin, was known by the name of Magh Breagh, signifying the Magnificent Plain, mentioned by the Latin writers under the name of Bregia, and by O'Connor, (Rev. Hib. Scrip. Vol. I.) as Campus Brigantium, or the Plain of the Brigantes, from being possessed by the Brigantes, who were called by the Irish Clanna Breogain. Part of the territory of Bregia obtained the name of Fingal from the Danes, or rather Norwegians, who planted a colony there in the tenth century, along the coast between Dublin and Drogheda, and who were called by the Irish Fionn Ghaill, signifying the Fair-haired Foreigners: hence the name Fingal. The plain of Bregia extended from Dublin to Drogheda, and thence to Kells, and contained the districts about Tara, Trin, Navan, Athboy, Dunboyne, &c. Another great division of ancient Meath was called Teabhtha or Tefia, which comprised the present county of Westmeath, with parts of Longford and the King's county.

Meath was for many ages the seat of the Irish monarchy; and from the kings of Meath were generally elected the monarchs of Ireland. From the earliest period to the fifth century the monarchs of Ireland were occasionally elected from the descendants of each of the three sons of Milesius, namely, from the races of Heber, ordaining priests, deacons, and clergymen of every degree, repairing and consecrating many ecclesiastical establishments and cemeteries, building many monasteries and abbeys, performing every clerical duty, and gaining the victory of devotion, pilgrimage, and penance, his spirit departed to heaven, in the Black Abbey church of Columkille, at Derry, on the 10th day of February. A great miracle was performed on the night of his death, viz:—the dark night became bright from dusk till morning, and it appeared to the inhabitants that the adjacent parts of the globe were illuminated; and a large body of fire moved over the town and remained Heremon, and Ir. From the fifth to the eleventh century, during a period of six hundred years, the Hy Nialls of the race of Heremon held exclusive possession of the Irish monarchy, until A.D. 1002, when Brian Boromhe, king of Munster, of the race of Heber, dethroned Malachy the Second, and became monarch of Ireland.

The Hy-Nialls took their name from their immediate ancestor, Niall of the Nine Hostages, who was monarch of Ireland from A.D. 379 to A.D. 406. They were divided into two great families, denominated the northern and southern Hy Nialls. One branch of the northern Hy Nialls consisted of the O'Neills, who were descended from Eoghau, one of the sons of Niall of the Hostages, and were princes of Tyrone, and in many instances kings of Ulster, and monarchs of Ireland: the other branch consisted of the O'Donnells, princes of Tyreconnell, and some of whom were also monarchs of Ireland, who were descended from Conall Gulban, another son of the monarch Niall.

The southern Hy Nialls were descended from four other sons of Niall, but chiefly from his son Conall Criomthann, many of whose descendants were kings of Meath, and monarchs of Ireland. This family took the name of Clan Colman, from Colman More, son of Dermot, son of Criomthann, and monarch of Ireland, from A.D. 554 to A.D. 565. The descendants of the Clan Colman, kings of Meath, took the name of O'Maolseachlainn or O'Melaghlin, from Maolseachlainn or Malachy, monarch of Ireland, their ancestor in the tenth century.

The ancient monarchs had four royal palaces in Meath, namely, at Teamair or Tara, at Tailten, at Theltega, and at Uisneach. Amergin, the celebrated bard of Dermot, monarch of Ireland in the sixth century, derives the name of Teamair from Tea, the queen of Heremon, who was buried there, and Mur, which signifies "Mound," hence Tea Mur, or the Mound of Tea. By Latin and English writers it is named Temoria and Temor, and was celebrated for the great national conventions held there, called the Feis Tamhrach. Tailten obtained its name from Tailte, queen of Eochaidh, son of Eire, the last king of the Firbolgs, who was buried there. This place was long celebrated for the great assemblies of the people held there annually in August, at which various sports and recreations similar to the Olympic games of Greece were exhibited, and marriage contracts ratified. It is known as Teltown, near the river Blackwater, between Kells and Navan. Theltega, according to the Annals of the Four Masters, was situated near Athboy, and was celebrated as a seat of Druidism. The hill of Uisneach, in the barony of Rathconrath, in Westmeath, between Mullingar and Athlone, was another great seat of Druidism.

The chiefs and clans of the kingdom of Meath, and the territories they possessed in the twelfth century, are given in O'Dugan's Topography as follows: to which are added various clans not mentioned by O'Dugan, but whose names are collected from other sources. I. O'Melaghlin, kings of Meath. Of this family Murtoch O'Melaghlin was king of Meath at the period of the Anglo-Norman invasion, when the kingdom of Meath was granted by Henry II., to Hugh de Lacy. II. O'Hairt or O'Hart; O'Riagain or O'Regan; and O'Ceallaigh or O'Kelly, whom O'Dugan styled prin-in the south east; all the people rose from their beds, for they thought it was day; and it (the light) continued so eastward along the sea.

Conaing O'Haengusa (Henesey,) chief eanon of Roserea, died.

Edru O'Miadhachain (O'Meehan,) bishop of Cluain (Clonard,) died at an advanced age, after a well-spent life.

Cionadh O'Ronan, bishop of Glendalough, died.

Maolmochta O'Maolseachnaill, abbot of Clonmacnois, died.

A great prey was taken by Hugh Magennis and the Clan Hugh. They plundered the Trian More of Armagh. He (Hugh) was, however, killed three months afterwards.

Domhnall Breaghaeh (Donald of Bregia) O'Melaghlin, king of Meath, was slain at Durrow of Columkille, by his own brother Arthur, aided by Muintir Laighachain.

Giolla-Mac-Liag (Gelasius,) son of Rory, successor to St. Patrick, primate of Armagh, and of all Ireland, a son of chastity, and pure of heart towards God and man, died happily, on the 27th of Mareh, being the Wednesday before Easter, in the 87th year of his age. He had been sixteen years in the Abbey of Columkille, at Derry, before his elevation to the see of Armagh.

ces of Tara. According to the book of Clonmacnois, quoted by Hardinian in his Statute of Kilkenny, page 7, the O'Kellys were lords of Bregia, long before the Anglo-Norman invasion. The O'Kellys of Bregia, it appears, were of a different race from the O'Kellys of Hy Maine, being a branch of the southern Hy Nialls, and descended from Aodh Slaine, monarch of Ireland: the son of Dermot was also monarch of Ireland, in the sixth century. III. O'Congalaidh, probably O'Connolly, whom O'Dugan describes as one of the four princes of Tara. IV. O'Ruaidhri or O'Rory, now anglicised to Rogers, lord of Fionn Fochla, in Bregia. V. O'Falamhain or O'Fallon, lord of Criche-na-g-Ceadach, so called from Oilioll Cedach, son of Cathair More, king of Leinster, and monarch of Ireland in the second century. The country of the O'Fallons was near Athlone, in the county of Westmeath, but they were afterwards driven across the Shannon into Roscommon. VI. O'Coindealbhain or O'Kendellan, or O'Connellan, prince of Ibh-Laoghaire, or Ive-Leary which, according to Mac Geoghegan and others, was an extensive territory in the present counties of Meath and Westmeath, and was possessed by the descendants of Laoghaire, monarch of Ireland at the time of St. Patrick. The parish of Castletown Kendellan in Westmeath shows one part of this ancient territory, and the townland of Kendellan's town near Navan shows another part of it. O'Braoin or O'Breen, chief of Luighne, now the parish of Leney, in the barony of Corcaree, Westmeath. VIII. O'Haongusa or O'Hennesey, chief of Hy-Mac-Uais, now the barony of Moygoish, in Westmeath. The Clan Mac Uais, or Mac Eyoys, sometimes called Mac Veaghs, of the race of Clan Colla, were the original chiefs of this territory. IX. O'Haodha, supposed to be O'Hughes or O'Heas, chief of Odhbha, (probably Odra or Oddor, in the barony of Skrine, near Tara.) X. O'Dubhain or O'Duvin, chief of Cnodbha, probably Knowth near Slane. XI. O'Hainbeith or O'Hanvey, chief of Fearbile, now the barony of Farbill in Westmeath. XII. O'Cathasaigh or O'Casey, chief of Saithne, now Sonagh in Westmeath, [See note on Saithne.] XIII. O'Leochain or O'Loughan, chief of Gailenga, now the parish of Gallen, in the barony of Garrycastle, King's county. XIV. O'Donchadh or O'Donoghoe, chief of Teallach Modharain, probably now Tullamore, in the King's county. XV. O'Hionradhain or O'Hanrahan, chief of Corcaraidhe, now the barony of Corcaree in Westmeath. XVI. O'Maolmuaidh or O'Mulloy, prince of Ferceall, comprising the present baronies of Ballycowen, Ballyboy, and English or Fercall. XVII. O'Dubhlaidhe or O'Dooley, chief of Fertullach, the present barony of Fertullagh, in Westmeath. XVIII. O'Fionnallain or O'Finnellan, of the race of Heber, and tribe of the Dalcassians, lord of Delbhna Mor, now the barony of Delvin, in Westmeath. XIX. O'Maollugach or O'Mulledy, chief of Broghia, part of the now baronies of Delvin and Farbill. XX. Mac Cochlain or Mac Coghlan, of the Dalcassians, lord of Dealbha-Eathra, now the barony of Garrycastle, in the King's county. XXI. O'Tolairg or O'Toler, chief of Cuirene, now the barony of Kilkenny West, in Westmeath. XXII. Mac Eochagain or Mac Geoghegan, prince of Cenel Fiaheaidh, now the barony of Moycashel, with parts of Rathconrath, and Fertullagh. The Mac Geoghegans were one of the principal branches of the Clan-Colman, and were called Cenel Fiaeha, from one of the sons of Niall of the Hostages. XXIII. Mac Ruairc or Mac Rourke, chief of Aicme-Enda, descended from Enda son of Niall of the Hostages. This clan was located in the district in which is situated the Hill of Uisneach, in the barony of Rathconrath in Westmeath. XXIV. O'Cairbre or O'Carberry, chief of Tuath Binn. XXV. O'Heochadhia or O'Heoghy, chief of Cenel-Aengusa. XXVI. O'Maelcolain, chief of Delvin Beag, or Little Delvin, adjoining the barony of Delvin.

Teathbha or Tefia, as before mentioned, formed a great portion of the ancient kingdom of Meath. O'Flaherty states that Tefia, which became the territory of Maine, one of the sons of Niall of the Hostages, and of his descendants, comprehended the greater part of the present county of Westmeath, with nearly the whole of Anally, or the county of Longford. It was divided into north and south Tefia. North Tefia, or Cairbre Gabhra, was that portion of Anally about Granard, which obtained its name from Cairbre, one of the sons of Niall of the Hostages, and his descendants, who were its possessors. South Tefia comprised the remaining portion in Anally and Westmeath. O'Dugan, in the continuation of his Topography of Meath, enumerates the different chiefs and their territories in Tefia. The principal chiefs of Tefia, according to him, were the following:--I. O'Catharnaigh or O'Kearney. II. O'Cuinn or O'Quinn. III. O'Coinfiachla, now O'Convally. IV. O'Lachtinain, or O'Loughnan, by some anglicised to Loftus. V. O'Muircagain, or O'Murrigan. The O'Quinns were chiefs of Muintir Giolgain, and had their chief castle at Rathcline, in Longford. The other chiefs were:--I. O'Flannigain or O'Flanagan, chief of Comar, which O'Dugan places beside O'Braoin's country. II. O'Braoin or O'Breen, of Breaghmuine, now the barony of Brawney in Westmeath. III. Mac Conmadha or Mac Conway of Muintir Laodagain. IV. Mac Aodha or Mac Hugh of Muintir Tlamain. V. Mac Taidhg or Mac Teige, (by some anglicised to Tighe, by others to Montague,) of Muintir Siorthachain. VI. Mac Amhalgaidh or Mac Gawley, chief of Calraidhe or Calrigia, a territory on the borders of Westmeath and the King's county. Mac Geoghegan states that this territory comprised the barony of Kilcourcey, in the King's county. Count Magawley of the Austrian service, was of this ancient clan. VII. Mac Garghamna or Mac Gaffney, of Muintir Maolsionna. VIII. O'Dalaigh or O'Daley, of Corea Adhaimh, or Coreaduin. On the map of Ortelius, by O'Conor, O'Daly is given as in, or contiguous to, the barony of Clonlunan, in Westmeath. IX. O'Scolaidhe or O'Scully, of Dealbha Iarthar or West Delvin. X. O'Comhraidhe, anglicised to Curry, of Hy Mac Uais, the present barony of Moygoish in Westmeath. O'Haodha, or O'Hugh, or O'Hea, of Tir Teabtha Shoir, or East Tefia. XII. O'Cearbhaill or O'Carroll, of Tara. XIII. O'Duinn, O'Doyne or O'Dunn, of the districts of Tara. XIV. Mac Giolla Seachloinn or O'Shaughlin, of Deisceart Breagh, now the parish of Dysart in Westmeath. XV. O'Ronain of Cairbre Gaura, or northern Tefia. XVI. O'Haongusa or O'Hennesey, of Galinga beag, now the parish of Gallen, in the King's county.

A.D. 1174.

Maol Iosa O'Conaghtan, bishop of Sial Murray, (Elphin,) died.

Maol Patrick O'Banan, bishop of Conor and Dal Araidhe (Down,) a venerable man, full of sanctity, meekness, and purity of heart, died happily in Hy of Columkille, (Iona in the Hebrides,) at a good old age.

Giolla Machaidhbco, (latinised Maccabeus,) abbot of Peter and Paul's monastery at Armagh, a zealous and efficient servant of Christ, died on the 31st of March, in the 70th year of his age.

Flann (Florence) O'Gorman, chief professor (or lecturer) of Armagh and of all Ireland, a learned and erudite doctor of divinity and moral law, having studied twenty years in France and England, and passed twenty more governing and superintending the schools of Ireland, died happily on the Wednesday before Easter, in the 70th year of his age.

Murghes O'Dubhthaigh (or Maurice O'Duffy,) abbot of the monastery of Ath-da-la-arg at Boyle, died.

Rory O'Cearbhaill (or O'Carroll,) lord of Ely, was killed on Inis Clothran, (an island in Lough Ree on the Shannon, in the county of Longford.)

Congalach O'Coinfiacra, lord of Teathba, died.

The following chiefs and clans in Meath and Westmeath have not been given by O'Dugan, O'Sionnaigh, anglicised to Fox, of the southern Hy Nialls, lords of Maithir Tadhguin, an extensive territory in Tella, containing parts of the baronies of Rathconrath and Cloonlara in Westmeath, with part of the barony of Kilconrey, in the King's county. The head of this family was distinguished by the title of The Fox, and obtained large grants of lands from queen Elizabeth, with the title of lord of Kilconrey. The O'Malones, a branch of the O'Conors, kings of Connaught, who had large possessions in the barony of Brawney, in Westmeath. In former times these chiefs had the title of barons of Clan-Malone and afterwards obtained that of barons Sanderlin, of Lake Sanderlin, in Westmeath. The O'Fogans, a numerous clan, in Meath and West Meath, of which there were many respectable families, the head of which had the title of baron of Feltrim in Fingal. The following also were clans of note in Westmeath, viz:--the O'Connors, and O'Higgins. In Meath O'Leinseachs, or O'Lyneches, O'Murphys, and O'Murrays, the O'Brogans, and others. The chiefs and clans of ancient Meath were, with few exceptions, of the race of the southern Hy Nialls. There are now but few families of any note, descendants of the ancient chiefs of Meath.

In the year 1172 Henry II., granted to Hugh de Lacy for the service of fifty knights, the whole kingdom of Meath, of which that chieftain was made lord Palatine, with as full and ample powers as Murchlord O'Molaghlán, then king of Meath, who was dispossessed. The original charter in Latin, conferring the grant, will be given in the course of this work. De Lacy divided Meath amongst his various chiefs, who were commonly denominated de Lacy's barons. Hugh Tyrrell obtained Castleknock; and his descendants were for a long period barons of Castleknock. Gilbert de Angulo or Nangle, obtained Magheristeen, now the barony of Morgallion, in Meath. Jocelin, son of Gilbert Nangle, obtained Navan and Ardaraean. The Nangles were afterwards barons of Navan. Many of the Nangles took the Irish name of Mac Costello, and from them the barony of Costello in Mayo derived its name. William de Missett obtained Lun; and his descendants were barons of Luncarty Trillick.

Adam Felpo or Pimpoe obtained Slrinc, Santreff, or Santry, and Clontorth, (either Clontark or Clontarf.) This family had the title of barons of Slrinc, which title afterwards passed to the family of Marward. Gilbert Fitz-Thomas obtained the territories about Kenlis; and his descendants were barons of Kells. Hugh de Hese obtained Dees or the barony of Dees in Meath. The Husesys were made barons of Crathra. Richard and Thomas Fleming obtained Crandon and other districts. The Flemings became barons of Slane, and a branch of the family viscounts of Longford. Adam Dillard or Dillard obtained Dullenevarty. Gilbert de Nugent obtained Delvin and his descendants were barons of Delvin, and earls of Westmeath. Richard Tuile received large grants in Westmeath and Longford. The Tuiles received the title of barons of Moyashell, in Westmeath. Robert de Lacy received Rathwire in Westmeath, of which his descendants were barons. Jeffrey de Constantine received Kibbrey in Westmeath, of which his descendants were barons. William Pelic received Castlebreck and Magheristherinan, now the barony of Magheradernon in Westmeath. The Petits received the title of barons of Mullingar. Myler Fitz-Henry obtained Magheranran, Rathkenin and Athinorker, now Ardnoreher. Richard de Lachapelle, brother to Gilbert Nugent, obtained much land.

The following great families, either of English or Norman descent, settled in Meath in early times. The de Genevilles succeeded the de Lacys as lords of Meath; and afterwards the great family of Mortimer, earls of March in England. The Plumketts, a family of Danish descent, became earls of Fingal, and branches of them barons of Dunsaney, and earls of Louth. The Prestons, viscounts Gormanstown, and another branch viscounts of Tara. The Barnwalls, barons of Trimblestown, and viscounts Kingsland. The Nettervilles, barons of Dowth. The Bellevs, barons of Dulceek. The Dareys of Platten, some of whom were barons of Navan. The family of Jones were afterwards barons of Navan. The Cusacks, barons of Clonmullen. The Fitz-Eustaces, barons of Portlester.

The following were also families of note in Meath. The de Batthes of Athearn. The Dowdalls of Athlumney. The Flenings of Staholmock. The Betaghs of Moynalty, of Danish descent. The Cruises of Cruisetown and Cruis-Rath, &c. The Drakes of Drake-Rath. The Corballys. The Everards. The Cheevers, some of whom had the title of barons of Mount Leinster. The Dardises. The Delahoids. The Balfies. The Berfords. The Cad-dells. The Scurlocks or Sherlocks. The Dillons. In more modern times the following families of note. The Brabazons, earls of Meath. The Butlers, barons of Dunboyne. Wharton, baron of Trim. Seomberg, viscount Tara. Cholmondeley, viscount Kells. Hamilton, viscount Boyne. Colley Wesley or Wellesley, of Dangan, earl of Mornington, afterwards marquess Wellesley, and duke of Wellington. The Taylors, earls of Beville, and marquesses of Headfort. The Hlghs, earls of Darnley. The marquess Conyngham at Slane. Langford Rowley, baron of Summerhill. The Gerards, Garnetts, Barneses, Lamberts, Napper of Lougherew, Wallers, Tisdalls, Winters, Coddingtons, Nicholson, and Thomsons, respectable families in modern times in Meath.

In Westmeath the following great families of English descent were located, together with those already enumerated. The Dillons, who according to Lodge's Peerage, by Areladall, were originally descended from a branch of the southern Hy Nialls; their ancestor, a chieftain named Dillune or Delion, in the seventh century, went to France, and being a famous warrior, became duke of Aquitaine. One of his descendants came to Ireland with king John, and got large grants of lands in Westmeath and Anally, his descendants were lords of Drumrany, in the barony of Kilkenny West, and having founded many great families in Meath and Connaught, became earls of Roscommon, viscounts Dillon in Mayo, barons of Clonbrock, and barons of Kilkenny West, and several of them were counts and generals in the French and Austrian service. The Daltons and Delaneres obtained large possessions in Westmeath and Anally. The chief seat of the Daltons was at Mount Dalton, in the barony of Rathconrath, of which they were lords, and some of them distinguished in the service of foreign states, and were counts of the Holy Roman Empire. The Deases in Meath and Westmeath.

Mulrooney O'Kiardha, (O'Keary,) lord of Cairpre (Carbury in Meath,) was treacherously slain by the English of Dublin, assisted by Mac Turnin, by the son of Hugh O'Ferrall, and by Keallagh O'Finnellan, lord of Delvin More.

The diocese of Westmeath, (the ancient see of Fore,) was annexed to the abbacy (or see) of Clonmacnoise by a general decree of the clergy of Ireland.

Earl Strongbow having marched with an army into Munster, Roderick O'Conor, (king of Connaught,) proceeded thither with his forces to oppose him. When the English received intelligence of Roderick's advance, they sent for reinforcements to Dublin, who marched with all possible speed to Thurles. Donal O'Brien advanced thither at the head of the Dalcassians, (clans of Clare,) and battalions from West Connaught, and with a large army of the Siol Murray, (clans of Roscommon,) besides the numerous and select army commanded by king Roderick. A fierce battle ensued, in which the English were defeated by means of great valour. Seven hundred of them having been slain, the few who survived fled in dismay with the earl to Waterford. O'Brien after the victory returned home.

Maolscahlain O'Donagan, lord of Aradh,¹ was slain by O'Conor.

A.D. 1175.

O'Brien or O'Byrne, (Malachy,) bishop of Kildare, died.

Maol Iosa, son of Cleraighchuir, and Giolla Donal Mac Cormack, his successor, both bishops of Ulidia, (Down,) died.

Flaithbertagh O'Brolchain, coarb of Columkille,¹ a tower of wisdom and hospitality, to whom the clergy of Ireland had given a bishop's see for his great virtues and superior wisdom, and offered the superintendence of the monastery of Iona, after a patient suffering died, at the Black Abbey church of Derry. He was succeeded in the abbey by Giolla Mac Liag O'Brennan.

The Kinel Enda² were defeated in battle with much slaughter, by Eachmarcach O'Kane and Neill O'Gormley.

Manus O'Maolsachlain, (or O'Melaghlin,) lord

In more modern times are the following families having titles in Westmeath. The Rochforts, earls of Belvidere, and de Ginkells, earls of Athlone.

In Meath the following baronets are located, viz.:—sir William Somerville, sir Henry Meredith, sir Francis Hopkins, sir Charles Dillon; and in Westmeath the following:—sir Percy Nugent, and count Nugent, sir Richard Nagle, sir John Bennet Piers, sir Richard Levinge, and sir John O'Reilly.

Meath constituted the chief part of the English Pale, and was divided into the counties of East and West Meath, in the reign of Henry VIII., but its extent was diminished, as East Meath in early times contained parts of Dublin and Kildare, and West Meath contained parts of Longford and King's county.

The Ecclesiastical Divisions of ancient Meath were as follows: It contained several small bishops' sees, namely, Clonard, Duleek, Ardbracan, Trim, Kells, Slane, Dunshaughlin, and Killskyre, in East Meath, with Fore and Uisneagh or Killere, in Westmeath. All those sees were consolidated in the twelfth century, and formed into the diocese of Meath. In the year 1568 the ancient see of Clonmacnois, in Westmeath and King's county, was annexed to the diocese of Meath. The ancient see of Lusk, which lay in the kingdom of Meath, was united to the diocese of Dublin. The diocese of Meath is one of the ten which constitute the ecclesiastical province of Armagh, and comprehends almost the whole of the counties of Meath and Westmeath, a large portion of the King's county, with parts of Kildare, Longford, and Cavan, being nearly co-extensive with the ancient kingdom of Meath.

6. The O'Muldorries were princes of Tirconnell, prior to the O'Donnells, and are supposed to be the same sept.

7. Anghaile or Anally, which was formed out of the ancient territory of Teffia, comprised the whole of the county of Longford, and was the principality of O'Ferrall of the Clanna Rory. His chief residence was in the town of Longford, anciently called Longphort-ui-Fhearghail, or the fortress of O'Ferrall. It appears that this territory was divided into upper and lower Anally, the former comprising that portion of the county of Longford south of Granard, and a part of the county of Westmeath possessed by O'Ferrall Buidh or the Yellow; the latter that portion north of Granard, possessed by O'Ferrall Ban, or the Fair. The O'Ferralls were dispossessed of the eastern parts of this territory by the English settlers, the Tuites and Delamares, who came over with Hugh de Lacy in the twelfth century. Amongst the old clans of Anally were also the following, viz.:—O'Cuinn or O'Quinn, who had his castle at Rathcline; and the Mac Gillegans. The Muintir Megiollgain or Giollgain, were located by O'Dugan in the territory of Muintir Eoluis, that is, in the northern portion of the county of Longford, and their chief was O'Quinn. A district called Corcard was possessed by the O'Mulfinnys; the Mac Cormacs; Mac Corgabhans (now Gavaus); O'Dalys; O'Slamans or Slevins; and O'Skollys. The O'Ferralls maintained their sovereignty till the reign of Elizabeth, when Anally was formed into the county of Longford by the lord deputy, sir Henry Sidney. In modern times the following families have formed the nobility of this county. The Aungiers, earls of Longford, afterwards the Flemings, and at present the Pakenhams. The Lanes, earls of Lanesboro', and at present the Butlers. The Gores were earls of Anally, and the family of Forbes are now earls of Granard. The see of Ardagh was founded by St. Mel in the fifth century, and the bishops were also styled bishops of Conmaicene, as the diocese included the territory in Leitrim called Conmaicene. The diocese of Ardagh at present comprehends nearly the whole of the county Longford, a large portion of Leitrim, and parts of Westmeath, Roscommon, Sligo, and Cavan. In the Roman Catholic division the ancient see of Clonmacnois, in the King's county, is united to Ardagh, but in the Established Church the see of Clonmacnois has been united to the diocese of Meath.

1. Aradh, now the barony of Ara, county of Tipperary.

1. The coarb or successor of St. Columkille was the abbot of Derry. Flaithbheartagh O'Brolchain resigned the see of Derry.

of East Meath, was taken treacherously by the English, and hanged by them at Trim.

Donal Caemhnaech (Kavanagh,) the son of Dermot, king of Leinster, was treacherously slain by O'Forchern and O'Nolan, (clans in Carlow.)

The son of Donal, son of Donagh, (Fitzpatrick) lord of Ossory, was treacherously slain by Donal O'Brien. Teige, the son of Fergal O'Rourke, was also slain.

Dermot, son of Teige O'Brien, and Mahon, son of Torlogh O'Brien, had their eyes put out, in their own house at Caislean-ui-Chonaing, (Castle Conell) by Donal O'Brien; Dermot shortly afterwards died. Mac-an-Leithdirg O'Conor, the son of O'Conor of Coreomroe, was also slain by Donal on the same day.

Roderick O'Conor, king of Ireland, marched an army into Munster. He compelled Donal O'Brien to fly from Thomond, and spoiled the country on that expedition.

Conor (Cornelius,) Mac Concoilleadh, abbot of St. Peter and St. Paul's, and afterwards the coarb of St. Patrick, (archbishop of Armagh,) died at Rome, whither he had gone to confer with the successor of St. Peter.

Giolla Colum O'Maolmuaidh (Mulloy,) lord of Ferkale, was treacherously slain by Roderick, son of Conor Mac Coghlan.³

2. The Kinel Enda were the O'Gormleys, chiefs of Moy Ith in the present barony of Raphoe, county of Donegal. The O'Caithans or O'Kunes were powerful chiefs in Derry, of whom a full account is given in the note on Tir-Eoghain.

Cinel, Muintir, Clann, Siol, Teallach, Hy, O, and Mac. As these words constantly occur in the Annals, it is necessary to explain their meaning. The word Cineal, Cinel, or Cneul, pronounced Kinel, signifies a people, or race, for instance the Cinel Eoghain, that is, the people or descendants of Eogan or Owen, a term applied to the people of Tyrone, and the posterity of Owen, son of king Niall, who possessed that territory. In like manner the name Cinel Conaill was applied to the people of Tyreconnell, or Donegal, the posterity of Conall Gulban, brother of Owen, son of Niall. In the translation of the Annals the word is written Kinel, as conveying the proper pronunciation. Muintir also signifies a people or tribe, but in a more limited sense than the word Cinel, for instance, Muintir Maolmordha, a term applied to a tribe of the O'Reillys, descended from Maolmordha, one of their ancient chiefs; Muintir Eoluis, the tribe name of the Mac Ruall's of Leitrim. Clann or Clan, literally signifying a family, or descendants, is a term generally known. Siol signifies a race, or descendants, or a tribe, for instance Siol Muireadhaigh, pronounced Sheel Murray, the tribe name of the O'Conors of Connaught, as descended from Muireadhaigh Milleathan, king of Connaught in the seventh century. Teallach is also a term applied to a tribe or clan, for instance, Teallach Eeachtugh, that is, the tribe of Eachaidh, a name applied to the tribe of the Mac Gawrans, and also to their territory, now the barony of Tullaghaw, in the county of Cavan. All the foregoing terms are also applied to the territories possessed by the various clans, as well as to the clans them-

A.D. 1176.

The abbeys of Fabhar (or Fore,) and Ceanannus (or Kells,) were laid waste by the English, and by the people of Hy Briuin.¹

Louth was devastated by the English.

Niall, the son of Mac Loughlin, was slain by the Muintir Branain, namely, Dal-m-Binne.²

The daughter of Roderick O'Conor, king of Ireland, and wife of Flaithbheartach O'Maoldoraidh, was slain by the sons of O'Cairellain.

Bean Midhe, daughter of Donagh O'Carroll, and wife of Cumaghe O'Floinn (Flynn), lady of Hy-Tuirtre and Firlee, died.

Cumaghe O'Flynn, lord of Hy-Tuirtre, Firlee and Dal Araidh (Down,) was slain by his own kinsman Conmidhe, aided by the people of Firlee.³

Donal O'Brien besieged the city of Limerick and expelled the English therefrom.

A castle was erected by the English at Kells.

The English earl, Richard (Strongbow,) died of an ulcer in his foot, a visitation attributed to SS. Bridget, Columkille, and other saints, whose churches he had destroyed; and it is said that he thought he saw St. Bridget killing him.⁴

The castle of Slane, which was occupied by Richard Fleming and his forces, and from which he was in the habit of making predatory excursions into Oriel and Hy Briuin, and against the men of selves. Hy, in Irish Ibh, pronounced Ir, is the plural of Ua, or O, which is the preposition from, and thus signifies of, or from. The word Hy is adopted by various writers instead of Ibh, and is retained in the present translation. The word Ua or O prefixed to Irish surnames, signified originally a grandson, but was afterwards applied to all the descendants. Mac, signifying a son, was in after times applied to the descendants of the same ancestor.

3. The Mac Cochlains or Coghlan's, a powerful clan, were chiefs of Deabhna Eathra, now the barony of Garrycastle, in the King's county.

1. There were several places called Hy-Briuin, as will be afterwards explained in the note on Brehney.

2. The Dal-m-Binne or m-Buinne were so called, according to O'Flaherty, from Buinn, son of Fergus Mac Roy, king of Ulster. It was an ancient district in the county of Antrim. See Dalriada.

3. Hy-Tuirtre was an ancient territory in Dalaradia, on the borders of Down and Antrim, extending from Lough Neagh to Slieve Mis, of which the O'Flynn's were chiefs. It was afterwards called Clannaboy and possessed by the O'Neills. Fir Li or Firlee was a district on the borders of Tyrone and Derry, near Lough Neagh and the river Bann. In the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick by Colgan it is called Leacorum fins.

4. It is necessary here to give some account of Strongbow, a name so intimately connected with the English Invasion, the most important event in Irish history. The ancestors of Strongbow were descended from the dukes of Normandy, and came to England with William the Conqueror. They were lords of Clare in Suffolk, from which they took the name of de Clare, and were created earls of Pembroke in Wales. Gilbert de Clare, earl of Pembroke, being a Meath, was plundered by Maoleachlain, son of Mac Loughlin, lord of Kinel Owen, at the head of the Kinel Owen, and the people of Oriel. They slew about five hundred or more of the English and their horses, and not one person escaped with his life from the castle. Three castles were abandoned in Meath on the following day, through fear of the Kinel Owen, those of Kells, Calatrom, (Galtrim,) and Derry Patrick. Richard Fleming was slain on that occasion.

Roderick O'Connor, king of Ireland, granted a Bally Biatach (townland) to God and St. Bearraidh forever, namely, Tuaim Achaidh. The witnesses for confirming this grant by O'Connor and his successors for ever, were Cadhla O'Duffy, archbishop of Tuam, Aireachtach O'Roduibh (Rody,) Flann O'Fionnachta (Fecnaghty,) Hugh O'Floinn, Ruairc O'Maoilbrenainn, Ignaidhe (Ignatius) O'Manachain, Giollu-an-Coimide Mac Anlestairs, (Mac Allister) O'Hainlidhe (O'Hanly,) and Conor Mac Dermott.

Donal, son of Torlogh O'Connor, lord of North Connaught, the most exemplary man for generosity, good order, and counsel, among the Irish, died and was buried at Mayo of the Saxons.

Donal, son of Torlogh O'Brien, king apparent of Munster, died.

Donal O'Mailli (or O'Mally,) lord of Hy Mallia, died.

Dermot, son of Cormac Mac Carthy, king of Desmond, was taken prisoner by his own son Cormac Liathanach; Cormac, however, was treacherously put to death by his own people, and Dermot re-took possession of the lordship.

Donal Fitzpatrick, lord of Ossory, died.

Hugh Mac Gillabroidi O'Rourke died.

Donal, son of Giolla Patraic, lord of Cair-pre O'Ciarda, was treacherously slain by Art O'Melaghlin, who was deposed by the men of Mcath, who conferred the principality on Donogh O'Melaghlin, whose son Flan was slain by (the people of) Carbry O'Ciarda.

A.D. 1177.

Cardinal Vivianus came to Ireland on the first Sunday in Lent, and convened a synod of the Irish bishops and abbots at Dublin, in which they enacted many ecclesiastical regulations not now observed.¹

Hugh O'Neill, the youth called Toinleasg, lord of Kinel-Owen for a considerable time, and heir presumptive to the monarchy of Ireland, was slain by Maolachlain and Ardgall O'Loughlin; but the latter fell by the hand of O'Neill in the conflict.

John de Courcy, accompanied by the knights of Dalaraidhe, marched an army to Dun-da-Leathglas (Down), and slew Donal, son of Cathusach, lord of Dalaraidhe. Down was plundered by de Courcy. He erected a castle there from which they defeated the Ultonians in two engagements. They also defeated the Kinel-Owen and Orgallians; and Conor O'Cairrellain, chief of Clan Dermot,² and Giolla-Mac-Liag O'Dongaile (or O'Donnelly,) chief of Ferdroma,³ and many other chiefs were slain in the battle. Donal O'Flaherty, shot by arrows in the same engagement, died of his wounds in St. Paul's church at Armagh, after penance and receiving the eucharist and extreme unction. John de Courcy then proceeded to Hy Tuitre and Fir Li, but Cumidhe O'Floinn burned the eastern plain before him; Colerain also, and many other churches were burned.

famous archer, was designated de arcu forti, or Strongbow, and his son Richard also bore that name, and the titles of earl of Pembroke, Strigul and Chopstow; and Richard de Clare, earl of Pembroke, who invaded Ireland, is described by Cambrensis and Hollingshed as follows: "Earl Strongbow was of a sanguine complexion, freckled in the face, his eyes grey, and features feminine, his voice not strong, neck slender, in stature tall and well formed, courteous and gentle in manners; what he could not compass by deeds, he would win by good words and gentle speeches; in time of peace he was more ready to yield and obey, than to rule and command; out of the camp he was more like a soldier-companion than a captain, but in the camp and in war, he carried with him the state and countenance of a valiant captain. Of himself he was slow to adventure anything, but being advised and set on he refused no attempts. In all chances of war, he was still one and the same manner of man, being neither dismayed by adversity, nor puffed up with prosperity."

Strongbow, as already mentioned, was invited to Ireland by Der-mod Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, who gave him his daughter Eva in marriage, at Waterford A.D. 1171, with the reversion of the whole kingdom of Leinster after Dermot's death. By his wife Eva Strongbow had an only daughter, Isabel, who was married to William Le Mareschal, Earl Marshal of England, afterwards earl of Pembroke. After many battles with the Irish chiefs Strongbow died at Dublin of a mortification in his foot, in the month of May, A.D. 1176, and was buried in Christ Church, where his monument still remains. The descendants of the Anglo-Norman chiefs who came with Strongbow, were known by the name of the Strongbowmians, and form to this day many of the principal families in Ireland.

1. Cardinal Vivianus was the Pope's Legate in Ireland.

2. The O'Carolans of the Clanna Rory, were chiefs of Clann Diarmada, now the parish of Clandermot, or Glendermot, in Derry, Niall O'Gairmleadhaigh (Gormley), lord of Fermaighe Ith and of Kinel Enda, was slain by Donogh O'Cairellain and the Clan Dermod in the precincts of Derry Columkille. The house in which Niall was at this time was set on fire, and he was slain at the door while endeavouring to make his escape. After this Donagh O'Cairellain made peace with God, Columkille, and the people of Derry, on his own account and on behalf of his descendants; and he made an offering to St. Columkille, and the people of Derry, for his sons, grandsons, and descendants for ever. He likewise bestowed upon them a Bally Biatach, in the parish of Domhnachmore; and he gave them the Mac Riabhach,¹ the most valuable goblet in Ireland at that time, which was an equivalent for sixty cows. He built a house for the clergyman in lieu of that which was burned over O'Gormley, and paid him the loss sustained by the fire. The whole Clan Dermod, also, made restitution on their own behalf.

Morogh, son of Roderick O'Conor, took with him Miles de Cogan, and his knights to Roscommon, to lay waste Connaught, from ill will towards his father. The Conacians burned Tuam, and many other churches in the country, to prevent the English from fixing their quarters in them. They defeated the English and expelled them from the country. Roderick put out the eyes of his son, Morogh, for having joined the English.

O'Maoldoraidh (chief of Tyreconnell,) and the Kinel Conell were defeated by Conor O'Cairellain; and the Kinel Enda suffered great slaughter in the battle. The son of O'Searraigh (Foley), and many other chieftains were slain.

Donal O'Hara, lord of Lieney,⁵ died.

A.D. 1178.

Donal O'Fogarty, bishop of Ossory, died.

Giollu-Criost O'Heothaidh (O'Heoghaidh or O'Hoccy,) bishop of Connaicene, died. (See note on Anally.)

Conor, son of Cualladh O'Lainnidh (Luiny,) took the chieftainship of Kinel-Moen,¹ and expelled Donal, son of Donal O'Gormley, from Moy-Ith,² who fled to Donogh O'Duibhdiorma in Inisowen. Three months afterwards the Kinel-Moen took the chieftainship from Conor and conferred it again on Donal O'Gormley. Giolla Caoch (the Blind,) O'Ederla and O'Flanagan, two of Donal's party, treacherously slew Conor in Donal's house, although he was under the protection of the chief Erenach of Ernaidhe,³ who was then with him. Shortly afterwards the Kinel-Moen expelled Donal O'Gormley from the chieftainship, and placed Rory O'Flaherty in power over them. The three sons of O'Flaherty acted treacherously towards Kinel-Moen, and slew Donal, son of Donal O'Gormley, and Tiarnan, son of Rannall Mac Donall, with eight of the gentry of Kinel Moen. Raghnaill, son of Eachmarcach O'Cathain, had been slain by the Kinel Moen, in the beginning of the summer, and it was to revenge him that Galach O'Luinidh and Murtogh O'Petain (Peyton) were slain, and that the aforementioned treachery was committed against Kinel Moen.

There was a great wind in this year, by which many trees were uprooted, and many churches laid prostrate. One hundred and twenty trees fell at Derry Columkille.

John de Courcy, with his foreigners, marched into Machaire Chonaill,⁴ which they plundered. He remained encamped for one night at Glionn Ríche.⁵ Murogh O'Carroll, lord of Orgiall and Cu-Ulladh,⁶ son of Dunslevey, king of Ulladh attacked de Courcy's forces, of whom they slew four hundred and fifty! Of the Irish one hundred and fifty were slain on the field of battle, including O'Nainffed (O'Nency,) lord of Hy-Meith-Macha (a territory in Monaghan and partly in Armagh.)

John de Courcy, in an expedition into Dalaraidhe (or Dalaradia,) was opposed by Cu-Midhe O'Flainn (Flynn,) lord of Hy-Tuirtre and of Firlee, on the borders of Tyrone. Many of this clan have changed their name to Carleton.

3. Fear Droma, an ancient territory in the county of Donegal, written Fardrom and Fardrome, in the inquisitions taken of that county.

4. Mac Riabhach signifies the Grey or Speckled Boy, a fanciful name given to this curious goblet.

5. The O'Haras, chiefs of Lieney, now the barony of Lieney, in the county of Sligo.

1. Kinel-Moen, now the barony of Raphoe, in the county Donegal.

2. Moy-Ith, or the plain of Ith, so called from Ith, the uncle of Milesius, who landed at this place, where he was wounded, or, as some state, killed, by the Tuath-De-Dnnans. According to O'Flaherty this district lay in the barony of Keenaght in the county of Derry. O'Gormly was chief of Moy-Ith and Kinel Enda. The family name O'Duibhdiorma has been corruptly anglicised to Mac Dermott.

who gave him battle. The English were defeated with great slaughter through the interposition of St. Patrick, St. Columkille, and St. Brendan; and de Courcy with difficulty escaped to Dublin, covered with wounds.

The king of England's constable for Dublin and East Meath marched with his forces to Clonmacnois, and plundered all the town except the churches and the houses of the bishop. God and St. Kieran wrought a visible miracle against them, for they could neither plunder nor rest, but abandoned their schemes, and departed the next day.

The river of Galway was dried up for several days, so that all things lost in it from time immemorial were recovered, and great quantities of fish were taken by the inhabitants.

The people of Dealbhna-Eathra (O'Coghlin's,) Maoileachlainn Beag (the Little,) and a party of the men of Teffia (the Foxes,) were defeated by Art O'Melaghlin, aided by the people of Offaley, and the English, in which battle Muiredhach Mac-an-t-Sionnaigh (Fox,) was slain.⁷

3. Ernaidhe, now the parish of Urney, which partly lies in the barony of Raphoe, but chiefly in that of Strabane, county of Tyrone.

4. Machaire Chonail. See note on Orgiall.

5. Glinn or Glen Righe was the vale of the Newry river.

6. Cu-Ulladh. This Cu-Ulladh was a celebrated chief, son of Conor Mac Dunsleive, king of Ulidia, now the county of Down. O'Connor (Rev. Hib. Serip. vol. i.) states that he was called Cu-Ulladh, signifying the Hound of Ulladh, from his great swiftness of foot, and bravery in battle. The defeat of de Courcy was owing to the valour of Cu-Ulladh.

John de Courcy was the most renowned leader of the Anglo-Normans in Ireland. He was descended from the dukes of Lorraine in France, and his ancestor came to England with William the Conqueror. He was a man of great strength, of gigantic stature, and indomitable courage. Holingshed says that, "de Courcy was mighty of limb and strong of sinews, very tall and broad in proportion, a most valiant soldier, the first in the field and the foremost in the fight, a noble and right valiant warrior." Campion in his Chronicle says of him, "John de Courcy was a warrior of noble courage, and in pitch of body like a giant." It is remarked that in private life he was modest and religious; he was, moreover, the founder of many monasteries. Holingshed states that, "he rode on a white horse, and had three eagles painted on his standards, to fulfill a prophecy made by Merlin, that a knight riding on a white horse and bearing birds on his shield should be the first of the English who with force of arms would enter and conquer Ulster." De Courcy and his forces subjugated a great part of Orgiall, now the counties of Louth, Monaghan, and Armagh, together with Ulidia, or the county of Down, and had his chief castle at Downpatrick. He was married to Africa, daughter of Godred, king of the Isle of Man, and was created earl of Ulster by Henry II. After various contests with his great rivals the de Laeys, lords of Meath, he was at length overcome, taken prisoner, and banished from Ireland, and died an exile in France, A.D. 1210. The de Courcys, his successors in Ireland, were created barons of Kinsale, and in consideration of the fame of their ancestors were allowed the peculiar privilege of wearing their hats in the royal presence—a right which Hugh O'Flaherty, lord of West Connaught, died at Eanach-Duin.

Mac Awley was slain by the Siol-Anmchadha.⁸

Maelsechlainn Beag O'Melaghlin stormed the fortress of Art O'Melaghlin, and expelled him from his mansion, and also slew Flan, son of Mac Awley, chief of Calry.⁹

A.D. 1179.

In this year the following ecclesiastics died: namely, Tuathal O'Connachtaidh, bishop of Tir Briuin;¹ Colman O'Scannlain (or O'Scanlan,) *Aircinneach*² of Cloyne; Giollu Domhnaill O'Forannain, Aircinneach of Ard Sratha;³ and Maelmuire Mac Giollu Commain, Secnap, or prior of Ard Sratha.

Armagh was entirely consumed by fire with all its churches and chapels, except St. Bridget's Church, and that of na bh-Feartha, or of the Miracles.

All the churches of Tyrone from the mountains the baron of Kinsale exercised on the occasion of George the Fourth's visit to Ireland.

7. See note on Meath.

8. The Siol-Anmchadha were the O'Madigans or Maddens. See note on Siol-Anmchadha.

9. Calry, a district in the county West Meath, the ancient property of the Mac Awleys. See note on Meath.

1. Bishop of Tir Briuin. Ware mentions Tuathal O'Conachtaigh, bishop of Hua Brunc, or Enaghduine, as attending at the council of Kells, A.D. 1152. Enaghduine, now the parish of Annadown, county of Galway, was an ancient bishop's see, afterwards annexed to Tuam.

2. The title Aircinneach, or Erenach, originally meant an Archdeacon who, according to ancient discipline, was the manager of the property of the church. By degrees this office fell into the hands of laymen, who consequently assumed the title of Archdeacons. In the middle ages several archdeacons are found in one and the same diocese, some called majores, others minores. In the course of time the Erenachs became exceedingly numerous in Ireland. They were universally laymen, except that they were tonsured, on which account they were ranked among the clerici or clerks. Each of these Erenachs used to pay, and was bound to do so, a certain subsidy, refectons, and a yearly pension to the archbishop or bishop, in whose diocese the lands held by them were situated, in proportion to the quantity of land and the custom of the country. Usher observes, that in the diocese of Derry and Raphoe the bishop got a third part, the other two-thirds being reserved for the repairs of churches, hospitality, and Erenachs' maintenance. In fact the Erenachs were the actual possessors of old church lands, out of which they paid certain contributions, either in money or kind, towards ecclesiastical purposes. There was another title in the church somewhat similar but superior in rank to the Aircinneach, called Comharba (Coarb,) corruptly written Corba or Corbe, and in the plural Corbas, Corbes, and Comarbans. Some of the Coarbs in latter times were laymen, and possessed lands belonging to episcopal sees, paying, however, certain mensal dues to the bishops, who did not hold the lands in demesne. On the whole it appears southwards were abandoned on account of the wars, commotions, and famine.

O'Ruadhachain, lord of Ua n-Eachdach,⁴ died of a disease of three nights duration, after his expulsion for having violated the Canon Laws of St. Patrick a short time previously.

A peace was concluded by Donogh O'Cairellain and the Clan Dermot, with the Kinel Moen and O'Gormley. Awlave Mac Meannan was brother of Donogh's wife. This treaty was ratified in the church of Ardstraw, where the oaths were administered by the clergy of that church as well as of Domhnach-Mor and of Urney. O'Gormley (Awlave) came on the following day, demanding more sureties, to the house of Donogh O'Cairellain; but they killed him in the middle of their people, before the mansion door, in the presence of his sister, Donogh's wife; they also slew three of his party, namely, Cionaedh, son of Art O'Bracain, (or Bracken.) and the son of Gillerist, son of Cormac Mac Reodain, the foster brother of Donogh O'Cairellain. Shortly after the churches of Ardstraw, Domhnach-Mor, and Urney were devastated by the men of Moy-Ith.

One hundred and five houses were burned in a plundering attack on Clonmacnois.

Clonfert and all its churches were burned.

Lothra, Ardfert, Cashel, Tuaim-da-ghnialainn (Tuam.) Dysart Kelly, Kil-meadhan, and Balla (in the county of Mayo,) were all destroyed by fire.

Maelseachlain O'Maoilmiadh, chief of Muintir Eoluis, died.

Ivar O'Casey, lord of Saithne, died.

Maolaghlín Riagh O'Shaughnessy,⁵ lord of the half of Kinel Aodh, was slain by the son of Donogh O'Cathail, (or O'Cahal.)

A.D. 1180.

Lorecan O'Tuathail, (or O'Toole,) i.e. Laurence, archbishop of Leinster, and legate of Ireland, was martyred.¹

Macraith O'Daighre, (or O'Deery,) Airceinneach of Derry, died.

Raghnall O'Carolan was slain by the Kinel Moain within the precincts of Derry-Columkille.

Donogh O'Carolan was slain by the Kinel Conaill (O'Donnells,) in revenge of his treachery to O'Gormley. This happened through the intervention of the saints, because he had violated their sanctuaries.

Aindilis O'Dochartaigh (or O'Dogherty,) died at Derry Columkille.

A battle, commonly called The battle of the Cenors, was fought between Conor of Moan Moy, son of (king) Rory O'Conor, and Conor O'Kelly, lord of Hy Mainc, in which O'Kelly, Teige his son, Dermot his brother, Maolseachlain, son of Dermot O'Kelly, and Teige, son of Teige O'Conor, were slain.²

Maurice O'Hedlún (O'Heyne or Hynes,) lord of Hy Fiachrach Aidhne,³ was slain by the men of Munster.

Carrghamhain O'Giollaltain, chief of Muintir Maoiltsiona,⁴ was slain by Hugh Mac Carrghamhna on Innis Endaimh on Morlough.

that the coarbs, erenachs, and airceinneachs were in ancient times the monasteries of Church Lands. (See Usher and Lanigan.)

3. Ard Sretha, now Ardstraw, an ancient episcopal see in Tyrone, afterwards united to the diocese of Derry.

4. Ua n-Eachdach or Ie Eachdach, now the barony of Iveagh county of Down.

5. O'Shaughnessy's territory was Kinel Aodh, in the south-west of the county of Galway.

1. Laurence O'Tuathail or O'Toole was the son of Murtogh O'Tuathail, prince of Imaille, in the present county of Wicklow. He became abbot of Glendalough, and afterwards archbishop of Dublin, A.D. 1162. In the year 1175, having gone to England on some business with king Henry, he nearly lost his life while in the net of commencing to celebrate Mass in the cathedral of Canterbury, a man, supposed to be a maniac, having approached the altar and struck him to the ground by a violent blow on the head with a club. The archbishop, from his active exertions to raise the Irish people and to resist against the English, incurred the enmity of king Henry. In the year 1180, the archbishop went again to England to arrange some matters with the king, who treated him in a tyrannical manner, and prevented his return to Ireland. King Henry having gone to France, the persecuted prelate followed him, with a view to accommodate matters, but on his arrival in Normandy he was seized with a fever, of which he soon afterwards died, on the 14th of November, A.D. 1180, in the monastery of Argum, now Eu, in the church of which he was interred. Grief and persecution having prematurely cut off this eminent prelate, the Annalists mean to intimate that fact by stating that he died a martyr. In person he was tall and graceful, and of a comely countenance; he was equally eminent for his piety and patriotism, and was a man of unbounded charity. During a famine of three years' duration he daily gave alms to five hundred destitute persons, whom he also supplied with food, clothing, and other necessities. For his eminent virtues and sanctity he was canonized by Pope Honorius III., A.D. 1226. The festival of St. Laurence O'Toole, as patron saint of the diocese of Dublin, was annually celebrated on the 14th of November.

2. This battle, commonly called the battle of the Cenors, from the Christian names of the two chiefs being Conor, is mentioned Donal, son of Teige O'Cinneididh (or O'Kennedy,) lord of Urmhumha,⁵ (or Ormond,) died.

Maolmuire, son of Con the Charitable, chief sage of Ireland, died.

Hugh O'Caithniadh, (or O'Caheny,) lord of Erris, was treacherously slain by O'Callaghan, in Kilcoman.⁶

Awlave O'Toghda, chief of Bredagh, was slain by O'Gaibhtheachain, (or O'Gavaghan,) chief of Moy Eleg.⁷

Murogh O'Lachtna, chief of the two Backs,⁸ was drowned in Lough Con.

A. D. 1181

Dunghal O'Caellaidh (or O'Keely,) bishop of Leithglinne (or Leighlin,) died.

Maolmuire O'Dunain, abbot of Cnoc-na-Seangan, in Lugh Magh, died.¹

Maolciarain O'Fiodhabhra (or O'Fidaver,) coarb of St. Kieran,² died.

A battle was fought between Flaithbeartach O'Maeldoraidh (or Flaherty O'Muldorrey,) lord of Kinel Connell, and the sons of the king of Connaught, on Saturday in Whitsuntide, in which sixteen sons of the lords and chiefs of Connaught fell, besides many of the gentry and soldiery. The Kinel Connell held the Conacians in subjection for a considerable time afterwards. According to some records the following are the names of the chiefs who fell in this battle:—Bryan and Manus, sons of Torlogh More; Mulrooney; two sons of Hugh O'Conor; Hugh, son of Conor O'Kelly; Giollacrist, son of Mac Oireachtaidh O'Rodhuibh; (or O'Rody;) Eachmarcach O'Muircadhaidh (or O'Murray;) Donogh, son of Bryan Luigneach O'Conor; Cucuallachta, son of Murtogh O'Conor; the three O'Maoilbrenains (or O'Brenans;) the two Mac Giollabuidhes (or M'Gilwees;) Hugh, grandson of Roderick; and many other men of note.³

Donal, son of Hugh Mac Lochlainn (or Mac Loughlin,) marched an army of the Kinel Owen of Tlach Oge into Ulidia, and defeated the Uliadians, with the men of Hy Tuirtre and of Firlee, who were commanded by Rory Mac Duinnsele and Cumidhe O'Flainn (or O'Flynn.)

O'Cathain (or O'Kane,) Eachmarcach,⁴ assembled an army of the men of Moy-Ith, and of Kinel Binnigh of the Glen, and crossed Tuaim.⁵ They plundered Firlee and Hy-Tuirtre, and took an immense prey of cattle.

Tomaltach O'Conor was promoted to the coarbship of St. Patrick (or see of Armagh.) He made a visitation of the Kinel Owen (Tyrone), received his dues from them, and gave them his benediction.

A.D. 1182.

Hugh O'Caellaidh¹ (or O'Keeley,) bishop of Oriel, and chief canon of Ireland, died.

Donal O'Huallachain, archbishop of Munster (Cashel,) died.

Donal, son of Hugh O'Lachlainn (or O'Loughlin,) marched an army to Dunbo² in Dailriada, by Charles O'Conor as the battle of Ruba Gcailain. Maonmaigh was an ancient territory in Galway, afterwards, according to O'Brien, called Clanricard.

3. Hy Fiachrach Aidhne was an ancient territory in the county of Galway, co-extensive with the diocese of Kilmacduagh.

4. Innis Endaimh is probably Innis Aingin, which Lanigan says was the Island of All Saints in Lough Ree on the Shannon. Muin-tir Maoiltsiona was Fox's country in West Meath.

5. Urmhumha, that is, East Munster or Ormond, an extensive ancient territory which lay in the present counties of Tipperary, Kilkenny, and Waterford. See note on Ormond.

6. Cill Chomain, or Kilcoman, the parish of Kilcoman, in the barony of Erris, county of Mayo.

7. According to O'Dugan, O'Duibhdiairmaid, (anglicised to O'Dermott,) was chief of Bredagh. This territory was situated between Lough Foyle in Derry and Lough Swilly in Donegal, and the district is still traceable by the river Breadach in that locality, which falls into Lough Foyle. The parish of Moville lay in this district. O'Toghda, a name anglicised to Todd, was chief of the territory. Moy Elegh was the plain of Aileach in the same locality, in which was seated the famous palace of Aileach, a residence of the kings of Ulster.

8. The district called the two Backs, lies between Lough Con and the river Moy, in the barony of Tyrawley, and county of Mayo, and was anciently the property of the Mac Fimbises, the celebrated historians and antiquaries of Leacan.

1. Cnoc-na-Seangan, that is, the Hill of the Ants, a name applied to the large Moat or Mound at Ardee; hence the abbey meant is that of Ardee in Louth.

2. Coarb of St. Ciaran, that is, abbot or bishop of Clonmacnois.

3. This was called the battle of Cnoc-Cairbre, and was fought in the barony of Carburry, county of Sligo.

4. Whenever the chief or head of a territory or clan is mentioned, the surname is given first and then the christian name, for instance, O'Neill, Hugh; but among the inferior chiefs the christian name is frequently used first. Sometimes the surname alone is expressed, as O'Donnell, that is, The O'Donnell. To the names of the Anglo-Norman and English chiefs, and even to those of some of the Irish, the definite article The is prefixed, as An Diolamhnach, that is, The Dillon; An Sionnach, The Fox; &c.

5. Tuaim, now Toom Bridge on the river Bann, near Lough Neagh, in the county of Antrim.

1. O'Caellaidh is called by Ware and others O'Kelly and O'Killedy.

2. Dunbo or Dunboe, a parish in the barony of Colerain, county of Derry.

where he gave battle to the English; but the Kinel Owen were defeated, and Raghmall O'Breislen, Gilcreest O'Kane, and many others fell. They carried away with them the Gospels of St. Martin.

Bryan, son of Torlogh O'Brien, was treacherously killed by Raghmall Mac Conmara (or Mac Namara) Beag.

Hugh Mac Cargamhna, chief of Muintir Maolstiona, was killed by Gillu-Ultain Mac Cargamhna.

Murogh, son of Taichleach O'Dubhda (or O'Dowd,) was slain by Maolseachlain O'Maolruannaigh (or O'Mulrooney).

Awlave O'Ferrall expelled Hugh O'Ferrall, and assumed the chieftainship of Anally.

A.D. 1183.

Joseph O'Haotha,¹ bishop of Hy Kinselagh, died.

Bec O'Heaghra (or O'Hara,) lord of Lieney in Connaught, was treacherously killed by Conor O'Diarmada (or O'Dermott,) on Lough Mac Fercadaidh, in his own house.

A skirmish arose between O'Flaherty, viz. the Giolla Riabhach, and the son of O'Gormley. O'Flaherty and a great number of the Kinel Moen fell in the conflict.

Fergal, son of Awlave O'Rourke, was killed by Loghlin, son of Donal O'Rourke.

Gillultan Mac Cargawna, chief of Muintir Maolstiona, was slain by the sons of Sionnagh O'Catharnidh (or O'Kearney) aided by five others.

A.D. 1184.

Giolla Iosa O'Maolin, a bishop, died.

Bryan of Brefney, son of Torlogh O'Conor, died.

Maoil Iosa O'Carroll was elected successor of St. Patrick, (to the archbishopric of Armagh,) which had been vacated by Tomaltach O'Conor.

Art O'Melaghlin, lord of West Meath, was treacherously killed by Dermot of the Friars, the son of Torlogh, at the instigation of the English, and Maoilseachlain Beag (the Little,) caused himself to be appointed chief, and three days afterwards defeated Dermot in a battle, in which were slain the son of Mahon O'Brien, and many others.

A castle was erected by the English at Kill-Air (in West Meath.)

Another castle was attacked and plundered by Maoilseachlain, aided by Conor of Maon Moy O'Conor, in which many English were slain.

Thirty of the best houses in Armagh were plundered by the English of Meath.

The monastery of Eas Ruadh (Ballyshannon,) was dedicated to God and St. Bernard, by Flaherty O'Muldorrey, lord of Tyrcconnell, for the good of his soul.

Cenfaoladh O'Grada (or O'Grady,) successor to St. Cronan of Tuaim Grene,¹ died.

Niall, son of the Sionagh O'Catharnaidh, died.

Awlave, son of Fergal O'Rourke, lord of Brefney, was treacherously slain by Mac Raghnaill (Mac Reynolds.)

Donal O'Flanagan, chief of Clan Cathail, died at Cong of St. Feichin (in Mayo.)

Fergal O'Reilly was treacherously killed by Maelechlain O'Rourke.

A.D. 1185.

Maoilisu O'Murray, professor at Derry Columkille, died at a venerable age.

Philip Unsesra,¹ with his English forces, remained at Armagh six days in the middle of Lent.

Gillcreest Mac Cathmhaoil² (Mac Campbell,) head chieftain of the Kinel Fercadaidh and of the

1. Joseph O'Haotha, O'Hehe or O'Hugh, bishop of Hy Kinselagh, in the county of Wexford, that is, bishop of Ferns.

1. Tuaim Grene, now the parish of Tomgraney, in the barony of Tulla, county of Clare.

1 Philip Unsesra. This was Philip of Worcester, the lord deputy of Ireland, who is represented by various writers as a most corrupt and rapacious governor. Stuart, in his history of Armagh, says, that he entered that city in mid-lent, with his forces, accompanied by Hugh Tyrrel, and subjected the inhabitants to six days' pillage, having robbed the clergy and churches. Hammer in his Chronicle says of Worcester:—"In March, about the middle of Lent, he came to Armagh, where he extorted and per force exacted from the clergy there a great mass of money and treasure, and from thence he went to Dune (Down,) and from Dune to Dublin, laden with gold, silver, money, and money's worth, the which he extorted in every place where he came, and other good did he none. Hugh Tyrrel, his fellow scraper, took from the poor priests of Armagh a great brass pan or brewing furnace, which served the whole house." It is further stated, that as a judgment from Providence for those sacrilegious robberies, Worcester was seized with a sudden and violent cholick, which nearly killed him, and that the house where Tyrrel lodged having taken fire, all the plunder he had was consumed to ashes together with the horses that carried it. It appears that Tyrrel, terrified in conscience, restored their pan to the priests of Armagh.

2. Mac Cathmhaoil. See note on Tir Eaghain.

clans, viz.: clan Aengus, clan Dubhinrecht, clan Fogarty O'Ceannfhoda, and clan Colla, of Fer-managh, the chief of the councils of the north of Ireland, was slain by O'Negnaidh (O'Neney,) aided by Muintir Chaonain (the O'Keenans;) and his head was carried away by a party of them, but recovered in a month afterwards.

Maoilseachlain, son of Murtoigh O'Loughlin, was slain by the English.

Maoilisa O'Dalaigh (O'Daly,) chief sage of Erin (Ireland,) and of Albain (Scotland,) head chieftain of Corcaraidhe and of Corcadaimh,³ a nobleman distinguished for learning, poetry, and hospitality, died at Clonard, while on a pilgrimage there.

John, son of king Henry the Second of England, came to Ireland, with a fleet of sixty ships, to assume the government of the country. He took possession of Leinster and Dublin, and erected castles at Tioprat Fachtna, and Ardfinan,⁴ from which he proceeded to plunder Munster; but Donal O'Brien defeated his forces with great slaughter. John soon afterwards returned to England to lodge complaints with his father against Hugh de Lacy, who was then the king's representative in Ireland, but who sent neither tribute nor hostages from the Irish princes.

A fierce contest broke out in Connaught between the Rioghdamhnaidh (or heirs to the crown,) of that country, namely, Rory O'Conor; Conon of Maonmoy, the son of (king) Roderick; Conon, the descendant of Dermot; Cathal Carrach, son of Conon of Maonmoy; and Cathal Croibhdhearg (the Red handed,) the son of Torlogh. Many fell in the conflict. Roderick and his son made peace with the other nobles.

West Connaught was burned, both houses and churches, by Donal O'Brien and the English.

Cathal Carrach, son of Conon of Maonmoy, son of Roderick, burned Killaloe, both houses and churches, first plundering and carrying away their property. He, with the English, also spoiled and plundered Thomond. The English marched with him to Roscommon, where he gave them three thousand cows for their services.

Amhlaoibh O'Muireadhaigh (Awlave O'Murray,) archbishop of Armagh, and of Kinel Feradaigh, a shining light, illuminating both clergy and people, died; and Fogartaidh O'Cearbhallain (O'Carolan,) was elected his successor.

Dermot Mac Carthy, lord of Deasmumhan (Desmond,) was slain by the English of Cork.

Donal Mac Gillpatrick, lord of Ossory, died.

A.D. 1186.

Maolcallan, son of Adam, son of Cleirchein, bishop of Clonfert, died.

Donal, son of Hugh O'Loughlin, was deprived of his territory, and Roderick O'Flaherty was elected chief thereof, by a party of the Kinel Owen of Tullaghoge.¹

Con O'Breislein, chief of Fanat, the torch of hospitality and bravery of the north of Ireland, was slain by the son of Mac Loughlin, and a party of the Kinel Owen. Inisowen was afterwards plundered in retaliation.

Giollapatraic Mac Anghiollachuir, chief of Hy Branain, was slain by Donal O'Loughlin, at the instigation of the people of Hy Branain.²

Roderick O'Conor was banished into Munster by his own son, Conon of Maonmoy, and the entire of Connaught was laid waste between them. He (Roderick,) was, however, by the advice of the Siol Murray, brought back, and a Triochad Cead³ of land was given him.

Hugh de Lacy confiscated and transferred many churches to the English lords in Meath, Brefney, and Oriel, and to him the rents of Connaught were paid. He reduced and seized the greater portion of Ireland for the English, and erected castles in all parts of Meath, from the Shannon to the sea. After completing the castle of Dermagh (Durrow,) he came out to view it, accompanied by one-third of the English. There came towards him a certain young man, whose name was Giolla-

3. Corcaraidhe and Corca Adaimh. See the O'Dalys, in the note on Meath.

4. Tioprat Fachtna and Ardfinan. Tioprat Fachtna lay in the west of Ossory, in the parish of Tubrid, barony of Iverk, county of Kilkenny. Ardfinan castle was at Ardfinan, in the barony of Iffa and Offa, county of Tipperary, on the borders of the Suir.

1. Tullaghoge, the place at which the O'Neills were inaugurated; it lies between Grange and Donagherry, in the parish of Desertcreight, in the barony of Dungannon, county of Tyrone.

2. Hy Branain. See note on Dalriada.

3. Triochad Cead. A Triochad Cead comprised, according to various authorities, thirty Ballybetaghs, or 120 quarters of land, gan-ionathar O'Miaidh, of the men of Tefia, who, having a battle-axe concealed about him, gave de Lacy a blow with which he struck off his head, which, along with the body, rolled into the castle ditch, at the sanctuary of Columkille. Giolla-gan-ionathar made his escape by flight, both from English and Irish, into the wood of Clair, and soon after came to the Sionnach (Fox,) and O'Brien, at whose instigation he had slain the earl.⁴

Murogh, son of Teige O'Kelly, lord of Hy Maine, was killed by O'Conor of Maonmoy.

O'Breislein, chief of Fanat, in Kinel Connell, was slain by the son of Mac Loughlin.

A.D. 1187.

Muirheartach O'Maoiluidhir, bishop of Clonfert and Clonmaenois, died.

Maoiliosa O'Cearbhaill (O'Carroll,) bishop of Airghiall (Clogher,) died.

Roderick O'Flaherty, lord of Kinel Owen (Tyrone,) was slain on a predatory excursion into Tirconnell, by O'Maoldoraidh (i.e. Flaherty.)

The Rock of Lough Key was burned by an accidental fire. Upwards of seven score persons, men and women, perished, either by drowning or burning, in the space of one hour, among whom was Duibheasa O'Heyne, the lady of Conor Mac Dermott, lord of Moylurg.¹

Giollaiosa, son of Oiloll O'Brien, prior of Hy Maine, a historian, scribe, and poet, died.

The castle of Killair (in Westmeath,) was burned and destroyed by O'Conor of Maonmoy and Maelsechlain Beag, and not one of the English escaped to tell the tale. They took their arms and armour together with their horses, and two knights were amongst the slain.

Donogh O'Rourke was treacherously killed by the Muintir Eoluis.

Druimeliabh (Drumcliff,) was plundered by Maelseachlain, lord of Hy Briuin and Conmaiene, aided by the son of Cathal O'Rourke, and the English of Meath. A fortnight afterwards Maelseachlain O'Rourke was killed in Conmaiene, and the son of Cathal O'Rourke had his eyes put out by O'Maoldoraidh (i.e. Flaherty,) as a punishment for the violation of Columkille's sanctuary, and one hundred and twenty of the relatives of Maelseachlain O'Rourke were killed in Conmaiene, and in Cairpre (Carbury) of Drumcliff, all which happened through the miracles of God, and intervention of Columkille.²

Mac Dermott (Maurice,) son of Teige, lord of Moylurg, died in his own house at Claonlough, in Clan Cuain.³

each quarter containing 120 Irish acres, that is, 14,400 acres, and this quantity of land was considered equivalent to a barony.

4. Hugh de Lacy. The castle of Dearmagh, or Durrow, in the King's County, was erected by de Lacy, on the site of a famous monastery of St. Columkille, which he had thrown down; and his death was attributed by the Irish to that circumstance as a judgment from Heaven. The man who killed de Lacy fled to his accomplices in the wood of Clair or Clara; but it appears from Mac Geoghegan and others, that the Irish attacked and put to the sword the English retinue at the castle, and that having got de Lacy's body into their possession, they concealed it nearly ten years; for it is stated in Ware, under the article Simon Rochfort, bishop of Meath, and in Archdall's notice of the abbey of St. Thomas, in Dublin, that the body was not recovered till the year 1195, when it was interred with great pomp in the abbey of Beccive, in Meath; Matthew O'Heney, archbishop of Cashel, and John Comyn, archbishop of Dublin, attending at the ceremony. The head of de Lacy was brought to Dublin and buried in the tomb of his first wife, Rosa de Munimene, in the abbey of St. Thomas, which he had endowed. It appears that a curious controversy arose between the canons of St. Thomas and the monks of Beccive, about de Lacy's body, which was at last decided in favour of the abbey of St. Thomas, by Simon Rochfort, bishop of Meath, together with the archdeacon of Meath, and the prior of Dulcey, who had been appointed by the Pope as judges in the case.

Hugh de Lacy makes a remarkable figure in the English invasion. The de Lacys came from Normandy with William the Conqueror, and were earls of Lincoln in England. Hugh de Lacy came to Ireland with Henry II., A.D. 1171, and obtained from that monarch a grant of the whole kingdom of Meath, as already stated in the note on Meath. He was lord palatine of Meath, and many years chief governor of Ireland. He erected numerous castles, particularly in Meath and Westmeath, as those of Trim, Kells, Ardnorcher, and Durrow, &c., and endowed some monasteries. He is thus described in Holingshed:—"His eyes were dark and deep set, his neck short, his stature small, his body hairy, not fleshy, but sinewy, strong, and compact; a very good soldier, but rather rash and hasty." It appears from Hanmer and others, that he was an able and politic man in state affairs, but very ambitious and covetous of wealth and great possessions; he is also represented as a famous horseman. De Lacy's second wife was a daughter of king Roderick O'Conor; and his descendants, the de Lacys, were lords of Meath, and earls of Ulster, and founded many powerful families in Meath, Westmeath, and Louth, and also in Limerick, some of whom were distinguished marshals in the service of Austria and Russia.

1. Mac Dermott was prince of Moylurg, now the Plains of Boyle, or barony of Boyle, in the county of Roscommon, and had his chief castle at Lough Key. In the text seven hundred persons are said to have lost their lives, but the mistake has been corrected by an interlineation, which states the number at one hundred and forty.

2. Druimeliabh or Drumcliff, was a famous monastery in the barony of Carbury, county of Sligo, founded by St. Columkille. It appears that O'Rourke, chief of Brefney, who plundered it in conjunction with the English, usurped that principality after the death of Tiarnan O'Rourke. Flaherty O'Muldorrey, who killed O'Rourke for having committed this sacrilege, was prince of Tirconnell.

Raghnall Mac Coghlan, lord of Delvin, died.

Hugh, son of Maoileachlain O'Rourke, lord of Brefney, was slain by the sons of Con Mac Raghnall.

Aireachtach Mac Amalgaidh (Mac Awley,) chief of Calraidhe (Calry,) died.

A.D. 1188.

Martin O'Brolaigh, the chief sage of the Irish, and professor at Armagh, died.

Hugh O'Bechan, bishop of Innis Cathaidh,¹ died.

Awlave O'Daighre, having gone to Hi (Iona,) on a pilgrimage, died with sincere repentance.

Roderick O'Cananain, a long time chief of Kinel Connell, and heir presumptive to the crown of Ireland, was treacherously slain by Flaherty O'Muldorrey, on the bridge of Sligo, where he was decoyed from Drumcliff, and along with him were also killed his kinsman, and a party of his people. Manus O'Garvey, chief of Feardroma, who had attacked O'Cananain, was slain by the people of Eachmarcach O'Dogherty, in revenge for O'Cananain.

Donal O'Cananain, having accidentally cut his foot with an axe, at Derry, while cleaving some wood for fuel, died, having the curse of the clergy of St. Columkille.

The English of the castle of Moycoba (in Down,) and a party from Iveagh, in Ulidia, went on a predatory excursion into Tyrone, and advanced as far as Leim-Mic-Neill, where they seized some cattle. Donal O'Loughlin, with his followers, pursued and overtook them at Cabhan-na-g-Crann-ard.² A battle ensued, in which the English were defeated with great slaughter. Donal, son of Hugh O'Loughlin, lord of Aileach, heir presumptive (Rioghdamhna) to the crown of Ireland, a man eligible in person, in bravery, and in wisdom was slain in this engagement by a thrust from a spear. On the same day he was conveyed to Armagh, where he was interred with great honours and solemnity.

Edaoin, daughter of O'Quin,³ lady of Munster, while on a pilgrimage at Derry, died victorious over the world and the devil.

John de Courcy, and the English of Ireland, joined by Conor O'Dermott, having marched into Connaught, O'Conor of Maonmoy (O'Conor, king of Connaught,) summoned the chiefs of that country to his assistance. Donal O'Brien, with a large force of the men of Munster, joined the king of Connaught's army. The English burned several churches throughout the country, and did not halt until they arrived at Eas Dara (Ballysadare, in the county of Sligo.) They then resolved to march into Tirconnell, for the Conacians prevented them advancing into their own country. Upon O'Maol-doraidh (Flaherty) receiving intelligence of the intention of the English, he collected the troops of Kinel Connell, and marched to Drumcliff to oppose them. When the English heard of this they burned Ballysadare, and retreated to Coirshliabh (the Curlew mountains,) where the Connaught and Munster forces met and gave them battle. Many of the English were slain, and they retreated from that country with great difficulty, having done much damage on that expedition.

The English of Ulidia⁴ plundered the territory

3. Clann Cuain, a territory possessed by a tribe of the O'Dowds, in the north of the barony of Carra, county of Mayo. According to O'Dugan, Mac Dermott, prince of Moylurg, was their lord or chief.

1. Innis Cathaidh, now Inniscattery, an island in the Shannon, west of Limerick, had a famous monastery founded by St. Senan, in the sixth century, became a bishop's see, and afterwards united to the diocese of Limerick.

2. Cabhan-na-g-Crannard. Magh Coba, or Moycoba, signifying the plain of Coba, was a district situated near Downpatrick, where de Courcy had a castle. Cabhan (or Cavan) na-g-Crannard, signifies the hollow field of the high trees. It was afterwards called Cavan-na-Cath, that is, the hollow field of the fights. According to Stuart, in his history of Armagh, the place where this battle was fought is situated about two miles from Armagh on the road to Newry. Donal O'Loughlin, who commanded the Irish, and was killed in this engagement, was Rioghdamhna, or heir presumptive to the Irish monarchy. He was prince of Aileach, a title taken from Aileach in Donegal, a royal residence of the Ulster kings. The O'Loughlins were a branch of the O'Neills, princes of Tyrone, and took their name from Loughlin O'Neill, a valiant chief, one of their ancestors. In the same year that Donal O'Loughlin was killed we find also, in the Annals, that another chieftain named Donal O'Loughlin defeated the English in a battle in Tyrowen, in which he also was slain.

3. The O'Quins, a powerful family in the county of Clare. See note on Thomond.

4. Dalaradia and Ulidia. As Dalaradia and Ulidia are frequently mentioned in the Annals, it will be necessary here to give an account of them. Uladh, or Ulidia, derived its name, according to Keating, O'Flaherty, and others, either from Ollshaith, signifying great treasure, or from Ollamh Fodhla, who was monarch of Ireland about six centuries before the Christian era. The name Uladh was applied to the province of Ulster, but in after times was confined to a large territory comprising the present county of Down and part of Antrim, and was latinised Ulidia. This territory also obtained the name of Dalaraidhe. The word of Kinel Owen, but they were pursued and attacked by Donal, son of Hugh O'Loughlin, lord of Kinel Owen, and defeated with great slaughter, but O'Loughlin himself was slain in the thick of the battle.

Dal signifies a part or portion, and also descendants or a tribe, and hence Dal-Araidhe signifies the descendants or tribe of Araidh, as being descended from Fiachu Araidh, king of Ulster in the third century, who is described as of the race of Ir, or Clann Rory, called Rudericinns, and whose posterity possessed this territory, the name of which was latinised into Dalratria. In O'Flaherty, Lanigan, Dubouddieu's surveys of Down and Antrim, and others, the extent and boundaries of Dalratria are given as follows:—It comprised the present county of Down, with a great part of Antrim, extending from Newry, Carlingford Bay, and the Mourne mountains, to Slieve Mis mountain, in the barony of Antrim; thus containing, in the south and south-east parts of Antrim, the districts along the shores of Lough Neagh and Belfast Lough, Carrickfergus, and the peninsula of Island Magee, to Larne, and thence in a line westward to the river Bann. The remaining portion of the county Antrim obtained the name of Dalriada, a territory which will be described hereafter. It has been erroneously stated by some writers that the boundary between Dalaraidhe and Dalriada was the river Buais, or Bush, in the barony of Dunlinc, county of Antrim.

The territory of Uladh or Dalaraidhe is connected with the earliest events in Irish history. Inbhear Slainge, or the Bay of Slainge, now either the Bay of Dundrum or Strangford Lough, in the county of Down, derived its name from Slainge, son of Partholan, who planted the first colony in Ireland. Sliabh Slainge, or the mountain of Slainge, also took its name from Slainge, the son of Partholan, who was buried there. Giraldu Cambrensis calls it Mons Salunga. It is now called Slieve Donard; it is the highest of the Mourne mountains, and one of the most magnificent in Ireland. It obtained the name of Donard from St. Domangort, a disciple of St. Patrick, who built an oratory on its summit, which in after ages became a celebrated place of pilgrimage. Magh Innis, or the Plain of the Island, a name applied to the peninsula now called Lecale, is stated by our old Annalists as the place where Fionachta, monarch of Ireland, the son of Ollamh Fodhla, died and was buried. In the first century, in the reign of Lughnadh Rimbhdearg, monarch of Ireland from A.D. 65 to A.D. 73, Lough Neagh, according to the ancient Annalists, suddenly burst forth and overwhelmed by its waters the surrounding plains. Dalaradia is also remarkable as the scene of St. Patrick's early captivity, (it being there that he was sold as a slave to a chieftain named Milecho, whose flocks he tended near Mis mountain,) and is celebrated as the place where he made the first converts to Christianity, and finally as the place of his death and burial. He died at Sabhal, afterwards the abbey of Saul, in the parish of Saul, and was buried in the cathedral at Dune, which was called after him Downpatrick. The Dal Fiatachs, so designated as descendants of Fintech Fionn, monarch of Ireland in the second century, of the race of Heremon, were also inhabitants of Dalaradia, and founded many powerful families in this territory and other parts of Ulster. A colony of Picts, from north Britain, settled in Ulster at a very early period, chiefly in Uladh or Dalaradia, and other parts of the present counties of Down, Antrim, and Derry. The Picts were called by the Irish Cruithnids, which signified Painted Men. The Cruithneans, or Irish Picts, had their own princes and chiefs, and are frequently mentioned in Irish history, from the first to the tenth century. The Picts of Dalaradin were intimately connected by intermarriages with the old Milesians of the race of Ir. The great battle of Achmídhilthidhearg, in Dalaradin, in the fourth century, has been already described in the note on Orgiall. In A.D. 637, Conall Claon, king of Uladh, a valiant prince of the race of Ir, having attempted to recover the monarchy of Ireland, which had been wrested from his ancestors by the descendants of Heremon, was defeated, and forced to fly to North Britain or Albany, afterwards called Scotland, but returning with a powerful force of Picts, Britons, and Anglo-Saxons, and being joined by his allies in Uladh or Dalaradia, he fought against Donal the Second, monarch of Ireland, the famous battle of Moyrath, (now Moirra, in the county of Down,) one of the bloodiest engagements recorded in Irish history, which continued seven successive days, and in which, on the seventh day, the invaders were defeated, and Conall Claon, with almost all his forces, slain. Donal Breac, king of the Albanian Scots, a commander in Conall's army, narrowly escaped with his life from this battle, and fled from the field with the shattered remnant of his forces.

In A.D. 680, as mentioned in O'Connor's Dissertations, Cathasach and Ultan, princes of the Cruithnians of Dalaradia, leagued with the Britons to invade Ireland, and united their forces at Rath More, in Magh Line, but were defeated by the Northern Ily Nialls in a great battle. This Rath More was a royal residence of the kings of Dalaradia; it was situated in the parish now called Donegore, county of Antrim, and is comprised in the Manor of Moylinny, and not at Coleraine, as stated by Beaufort and others.

In the beginning of the twelfth century, Magnus, the celebrated king of Norway, the Orkneys, the Hebrides, and the Isle of Man, invaded Ireland with a powerful army, and ravaged the country. His progress was opposed by the men of Ulster, and in a great battle fought at Magh Coba, or the Plain of Coba, near Downpatrick, on St. Bartholomew's day, the 24th of August, A.D. 1103, the foreigners were totally defeated, Magnus himself with Sigurd, earl of the Orkneys, and other valiant commanders, being slain. The surviving remnant of the Norwegians fled to their ships, and sailed to Scotland. King Magnus was buried near the cathedral of Downpatrick. A most curious and interesting account of this battle is given in Johnstone's Celto-Scandinavian Antiquities from the Saga of Snorro, the Icelandic historian.

The chiefs and clans of Dalaradia or Ulidia, and the territories which they possessed in the twelfth century, as collected from O'Dugan's Topography, are as follows:—The Craobh Ruadh, or the portion of the Redbranch Knights of Ulster, a large territory which comprised the central parts of the present county of Down, with some adjoining parts of Armagh, is given by O'Dugan as the head territory of Uladh. The principal chiefs of the Craobh Ruadh were—I. O'Duinnslebh, called by the Annalists, Mac Duinnslebh, as king of Uladh, which name has been anglicised O'Dunlevy, or Mac Donlevy, as already explained under A.D. 1171; O'Heochadha, anglicised to O'Heoghy, or Hoey, a branch of the Mac Dunslevys; O'Haidith; O'Eochgain; O'Lahradha; O'Leathlobhra; O'Luingsigh, or Lynch; O'Moran; and O'Mathghmhina. O'Gairbhith, or O'Garvey, and O'Ainbith, or O'Hanvey, were chiefs of Ily Eachach Coba, now the barony of Iveagh. II. Mac Aongusa, or Magennis, chief of Clan Aodha, or Clan Hugh, the tribe name of the family. The Mac Gennises had the baronies of Iveagh and Lecale, and part of Mourne, and were lords of Iveagh, Newry, and Mourne. They were descended from the famous warrior Conall Cearnach, and were the head of the Clanna Rory of Ulster. III. Mac Artain, or Mac Cartan, chief of Kinel Fingartaigh, now the baronies of Kinelarty and Dufferin. IV. O'Duibheanaigh, or O'Duvany, chief of Kinel Amalgaidh, or Amhargaidh Uí Morna, or Uí Mughroin, now Clanawley, in the county of Down. V. Mac Duileachain, or O'Duibh-lechain, chief of Clan Breasail Mac Duileachain, near Kinelarty, in the barony of Castlereagh. VI. O'Coltarain, or Coulter, chief of Dal Coirb, in the barony of Castlereagh. The following clans collected from O'Dugan were located in Dalaradia. VII. O'Flonn, or O'Flynn, and O'Domhnallain, or O'Donnellan, chiefs of Ily Tuirtre. The territory of Ily Tuirtre lay along the northern shores of Lough Neagh and the river Bann, and extended to Slieve Mis, comprising the baronies of Toome and Antrim, in the county of Antrim, and was afterwards known as northern Clanaboy. VIII. O'Leirc, or Ere, chief of Ily Fiachrach Finn, in the barony of Massareene. IX. O'Criadain, or O'Credan, chief of Machaire Meadhaidh, now the parish of Magheramisk, in the barony of Massareene. X. O'Ilaotha, or O'Ilugh, chief of Fearnmhoghie, or Fermoy, a district in the county of Down, on the borders of

A.D. 1189.

AOLCAINNIDH O'Fercomais (now Mac Comas,) professor at Derry, was drowned between Ard (Ardmagilligan) and In-nisowen.

John de Courcy, and the English, plundered Armagh.

The entire of Armagh, situate between St.

Antrim, in the barony of Lower Iveagh: XI. O'Caomhain, or O'Keevan, chief of Magh Lini, now Moylinny, a district in the barony of Antrim. XII. O'Machoiden, chief of Mughdhorn, or Mourne. XIII. O'Lachnain, or O'Loughnin, chief of Modharn Beag, or Little Mourne.

In addition to O'Dugan, the following clans in Dalaradia are given from other authorities. The Mac Gees of Islandmagee. The Mac Gillmores, a warlike clan, who possessed the districts of the great Ards. The Mac Rorrs, or Rogers, chiefs of Killwarlin. The O'Kellys of Clanbrasil Mac Coolechan, in the county of Down. The Mac Wards. The Mac Gobhans, or Mac Gowans, also given by some writers as O'Gobhans, or O'Gowans, a name which has been anglicised to Smith. These were a powerful clan of the race of Ir, or the Clanna Rory, and were descended from the famous warrior Conall Cearnach. They were mostly expelled by the English into Donegal, from whence great numbers of them emigrated to the county of Leitrim, and they are still very numerous in Rossinver, as well as in the county of Cavan. Dal Buinne was a district in Dalaradia not given by O'Dugan, but occurring in the Annals, and derived its name, according to O'Flaherty, from Buinn, son of Fergus Mac Roy. It was situated on the borders of Down and Antrim, and contained the parish of Drumboe, in Down, with those of Lisburn, Magheragall, Magheramask, Glenavy, Aghalee, and Aghagallen, in Antrim.

In the fourteenth century Hugh Buidhe O'Neill, prince of Tyrone, with his forces, crossed the Bann, and took possession of the northern part of Dalaradia, which, from its being possessed by his posterity, who were called Clann Aodha Buidhe, was anglicised to Claneboy or Clandeboy. It extended from Carrickfergus Bay, and the river Lagan, westward to Lough Neagh, and contained, according to Dubourdieu and other authorities, the baronies of Belfast, Massareene, Antrim, and Upper Toome, in the county of Antrim. This territory was called North Claneboy, to distinguish it from South Claneboy, which was in the county of Down. A part of North Claneboy also obtained the name of Bryan Carragh's country, from having been taken from the O'Neills by a chief of the M'Donnells, who was called Bryan Carragh.

South Claneboy, a territory which derived its name from the same Hugh Buidhe O'Neill, comprised the baronies of Ards, Castlereagh, Kinelarty, and Lecale, and extended, according to Mac Geoghagan, from the Bay of Dundrum to the Bay of Carrickfergus, or Belfast Lough.

In A.D. 1177, John de Courcy, with his forces, overran a great part of Orgiall and Ulidia, or Dalaradia, and for a period of twenty years carried on an incessant warfare with the native chiefs. He fixed his head quarters at Downpatrick. After de Courcy had been driven out of Ireland by his great rivals, the de Lacys, lords of Meath, the latter obtained possession of Ulidia, and were created earls of Ulster. The de Burgos next became earls of Ulster, and possessors of Ulidia, which title and possessions afterwards passed to the Mortimers, earls of March, in England. The chief Anglo-Norman and English settlers in Ulidia under de Courcy and his successors were the Audleys, Bissetts, Copelands, Fitzsimons, Bridget's crosses and St. Bridget's church, including the fortress, the Trian,¹ and the churches, was consumed by fire.

Murogh O'Carroll, lord of Oirgiall, died in the great monastery,² after due penance.

Donal, son of Murtoth O'Loughlin, was killed by the English of Dalaraidhe while amongst them.

Echmilidh,³ son of Mac Cana (or Mac Can,) the delight and happiness of all Tyrone, died.

Mac-na-hoidhche (Son of the Night), O'Maol-ruanaidh,⁴ lord of Fermanagh, being expelled from his lordship, fled for refuge to O'Carroll. Shortly Chamberlains, Bagnalls, Martells, Jordans, Mandevilles, Riddles, Russells, Smiths, Stauntons, Logans, Savadges, Walshes, and Whites. The Fitzgeralds, earls of Kildare, obtained Lecale in the reign of queen Mary. The following noble families are found in more modern times in the county of Down. The Hamiltons, barons of Claneboy, and earls of Clanbrassil. The Montgomerys, earls of Mount Alexander, in the barony of Ards. The Cromwells, viscounts of Ardglass, a title afterwards possessed by the Barringtons. The Hills, barons of Killwarlin, viscounts of Hillsborough, and now marquesses of Downshire. The Annesleys, barons of Glerawley and viscounts Annesleys of Castlevellan. Rawdon Hastings, earls of Moira. The Jocelyns, barons of Clanbrassil, and earls of Roden. The Stuarts, viscounts Castlereagh, now marquesses of Londonderry. The Dawneys, viscounts of Down. The Wards, barons of Bangor. The Needhams, earls of Kilmorby, and viscounts of Newry and Mourne. The Smythes, viscounts of Strangford. The Blackwoods, barons of Dufferin.

In the reign of Edward II. the chief part of Ulidia was divided into two counties, namely, Down and the Ards, or Newtown, and in the reign of Elizabeth both were formed into the county of Down.

In the ecclesiastical divisions the see of Down, in Latin Dunum, was founded by St. Cailan, or Coelan, in the fifth century. The bishops of Down are frequently mentioned as bishops of Dundaleathghlass, an ancient name of Downpatrick; they are also styled bishops of Uladh, or Ulidia. The diocese of Down comprehends the greater part of the county of Down, with a small portion of Antrim, and is united to the see of Connor. The see of Dromore, which was founded by St. Colman in the sixth century, comprises a large part of the county of Down, with small portions of Armagh and Antrim. At Newry a great Cistercian monastery was founded by Murtoth Mac Loughlin, king of Ireland, in the twelfth century. A mitred abbot presided over both it and the lordships of Newry and Mourne, and exercised episcopal jurisdiction. This abbey was named in Irish Iubhair Chinn Traighe, which signifies, Of the Yew at the Head of the Strand, from a yew tree planted there by St. Patrick; and its name was latinised Monasterium de viridi ligno. At Beauchoir, or Bangor, in the county of Down, an abbey was founded by St. Congal, in the sixth century, and was famous for its college in the early ages.

Dalriada or Dalriada. This ancient territory comprised all the remaining portion of the county of Antrim, not mentioned in Dalaradia, with a small part of the present county of Derry, as it is stated in these Annals at the year 1182, that Dunboe was in Dalriada, now the parish of Dunboe, in the barony of Colerain, county of Derry. Dalriada was named from Cairbre Riada, son of Conaire, monarch of Ireland in the third century. Some Irish chiefs from Ulster, descendants of Cairbre Riada, founded a colony in Albany, afterwards called Scotland, and after having conquered the Picts of that country became the founders of a kingdom also called Dalriada. From the chiefs of the Dalriadians were descended the ancient Scottish kings, and also the house of Stuart. The after an English force came to that country, O'Carroll and O'Maolruanaidh gave them battle, but O'Carroll was defeated, and O'Maolruanaidh was slain.

O'Conor, of Maonmoy, (son of Roderick,) king of Connaught over both Irish and English, was slain by a party of his own people, namely, by Manus, son of Floinn O'Finachta (who was called the Crosach Donn,⁵) aided by Hugh, son of Bryan of Brefney, son of Torlogh O'Conor; Murtoth, son of Cathal, son of Dermot, son of Teige; and Giolla-na-naomh, son of Giollacomain, son of Muireadhach Ban (the Fair) O'Maoilnichil of the Tuatha⁶ (or Districts.) It was a sad thing for a faction to have conspired to kill the monarch elect of Ireland, to whom the greater portion of the princes of Leath Mogha (or the south of Ireland,) gave their suffrages, for Donal O'Brien came to territory which obtained the name of Dalriada in Ulster is connected with some of the earliest events in Irish history; and our old Annalists record the battle of Murbolg, which was fought in this district between the Nemedians and Fomorians. It is stated that Sobairee, monarch of Ireland of the race of Ir, about nine centuries before the Christian era, erected a fortress, in which he resided, at Dunsobairee, or the fortress of Sobairee, near Murbolg. It is also mentioned that Rotheachta, king of Ireland, was killed by lightning at Dunsobairee. This place, now called Dunseverick, is situated on a bold rock projecting into the sea near the Giants' Causeway. The chief, O'Cathain, in after times, had his castle at Dunseverick, the ruins of which still remain. On the sea coast of Antrim is that stupendous natural curiosity the Giants' Causeway, of volcanic origin, consisting of a countless number of basaltic columns of immense height, which, from the regularity of their formation and arrangement, have the appearance of a vast work of art, and hence were supposed to have been constructed by giants. In O'Brien's Irish Dictionary, under the word Fomar, it appears that the ancient Irish called this wondrous production of nature Clochán-na-Fomaraigh, signifying the Causeway of the Fomorians. These Fomorians, it may be observed, are mentioned by our old historians as a colony of African pirates, descendants of Hain, who had settled in the North of Ireland, on the coasts of Ulster and Connaught, and are represented as a race of giants. Dalriada was divided into two large districts: 1st. The Glynnys, so called from its consisting of several large glens, extended from Oldersfleet or Larne, to the vicinity of Ballycastle, along the sea shore, and contained the barony of Glenarriu, and part of Carey. 2nd. The Routes, called Renta, or Ruta, which comprehended the baronies of Dunluce, and Kilconway.

The chief clans in Dalriada were the O'Kanes, above-mentioned, and the Mae Uidhiliu or Mae Quillans, who held the territory of the Routes, and had their chief seat at Dunluce. In these Annals, A.D. 1211, the Mae Donnells of the Hebrides are mentioned as having invaded the territories of Antrim and Derry, where they afterwards made settlements. In the reign of Elizabeth Somhairle Buidhe Mac Donnell, called by English writers Sorley Boy, a chief from the Hebrides, (descended from the ancient Irish of the race of Clan Colla, as given in the note on Orgiall,) came with his forces and took possession of the Glynnys. After many long and fierce battles with the Mae Quillans, the Mac Donnells made themselves masters of the country, and dispossessed the Mae Quillans. Dubourdien, in his Survey of Antrim, says: "A lineal descendant of the chief Mae Quillan lives on the road between Belfast and Carrickfergus, near the silver stream, and probably enjoys more happiness as a respectable farmer, than his ancestor did as a prince in those turbulent times." The Mac his mansion at Dunleoda⁷ and remained with him on a visit for a week, and O'Conor gave him sixty cows out of every Triochad Cead (or barony) in Connaught, and ten valuable articles of gold, but O'Brien accepted only of the cup (or goblet) of Dermot O'Brien, his own ancestor. Roderick Mac Dunslevey, king of Ulidia, also paid him a friendly visit. Donal Mac Carthy, lord of Desmond, came to his mansion, and O'Conor gave him five steeds out of every barony in Connaught. Mael-seachlain Beag, king of Tara, visited O'Conor, and received large presents, as did also O'Rourke.⁸

After the death of O'Conor of Maonmoy, the Siol Murray waited on Roderick O'Conor, king of Ireland, to give him the government of Connaught; and as soon as Roderick came to Moy Aoi,⁹ he took under his charge the hostages of Siol Murray and Connaught, for it was at Iniselothran on Donnells were created earls of Antrim, a dignity which they still enjoy. The O'Haras, a branch of the great family of O'Hara in Sligo, have also been long settled in Antrim. Several families of the O'Neills have been also in Antrim from an early period. The other clans in this territory were the O'Siadhails or O'Shields; the O'Quinns; O'Furries; Mae Allisters, Mae Gees, &c.

The following are the noble families in Antrim, in modern times. The viscounts O'Neill, a branch of the O'Neills, princes of Tyrone. The Chichesters, earls of Belfast, and marquesses of Donegal. The earl Mac Cartney, baron of Lisanoure. The Clotworthys and Skeffingtons, earls of Massereene. And the Vaughans, barons of Lisburne. Antrim was formed into a county in the reign of Edward II.

The diocese of Connor was founded by St. Aengus Maenisius in the fifth century. It comprehends almost the whole of the county of Antrim, with small portions of Down and Derry.

1. The Trian or Third, was a division of Armagh.
2. The great monastery was that of Mellifont, near Drogheda in Louth.
3. Eaehmilidh Mac Cana, or Mac Can. The name Eaehmilidh is derived from Each, a steed, and Milidh, a knight, and is equivalent to the Latin eques auratus, a knight or esquire: The Mac Cans were chiefs of Clan Breasail, an ancient territory on the borders of Armagh and Tyrone, near Lough Neagh, comprising the present baronies of Ouncilland in Armagh, and extending into the county of Tyrone. The family of Hamilton have been in modern times earls of Claubrazil.
4. O'Maolruanaidh was descended from the Clan Colla, and of the same stock as the Mac Guires, lords of Fermanagh.
5. Crosach Donn signified the brown haired squinter.
6. According to O'Dugan, O'Branan, and O'Maoilnichil were chiefs of Coreaseachnaill, in the county of Rosecommon, for which territory the Tuatha, or Districts, was another name.
7. Dunleoda, now Dunloe, where a castle was built by Conor Maonmoy (O'Conor), near Ballinasloe, afterwards possessed by the earls of Clancarthy.
8. It appears that the large presents of cattle, golden articles, &c. made by O'Conor to the provincial princes, were in the nature of compensation, or tributes, which were always paid by the monarchs to the provincial kings and princes, who did them homage and acknowledged their authority, as may be seen in the celebrated work called Leabhar-na-g-Ceart, or the Book of Rights.
9. Moy Aoi, or Magh Aoi, also called Machaire Chonnacht, comprised the large plain in the county of Rosecommon, between the towns of Rosecommon and Elphin.

Lough Ree, that the hostages of O'Connor Maonmoy were kept at that time.

Flaherty O'Maoldoraidh, lord of Kinel Connell, remained encamped with his forces at Corran (in Sligo,) and was opposed by all the Conacians, both English and Irish.

Conor O'Dermott was slain by Cathal Carrach, son of O'Connor of Maonmoy, in revenge of the death of his father.

Richard I.¹⁰ was proclaimed king of England on the 6th of July.

O'Maoldoraidh (Flaherty,) marched a large force into Connaught, and encamped at Corran. The Conacians, both English and Irish, opposed him, but no advantage was gained on either side, and both armies returned.

A.D. 1190.

Dermod O'Rabhartaigh (O'Rafferty,) abbot of Durrow, died.

Maelseachlain O'Neachtain and Giolla Bearaidh O'Sluaghadaigh, were slain by Torlogh son of Roderick O'Connor.

Mor, daughter of Torlogh O'Connor, and of Duibheasa, daughter of Dermod Mac Teige, died.

A conference was held to conclude a peace between Cathal Croivdearg (O'Connor,) and Cathal Carrach (O'Connor,) at Clonfert Brendan. The Siol Murray came to the meeting, together with the successor of St. Patrick (Thomas O'Connor,) Conor Mac Dermott, and Aireachtach O'Rody, but they could not reconcile them. O'Connor and the Siol Murray came to Clonmacnois that night, and early on the following morning they embarked on the Shannon, and sailed into Lough Ree. A great storm arose on the lake by which their vessels were separated, and the boat in which O'Connor sailed became unmanageable in consequence of the violence of the storm, and was swamped, so that all perished with the exception of Cathal Croivdearg and six others. Among those drowned were Airachtach O'Rody; Conor, son of Cathal; Conor and Awlave, the sons of Hugh Mac Oirechtaigh (Mac Geraghty;) O'Maoilbrenainn, the son of O'Mannachain, and many others.

A.D. 1191.

Roderick O'Connor went from Connaught into Tirconnell to the seat of Flaherty O'Maoldoraidh, and from thence into Tyrone, requesting forces from the north of Ireland to enable him to recover his kingdom of Connaught; but the people of Ulster would give him no support. He then proceeded to the English of Meath for the same purpose, but they would not assist him. From thence he went into Munster, whence he was recalled by the Siol Murray, who granted him lands in Tir Fiachrach and Kinel Aodha-na-Hechtge.¹

Ailleann, the daughter of Riagan O'Mailruan-aidh, the wife of Aireachtach O'Rody, died.

A.D. 1192.

The porch of the refectory of the black church of St. Columkille at Derry, was built by O'Kane of the Creeve,¹ and by the daughter of O'Inneirghe (O'Henery.)

Taichleach O'Dowd, lord of Hy Amhalgaidh and Hy Fiachrach,² was slain by his two grandsons.

Hugh O'Flynn, chief of Siol Maoilruain,³ died.

The English were defeated at Carraidh Eacharadh⁴ by the Muintir Maoiltsiona.

The castles of Ath-an-urchair and Cillbisge⁵ were erected this year.

10. Richard I. The chronology of the kings of England, followed in those notes, is that of Sir Harris Nicholas, the most accurate authority on the subject. Henry II. died at the castle of Chinon, in Normandy, on the 6th of July, A.D. 1189, and was succeeded by his son Richard, surnamed Cœur de Lion.

The year of king Henry's arrival in Ireland, as already given in the Annals, is A.D. 1171. Ware, O'Flaherty, and Lanigan, give the same year, though Leland and others erroneously state A.D. 1172, as the year of his arrival.

1. Tir Fiachrach was in the county of Galway. See note in p. 15. Kinel Aodha-na-hEchtge, a district in the south-east of the same county.

1. O'Kane of the Craoibh or Creeve. This territory was identical with the present barony of Colerain, county of Derry.

2. Lord of Tyrawley and Tireragh. The baronies of Tyrawley, in the county of Mayo, and Tireragh, in the county of Sligo, which in the original are written Uan-Amhalgaidh and Ua Ffiachrach.

3. Siol Maoilruain, or Maoilruana. This territory lay in the west of the county of Roscommon, and comprised the parish of Kiltullagh, part of the parish of Kiltewan, in the county of Roscommon, and a considerable portion of Ballynakill, in the county of Galway. It also comprehended the mountain district of Sliabh-uis-Fhloinn, or O'Flynn's mountain, celebrated in the Irish song of the Droigheanan Donn, or the "Black Thorn."

4. Carraidh Eacharadh, now Corry, near Ballinalack, county of Westmeath.

5. The castles of Ardnorcher and Kilbixey, in Westmeath.

The English committed great depredations on Donal O'Brien. They marched over the Plain of Cilldalna (Killaloe,) into Moy O'd-Toirdhealbhaidh (or Torlogh's Plain,) where they were overtaken by the Dal g-Cais (Dalcassians,) who slew a great number of them. On that expedition the English built the castles of Cill Fiachal and Cnoc Raflonn.⁶

Donal O'Brien defeated the English of Ossory with great slaughter.

A.D. 1193.

Eochaidh O'Baoighill (O'Boyle,) was slain by the people of Hy Fiachra of Ard Sratha.¹

Maolpadraic O'Coffey died.

Cathal Mac Gaithene died.

Derforghaill, wife of Tiarnan O'Rourke, and daughter of Murchadh O'Maoileachlainn,² died in the monastery of Droichead Atha (Drogheda,) in the 85th year of her age.

Dermot, son of Conbroghda O'Diomusaigh (O'Dempsey,) a long time chief of Clan Maoilughra, and lord of Hy Failge,³ died.

Cathal Odhar Mac Carthy was slain by Donal Mac Carthy.

Murtogh, son of Murrough Mac Murrough, lord of Hy Cennselaigh,⁴ died.

Hugh O'Maoilbrenan, chief of Clan Conchubhair,⁵ was slain by the English of Dublin.

O'Carroll, lord of Oriel, was taken by the English, who hanged him, having first put out his eyes.

Inis Clothrann was plundered by the Mac Costelloes,⁶ and the sons of Conor of Maonmoy.

6. Cill Fiachail, or Kilfeacle, a parish in the barony of Clanwilliam, county of Tipperary. Knockraffon, a beautiful hill near the river Suir, in the parish of Knockgraffon, in the barony of Middlethird, county of Tipperary.

1. The territory of Hy Fiachra, in Tyrone, comprised the parish of Ardstraw, and some adjoining districts.

2. Derforghaill. This was the celebrated princess Dervorgilla, daughter of the king of Meath, and wife of Tiarnan O'Rourke, prince of Breffny. She has been already mentioned as celebrated in Irish history, on account of her abduction by Dermot Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, which was the cause of the English invasion. By other writers her death is stated to have taken place at the monastery of Mellifont, near Drogheda.

3. The O'Dempseys were chiefs of Clan Maoilughra, or Glenmalire, a territory which, according to O'Brien, was divided between the King's and Queen's counties. Hy Failge, or Offaley, was an extensive territory, containing parts of the present King's and Queen's counties, of which O'Conor was supreme chief.

A.D. 1194.

Constantine O'Brien, bishop of Killaloe, died.

Donal, son of Torlogh O'Brien, king of Munster, a refulgent torch of peace and war, and the brilliant star of hospitality and generosity of the men of Munster and Leth Mogha, died. He was succeeded by his son Murtogh.

The English took possession of Inis O'Fionnain,¹ but they were driven out of it.

Cumidhe O'Flynn² was slain by the English.

Gilbert Mac Costelloe (or Nangle,) marched to Easruadh (Ballyshannon,) but was obliged to return without obtaining advantages.

Maolseachlainn, son of Donal Fitzpatrick, lord of Ossory, died.

Conor, son of Manus, son of Dunslevey O'Heoghy, was treacherously killed by O'Hanlon.

Hugh the Blind, son of Torlogh O'Conor, died.

Sitring, son of Floinn O'Feenaghty, chief of Clan Murchadha,³ died.

Donagh, son of Murtogh, son of Torlogh (O'Brien,) was slain by Murtogh, son of Donal O'Brien.

Murogh, son of Awlave O'Cinneidigh (O'Kennedy,) was killed by Loughlin, son of Macraith O'Kennedy.

A.D. 1195.

Donal O'Conaing (Gunning,) bishop of Killaloe, died.

Florent, son of Riagan O'Maoilruanaidh, (Mulrooney,) bishop of Elphin, died.

Donal O'Finn, successor of St. Brenan of Clonfert, died.

Eachmarcach O'Kane died in St. Paul's church.

4. Hy Kinselagh, or Cennselagh, was an extensive territory, containing a great part of the county of Wexford, and part of Carlow.

5. The O'Maoilbranans were chiefs of Clanconor, a district in the county of Rosecommon; and another family of the same name were located in Leix, Queen's county.

6. Inis Clothrann, was an island in Lough Ree, county of Longford, which had a celebrated abbey. The Mac Costelloes here mentioned were the English family of the Nangles, as explained in the note on Meath.

1. St. Fintan's island, in Lough Dearg, county of Donegal. See Seward.

2. O'Flynn was lord of Hy Tuirtre, in Dalaradia, and this Cumidhe appears to have been the chief who defeated de Courcy in A.D. 1177.

3. O'Finnaghta was chief of Clan Murchada, a district in the county of Roscommon.

Conor Mac Fachtna died in the church of Derry.

Sitrig O'Gormley was slain by the son of Dunslevey.

John de Courcy, and the son of Hugo de Lacy, marched an army to bring the English of Leinster and Munster under subjection.

Cathal Crovdearg O'Conor, joined by Mac Costelloe, and a party of the English and Irish of Meath, marched into Munster, as far as Imleach Iubhair (Emly,) and Cashel; they burned four great castles, and several others of a minor description.

Cathal Mac Dermott came from Munster into Connaught, and conquered all before him, until he arrived at Lough Mask and Inisroba (at Ballinrobe in Mayo,) where he seized on all the shipping of Cathal Crovdearg, which he took to Caislean-na-Caillighe (in Lough Mask,) from whence he committed many depredations on all sides. Cathal Crovdearg, with a party of the English, and the Clan (or Siol) Maolruanaidh, marched thither, and at length concluded a peace with Mac Dermott, notwithstanding all the depredations he had committed.

A.D. 1196.

The cathedral of Peter and Paul at Armagh, with its churches, and a great portion of the fortress, were burned.

Murcheartach, son of Murcheartach O'Loughlin, lord of Kinel Owen, and heir presumptive to the throne of Ireland, the tower of bravery, and feats of arms of Leath Cuinn, the demolisher of the cities and castles of the English, and a founder of churches and delightful sanctuaries, was slain by Donogh, son of Blosghaidh O'Kane, at the instigation of the Kinel Owen, after they had sworn by the three shrines, and the canon of St. Patrick, to be faithful to him. His remains were conveyed to Derry Columkille, and interred there with honours and solemnity.

Roderick Mac Dunslevey, joined by the English, and the sons of some chieftains of Connaught, marched his forces into the territories of Kinel Owen, and of Airtheara (Orior in Armagh.) The Kinel Owen of Tellaghoge, and the men of Orior, marched to the plain of Armagh to oppose them, and gave them battle; and Mac Dunslevey was defeated with a dreadful slaughter of his forces. In this battle were slain twelve sons of the nobles and chiefs of Connaught, with a great number of the common soldiery. Among the nobles slain were Bryan Buidhe O'Flaherty; the son of Maolisa O'Conor of Connaught; the son of O'Conor Faily; and the son of O'Faelain of the Desies.

Mac Blosghaidh O'Cairin, having plundered Termon Dabeog,¹ was himself slain in a month afterwards, with a dreadful slaughter of his people, through the interposition of God and St. Dabeog.

Donal, son of Dermot Mac Carthy, defeated the English of Limerick and Munster, in a battle, with dreadful slaughter, and expelled them from Limerick; he also defeated them in two other battles.

Conor Mac Dermott, lord of Moylurg, took holy orders in the monastery of Boyle, and was succeeded in the lordship by Tomaltach.

Hugh O'Ferrall, lord of Muintir Anally, was treacherously killed by the sons of Sitrick O'Quinn.

The chiefs of Muintir Eoluis were treacherously killed by the son of Cathal O'Rourke.

Muireadhach Mac Rannall, viz. the Giolla Ruadh, chief of Muintir Eoluis, was slain by the son of Manus O'Conor, at the instigation of the son of Cathal O'Rourke, by whom the aforementioned nobles were slain.

Mahon, son of Conor of Maonmoy, heir presumptive to the crown of Connaught, was slain by O'Moore, (Donal,) and the men of Laoighis,² while defending a booty which he had taken from the English; and in retaliation, O'Moore was slain by Cathal Carrach O'Conor.

Congalach, son of Fergal O'Rourke, was slain by the men of Lieney, at Sliabh Da-En.³

1. Termon Dobeog, or the church lands of St. Dabeog, who founded a monastery on an island in Lough Derg, county of Donegal.

2. Laoighis, or Leix, the principality of the O'Mordhas, or O'Moores, was situated in the Queen's county, on the borders of Kildare.

3. Sliabh Da-En, or Slieve Daen, a mountain to the south of Lough Gill, in the barony of Tirerrill, county of Sligo.

Iodnaidhe O'Mannaehain (O'Monaghan,) lord of Hy Briuin of the Shannon,⁴ died.

Cathal, son of Hugh O'Flaherty, was slain by Muirheartach Midhigh.

A.D. 1197.

John de Courey, with the English of Ulidia, marched to Eas Craoibhe,¹ where they built the castle of Kill Sanctan. They plundered and laid waste the district of Cianaeha, and left Roitsel Pitun (Peyton,) with a strong garrison in the castle, from which they sallied out, plundering and devastating the country and churches. Shortly afterwards Roitsel Pitun went on a predatory excursion to the port of Derry, and plundered Chuain I, Eanach, and Dearn Bruach; but Flaherty O'Muldoraidh, lord of Tireconnell and Tirowen, with a party of the northern Clan Neill, attacked him on the strand of Ua-Congbhala (near Faughanvale.) The English were defeated with great slaughter, through the interposition of Columkille, Caindeach (Canice,) and Breacan, for having plundered their churches. Amongst the slain was the son of Ardgall Mac Loughlin.

Mac Etigh, one of the people of Keenaght, robbed the altar of the great church of Derry Columkille, and carried away with him the four most valuable cups in Ireland, which were called, the Mac Riabhach, the Mac Solas, the cup of O'Maoldoraidh, and the crooked goblet of O'Dogherty. He broke them to pieces, and took off their valuable ornaments. In three days after the robbery, these precious ornaments and the robber were discovered. He was hanged by Flaherty (O'Maoldoraidh,) at the Cross of Executions, to avenge St. Columkille for having profaned his altar.

Flaherty O'Muldorrey, lord of Tireconnell, Tirowen, and Orgiall, the defender of Tara, and heir presumptive to the throne of Ireland, a Conall² in heroism, a Cuchulain in valour, a Guaire in hospitality, and a Mac Lughach in bravery, died on the 2nd day of February, after a patient suffering, at Inis Saimer, in the 30th year of his government, and 59th of his age; and was buried at Druim Tuama, with the customary honours.

Eachmarcach O'Dochartaigh (O'Dogherty,) thereupon assumed the government of Tireconnell, and in a fortnight afterwards John de Courey, at the head of a strong force, crossed Tuaim (Toom Bridge,) into Tirowen; from thence he proceeded to Ardstraw, and afterwards marched round to Derry Columkille, where he remained for five nights, and then crossed over by water to Cnoc Nascaín (in Inisowen.) Eachmarcach O'Dogherty, at the head of the Kinell Connell, marched to oppose him, and a battle ensued, in which many fell on both sides, and the people of Tireconnell sustained great loss, a hundred of their men being slain, amongst whom were Eachmareach himself; Donogh O'Taireert, chief of Clan Snedgile, the mainstay of hospitality, generosity, wisdom, and counsel of all Tireconnell; Giolla Brighde O'Dogherty; Mac Dubhain; Mac Fergail; the sons of O'Boyle, and many other chiefs. The English, after the battle, plundered Inisowen, from which they took a great prey of cattle, and then retreated.

Conchobhar O'Cathain, died.

Conor, son of Teige (Mac Dermott,) lord of Moylurg, and of Moy Aoi, the tower of dignity, prudence, hospitality, and protection of all Connaught, died, after sincere repentance, in the monastery of Ath-da-laarg (Boyle.)

Mac Raith O'Laithbheartaigh (O'Flaherty,) tanist of Tirowen, and Maolruanaidh O'Cairellain, chief of Clan Dermott, were killed.

Donal, son of Rannall Mac Rannall, was

4. Hy Briuin-na-Sionna, or Hy Briuin of the Shannon, a territory in Roscommon, between Elphin and the Shannon, comprising the parishes of Aughrim, Kilmore, and Cloueraft. The O'Monaghans were chiefs of this territory, and had their castle at Lisadorn.

1. Eas Craoibhe, is now called the Cuts' Fishery, near Colerain; Kill Sanctan Castle was also near Colerain. Cianaeha, above mentioned, is the barony of Keenaght, in the county of Derry.

2. This celebrated chief, Flaherty O'Maoldoraidh, or O'Muldorrey, is compared to the ancient heroes, namely, Conall Cearnach, chief of the Red Branch Knights of Ulster, and Cuchulainn, another famous contemporary warrior of the Red Branch; Mac Lughach, probably Lughaidh Mac Con, who was a great champion in Munster, in the reign of king Connae; or perhaps Lughaidh Lamhfada, who is celebrated for having expelled the Fomorians. Guaire, here mentioned, was a king of Connaught, renowned for his hospitality. Inis Saimer, given as the place of O'Muldorrey's death, was the monastery of Ballyshannon, and the place of his burial was Druim Tuama, a monastery founded by Columkille, now the parish of Drumhorne, in the barony of Tirhugh, county of Donegal.

treacherously slain by the sons of Mac Duibhdara.

Roderick O'Flaherty, lord of West Connaught, was taken prisoner by Cathal Croibhdearg (the Red Handed,) O'Conor, king of Connaught.

A.D. 1198.

Giolla Mac Liag O'Branain resigned his abbacy of Derry Columkille, and Giolla Criost O'Cearnaigh (O'Kearney,) was appointed in his place by the chiefs and clergy of the north of Ireland.

Roderick O'Conor,¹ king of Connaught and of all Ireland, both English and Irish, died in canonical orders at Cong, after sincere repentance, victorious over the world and the devil; his body was conveyed to Clonmacnois, and was interred there, on the north side of the altar of the great church.

The son of Bryan of Brefney, son of Torlogh O'Conor, was slain by Cathal Carrach, son of Conor of Maonmoy.

Cathalan O'Maolfabhail, lord of Carraig Brachaidhe,² was slain by O'Derain, and in retaliation O'Derain himself was immediately after killed.

John de Courcy marched into Tirowen, and plundered and spoiled the churches of Ardstraw and Raphoe. He afterwards came to Derry Columkille, where he remained for nine days, during which time he plundered Inisowen and the adjacent country, but did not succeed in carrying off the booty, for at this time Hugh O'Neill, with five armed ships, came to the church of Lathairne (Larne,) burned a part of the town, and slew eighteen of the English. The English of Magh Line (Moylinny,) and Dalaradia, mustered three hundred men, and marched against Hugh, who had no intimation of their approach until they came up to him, while in the act of burning the town. A battle ensued in which the English were defeated, as they were in five different engagements afterwards, between that town and the place where the English took to their shipping. Hugh lost but five men. As soon as John de Courcy received intelligence of this he left Derry.

A war broke out between the Kinel Connell and the Kinel Owen. The Kinel Connell joined O'Hegnigh against the Kinel Owen, and they held a conference to ratify their union at Termon Dabeog. Hugh O'Neill came thither with the Kinel Owen to prevent the meeting, attacked O'Heigny, and defeated him; and O'Neill obtained hostages.

Hugh, at the head of the Kinel Owen, marched the same day, and plundered the Kinel Connell, on the plain of Moy Ith; he took away with him many cattle, after slaying O'Duibhdiarma,³ who opposed him with a troop of horse.

Hugh O'Neill, with a force of the Kinel Owen, marched a second time to the plain of Moy Ith, to give the Kinel Connell battle; but the Kinel Connell marched out of their camp, and made friendly and peaceable terms with them on that occasion.

Cathal Croibhdearg O'Conor made peace with Cathal Carrach, son of Conor of Maonmoy, whom he recalled to the country, and gave him lands.

A.D. 1199.

Maol Iosa Mac Giolla Erain, the airchinneach of Kilmore, in Hy Niallain,¹ successor elect of St. Patrick, died.

Sanctus Mauritius O'Baodain died in Hy (or Iona,) of Columkille.

1. Ruaidhri Ua Conchobhair, or Roderick O'Conor, the last Milesian monarch of Ireland, after having reigned eighteen years, abdicated the throne A.D. 1184, and retired to the monastery of Cong, in Mayo, where, after a religious seclusion of thirteen years, he died, A.D. 1198, in the 82nd year of his age, and was buried in the same sepulchre with his father, Torlogh O'Conor, monarch of Ireland, at the north side of the great altar, in the cathedral of St. Kieran, at Clonmacnois. O'Conor (Rer. Hib. Scrip. vol. I.,) says he bequeathed gold, silver, and many other things to God, to the poor, to all the churches of Ireland, and to those of Rome and Jerusalem. In the chronological poem on the Christian kings of Ireland, written in the twelfth century, by Giolla Moduda, abbot of Ardbracan, as quoted in vol. I. of O'Conor's Rer. Hib. Scrip. is the following verse:—

"Oeht m-Bliadhna agus deieh Ruaidri an Ri, Mae Toirdhealbhaidh an t-Ard Ri,
Flaith na n-Eirend: gan fhell,
Ri deighneach deig Eirenn.

"Eighteen years the monarch Roderick,
Son of Torlogh, supreme sovereign,
Ireland's undisputed ruler,
Was fair Erin's latest king."

2. Carraig Brachaidhe, in the barony of Inisowen, county of Donegal.

3. O'Duibhdiarma was a chief in Inisowen.

1. Kilmore in Hy Niallain, that is, the parish of Kilmore,

The English of Ulidia marched three great armies successively into Tirowen. The third army pitched their camp at Domhnachmore of Moy Iomchlaire,² from which they sent a large party to spoil and plunder the country. Hugh O'Neill, who marched to meet them, arrived at the place at the same time with the English; he attacked and routed them with great slaughter; and such as escaped, fled by night, and did not halt until they passed over Tuaim (Toom Bridge.)

Rory O'Dunsleve, joined with a party of the English of Meath, marched his forces and plundered the monastery of S.S. Paul and Peter (at Armagh,) and left only one cow in the place.

Donal O'Dogherty, lord of Kinel Enda, and of Ardmiodhair,³ died.

Donogh Uaithneach, son of Roderick O'Conor, was slain by the English of Limerick.

Rodubh Mac Roedig, chief of Kinel Aengusa, was slain by the English while plundering Hy Earca Chein.⁴

Cathal Croibhdearg O'Conor was driven from Connaught, and Cathal Carrach assumed his place.

Hugh O'Neill marched his forces to assist Cathal Croibhdearg, and was joined by the men of Moy Ith, and of Orgialla. They went as far as Teach Baoithin of Artagh,⁵ from whence they returned to Ballysadare, where they were overtaken by Cathal Carrach, with the chiefs of Connaught, and William Burke, at the head of the English of Limerick. A battle ensued, in which the northern forces were defeated, and O'Hegnidh (O'Heney,) lord of Oriel, and many others, fell.

John de Courcy, at the head of the English of Ulidia, joined by the son of Hugo de Lacy, at the head of the English of Meath, marched their forces to relieve Cathal Croibhdearg, and arrived at Kilmaeduaigh. Cathal Carrach, at the head of the Conaicians, marched thither, and gave them battle, in which the English were defeated with such slaughter, that although their original force consisted of five battalions, only two survived the battle. They fled, but were closely pursued from the field of battle, as far as Rinn Duin,⁶ at Lough Ree, where de Courcy was hemmed in, and a great number of the English slain; many others were drowned, for they had no means of escaping but by crossing the lake eastward in boats.

Ruarc O'Maoilbrenainn, chief of Clan Conor,⁷ died.

John was proclaimed king of England, on the 6th of April.⁸

Murchadh Mac Coghlan, lord of Delvin Eathra, died.

A.D. 1200.

Cadhla O'Duffy, archbishop of Tuam, died at an advanced age.

Uaireirge, son of Maolmordha, son of Uaireirge O'Neachtain, a learned professor of Clonmacnois, a man distinguished for sanctity, charity, and all other virtues, and chief of the Culdees of Clonmacnois, died on the 10th day of March.

Maol Eoin O'Carmacain, coarb of St. Comman, (abbot of Roscommon,) died.

Hugh O'Neill was deposed by the Kinel Owen, and Conor O'Loughlin was elected prince in his place; he plundered Tir-Enda, slew many people, and took away with him a large prey of cattle.

Egneachan O'Domhnaill (O'Donnell,) lord of Kinel Connell, sailed with his fleet by sea, and sent his forces by land, and encamped at Gaothsituated partly in the barony of Lower Orior, but chiefly in that of O'Neilland, county of Arniagh.

2. Domhnach Mór Maighe Iomchlaire. The parish of Donaghmore, in the barony of Dungannon, county of Tyrone.

3. Lord of Kinel Enda and Ard Miodhair. See note on Kinel Enda at p. 10. According to O'Brien, Ard Miodhair lay near Fanat, in the county of Donegal.

4. Chief of Kinel Aengusa, &c. See note on Meath. Hy Earca Chein, or Ibh Earca, now the barony of Iverk, county of Kilkenny.

5. Teach Baoithin Airtigh, that is, Tibohine, Tanghboyne, or Artagh, a parish in the barony of Boyle, county of Roscommon. It obtained its name of Teach Baoithin, or the House of Baoithin, from St. Baoithin, who, according to Colgan, was bishop of this place in the seventh century.

6. Rinn Duin, signifies the peninsula of the fortress. This peninsula was situated in Lough Ree, on the shore of the Shannon, in the county of Roscommon, about eight miles north of Athlone. There was a fortress here from the earliest times, and afterwards a strong castle, called Randown castle, which belonged to the O'Conors. Cill Mic Duach, or Killmaeduaigh, a parish, and the seat of a diocese in the barony of Kiltarton, county of Galway.

7. Clan Conchobhair, or Clan Conor. O'Dugan gives Maolbrenainn as chief of Clan Conor, in south Connaught, in Roscommon. This name has been changed to Brennan, and by others to O'Mulrenan.

8. King Richard I. died on the 6th of April, A.D. 1199, at the castle of Chalus, in Normandy, of a wound he received from an arrow, while besieging that place, and was succeeded by his brother John.

an-Chairgin. The Clan Diarmada, on the other side, came to Port Ross to attack the fleet. When the crews of the thirteen ships beheld them, they sallied forth and defeated them. Mac Loughlin, namely, Conor Beag, son of Murtoth, came at this time to assist the Clan Diarmada; but his horse being wounded, he was dismounted, and finally slain by the Kinel Connell, to avenge Columkille and his coarb, whose shrines he had formerly violated. It was on account of the same violation that Murchadh O'Criochain, lord of Hy Fiachrach, was killed. Egneachan's party followed up their victory, and committed great slaughter among the Kinel Owen, and the Clan Diarmada.¹

Meler,² and the English of Leinster, marched their forces against Cathal Carrach, and remained two nights at Clonmacnois. They plundered the town of property and provisions, not sparing even the churches.

Cathal Croibhdearg fled for protection into Munster, to Mac Carthy and William Burke.

Gerrmaide O'Baoighellain³ (O'Boylan,) was killed by Egneachan O'Donnell.

A battle was fought between O'Donnell and O'Ruairc (Ualgarg O'Rourke,) aided by Conor O'Rourke of Glaisfene, in which the Hy Briuin were defeated with great havoc, both in killed and drowned; and among the latter was Conor O'Rourke. The place where that battle was fought was Leac O'Maoldoraigh.⁴

Donagh Uaitneach, son of Roderick O'Conor, was slain by the English of Limerick.

Mahon, son of Gillpatrick O'Ciardha, was slain by the English of Clonard. O'Ciardha burned Clonard, and plundered the English who resided there.

Cathal Croibhdearg O'Conor went to plunder

Munster; he burned Castle Connell, the marketplace of Limerick, and the castle of Wilkin, and took Wilkin and his wife prisoners, after having slain twelve knights, with many common people.

Fiachra O'Flynn, chief of Siol Maolruain, died.

Cathal Carrach assumed the sovereignty of Connaught, and drove Cathal Croibhdearg into Ulster, who went to the residence of O'Eignigh, lord of Fermanagh, and from thence to the seat of John de Courcy, with whom he confirmed his covenant of friendship.

A.D. 1201.

Tomaltach O'Conor, successor of St. Patrick, and primate of Ireland, died.

Conn O'Meallaigh, bishop of Eanach Duin, a brilliant gem, and a pillar of the church, died.

Johanes de Monte Celion, a cardinal, came to Ireland from Rome, as the Pope's legate, and convened a great synod at Dublin, which was attended by the bishops, the abbots, and the clergy of the various orders, as also many of the nobility of Ireland. At this convention many regulations between clergy and laity were satisfactorily arranged. In a fortnight afterwards, the cardinal convened a synod of the clergy and nobility of Connaught at Tuam, where the necessary regulations were enacted.

Niall O'Flynn was treacherously slain by the English of Ulidia.

Manus, son of Dermot O'Loughlin, was slain by Murtoth O'Neill, and Murtoth himself was afterwards slain in retaliation.

Conor, son of Maurice O'Edin, died.

Teige O'Breen, lord of Leiney, in Meath, died.

1. It appears that O'Donnell sailed up Lough Foyle, and was attacked by the Clan Dermot, that is, the O'Carolans and others, on the opposite side, in the county of Derry. Hy Fiachra, of which O'Criochain was lord, was a territory about Ardstraw, in Tyrone.

2. Meler and William Burke, that is, Meiler Fitz Henry, one of the Anglo-Norman leaders, who came over with Strongbow. He was grandson to king Henry I., and a very valiant commander. In A.D. 1199, he was appointed chief governor of Ireland, by king John, and had large grants of land in Westmeath and Kildare. He died in A.D. 1220, and was buried at Connell Abbey, in Kildare, which he had founded. William Burke, whose name occurs so frequently in the Annals at this period, was William Fitz Adelm de Burgo. The family of de Burgo came from Normandy with William the Conqueror, and were earls of Kent in England. William de Burgo was chief governor of Ireland for some time in the reign of Henry II., and obtained extensive possessions in Connaught. He died A.D. 1204, and was buried in the abbey of Athassell, in Tipperary, which he had founded. He was married to Isabella, natural daughter of king Richard I., and his descendants were earls of Connaught and Ulster, and founded many of the most powerful families in Ireland, as the earls of Clanrickard, and many others of the nobility. The name de Burgo was changed to de Burgh and Burke. See Lives of Illustrious Irishmen.

3. The O'Boylans, a clan in Monaghan, on the borders of Tyrone.

4. Leac O'Maoldoraigh, or O'Muldorrey's Rock, situated somewhere on the borders of Leitrim and Donegal, supposed to be at Ballyshannon. The Hy-Briuin, signifies the people of Leitrim, as Hy-Briuin was a name applied to that territory.

Muireadhach, son of Neill, son of Sionnach O'Catharnaigh, died.

Murogh O'Madden, chief of the half of Siol Anmchadha, received a wound in his head from an arrow, of which he died.

Cathal Croibhdearg, and William Burke, at the head of the English and Irish forces, marched from Limerick to Tuam, in Connaught, from whence they went to Huaran (Oran,) to Elphin, to the Rock of Lough Key, and finally to the monastery of Ath-da-lo-arg (Boyle,) where they took up their quarters. Cathal Mac Dermott went at this time to plunder Hy Diarmada;¹ he was overtaken and attacked by Teige, son of O'Conor of Maonmoy, and a conflict ensued in which Mac Dermott was slain.

Cathal Carrach, king of Connaught, collected his forces (to oppose Cathal Croibhdearg and Burke before-mentioned,) and marched to Guirtin Cuil Luachra, near the monastery, where they were encamped. The two armies remained close to each other for a week, during which time many skirmishes took place. Cathal Carrach then went to view one of those engagements, when it happened that his party were defeated, and he himself, in the thick of the conflict, was slain; this was attributed to the miracles of God, and the intervention of St. Kieran. In the same engagement Collaid, son of Dermot O'Maoilruanaidh, and many others fell.

After this Cathal Croibhdearg, and William Burke, marched with their forces through Moylurg, Moy Aoi, from thence to West Connaught, to Cong of St. Feichin, where they spent the Easter. William Burke, and the sons of Rory O'Flaherty, conspired to betray Cathal Croibhdearg, but God saved him through the intercession of the clergy, who were the sureties of their mutual fidelity. Shortly afterwards William Burke's soldiers came to demand their pay from the Conacians, but the Conacians attacked and slew many of them. William Burke afterwards returned to Limerick, and Cathal Croibhdearg again assumed the title of king of Connaught.

Ualgarg O'Rourke marched his forces into Kinel Connell, and seized on the cattle and property. O'Donnell (Egneachan,) overtook them at Leac-ui-Mhaoldoraigh. A conflict ensued, in which the Hy Briuin were defeated with dreadful havoc, both in killed and drowned. On that expedition Conor (O'Rourke,) of Glaisfene was drowned.

The Kinel Owen went on a predatory excursion into Kinel Connell, on the same day, but were defeated by O'Donnell, in a battle in which Gearmaide O'Boylan, and many others of the Kinel Owen were slain.

Tiarnan, son of Donal, son of Cathal O'Rourke, was slain by Mac Fiachraigh and the Clan Cathail. Mac Fiachraigh the younger was also slain on that occasion.

A.D. 1202.

Muirheartach O'Carmacain, bishop of Clonfert, died.

Maolcolaimm O'Branain, aireineach of Toragh,¹ died.

Donal O'Brolchain, a prior (of Derry,) an illustrious sage and learned doctor, distinguished for his wisdom and worth, form and figure, mildness and devotion, died, after a well spent life, on the 27th day of April.

Maolfinnein Mac Colmain, an admired sage, and the devout Con O'Flanagan, died.

Donal Carrach O'Dogherty, head chief of Ardmiodhair, was slain by Muintir Baoighill,² after plundering many churches and districts.

Conor Roe, son of Donal O'Brien, was killed by his own brother, namely, Murchertach, son of Donal, son of Torlogh O'Brien.

Torlogh, son of Rory O'Conor, having escaped from confinement, Cathal Croibdearg made peace with him, and granted him lands. Torlogh was afterwards expelled by Cathal, but he made peace with him through the intercession of the English.

Donal, son of Muirchertagh O'Melaghlin, died.

Dermot, son of Art O'Melaghlin, was slain by the son of Loughlin O'Conor.

1. Hy Diarmada, or Clan Diarmada, was a district in Hy Maine, of which the Mac Egans were chiefs.

1. Tory Island, off the coast of Donegal, on which an abbey was founded by St. Ernan, in the seventh century.

2. Muintir Baoighill, or the O'Boyles, a clan who possessed the barony of Boyleagh, in the county of Donegal.

A.D. 1203.

Mac Giolla Cheallaigh O'Ruaidhin, bishop of Kilmacduagh, died.

Derry Columkille was burned, from the cemetery of St. Martin to the well of St. Adamnan.

A monastery was unlawfully erected by Ceallach, in the centre of Iona, in opposition to the people of that place; and he did great damage to the town. The clergy of the north of Ireland assembled together, for the purpose of going to Iona, namely, Florent O'Cerballain, bishop of Tyrone, (Ardstraw); Maoliosa O'Dorigh, bishop of Tircconnell (Raphoe,) and abbot of the church of SS. Paul and Peter at Armagh; Amhlagaidh O'Fingail, abbot of the church of Derry; Ainmire O'Cobhthaigh (Coffey); with many of the people of Derry, and of the northern clergy. They proceeded to Iona, and pulled down the church before mentioned, in accordance with the ecclesiastical laws; and Amhlagaidh O'Fingail was elected abbot of Iona, by the suffrages of the Scots and Irish.

Dermot, son of Murchertach O'Loughlin, with a party of English, proceeded on a predatory excursion into Tyrone, and plundered the shrine of Columkille; but they were overtaken by a party of the Kinel Owen, who defeated them, and Dermot himself was slain, through the miraculous interposition of Columkille.

The son of Hugo de Lacy marched, with a force of the English of Meath, into Ulidia, and expelled John de Courcy from thence, after a battle fought between them at Dundaleathglass (Down,) in which many were slain.

Muircheartach of Teffia, son of Conor of Maonmoy, son of Roderick O'Conor, was slain by Dermot, son of Rory, his uncle, on the plain of Kilmacduagh.

Donal, son of Mac Carthy, at the head of the people of Desmond, defeated the English in a battle, in which upwards of one hundred and sixty of the English were slain.

Faolan, son of Faolan, lord of Hy Faolain, died in the monastery of Congalaidh.¹

Kells, Trim, and Newbridge were burned.

Sitrig of Teffia O'Kelly, of Hy Maine, died.

A.D. 1204.

Sitrig O'Sruithen, aircineach of Congbhala, viz.: the leader of the Hy Murtele, and chosen chief of Clan Snedgile,¹ died, after true penance, and was buried in the church built by himself.

John de Courcy, the plunderer of churches and territories, was driven by the son of Hugh de Lacy into Tyrone, where he sought the protection of the Kinel Owen; but he was pursued as far as Carrickfergus, and the English of Ulidia slew many of his party.

William Burke plundered the whole of Connaught, both lay and ecclesiastical, but God and the saints visited him with their vengeance, for he died of an uncommon disease, unbecoming to mention.

Muirchertach O'Flaherty, lord of West Connaught, died.

A.D. 1205.

The archbishop O'Heinni,¹ having retired to a monastery, died shortly afterwards.

Donal O'Bedha, bishop of Hy Amalgaidh, (Killala,) died.

Saoirbhrethach O'Doired, aircineach of Domhnachmore, and Patrick O'Moghroin, died.

Manus O'Kane, son of the lord of Ciananacht and Fercraoibhe, the tower of bravery and activity of the North, was wounded with a javelin, of which he died.

Mac Guillbhealaidh O'Carroll, lord of Ely,² was slain by the English.

Conor O'Brien, of Breghmaine, died, while on a pilgrimage at Clonmacnois.

Ragnall Mac Dermott, lord of Clan Dermott, died.

Donal Mac Concoigrighe, chief of Muintir Sercachain, died.

1. The monastery of Congalaidh, or Great Connell, a parish in the barony of Connell, county of Kildare, in which, according to Seward, are the ruins of Great Connell Abbey. In A.D. 1202, a priory was founded here, under the invocation of the Blessed Virgin and St. David, by Meyler FitzHenry, who placed in it regular canons from the monastery of Lanthony, in Monmouthshire.

1. Clan Snedgile, a tribe in Tircconnell. Congbhala, or Conwall, an abbey over which St. Fiachra presided in the sixth century, was situated near Lough Swilly, in the barony of Kilmacrenan, county of Donegal, and gave name to the parish of Conwall.

Donal O'Faolain, lord of the Deisi³ of Munster, died.

Teige, the son of Cathal Croibhdírig (O'Conor,) died, after one night's sickness, at Clonmaenois.

Meyler, son of Meyler (Fitz Henry,) took forcible possession of Limerick; on which account a great war broke out between the English of Meath and the English of Meyler. In this contest Cuuladh, son of Connidh O'Laeghachain, chief of Siol Ronain,⁴ was slain by the Kinel Fiachach Mac Neill.

A.D. 1206.

Donal O'Muiredhaidh (O'Murray,) chief professor at Derry, died.

Maolpeadair O'Colmain (O'Coleman,) successor of Caindeach (St. Canice of Kilkenny,) the pillar of piety and wisdom of the north of Ireland, died.

Flaherty O'Flaherty, prior of Dungiven, and Gilpatrick O'Falachtaidh, aireineach of Duncruithne,¹ died.

Eignaghan O'Donnell, plundered and slew many in Tyrone.

The successor of St. Patrick² went to the king of England on behalf of the churches of Ireland, and to complain against the English in Ireland.

Tomaltaeh, son of Conor, son of Dermod, son of Teige (Mac Dermott,) lord of Moylurg, of Artagh, and of the neighbouring territory of Clan Maolrooney, died.

Eignachan O'Donnell plundered Hy Faranain and Clan Dermod; he carried away cattle, and slew many people. He was pursued and overtaken by the people of Clan Dermod, of Hy Forannain, and of Hy Gormley;³ many were slain and drowned on both sides, but the Kinel Connell at length, with difficulty, succeeded in carrying away the booty.

Rory O'Gara, lord of Slieve Lugh,⁴ died.

Hugh, son of Murogh O'Kelly, lord of Hy Maine, and Caithniadh O'Caithniadh, lord of Ioras (Erris, in the county of Mayo,) died.

Hugh O'Goimghialladh, lord of Partraidhe,⁵ in Carra, was slain by the people of Carra.

Rory O'Toghda, chief of Bredach,⁶ in Hy Amalgaidh, died.

Gilbert O'Flanagan, and Ivar Mac Murrough, slew each other at Rosecommon.

Murtogh Mac Carghamhna, chief of Muintir Maoiltsionna, died.

Hugo de Laey, the younger, marched with the English of Meath and Leinster, into Tulaghoge (in Tyrone.) He burned some churches, and the corn of the country, but obtained neither hostages nor cattle from Hugh O'Neill on that expedition.

The same party marched into Kianaght; they burned all the churches in that territory, and carried away an immense prey of cattle.

A.D. 1207.

Eignaghan O'Donnell went into Feara Manach (Fernanagh,) and seized some cattle. A large party of the inhabitants attacked him, and slew O'Donnell, lord of Tireonnell, the tower of valour and hospitality of the province in his time. Many of his chiefs were slain along with him, viz.: The Giolla Riabhach, son of Callaidhe O'Boyle; Donogh Conailleach, son of Conor of Maonmoy; Mathgamhan (Mahon,) the son of Donal Midhigh O'Conor, with many other warriors.

Donal, son of Fergal O'Rourke, lord of the greater portion of Brefney, died.

Muiredhaeh, son of Rory O'Conor, and Awlave O'Ferrall, chief of Anally, died.

Dermod O'Madagain (Madden,) lord of Siol Anmehadha, died.

1. Archbishop O'Heimi. This was Matthew O'Heney, archbishop of Cashel, who died in the abbey of Holyross.

2. O'Carbhaill, or O'Carroll, lord of Ely O'Carroll, in the county of Tipperary.

3. The O'Faolains, or O'Phelans, lords of Deisi, in the present county of Waterford, from which the baronies of Decies took their name.

4. O'Laeghachain, of Muintir Laedhachain, in Teffia. Siol Ronain was in Cairbre Gaura, in Teffia. Kinel Fiacha was also in Teffia. See note on Teffia.

1. Dungiven and Duncruithne. Dungiven, a parish in the barony of Kenaught, county of Derry where there was an Augustinian priory, founded by the O'Kanes. Duncruithne, now Dunerun, in the parish of Magilligan, county of Derry, had a famous monastery, founded by St. Columkille.

2. The archbishop of Armagh at that time was Eugene Mac Gillivider, who waited on king John in England.

3. This affair happened on the borders of Donegal and Derry, at Lough Foyle.

4. Sliabh Lugh. O'Gadhra, or O'Gara, was lord of Moy O'Gara and Coolavin, in the county of Sligo.

5. Partraighe, or Partry, an ancient territory in the present barony of Carra, county of Mayo.

6. Bredcha, or Bredach, in the parish of Moygawnagh, barony of Tyrrawley, county of Mayo.

The remains of Roderick O'Connor, king of Connaught, were exhumed, and deposited in a stone coffin or shrine.

Cathal Croibhdearg O'Connor, king of Connaught, expelled Hugh O'Flaherty, and gave his territory to his own son Hugh.

A great war broke out amongst the English of Leinster, viz. : between Meyler (Fitz Henry) Jeffry Mares, and William Marusgal, so that Leinster and Munster were spoiled between them.¹

Great contentions also arose between Hugo de Lacy and Myler, in which all Myler's party were spoiled.

Cathal Carrach, son of Dermod, son of Teige (Mac Dermott), plundered Cormac, son of Tomaltach Mac Dermott, and O'Flynn of Eassa.² He was pursued by the Conacians, headed by the following chiefs, viz. : Dermod, son of Magnus, son of Murtogh O'Connor, and Cormac, son of Tomaltach ; Conor Godh O'Hara, lord of Lieney ; and Donogh O'Dowd, lord of Tyrawley and Tireragh. A battle ensued, in which Cathal Carrach was defeated and taken prisoner, his eyes put out, and his son Muirghes, Mac Conghranna O'Flanagan, and many others slain.

Myler Oge (Young Myler,) Murtogh O'Brien, and Torlogh, son of Roderick O'Connor, made a predatory excursion into Tir-Fiachra-Aidhne, where they plundered fifteen towns.

Cathal, son of Rory, son of the Sionnagh O'Catharnaigh,³ lord of Teffia, died.

The sons of Hugo de Lacy, and the English of Meath, marched with their forces to the castle of Ardnorcher, which they besieged for five weeks ; and, having taken it and the territory of Ferkale, they drove Myler out of the country.

A.D. 1208.

David Breatnach (i.e. the Briton,) bishop of Purt

Lairge, was slain by O'Faolain (O'Phelan,) of the Decies.¹

Hugh O'Neill marched his forces, on a predatory excursion, into Inisowen. O'Donnell (Donal More,) overtook them, an engagement ensued, with great slaughter on both sides. Donal Mac Murchadha, and a great number of the Kinel Owen, were slain, and the following also fell in the thick of the fight, namely, Cathbhar O'Donnell, Fergal O'Boyle, Cormac O'Donnell, David O'Dogherty, and several other chiefs of the Kinel Connell. The Kinel Owen were finally defeated by superior valour.

O'Donnell (Donal More,) marched his forces against Hugh O'Neill, and the Kinel Owen, and took preys and hostages from the country ; but a peace was concluded between them, and they entered into an alliance against the English and Irish who would oppose them.

Duibhinnsi Mac Gennis, lord of Clan Hugh, of Iveagh, was slain by Mac Dunslevy O'Heoghaidh.

Finghin, son of Dermod, son of Cormac Mac Carthy, was slain by his own kinsmen.

Ualgharg O'Rourke was expelled from the lordship of Brefney, and Art, the son of Donal, son of Fergal, was set up in his place, by the influence of the English.

John, bishop of Norbus,² was sent by the king of England to Ireland as lord justice, but an interdiction was laid on the English by the Pope ; and in order that the bishop's authority might be opposed in Ireland, the English were denied the rites of mass, baptism, extreme unction, and burial, for the space of three years after his arrival.

Murtogh, son of Donal O'Brien, lord of Thomonnd, was taken prisoner by the English of Limerick, in spite of the remonstrance of three bishops, at the instigation of Donogh Cairbreach (of Carberry,) his own brother.

1. Jeffrey Mares was Jeffrey de Marisco, afterwards lord justice of Ireland. William Marusgal was William Mareschal, earl of Pembroke.

2. O'Flynn of Eassa, that is, Eass-ui-Fhlóinn, or Assylin, near Boyle, in the county of Roscommon.

3. O'Catharnaigh was the Sionnagh, or principal chief of the family of the Foxes, in Westmeath. See note on Teffia.

1. Purt Lairge was the ancient name of Waterford. This David, bishop of Purt Lairge, or Waterford, was kinsman to Meyler Fitz Henry, lord justice of Ireland. He was appointed, through the English influence, against the will of the Irish, and had a long contest with O'Heda, the Irish bishop of Lismore, whose rights and possessions he had usurped. In consequence of these contests, bishop David was killed by O'Felan, chief of the Decies. See Ware, by Harris, on Bishops of Waterford and Lismore.

2. John, bishop of Norbus, was John de Gray, bishop of Norwich, who was appointed lord justice of Ireland. At that time Pope Innocent III. had laid an interdict on the kingdom of England, in consequence of king John's opposition to the see of Dermod O'Caomhain, chief of the district from Tuaim-da-bhodhar to Gleoir,³ died.

Awlave O'Rothlain, chief of Calry, of Cuilearnatan (Coolearny, in the county of Mayo,) died.

A.D. 1209.

Cele O'Duffy, bishop of Mayo, of the Saxons; Giolla Crist O'Kearney, the coarb of Condere; and Flaherty O'Flynn, the coarb of Daehonna-Easa-Mie-Eire, died.¹

Art, son of Donal, son of Fergal O'Rourke, lord of Brefney, was slain by Cormac, son of Art O'Melaghlín, and Cormac, son of Art O'Rourke; and Ualgarg O'Rourke assumed the lordship.

Donogh O'Ferrall, lord of Anally, died.

John, king of England, sailed for Ireland with a large fleet, and landed at Dublin, where he rested for some time after his voyage; he then proceeded to Tiopraid Ultaín, in Meath, where Cathal Crovdearg O'Conor came to meet him. Walter de Laey was expelled from Meath into England. The king, accompanied by his nobles, proceeded to Carriekfergus, and expelled Hugo de Laey from Ulidia, into England. Hugh O'Neill attended the king's summons, but he returned without making submission. The king besieged Carriekfergus, which surrendered; whereupon he garrisoned it with his own forces. O'Conor returned home, and the king of England next proceeded to Raith Guaire,² where O'Conor a second time waited on him; the king demanded his son as a hostage, in confirmation of his fealty; O'Conor, however, would not consent to give his son, but gave four of his chiefs in his stead, namely, Conor Godh O'Hara, lord of Lieney; Dermod, son of Conor O'Mulrooney, lord of Moylurg; Fionn O'Carmaeain; and Aircaethach Mac Donogh, a young prince of O'Conor's friends. The king returned to England, and brought the hostages with him.

A.D. 1210.

The English came to Caoluisge (at Ballyshannon.) Hugh O'Neill and Donal O'Donnell proceeded thither with their forces, and defeated and slew many of the English, amongst whom was Fitz Henry the younger; and they distributed their property and booty amongst their own men.

Torlogh, son of Roderick O'Conor, having plundered Moylurg, took the booty with him to his kinsman Dermod's house at Seghais; Hugh, the son of Cathal, pursued him, but Torlogh fled to the North.

The hostages of Connaught, (taken by king John,) returned to Ireland, namely, Conor Godh O'Hara, lord of Lieney; Dermod, son of Conor O'Mulrooney; Fionn O'Carmaeain; and Aircaethach Mac Donogh.

Murtogh Muimhneach (of Munster,) son of Torlogh More (O'Brien,) died.

A great war broke out between the king of England, and the prince of Wales; and dispatches came from king John, commanding the English bishop (of Norwich,) and the English nobles in Ireland, to return to England. Richard Diuid¹

Rome in ecclesiastical matters, and it appears that the interdict extended to the English in Ireland.

3. The O'Caomhains were chiefs of Tuaim-da-bhodhar to Gleoir, a district on the borders of Mayo and Sligo, extending from Foxford to Killaglass, and comprised the parish of Toomore. The Gleoir is a small river in the parish of Killaglass, in Sligo. The O'Caomhains, a branch of the O'Dowds, were a numerous clan, and the name has been changed to Cavanagh.

1. Cele, or Celestine O'Duffy, as he is called by Ware, was bishop of Mayo, an ancient see, which was annexed to Tuam in the sixteenth century. Coarb of Condere, that is, bishop of Connor. The bishops of Connor, in ancient times, were sometimes styled bishops of Dalaraidhe, while those of Down were called bishops of Ulidia. As the territories of Dalaraidhe and Ulidia were nearly co-extensive, and the two sees being afterwards united, it is difficult to determine the exact boundaries of each. Daehonna-Easa-Mie-Eire, was a monastery founded by St. Moelona, son of Eire, at Lough Key, near Boyle, county of Roscommon.

2. In the month of June, A.D. 1210, according to various authorities, king John landed at Waterford, with a large fleet and powerful army. According to these Annals he landed at Dublin. Copies of the Annals vary as to the number of ships; in some it is stated at one hundred, in others more; a discrepancy which probably arose from a mistake of the transcribers. In the month of July king John proceeded to Meath, to a place called Tiopraid Ultaín, or St. Ultan's Well, which is considered to be Ardraccan, as it had that name from a holy well there, in honour of St. Ultan, who was bishop of Ardraccan in the sixth century. Others state that the castle of Trim was the place where the king stopped in Meath, hence it has been called king John's castle. After proceeding to Downpatrick, Carriekfergus, and other parts of Ulster, king John returned in August by Carlingford, Drogheda, Duleek, Kells, Fourc, and Granard, to Rathwire, where the de Laeys had a castle near Kinnegad, in the parish of Killucan, in Westmeath, where he received the submission and hostages of Cathal Crovdearg O'Conor, which place is given in the Annals as Rath Guaire.

1. Richard Diuid. This was Richard Tuite, who came over (Tuite,) was appointed lord justice over Ireland, and, shortly after, proceeded to Athlone, in order to send his kinsmen to Limerick, Waterford, and Wexford, while he himself should govern Dublin and Athlone. During his stay at Athlone, some of the stones of the castle fell on his head, and killed him on the spot, together with his priest, and several others of his party, a circumstance which was attributed to the miracles of God, and SS. Peter and Kieran.

The sons of Roderick O'Conor, and Teige, the son of Conor of Maonmoy, having crossed the Shannon from the east into the Tuatha,² accompanied by a party of the people of Anally, they plundered the district, and carried away the booty into the recesses of Kinel Dobhtha. Hugh, son of Cathal Crovdearg pursued them, and an engagement ensued, in which the sons of Roderick were defeated, so that they were compelled to recross the Shannon, losing many men and horses.

A.D. 1211.

Sitrig O'Laighenain, the coarb of Comgall (abbot of Bangor,) died.

The castle of Cluan Eois (Clones in Monaghan,) was erected by the English, and the English bishop (of Norwich,) and they marched with a force on a predatory excursion into Tyrone, but were, however, attacked by Hugh O'Neill, and defeated with great slaughter; among the slain was Myler, the son of Robert Fitz Henry.

Thomas Mac Uchtry, with the sons of Randal, the son of Somhairle, came to Derry Columkille, with a fleet of seventy-six ships; and, after plundering and destroying the town, they proceeded to Inisowen, and spoiled the whole peninsula.¹

The Conacians, by command of the English bishop, and Gilbert Mac Costello, marched with their forces to Easroe (Ballyshannon,) and erected a castle at Caoluisge.²

Roderick, son of Roderick, son of Torlogh O'Conor, was slain by the people of Lieney, in Connaught.

Cormac, son of Art O'Melaghlin, dispossessed the English of Delvin; and Malachy, son of Art, defeated in battle the English who were in possession of that country, and slew Robert of Duncomar, their constable.

Cugacla O'Heyne, died.

Raghnailt, and Cailleach De (the nun,) two daughters of Roderick O'Conor, died.

A.D. 1212.

Drum Caoin,¹ and its church, were burned by the Kinel Owen, despite of Hugh O'Neill.

Fergal O'Kane, lord of Ciannachta, and of the Creeve, was slain by the English.

Gilbert Mac Costello was slain in the castle of Caoluisge, which was burned by O'Heignig.

The castle of Clones was burned by Hugh O'Neill, and the northern Irish.

Donogh O'Heyne had his eyes put out by Hugh, son of Cathal Crovdearg, against the will of O'Conor.

The battle of Caille-na-Grann,² was fought by Cormac, son of Art O'Melaghlin, and Hugh, son of Conor of Maonmoy, against the English, who were defeated with great slaughter; and Piarus (or Pierce) Mason, and the sons of Sleimhne, were amongst the slain.

Donogh Mac Can, chief of Kinel Aongusa,³ died.

Donal O'Daimhin (O'Devin,) was slain by the sons of Mac Loughlin, in the porch of the church of Derry.

The Giolla Fiaclach O'Boyle, with a party of with Strongbow, and got large grants of lands in Westmeath. He was made a palatine peer, with the title of baron of Moyashell, as stated by the learned antiquary, John D'Alton, in his History of Drogheda.

2. Tuatha, that is, the districts, a large territory in the county of Roscommon, through which Slieve Baghna, or Slieve Baun, extends from north to south, parallel with the Shannon. Slieve Baun, according to Weld, lies in the barony of Roscommon. It obtained the name Tuatha, from having comprised several districts. In the Annals, under the year 1536, it is stated that O'Hanley was chief of this territory, who is also styled by the Annalists and O'Dugan, chief of Kinel Dobhtha.

1. Somhairle. This was Sorley Mac Donnell, a chief from the Hebrides. Thomas Mac Uchtry was another chief from Galloway in Scotland, and was sometimes styled earl of Athol.

2. Caol Uisge, signifies the narrow water, or ford, where this castle was erected probably somewhere near Ballyshannon.

1. Drumcaoin, now Drumquin, near Omagh, county of Tyrone.

2. Caille-na-grann signifies the pass of the wood, and is supposed to be the place called Cullen Wood, in the barony of Moyashell, in Westmeath.

3. Kinel Aongusa. The Mac Cans were chiefs of Clanbrasil, in Armagh, as already stated, Kinel Aongusa is a territory given by O'Dugan in Meath. See note on Meath.

the Kinel Connell, plundered some of the Kinel Owen, who were under the protection of O'Tairceirt, namely, the Giollareiaigh, chief of Clan Sneidghile and Clan Fingin. O'Taircheirt overtook them, and a conflict ensued, in which, however, he was slain, while fighting in defence of those whom he had taken under his protection.

Dermot, son of Roderick O'Connor, took by force the house of Hugh, son of Manus O'Connor, in Killcolmain-Finn,⁴ in Corran, and set it on fire, by which thirty-five persons were burned.

Donal, son of Donal of Bregia O'Melaghlin, defeated Cormac O'Melaghlin, in an engagement in which Gillcreest Mac Colgan, with many others, were slain.

Donal, son of Donal O'Melaghlin, was killed in a predatory affray by Myler's party.

The English of Munster marched with their forces to Roscrea, where they erected a castle; and from thence they proceeded to Kilaghaidh,⁵ where they were overtaken by Murtogh Mac Brien, and his forces, who opposed them in a battle, in which Melaghlin, the son of Catal Carrach, received wounds, of which he died.

A. D. 1213.

Giolla-na-naomh O'Ruadhain, bishop of Lieny, (Achonry,) and Muirigen O'Muirigein, bishop of Clonmacnois, died.

Ainmire O'Coffey, abbot of the church of Derry Columkille, an ecclesiastic of noble birth, distinguished for his piety, meekness, charity, wisdom, and other virtues, died.

Thomas Mac Uchtry, and Rory, son of Randal (Mac Donnell,) plundered Derry Columkille, and carried away the precious and valuable articles of the people of Derry, and of all the north of Ireland, from the Abbey Church to Coleraine.

O'Kane, and the men of Creeve, came to Derry to attack the house of the sons of Mac Loughlin. The prior of the great church of Derry, who interposed to make peace between them, was killed, and Mahon Magaithne, who collected and commanded this force, was slain in the sanctuary of Columkille, in the porch of the Black Church, a circumstance which was attributed to the miracles of God, through the intervention of Columkille.

The castle of Coleraine was erected by Thomas Mac Uchtry, and the English of Ulidia; and in order to build it, the houses of the town, with all the ecclesiastical establishments except the church, were pulled down.

Hugh O'Neill defeated the English with dreadful slaughter, and on the same day burned Carlingford, sparing neither persons nor property.

Donn O'Breslein, chief of Fanad, was treacherously slain by his own people.

Fionn O'Brolchain, the steward of O'Donnell (Donal More), went to Connaught to collect O'Donnell's tribute. He first went to Carbury, of Drumcliff, where he visited, along with his attendants, the house of the poet, Muireagh O'Daly, of Lissadill. On coming into the poet's presence, he betrayed appearances of fear and caution before him, as he was a man of gigantic strength, and as his master had advised him to beware of the poet. O'Daly became enraged on seeing him, and, seizing a sharp axe, he struck him a blow, and slew him on the spot, and then fled into Clanrickard, being afraid of O'Donnell. When O'Donnell obtained intelligence of this, he collected his forces and pursued him, and did not rest until he arrived at the place afterwards called Derry O'Donnell, in Clanrickard (so named because O'Donnell encamped there for the night,) when he began to devastate the country by fire and sword, until, Mac William (de Burgo,) at last submitted to him, having previously sent Muireagh into Thomond for refuge. O'Donnell pursued him thither, and proceeded to plunder and lay waste that country also, whereupon Donogh Cairbreach O'Brien sent Muireagh from him for protection to the people of Limerick, to the gates of which O'Donnell pursued him, and, pitching his camp at Moin-ui-Donnell (O'Donnell's Marsh, so called from that circumstance) laid seige to the city, upon which the inhabitants, at the command of O'Donnell, expelled Muireagh, who found no protection, but was sent from place to place, until he arrived at Dublin. O'Donnell after his pursuit, and his visitation of all Connaught, returned home, and having mus-

4. Kilcolmain Finn, the parish of Kilcoleman, in the barony of Coolavin, county of Sligo.

5. Kilaghaidh is the parish of Kilaughy, in the King's county.

Mac Brien, the chief, who commanded the Irish, was probably Mac Brien, or Mac I-Brien, of Ara, in Tipperary.

tered another force with all possible speed, in the same year marched to Dublin, and compelled the inhabitants to banish Muireagh to Scotland; whilst there, the poet composed three poems in praise of O'Donnell, and requesting peace and pardon for his crime. The third poem commences thus: "Oh! Donal, benevolent hand of peace." Muireagh obtained pardon on account of his laudatory poems, and O'Donnell afterwards received him into his friendship, and with his usual generosity gave him lands and possessions.

Cormac O'Melaghlin plundered and burnt the castle of Cinn Clair, beat the English, and carried away many horses, and much property.

The English, with a great force, marched to attack Cormac Mac Art (O'Melaghlin,) and both parties having met at the bridge of Tinne, an engagement ensued, in which Mac Art was defeated, and Rory O'Ciardha was slain. Mac Art was expelled from Delvin, and his people were plundered: after this, the English went to Athlone, where they erected a castle; and they also built castles at Cinneidigh, Birr, and Durmaighe.¹

Cormac Mac Art went on a predatory expedition into Delvin, plundered Maoilseachlain Beag (the little,) expelled him from the country, slew William Muilinn, and reassumed the lordship of Delvin.

A. D. 1214.

The bishop O'Ceallaigh, (O'Kelly) of Hy Fiachra¹, died.

Ardgar O'Conor, bishop of Siol Muireadhaigh, (Elphin,) died.

Benmidhe, daughter of Egnigh, wife of Hugh O'Neill, and lady of Aileach, died, after a well-spent life.

A depredation was committed by Hugh, the son of Malachy O'Loghlin, upon the coarb of Columkill, but Hugh himself was slain by the English in a year afterwards, through the miracles of God and Columkille.

Cathal Mac Dermott, the son of Teige, lord of Moylurg, the tower of generosity of Connaught died.

Bryan, son of Roderick O'Flaherty, son of the lord of West Connaught, died.

Ualgarg O'Rourke plundered the property of Philip Mac Costello, in Crich Cairpre,² and carried off a great prey of cattle.

A. D. 1215.

Dionisius O'Lonargan, archbishop of Cashel, died at Rome.

Conor O'Henry, bishop of Killaloe, died on his way home, while returning from the fourth general council of Lateran.

Annudh O'Murray, bishop of Conmaicne,¹ and Maolpoil O'Murray, prior of Dungiven, died.

Trad O'Maoilfabhail, chief of Kinel Fergusa, with his brother, and many others, were slain by Muiredagh, son of the great steward of Leamhna.²

Donagh O'Duyiorma, chief of Breadagh, died in the black abbey church of Derry.

Angus O'Carolan, chief of Clan Dermot, was slain by his own kinsmen.

Murrough Mac Cathmail, chief of Kinel Feraidith, died.

Mac Can, chief of Kinel Aongusa, was slain by his kinsmen.

Rory O'Flynn, lord of Derlas³, died.

Giolla Cuitrigh Mac Cargamna, chief of Muintir Maoilsiona (Fox, of Teffia,) died.

Giola Caomgin O'Kelly, of Bregia, was taken prisoner by the English, in St. Peter's monastery at Athlone, and hanged by them at Trim.

Teige Mac Eitigen, a chief of Clan Dermot,⁴ died.

1. Cinn Clair was the castle at Clara, King's county. The Bridge of Tinne was at Tinneecross, on the river Cladagh, near Tullamore. The castles built by the English were, as stated in the text, those of Cinneidigh, that is, Kinnitty, in the parish of Kinnitty, King's County; that of Birr; and that of Durmaighe, or Durrow.

1. Bishop of Hy Fiachra. The bishops of Killala, were styled bishops of Hy Fiachra Muaidhe, that is, of Hy Fiachra on the Moy, in Mayo and Sligo, to distinguish it from Hy Fiachra Aidhne, an ancient territory in Galway, co-extensive with the diocese of Kilmacduagh. The bishops of Killala were also sometimes called bishops of Tir Amalgaidh, or Tyrawley. See Ware's Bishops, by Harris.

2. Crioch Cairbre, the barony of Carburry, in Sligo.

1. Bishop of Conmaicne, that is, bishop of Ardagh, who is called by Ware, Adam O'Murray.

2. Kinel Fergusa, a tribe of the Kinel Owen; see note on Tir Eogain. The Steward of Leamhna. This was Murdoch, son of the Mormair, or the great Steward of Lennox, in Scotland; one of the chiefs who came over with the Mac Donnells, and other Scots who invaded the north of Ireland at this period. Ogygia II. p. 306.

3. Derlais, a district in the county of Antrim, in Hy Tuirtre, of which O'Flynn was chief. See note on Dalaradia.

4. Clan Dermot. See note on Hy Maine.

A. D. 1216.

Mahon O'Lavery, (or O'Flaherty,) chief of Clan Donal,¹ died.

Giolla-Arnain O'Martain, chief Brehon, or judge of Ireland, died.

Tomaltach, son of Hugh, son of Araghtagh O'Rody, was slain by Donal, son of Hugh Mac Dermott.

Eaghdon Mac Gilli-Uider,² coarb of St. Patrick, and primate of Ireland, died at Rome, after a well spent life.

Malachy Mac Dermott was slain by the people of Ferkall, and those of Myler Fitz Henry.

Moragh, son of Roderick O'Conor, died.

The castle of Killaloe was erected by Geoffrey Marisco, and the English bishop (of Norwich,) also erected a mansion there, despite of all opposition.

Henry III. was proclaimed king of England, on the 19th of October.³

A. D. 1217.

Giolla Tigernagh Mac Giolla Ronan, bishop of Oriel, (Clogher,) and chief canon of Ireland, died, after penance and repentance.

Dermot, son of Conor Mac Dermott, lord of Moylurg, died.

Mor, the daughter of O'Brien, (that is, Donal,) the wife of Cathal Croiddearg O'Conor, died.

Donal O'Gara, died.

Nial, the grandson of Loughlin O'Conor, died.

Teige O'Ferrall was slain by Muragh Carragh O'Ferrall.

Gillpatrick Mac Acadhain, chief of Clan Fermaighe,¹ died.

Donal, son of Murragh Mac Coghlan, lord of the greater portion of Delvin, was treacherously slain by the sons of Malachy Mac Coghlan, at Liathdruim.²

1. Clan Donal. There was a district so called, near Lough Con, in the county of Mayo.

2. Mac Gilli Uidhir. This was Eugene Mac Gillivider, archbishop of Armagh.

3. King John died on the 19th of October, A.D. 1216, and was succeeded by his son Henry III.

1. Clan Fermaighe, according to O'Dugan, was a district in Brefney, of which Mac Cagadhain was chief, a name sometimes anglicised Mac Egan, and by others, Mac Coggan.

2. Liathdruim, probably the parish of Leitrim, in the county of Galway.

3. Moy Eleog, a district in the parish of Crossmolina, in Mayo. The district of the Two Backs, in Mayo, has been already explained.

Cathal Fionn (the Fair) O'Laghtna, chief of the Two Backs, was killed in his own house, by O'Flynn, of Moy Eleog.³

A.D. 1218.

Clemens, bishop of Lieney (Achonry,) died.

Giolla-na-naomh (or Giollananeev) O'Gormley, priest of Rathluraigh,¹ died while on a pilgrimage.

Maoiliosa O'Doighre, aircineach of Derry Columkille, died on the 8th of December, after having presided for forty years, and having done every possible service to the church and to the country.

The church of the monastery of Boyle was consecrated.

Murtogh O'Flynn, lord of Hy Tuirtre, was slain by the English; and Congalach O'Cuinn (O'Quinn,) chief of Moy Lugad,² and of the entire of Siol Cathusaigh, who was the tower of bravery, hospitality, and magnanimity of the north of Ireland, was also slain by the English on the same day.

Rory and Malachy, the sons of Mac Coghlan, died in the monastery of Kilbeggain.³

Loughlin O'Conor died in the monastery of Cnoc Muaidhe.⁴

The English of Meath, and Murtogh Carrach O'Ferrall, plundered the territory of Hy Briuin, of the Shannon, but were overtaken by Dermot, son of Torlogh, son of Melaghlin, with a party of the Conacians, who defeated the English, of whom upwards of one hundred were either drowned or slain; and O'Conor himself, and many of his party, were also killed in the thick of the fight.

A.D. 1219.

Hugh O'Malone, bishop of Clonmacnois, was drowned.

1. Rathluraigh, that is, Ardstraw, a parish partly in the barony of Omagh, but chiefly in that of Strabane, county of Tyrone; it was an ancient bishop's see, which was removed to Derry in A.D. 1158.

2. Magh Lugad, according to the books of Leacan and Ballymote, lay in Kianaght of Glengiven, now the barony of Kenaught, in the county of Derry. Keating states that one of the plains cleared by Nemetius, was Moy-Lughaidh, in Hy Tuirtre.

3. Kilbeggain, now the parish of Kilbeggan, in the barony of Moyeshel, Westmeath, where a monastery was founded by St. Beccan, about A.D. 600.

4. Cnoc Muaidhe, now the parish of Abbeyknockmoy, in the barony of Tyaquin, county of Galway: where an abbey was founded in A.D. 1189, by Cathal Croiddearg O'Conor, in commemoration of Fonachtan O'Bronain, the abbot of Derry, died, and was succeeded by Flan O'Brolchain.

Malachy, son of O'Conor of Maonmoy, was slain by Magnus, son of Torlogh O'Conor, after the latter had forcibly taken his house at Clontuiscert.¹

O'Donnell (i.e. Donal More,) marched his forces into the Garbh Thrian of Connaught, and obtained hostages, and the submission of O'Rourke, O'Reilly, and the entire tribe of Hugh Fionn.² He afterwards led his forces through Fermanagh, and spoiled every place through which he passed, both church and country, wherever he was opposed.

Walter de Lacy, and Mac William Burke, arrived from England.

Dudara, son of Muireagh O'Malley, was put to death in prison by Cathal Croidhearg O'Conor, in his own fortress, for his misdeeds.³

Enda, son of Danair O'Maoilchiarain, died.

A.D. 1220.

Jacobus arrived in Ireland as the Pope's legate, to arrange and settle the ecclesiastical affairs of Ireland, after which he returned.

Dermod, son of Roderick O'Conor, son of Torlogh More (monarch of Ireland,) was slain, on his voyage from the Hebrides, by Thomas Mac Uchtry. Dermod collected a fleet, with which he was coming, for the purpose of having himself made king of Connaught; Mulrooney O'Dowd was drowned on the same expedition.

Malachy, son of Malachy Beag (the Little,) was drowned in Lough Ree.

Dermod, son of Bryan the Blind, was treacherously killed by the son of Mahon O'Brien.

Walter de Lacy, and the English of Meath, marched their forces to Athleague,¹ where they partly erected a castle, but Cathal Croidhearg, with his party, crossed the Shannon, eastward by the Ferry, which so much terrified the English, that they made peaceable terms, and the Conacians demolished the castle.

The Cairneach Riabhach (i.e. the Grey Friar) Mac Flanchadha, and Fergal Mac Samhradhain, were slain by Hugh O'Rourke (i.e. the son of Donnell, son of Fergal,) and the Clan Fermaighe.²

A.D. 1221.

Cormac, abbot of Comar,¹ was slain.

The son of Hugo de Lacy came to Ireland, contrary to the command of the king of England, and having joined Hugh O'Neill against the English, they first proceeded to Colerain, and dismantled the castle, and from thence marched to Meath and Leinster, and reduced the country on that expedition. The Anglo-Irish collected twenty-four battalions at Dundalk, but Hugh O'Neill, and de Lacy collected four large battalions, and marched against the English, who submitted to O'Neill on his own terms.

A.D. 1222.

Mac Gealan, bishop of Kildare, died.

Ailbin O'Mulloy, bishop of Ferns, died.

Maoilisa O'Flynn, prior of Eas Mac Erc,¹ died.

Teige O'Boyle, the prosperity and support of the north of Ireland, the bestower of rich presents, and patron of learned men, died.

Niall O'Neill violated Derry, in defiance of the daughter of O'Kane, but God and Columkille were avenged for this, for he did not live long afterwards.

a great victory which he obtained there over the English; hence it is said the monastery was called de colle victoriae.

1. Clontuskert, a parish in the county of Galway.

2. Hugh Fionn, or Hugh the Fair, was one of the ancient kings of Connaught, and ancestor to the O'Rourkes and O'Reillys, princes of the two Brefneys. The Garb Thrian, signifies the Rough District, a name applied to the mountainous part of the county of Leitrim.

3. The O'Malleys were chiefs of Hy Maille, or Umalia, now the barony of Murrisk, in the county of Mayo.

1. Athliag, or Athleague, was the ancient name of the ford on the Shannon at Lanesborough, between Longford and Roscommon; so that it appears that this castle was built in the vicinity of that place, on the banks of the Shannon.

2. Mac Flanchadha, was Mac Clancy, and Mac Samradhain was Mac Gauran, sometimes anglicised to Somers. Both were chiefs in Leitrim and Cavan, as will be fully explained in the note on Brefneiy.

1. Comar was probably the Cistercian abbey of Comber, in the county of Down, or perhaps Commer, now the parish of Kilmacreen, county of Galway, where there was also a religious establishment.

1. Eas Mac Erc. There was a place so called, in the parish of Donagh, barony of Inisowen, county of Donegal. See also p. 34.

Giolla Mochoinni O'Cahal, lord of eastern and western Kinel Hugh, was slain by Shaughnusagh Macgiollanancev O'Shaughnusy, after having been betrayed by his own people.

Mor, daughter of O'Boyle, the wife of Awlave O'Beollain (O'Boland,) died.

A.D. 1223.

Maoliosa, son of Torlogh O'Conor, prior of Inismedhoin,¹ died.

Duvthagh O'Duffy, abbot of Cong, died.

O'Donnell (Donal More,) marched his forces to Croaghan of Connaught, from thence to the Tuatha, and proceeded westward across the river Suck, and devastated, by fire and sword, every district through which he passed, compelling them to give hostages, and make their submission.

Seachnusagh Macgiollanancev O'Shaughnusy, was killed by Clan Cuilein,² who carried off the great erozier of St. Colman of Kilmaeduaigh.

Murogh Carragh O'Ferrall was slain by a dart, while making an attack on Hugh, son of Awlave O'Ferrall.

A.D. 1224.

The monastery of St. Francis, at Athlone, was founded by Cathal Crovdearg O'Conor, king of Connaught, in the diocese of Clonmacnois, on the east bank of the Shannon.

Maolmuire O'Conmaic, bishop of Hy Fiachra, and of Kinel Hugh,¹ died.

The bishop of Conmaicne, i. e. the English bishop,² died.

Maurice, the canonist, son of Roderick O'Conor, one of the most eminent of the Irish for learning, psalmody, and poetry, died, and was buried at Cong.

Maolkeevin O'Scingin, aircineach of Ardcarna,³ died.

Maolisa Mac-an-Espoig O'Maolfaghmair, parson and bishop elect of Hy Fiachra and Hy Amalgaidh (Killala,) was slain by the son of O'Dowd, a crime the more culpable in him, for none of the O'Dowds ever before killed an ecclesiastic.

An awful and strange shower fell in Connaught, extending over Hy Maine, Sodain, Hy Diarmada, and other parts, followed by terrible diseases and distempers among the cattle that grazed on the lands where this shower fell; and their milk produced, in the persons who drank it, extraordinary internal diseases. It was manifest that these were evil omens, foreboding misfortunes to the people of Connaught, as they sustained irreparable loss and calamity in the same year by the death of Cathal Crovdearg, the son of Torlogh More O'Conor, and king of Connaught, the man who had, during a long time, destroyed more of the traitors and enemies of Ireland than any other had done, the chief supporter of the clergy, and benefactor of the poor and indigent—a man in whom God had implanted more goodness and greater virtues than in any other of the Irish nobility in his time. From the period of his wife's death till his own, he led a single and virtuous life. During his reign tithes were first lawfully collected in Ireland. This upright and noble prince, this warrior of pure piety and just judgments, died on the 28th day of Summer, on a Monday, in the habit of a grey friar, in the monastery of Knockmoy, which he himself had dedicated to God, and granted to the monks, with its site and lands, and in which he was interred with due honours and solemnity. The place of Cathal Crovdearg's birth was at the Port of Lough Mask, and he was nurtured and educated in Hy Diarmada, with Teige O'Conceanain.⁴

1. Inis Meodhain, an island in Lough Mask, county of Mayo.

2. Clan Cuilein, a district in the east of the county of Clare, of which the Mac Namaras were chiefs.

1. Bishop of Hy Fiachra and of Kinel Hugh, that is, bishop of Kilmaeduaigh.

2. Bishop of Conmaicne, or Ardagh, mentioned by Ware as Robert, a Cistercian monk.

3. Ard Carna, or Ardcarna, a parish in the barony of Boyle, county of Roscommon, had in early times a monastery, and was a bishop's see.

4. Cathal Crovdearg O'Conor, was the son of Torlogh, monarch of Ireland, and brother to king Roderick O'Conor, not his son, as stated by several writers. He was long celebrated amongst the Irish, as a valiant warrior, and got the name Croibhdearg, signifying, of the Red or Bloody Hand, from the many battles he fought against the English. He was king of Connaught for many years, and made many energetic efforts to restore the Irish monarchy. Amongst the many victories he gained, was the battle of Knockmoy, A.D. 1189, in which he cut off the English forces commanded by the valiant Almeric de St. Lawrence, ancestor to the earls of Howth. In commemoration of this battle, he founded a great Cistercian monastery at Knockmoy, in the county of Galway, which was known under the name de colle victoriæ, that is, of the hill of victory. Amidst the venerable ruins of Knockmoy, are still to be seen some interesting remains of the magnificent monument of Crovdearg O'Conor.

Hugh O'Connor, (Cathal Crowdearg's son), succeeded immediately, without opposition, as king of Connaught, for he held the hostages of Connaught previous to his father's death. Hugh, in maintenance of the laws and functions of a prince, when about to assume the government,

On Irish proper names. It may here not be unnecessary to give an explanation of some of the proper and Christian names of men and women that frequently occur in the course of these Annals. Many of these Irish names appear strange and uncouth to the mere English reader, though if their etymology and pronunciation were perfectly understood, they would be found truly beautiful, euphonious, and expressive. A few examples are given, as follows:—

Aodh, pronounced Ee and E, was one of the most frequent names of kings and chiefs amongst the Irish. The word signifies fire, and was probably derived from the Druidical worship. The name has been anglicised into Hugh, and latinised variously, Hugo, Aedus, Aedanus, Aidus, and Odo.

Aongus, the name of kings and chiefs, pronounced Angus, derived from Aon, excellent, and Gus, strength. This has become a surname, Mac Aongusa, or Mac Gennises, lords of Iveagh.

Adgal, a name of chiefs, from Ard, exalted, and gal, valour.

Art, a name of kings and chiefs, derived from Art, noble. It was a frequent name amongst the O'Neills. It has been anglicised to Arthur.

Brian, a name of kings and chiefs, derived from Bri, strength, and an, very great, that is, a warrior of great strength. It has been anglicised into Bryan and Bernard. It has become a surname in the great family of the O'Briens, kings of Thomond, as derived from their ancestor, Brian Boromhe.

Brandubh, the name of a king of Leinster in the sixth century, signifying the Black Raven, from the colour of his hair, the word Bran signifying a Raven, and Dubh, black. The O'Brains or O'Byrnes, chiefs of Wicklow, derived their descent from this king.

Blosgach, the name of a chief, signifies a strong man, or a smasher. This has become the surname of Mac Blosgaidh, or Mac Closkey, a clan in Derry.

Cathal, a frequent name of kings and chiefs, signifies a great warrior, from Cath, a battle, and all, great.

Cathaoir, or Cathair, also a frequent name of kings and chiefs, has a similar signification from Cath, a battle, and ar, slaughter.

In the pronunciation of these names the t is silent, and they are to be pronounced Cah-al and Cah-ir. It may be remarked that both these names have been absurdly anglicised into Charles.

Cormac, a name of kings and chiefs, signifies the son of the Chariot, from corb, a chariot, and mac, a son. Cairbre, a frequent name of kings and chiefs, probably derived from the same source, as corb, a chariot, and Ri, a king, hence may signify the chief or ruler of the chariot.

Conu, a name of kings and chiefs, may be derived from Conu, wisdom or sense; or from Cu, which signifies a hound, and was figuratively applied to a warrior, as the genitive case of Cu makes Con. This was a favourite name with the chiefs of the O'Neills, from Conn of the Hundred Battles, monarch of Ireland, one of their ancestors.

Conall, a name of kings and chiefs, derived either from Conall, friendship, or from Cu, making in the genitive Con, signifying a warrior, and all, mighty, an instance of which may be given in the famous warrior Conall Cearnach, or Conall the Victorious.

Cathbhar, pronounced Cah-war, was a favourite name amongst the chiefs of the O'Donnells, and signifies a helmeted-warrior, from Cathbhar, a helmet, or perhaps from Cath, war or battle, and Barr, a chief.

Conchubhar, or Conchobhar, pronounced Con-coo-var, a frequent name of kings and chiefs, derived from Cu or Con, a warrior, and Cobhair, aid; hence it signifies the helping warrior. This name has been anglicised into Conor, and latinised Cornelius.

commanded the eyes of the son of O'Monaghan to be put out, because he had committed a rape, and the hands and feet of another to be cut off, because he had committed a robbery.

Hugh O'Connor, of Maonmoy, died on his journey home from Jerusalem and the river Jordan.

It also, like many others, became a surname, as in the great family of the O'Conors, kings of Connaught, and others of that name in Ireland.

We find several names of chiefs commencing with Cu, which signifies a hound, and figuratively a swift-footed warrior, as for instance, Cuchullain, a famous warrior of the Red Branch Knights of Ulster, the name signifying the warrior of Ulster, as Ulladh, or Ulster, is some times inflected Ullain.

Cu-Ulladh, a frequent name of chiefs, also signifies the warrior of Ulladh, or Ulster. Cu-Midhe, signifying the warrior of Meath, is also a frequent name of chiefs.

Cuchonnacht, signifies the warrior of Connaught, and was a favourite name of the Mac Guires, chiefs of Fermanagh. This name has been anglicised into Conor, and Constantine.

Donnall, pronounced Don-all, and anglicised Daniel, a name of kings and chiefs, became also a surname, as in the great family of the O'Donnells, princes of Tirconnell.

Donnoch, or Donnchu, a name of kings and chiefs, frequent among the O'Briens, derived probably from Donu, brown, and Cu, a warrior, therefore might signify the brown-haired warrior. The name is pronounced Donogh, and anglicised Denis. It has also become a surname, as in the clans of the Mac Donoghs, and O'Donoghies.

Diarmuid, or Diarmuid, a name of kings and chiefs, which, according to O'Brien, is derived from Dia, a god, and Armaid, the genitive plural of Arm, arms, the word thus signifying a god of arms, an epithet as applied to a warrior equivalent to that of one of Homer's heroes, Dios Krateros Diomedes, or the god-like fighting Diomedes. This name has also become a surname, as Mac Diarmada, or Mac Dermotts, princes of Moylurg.

Eochaidh, pronounced Eochy, or Eohy, anglicised Achy, and latinised Eochadius, Achadius, and Achaius, a name of many kings and chiefs, is derived from Each or Eoch, a steed, and therefore signifies a horseman or knight.

Eachmarcach, and Eachmilidh, names of chiefs, have a similar signification, the first derived from Each, a steed, and marcach, a rider; the second from Each, a steed, and Milidh, a knight.

Eigneachan, derived from Eigean, force, and Neach, a person, and may signify a plundering chief.

Eogan, a name of kings and chiefs, signifies a young man or youthful warrior. This name has been anglicised into Owen and Eugene, in Latin, Eugenius. It was a favourite name of the O'Neills, from their ancestor Eogan, son of Niall of the Hostages, monarch of Ireland.

Feidhlim, or Feidhlimidh, a name of kings and chiefs, which, according to Cormac's Glossary, signifies great goodness, and is probably derived from Féile, hospitality, hence it may signify a man of hospitality. The name is pronounced Felim, or Phelim, and has been anglicised to Felix.

Feargal, a name of kings and chiefs, derived from Fear, a man, and gal, valour, hence signifying a valiant warrior. It has become a surname, as O'Feargail, or O'Ferralls, princes of Anally. This was a favourite Christian name of the O'Ferralls, O'Rourkes, and O'Reillys.

Feargus, or Fergus, a frequent name of kings and chiefs, derived from Fear, a man, and gus, strength, hence it signifies a strong warrior.

Fiacha, a frequent name of kings and chiefs from the earliest ages, and derived from Fiacha, a hunter, which probably had its origin from the occupation or amusement of hunting, so frequent in early times. Nimrod for instance, in the Scriptures, is mentioned as a mighty hunter.

Flann, a name of kings and chiefs, a word which signifies of a

Doncathach, son of Aireactach O'Rody, chief of Clan Tomaltaidh, died on his pilgrimage at Tobur Patriek.⁵

Maolseachlin, son of Teige O'Kelly, lord of Hy Maine, died.

Giolla-na-neev Crom O'Shaughnessy, lord of the western half of Kinel Hugh of Echtgi, died.

Donal O'Kelly, lord of Hy Maine, died.

Cucanan O'Concanan died.

red complexion. It has become a surname, as O'Flainn, or O'Flynn, of whom there were several clans, and the O'Flanagans are derived from the same source.

Fionn, the name of kings and chiefs, signifies fair-haired, and the word is prefixed to many names.

Flaithbheartach, pronounced Flaherty, the name of chiefs. This word, which may appear in the Irish to have an unechoing sound, is really a euphonious name, of expressive signification, being derived from Flaith, a chief, and bheartach, of deeds, and may, therefore, signify a chief of noble deeds. It has become a surname, as of the O'Flahertys, chiefs of West Connaught.

Guaire, a name of kings and chiefs, which signified noble or excellent. Guaire, an ancient king of Connaught, was celebrated for his hospitality.

Gearrmaide, a name of some chiefs, derived from Garr, short, and maide, a stick, which might signify the chief of the short cudgel: the first probably who obtained this was distinguished for his stick-fighting.

Giolla. This word is prefixed to many names, chiefly to those of ecclesiasties, and signifies a servant, or disciple, for instance Giolla-an-choimhdhe, signifying the servant of the Trinity, from Coimhdhe, the Trinity; Giolla-Iosa, the servant of Jesus; a name which has been latinised into Gelasius; Giolla-Criost, the servant of Christ; Giolla-Muire, the servant of the Virgin Mary; Giolla-na-naomh, pronounced Giolla-na-neev, signifying the servant of the saints; Giolla-Peadair, or the servant of St. Peter; Giolla-Poil, or servant of St. Paul; Giolla-Michil, the servant of St. Michael; Giolla-Patraig, the servant of St. Patrick; Giolla-Coluin, or servant of St. Columkille; Giolla-Brighde, the servant of St. Bridget; Giolla-Ciarain, the servant of St. Kieran; Giolla-Caomhain, the servant of St. Kevin; Giolla-Easbuig, the servant of the bishop, &c.

Maol is also prefixed chiefly to the names of ecclesiasties, and signifies a bald or tonsured person, who became the spiritual servant of some saint, as for instance Maol-Iosa, or the servant of Jesus; Maol-Muire, or the servant of the Virgin Mary; Maol-Peadair, or the servant of St. Peter; Maol-Poil, or the servant of St. Paul; Maol-Patraig, or the servant of St. Patrick; Maol-Coluin, or the servant of St. Columkille, a name known as Malcolm, and which was borne by many of the kings of Scotland.

Maolseachlain, signifying the servant of St. Sechnall, or Seachlan, was a name frequent amongst the kings and chiefs of Meath, of the Hy Nialls. This name has been anglicised to Malaehy; it also became a surname of that clan, under the name O'Melaghlin.

Maolmordha, a name which has been anglicised to Myles, or Miles, was a favorite name of the chiefs of the O'Reillys.

Muircheartach, a frequent name of chiefs, may be derived from Muir, the sea, and cart, a right, hence might signify a naval warrior, or a chief establishing his rights at sea. The name has been anglicised to Murtogh.

Muireadhach, a name of kings and chiefs, which may also be derived from Muir, the sea, and Endhach, a protector, a name equivalent to that of admiral. It has been anglicised Morogh, and Maurice.

Niall, a name of many kings and chiefs, derived from Niadh, a champion, or mailed knight, and all, noble, hence signifies a noble knight, or armed champion. This became the tribe-name of Mahon, son of Carney O'Kerin, lord of Ciarraidhe of Lough-na-nairneadh,⁶ died.

The corn was unreaped till the festival of St. Bridget, when the ploughing commenced (a delay), occasioned by war, and the inclemency of the weather.

Maurice Fitzgerald,⁷ from whom are descended the Geraldines of Kildare and Desmond, founded a monastery at Youghal, in the diocese of Cluaninsi-Mumhan (Cloyne), for friars of the order of St. Francis.

the Hy Nialls, who were descended from Niall of the Hostages, monarch of Ireland.

Rudhraighe, or Ruadhraighe, a name of kings and chiefs, may be derived either from Ruadh, valiant, and Righ, a king; or, Rundh, red, and Righ, a king, and may therefore signify the valiant king, or the red-haired king. This name has been anglicised to Rory and Roderick.

Toirdhealbhaich, pronounced Torlogh, a name of kings and chiefs, derived from Tor, a tower, and dealbhaich, form, signifying a man of tower-like stature. This name has been anglicised to Terence.

Tomaltach, a name of chiefs, derived from Tomaill, provisions, or good living, hence signified a man of hospitality. It has been anglicised to Thomas.

Tuathal, pronounced Tua-lul, a name of kings and chiefs, derived from Tuatha, territories, that is, a man possessed of a large landed property, or a lordship, has become a surname, as O'Tuathail, or O'Toole.

Tighearnan, or Tiarnan, a name of chiefs, derived from Tiarna, a lord. This was a favourite name among the chiefs of the O'Rourkes. It also became a surname, as Mae Tiernan, or Mae Kernan.

Tadhg, or Teige, a frequent name, signified originally, a poet.

Ualgarg, a name of chiefs amongst the O'Rourkes, derived from Uaill, famous, and garg, fierce, signifying a famous and fierce warrior.

A few names of women may be here given as specimens, as for instance, Bebinn, derived from Be, a woman, and binn, melodious.

Barrdubh, a dark-haired woman, from Barr, the hair, and dubh, dark.

Dearforgail, or Dervorgil, signifies a purely fair daughter, from Dear, a daughter, and forgil, purely fair.

Dubhdéasa, or Dudeasa, signifies a dark-haired beauty, from Dubh, dark, and deas, beautiful.

Feithfáilge, a beautiful and fanciful name, derived from Feith, a honey-suckle, and fáilge, of rings, hence it signifies a honey-suckle of ringlets.

Fionnghuala, signifies a fair-shouldered woman, from Fionn, white, and guala, shoulders. This name has been anglicised to Penelope.

Flanna, signifies a red or rosy complexioned beauty.

Lasairfhiona, signifies a wine or rosy complexioned woman.

Mor, a frequent name of women, signifies a fine or majestic woman.

5. Clan Tomaltaidh, a district, according to O'Dugan, in the territory of Croaghban in Connaught, in the present county of Roscommon. Tobar Padraig or St. Patrick's well, a place of pilgrimage, in the parish of Annagh, barony of Costello, county of Mayo, where a church was founded by the abbot Maolbrighe O'Maigin, in A.D. 1225.

6. Ciarraidhe-Loch-na-nairneadh, which O'Flaherty calls Kerry, of Loch Mairne, lay in the parish of Aghamore, barony of Costello, county of Mayo.

7. Maurice Fitzgerald. The Fitzgeralds trace their descent from the dukes of Tuseany. Some of the family, from Florence, settled in Normandy, and came from thence to England with William the Conqueror. Maurice Fitzgerald came to Ireland with Robert Fitzstephen, and other Anglo-Norman chiefs, A.D. 1169, and assisted Strongbow in the reduction of Ireland. He is thus described from Cambrensis and Hollingshed:—"A man he was,

A. D. 1225.

WLAVE O'BEO-LAN, aircineach of Drumcliff, a learned man, and a Biatach,¹ died.

O'Mulbrenan, abbot of the monastery of Boyle, died from the accidental effects of bloodletting.

Maolbrighde O'Maigin, abbot of Tobarpatrick, a son of purity and wisdom, died. He founded the church of Tobarpatrick, which he completed, with its sanctuary and crosses, at great pains, and dedicated it in honour of St. Patrick, the Virgin Mary, and the Apostles.

Giolla-an-Choimde Mac Giollacharraidh, a dignified priest, and parson of Taughboine, died.

Dionisius O'Mulkiaran, aircineach of Ardcarne, died.

Giollacoirpthe O'Mugroin died, and was interred at Cong of St. Feichin.

O'Neill mustered a powerful force, and marched into Connaught, to aid the sons of Roderick O'Conor, namely, Torlogh and Hugh, at the instance of Duinnoig Mac Oireachtaidh (Mac Geraghty), head chief of Siol Murray (Roscommon), to be revenged of O'Conor (Hugh), who had dispossessed him of his territory; but when Mac Oireachty turned against Hugh O'Conor, the Siol Murray, and the people of West Connaught, headed by Hugh O'Flaherty, lord of West Connaught, and all the Irish of the province, except Mac Dermott (Cormac, son of Tomaltach), rose in opposition to him. As to O'Neill, he did not halt until he arrived in the middle of Siol Murray, from whence he proceeded to the wood of Athlone, where he remained encamped for two nights at the mill of Guanach, until he devastated Lough Nen, from which he carried away all the treasures of O'Conor. From thence he marched to Carn Fraoich,² where Torlogh, son of Roderick O'Conor, was inaugurated by O'Neill and his party; for all the clans, except the supporters of Hugh, namely, Mac Dermott, David O'Flynn, and a few others, gave their support to the sons of Roderick.

The son of Cathal Crovdearg then came to a resolution to repair to the English, at the castle at Athlone; and it happened fortunately for him that the English nobility of Ireland were then assembled there, most of whom were his friends on his own account, as well as on that of his father, for they were both tributaries to the English. The English received him gladly, and he remained with them for some time, on very friendly terms. The lord justice, and many of the English nobility, gave him their support, and were joined by Donagh Cairbreach O'Brien, and O'Melaghlin, (lord of Meath), with their forces.

The people of Moy Ai, and those of the Tuatha of Connaught, (in Roscommon), having received intelligence of the muster of the forces, fled, with both honest and wise, and for truth and valour very noble and famous, a man of his word, of constant mind, and of a certain bashfulness, well coloured, and of good countenance, of middle stature, and compact at all points, courteous, gentle, and moderate, a pattern of sobriety and good behaviour; a man of few words; his speeches more full of wit and reason than of words; more wisdom he had than eloquence; in martial affairs bold, stout, and valiant, and yet not hasty to run headlong into any adventure, but when an attempt was once taken in hand, he would strictly pursue and follow the same." He was appointed chief governor of Ireland, A.D. 1173, by Henry II., and he and his descendants got large grants of lands in Leinster and Munster, chiefly in the counties of Kildare, Wicklow, Wexford, Cork, and Kerry. He died A.D. 1177, and was buried in the abbey of the Grey Friars at Wexford. From him was descended the above Maurice Fitzgerald, and the noble family of the Fitzgeralds, one of the most distinguished in Ireland. A branch of them were, down to the reign of Elizabeth, earls of Desmond, and had immense possessions in the counties of Cork and Kerry. Another branch became barons of Offaly, earls of Kildare, and dukes of Leinster. There have been also many other eminent families of the name in Ireland. The earls of Desmond and Kildare were frequently lords depute and chief governors of Ireland, down to the reign of Elizabeth. The noble family of the Geraldines frequently joined the Irish against the English government; hence they were charged by English writers as having become Irish in language and manners, and Hibernia ipsis Hiberniores, or more Irish than the Irish themselves.

1. Biatachs were an order of persons very numerous in Ireland, in ancient times appointed to keep houses of hospitality, for the entertainment of travellers and the poor; and the establishments over which they presided had endowments and grants of lands for the public use, and free entertainment for all persons who stood in need of it; and from these arose the term Ballybiatach, so common in Ireland as a name for a townland, which signified land appropriated to these purposes. In early times these appear to have been used for supporting the military on their march.

2. Carn Fraoich, above mentioned, was the place of inauguration of the O'Conors as kings of Connaught, and was situated near Tulsk, in the county of Roscommon.

their flocks and property, into the territory of Lieney and Tyrawley, and left the sons of Roderick, with a small army, who, with what men they could assemble, retired to Kilkelly.³ Hugh, and the English who aided him, sent the light companies to plunder the adherents of Roderick's sons, and kept the main army for the purpose of attacking those of their opponents. Hugh, the son of Roderick, Donal O'Flaherty, Tiarnan, son of Cathal Migarun, and the son of Torlogh, son of Roderick, went to solicit the aid of some friends. The English, accompanied by Hugh, son of Cathal Crovdearg, marched to attack Torlogh, who, perceiving their intention, commanded his inexperienced leaders, namely, Donagh Oge Mac Oircachty with his recruits, Flaherty O'Flanagan, and several other young soldiers, to advance with all possible speed before him, while he himself covered the rear; which movement he effectually executed, and thus they escaped without any loss.

On the same day, a skirmishing party from Hugh O'Connor came up with Eachmarcach Mac Branán, who, while defending his prey of cattle, was killed by his opponents.

Hugh O'Connor, at the head of the English, pursued the sons of Roderick, that night, to Mee-lick, and spent three nights plundering Lieney in all directions; but afterwards made peace with O'Hara, and spared the remaining property of the country. Roderick's sons were, at this time, in the neighbourhood of Lough Mac Ferdaidh, in Glenna-Mochart. Hugh advised his English allies to plunder the Tuatha of Connaught, Siol Murray, and also the clan Tomaltaidh, as they had fled. They determined on this plan, upon which he led the English by an unfrequented pass through the wood of Gatlaigh, until they reached Ath-tighe-in-messaigh, where they commenced plundering Cuil Cearnaidh,⁴ having expelled the inhabitants, who fled to Dubhchonga, and the most of whom were drowned, so that the pools of the river above the fords, which they endeavoured to cross, were found full of drowned children; and such of them as escaped the English, and drowning, fled into Tyrawley, where they were attacked, and plundered of all their cattle, by O'Dowd. With respect to the sons of Roderick, the resolution they came to was, that they would separate their forces until the English should quit Hugh; that Donn Mac Oiraghty, and others of their chiefs should go to the country of O'Flaherty, their friend and ally; and that the sons of Murtoigh O'Connor, and Tiarnan Mac Cathail, should go in quest of their people and cattle, and sue for peace on their behalf, until the English should separate from the son of Cathal Crovdearg. Hugh was then at Mayo; and the sons of Murtoigh Muimnagh proceeded thither with sureties, to seek his pardon and protection.

The people of South Connaught were then in a very unsettled and unhappy condition, for the English of Leinster and Munster, along with Murtoigh O'Brien and the English of Desmond, headed by the sheriff of Cork, marched together into their territory, slew all whom they met, and plundered their farms and towns. Hugh, son of Cathal Crovdearg, was much displeased with them, for coming on such an expedition, for they had not come at his instigation, but influenced by their own desire to plunder the country, on hearing how much the lord justice and his English followers had obtained of the wealth of Connaught on that occasion. During that incursion the four sons of Mac Murrough were slain in one place.

It was a woeful visitation of Providence which befel the best province in Ireland at that time, for no man spared his neighbour, but took advantage of his misfortunes, and plundered him; and many women, children, and helpless persons among the peasantry, perished of cold and famine during those wars.

The sons of Murtoigh Muimnagh, having proceeded as before stated, to sue for protection from Hugh O'Connor, arrived on the following day at Kilmeodhain.⁵ At this place the three English armies formed a junction, and the barony was nearly covered with their forces and those of the Irish. Hugh O'Flaherty, under protection of the

3. Kilkelly, in the barony of Costello, county of Mayo.

4. Cuil Cearnaidh. The places where this warfare occurred, namely, the Tuatha, Siol Murray, and the Clan Tomaltaidhe, were in the county of Rosecommon. Cuilcarney was a district in the barony of Gallen, county of Mayo. The river in which those persons were drowned, is supposed to have been the Moy. Ath-tighe-in-messaigh is Attemas, in the barony of Gallen, county of Mayo.

5. Cill Meodhain, now Kilmaine, a parish in the barony of Kilmaine, county of Mayo.

English nobles, and of Donagh Cairbreach O'Brien, his intercessors, came before Hugh O'Connor and the lord justice, and entered into terms of peace and protection for his people and property, on condition that he should expel from his territory the sons of Roderick. After this, Hugh O'Connor and his English allies marched to Tuam, where he dismissed the English of Leinster and of Desmond; after which, he himself returned back to O'Flaherty, on whose fidelity he did not depend, for O'Flaherty kept the sons of Roderick and Donn Oge Mac Oiraghty under his protection, on the western side of the lake, (Lough Corrib, in Galway).

At that time Mac Manus parted with the sons of Roderick (O'Connor), and went into Trawley in quest of his people and cattle, which he fortunately recovered without loss, and took with him, under the protection of O'Rourke, who at that time had plundered Philip Mac Costello. Donogh Cairbreach O'Brien, having sent before him a party with great booty, Hugh, son of Roderick, and Owen O'Heyne, who had received intelligence of it, intercepted them with a small select party, and having defeated the Munster men, recovered the booty, and took some of the chiefs as hostages. When Donogh Cairbreach (O'Brien), heard of these proceedings, he came to Hugh, son of Roderick, made peace with him, by the solemn ceremony of extinguishing candles, and bound himself never again to oppose him, on condition, that he (Hugh), should set his (Donogh's), captive friends at liberty. He (Donogh), did not, however, adhere to his covenant with the son of Roderick, after his friends were released, for, on the next occasion, he marched against him with the forces of Hugh, son of Cathal Crovdearg.

After some time Hugh O'Connor and the lord justice arrived at the port of Inis Creamha,⁶ and compelled O'Flaherty to surrender into his hands Inis, Oilean-na-Circe, and all the vessels on the lake. The lord justice, after this, returned home, being escorted a great part of his journey by Hugh O'Connor, with whom the lord justice left many of his chief officers and soldiers, for he could depend only on a few of the Conacians. He (O'Connor), then delivered into the hands of the English, the most distinguished heads of his clans as a guarantee for the payment of their tribute, namely, Flaherty O'Flanagan, Fergal O'Teige, and others of the chiefs of Connaught, who were obliged to ransom themselves. O'Flaherty, the son of Murtoth (O'Dowd), and the other chiefs, revolted against Hugh, son of Cathal Crovdearg, after the English army had departed, and joined the sons of Roderick. Hugh O'Connor then sent messengers and letters to the lord justice, informing him of these circumstances, and requesting him to send him some forces. He was not disappointed, for the English promptly and cheerfully responded to the call, and their expedition proved profitable to them, for great was their booty, and small their loss. The English of Leinster, commanded by William Cruse, and the sons of Griffin, were forthwith sent to his aid.

As soon as these forces arrived, Hugh O'Connor marched to attack the son of Roderick, passed the Tochar⁷ westward, and thence proceeded through the territory of Hy-Diarmada, where he heard that the son of Roderick then was, with a small force, as his friends had not as yet come to his aid. Hugh O'Connor sent his brother, Feidhlim, with other chiefs, and a large force of the English soldiers, to plunder Owen O'Heyne, in Hy-Fiachra Aidhne; and they encamped for the night at Ardrathan. Intelligence was brought to O'Flaherty, and to the sons of Murtoth, who were then preparing to join the son of Roderick, that the English had gone to plunder their ally, Owen O'Heyne, and were at Ardrathan; they, therefore, made no delay, but all with one accord pursued them, until they came close on them. They there held a consultation, and resolved first to send Tuathal, son of Murtoth (O'Dowd), and Taithleach O'Dowd, with a large body of their forces, to Ardrathan, while O'Flaherty, and the son of Murtoth, remained outside the town with their troops. Tuathal and Taithleach marched onward with a strong force, attacked the English in the town with great courage and animation, and made such havoc among them that they were totally defeated and put to flight, east and west. The victors closely pursued them eastward. Tuathal, in the first encounter, wounded the English constable or commander, and Taith-leach pierced him a second time, so that he was left lifeless on the spot. The remainder of the English who were driven out of the town westward were met by O'Flaherty, and the son of Murtogh (O'Dowd), but, unfortunately, they were defeated by the English, and Mahon, son of Hugh, son of Conor of Maonmoy; Gillereest Mac Dermott; Neill, son of Fergal O'Teige, and others, were slain in the conflict. The person who slew Niall O'Teige, namely, the brother of Colen O'Dempsey, was also slain. As to Roderick's son, he, O'Flaherty, and their supporters, assembled together, and marched on the following day southward, until they arrived at Drom Canannain; but Hugh, son of Cathal Crovdearg, with his English allies, pursued them.

6. Inis Creamha was an island on the east of Lough Corrib, county of Galway. Oilean-na-Circe, or the Hen's Island, was another island in Lough Corrib, where the O'Flahertys had a castle. The lord justice so frequently mentioned at this period was Richard de Burgo.

7. Tochar signifies a road, or pass; and the one here mentioned is probably the ancient road called Tochar Phadraig, or St. Patrick's causeway, which is traditionally stated to have extended from the abbey of Ballintober, in Roscommon, to Croagh Patrick, in Mayo.

The supporters of Roderick's sons now held a council, and resolved that they should return home, which all agreed to do, except Donn Oge Mac Oiraghty. The other chiefs, however, having left the royal sons of Roderick O'Conor, with whom they left but a small force, they proceeded to the residence of Hugh O'Neill, accompanied by Donn Mac Oiraghty. Hugh, son of Cathal Crovdearg, then attacked O'Flaherty, and took hostages from him, after which he proceeded to Kilmaine, and from thence to Mayo, in pursuit of the son of Murtogh (O'Dowd), and Tiarnan, son of Cathal Migarainn, who made terms, and obtained protection for their people and property; and they then made their submission to Hugh O'Conor, on the security of Donogh Cairbreagh O'Brien, and the English nobles. Until then there was no peace in Connaught, for all its churches and territories had been plundered and laid waste. After these events, a destructive plague and fever followed, and devastated Connaught, entire towns being depopulated, so that a single living creature could not be found in them.

Flan, son of Awlave O'Fallon, chief of Clan Uadagh,⁸ was slain by Feidlim, son of Cathal Crovdearg; and Teige O'Feenaghty, the friend of Hugh, son of Roderick O'Conor, was slain by the Mac Egans, in the aforementioned war.

Awlave, son of Feareair O'Fallon, the worthiest chief of his own clan, died.

Muireagh O'Feenaghty, chief of Clan Murchadha,⁹ died on board a vessel on Lough Oirbsin (Lough Corrib), though in perfect health when he embarked.

The residence of Conor, son of Teige O'Kelly (lord of Hy Maine), and of Ardgall, his brother, was attacked and set on fire by the sons of Teige O'Kelly; and both perished in the flames.

Duarean O'Hara, Teige O'Hara, and Edaoín, daughter of Dermot, son of Donal O'Hara, died.

The people of Munster and the English made a predatory attack on Termon Caolainne,¹⁰ but they were repulsed with slaughter, through the miracles of God and St. Caolainne.

The corn remained unreaped until after the festival of St. Bridget (the 1st of February).

—
A. D. 1226.

Donum Dei (or Deodatus), bishop of Meath, died.

Connmach O'Tappa (or O'Tarpa), bishop of Lieney (Achonry), died.

Hugh, son of Dun O'Sochlaehlain, aircincaeh of Cong, a learned scribe, skilled in psalmody, and in many arts and sciences, died.

Matthew O'Maolmoicherghe died.

Tiarnan, son of Cathal Migarun, son of Torlogh More, who was the most celebrated tanist of his tribe for hospitality, generosity, and magnani-

8. Clan Uadach, a district in the barony of Athlone, county of Rosecommon, of which, according to O'Dugan, O'Fallon was chief. O'Fallon had his castle at Milltown, in the parish of Dysart.

9. Clan Murchadha. This territory lay in the county of Galway, on the borders of Rosecommon, adjoining Clan Connhaighe, of which the O'Feenaghtys were also chiefs. Clan Connhaighe lay on both sides of the river Suck, which flows between the counties of Galway and Rosecommon, but chiefly in the former, and met Siol Maoilruana at the bridge of Glinsk, which lay in the west of the county of Rosecommon.

10. Termon Caolainne. This was probably Killone, near Ennis, in the county of Clare, where there was a celebrated Augustinian abbey, founded A. D. 1195, by Donald O'Brien, king of Limerick, and sometimes called Clare abbey; or perhaps Killanna, in the parish of Killofin, county of Clare, where the ruins of an ancient monastery are still to be seen.

mity for a long period, was slain by Donogh O'Dowd and his sons.

Nuala, daughter of Roderick O'Conor, and queen of Ulster,¹ died at Cong of St. Feichin, and was honorably interred there, in the church of the Canons.

Donal, son of Roderick O'Flaherty, was slain by the sons of Murtogh O'Flaherty, after they, together with Feilim, son of Cathal Crovdearg, had taken his house by assault.

Fergal O'Teige, chief of the household of Cathal Crovdearg (O'Conor), and Hugh, son of Cathal, were slain by Donsleve O'Gara.

Hugh, son of Donal O'Rourke, was slain by Cathal O'Reilly, aided by Cathal, son of Cormac O'Mulroony, on Lough Allen (in Leitrim).

Maurice Mac Dermott was slain.

The castle of Kilmore (county of Cavan) was demolished by Cathal O'Reilly.

Hugh, son of Cathal Crovdearg O'Conor, took Hugh O'Flaherty prisoner, and delivered him into the hands of the English.

A. D. 1227.

Conor, son of Niall O'Catharnaigh, was slain by the English soldiers of Leinster, who were at the time along with the king of Connaught.

Henry O'Melaghlin, and Murtogh O'Melaghlin (of Meath), were slain by the English.

Malachy O'Conor Faily was slain by Cuilen O'Dempsey.

Giolla Coluim O'Mulloy was slain by O'Moore.

The English of Ireland, having assembled in Dublin, invited Hugh, son of Cathal Crovdearg O'Conor, king of Connaught, to a conference, and attempted to betray him and keep him prisoner, but William Mareschal, his friend, arrived with some troops, rescued him in despite of the English, out of the middle of the court-house, and escorted him into Connaught.

Hugh, son of Cathal Crovdearg, appointed a meeting at Lathach Caichtuthbil,¹ with William Marisco, son of Geoffrey, lord justice of Ireland.

Only a chosen few of O'Conor's party went beyond the morass where the meeting was to take place, namely, Cormac, son of Tomaltach; Dermod, son of Manus; Manus, son of Murtogh O'Conor; Teige, son of Mahon O'Kerin; and Roderick O'Mullrenan, to receive William Marisco, who came thither, accompanied by eight horsemen. O'Conor, remembering their former treachery, rose in opposition to the English, and incited his party against them; and he himself attacked William Marisco, and made him prisoner on the spot. The party, thus instigated by O'Conor, obeyed the call, attacked the English, defeated them, and slew the constable of Athlone; they also took prisoners Master Slemhny and Hugo Ardin. Hugh O'Conor sent those Englishmen to prison beyond Lathach, and then marched with a body of men to Athlone, where he plundered the market-place, and burned the entire town. This was a fortunate circumstance for the Conacians, as many of their sons and daughters, and the hostages of Connaught, who were detained in bondage by the English, were released in exchange for the above-named English prisoners; and in addition to this, the people of Connaught obtained terms of peace.

Donslevy O'Gara, lord of Slieve Lugh, was slain by Giolla-ro, his own brother's son, after he (Giolla-ro) had taken his (Donslevy's) house by assault at night; and Giolla-ro himself was afterwards slain there by order of Hugh O'Conor.

Hugh, son of Roderick O'Conor, and Mac William Burke, marched a powerful force into North Connaught. They burned Inis Meodhain (in Lough Mask, county of Mayo), plundered the country through which they passed, and took hostages.

Jeffrey Marisco, and Torlogh, son of Roderick O'Conor, marched a force into Moy Aoi,² erected a castle at Rinn-Duin, and took the hostages of Siol Murray.

Hugh, son of Cathal Crovdearg, went to Tirconnell to O'Donnell, but on his return home with his wife, the sons of Torlogh (O'Conor), met him in the neighbourhood of Seaghsha (part of the

1. Queen of Ulster. This daughter of king Roderick O'Conor seems to have been the wife of O'Neill, prince of Tirowen, and king of Ulster.

1. Lathach, which signifies a morass, appears to have been near Athlone, on the Connaught side of the Shannon.

2. Magh Aoi. This plain, and Ruin Duin, both in Roscommon, have been already described in the notes.

Curlew mountains), attacked him, and took his horses from him, and also his wife, whom they delivered up as a prisoner into the hands of the English.

Torlogh, and the English of Meath, marched with another force into West Connaught, where they committed great depredations on Hugh, the son of Roderick O'Flaherty. They proceeded from thence into the territory of Carra (in Mayo), where they took hostages from the sons of Murtoogh; and they carried away with them a large number of beeves from every district.

Cumara O'Donnellan was slain in prison by Roderick Mac Dunslevy, in revenge of his father's death.

Bryan, son of Conor O'Dermott, was slain.

The castle of Athleague³ was built by Jeoffrey Marisco.

A. D. 1228.

Hugh, son of Cathal Crovdearg O'Conor, king of Connaught, was treacherously slain by the English, in the court of Jeoffrey Marisco, after he had been expelled by the Conacians.

A great war broke out in Connaught between Hugh and Torlogh, sons of Roderick O'Conor, after the death of the aforementioned Hugh, for the younger brother would not yield submission to the elder; so that the entire of Connaught lying between Ballysadare and the river of Hy Fiaehra, southward, except a small part of Slieve Lughra, and the territory of Airtagh,¹ was laid waste by them.

Niall, son of Congalach O'Rourke, lord of Dartry,² and of Clan Fermaighe, was slain by Art and Awlave, sons of Art, son of Donal O'Rourke. Awlave Gearr (the Short), son of Niall, son of Congalach, was also slain, while bathing, by Awlave, son of Art.

Fergal, son of Sitric O'Rourke, was slain by the sons of Niall, son of Congalach O'Rourke.

3. Athliag. This place was afterwards called Lanesborough; it is partly in Longford and partly in Roscommon.

1. Airtagh, a district belonging to Mac Dermott, in the barony of Boyle, county of Roscommon.

2. Dartraigh, or Dartry, was an extensive territory in the barony of Rosslogher, county of Leitrim, of which the Mac Murtoogh, son of Flaherty O'Flanagan, was slain by the sons of Teige O'Gara.

Hugh, son of Donogh O'Ferrall, was slain by Hugh, son of Awlave O'Ferrall.

David O'Flynn, chief of Siol Maoilruain, and Roderick O'Mullbrenan, died.

Rickard Mac William Burke was sent to Ireland by the king of England, as lord justice.

Hugh, son of Roderick O'Conor, was made king of Connaught, through the support of the lord justice and the chiefs of Connaught, thus usurping the rights of Torlogh, his elder brother.

Malachy, son of Torlogh, son of Roderick O'Conor, was slain by Hugh O'Conor, king of Connaught.

Excessive dearth prevailed in Connaught in consequence of the war between the sons of Roderick O'Conor. Both the churches and the country were plundered; the clergy and learned men were exiled into foreign lands; and many persons perished of cold and famine.

A. D. 1229.

The monastery of St. Francis, in Cork, was founded by Dermot Mac Carthy More.

Muireagh O'Gormley, prior of Inis Mac Nerin,¹ the most distinguished man in Connaught for wisdom and piety, died.

Dermot O'Fiaigh, abbot of the church of Giolla Molaisi O'Giollarain, from Tuam, died, and was interred at Ardcarne.

Dermot Mac Giolla Carraigh, aireincach of the house of St. Baoithin, a dignified priest, died, and was buried in the monastery of the Holy Trinity; his body having been taken, as by right, by the canons of that place, from the monks of the monastery of Boyle, after it had remained three nights unburied, as the monks had endeavoured to retain it in their own monastery.

Girard O'Kane, one of the most eminent of the order of canons for wisdom, died.

Claneys were chiefs. Clanfermaighe was another district in Leitrim. See note on Brefney.

1. Inis-Mac-Nerin, or "Inchmacnerin, an island in Lough Key. St. Colum founded a noble monastery at Easmacneire, probably the same with Inchmacnerin, over which he placed St. Mochonna, his disciple."—See Weld's Survey of the County of Roscommon.

Duvesa, daughter of Roderick, and wife of Cathal Mac Dermott, died a Benedictine nun.

Dermod Mac Carthy, lord of Desmond, died.

Dionysius O'Moore, bishop of Siol Muiredhaidh, (Elphin), resigned his see in honour of God.

Loughlin O'Monaghan was slain by his uncle.

A.D. 1230.

Florent O'Carolan, bishop of Tyrone (Derry), a select and dignified sage, died in the eighty-sixth year of his age.

In this year died Giolla Iosa O'Clery, bishop of Lieney (Achonry); Joseph Mac Tecedain (or Mac Teigan), bishop of Conmaicne (Ardagh); Magrath Mac Geoffrey, bishop of Conmaicne; Rool (Ralph) Petit, bishop of Meath, a select ruler, and soldier of Christ; Giolla Covdea O'Duilennain, the coarb and abbot of the church of Canons at Eass-dara (Ballysadare); Maolmuire O'Malone, coarb of St. Kieran, of Clonmacnois; Giolla Cartaigh O'Heilgusian, a canon and anchorite; and Dunslevey O'Hionmainen, a pious monk and chief Master of Arts in the monastery of Boyle.

Malachy Mac Firedin, a dignified priest and learned lecturer, died a novice monk in the monastery of Boyle.

O'Donnell (Donal More), marched with his forces into Connaught against Hugh, son of Roderick O'Connor, whom he attacked, and plundered Moy Aoi, with many parts of the country, but he did not reduce the sons of Roderick to submission.

Mac William Burke marched with his forces into Connaught, and plundered a large portion of that country; he slew Donnog Mac Oireaghty, Echtigern, the son of the Brehon O'Mionacain, and several others; he also, along with the English, banished Hugh, son of Roderick, king of Connaught, for having opposed them, and O'Connor being forced to fly to Hugh O'Neill, Felim, son of Cathal Crovdearg, was appointed king by Mac William Burke.

Hugh O'Neill, lord of Tir Eogain,¹ heir

A.D. 1230.

1. Tir Eogain and Tir Conaill. These ancient and extensive territories comprised the present counties of Tyrone, Derry, and Donegal; and a full account of them will be necessary, as they are constantly mentioned throughout these Annals, as connected with very important events.

1. Tir Eogain. This territory comprised the present counties of Tyrone and Derry, with a large portion of Donegal, between Lough Foyle and Lough Swilly, namely, the peninsula of Inisowen, and the greater part of the barony of Raphoe. It is connected with some of the earliest events in Irish history. We find, for instance, in Keating and O'Flaherty, that in the reign of Tigcarnmas, who was monarch of Ireland about nine centuries before the Christian era, the lake now called Lough Foyle suddenly burst forth and overflowed the adjoining plain, which was called Magh Fuinsidhe. This lake, mentioned in the Annals of the Four Masters, and in O'Flaherty, as Loch Feabhail Mic Lodain, that is, the Lake of Feval, son of Lodan, obtained its name from Feval, son of Lodan, one of the Tuath-De-Danan chiefs, who was drowned in its waves. In this territory, on a high hill or mountain, called Grianan, on the eastern shore of Lough Swilly, south of Inch Island, was situated the celebrated fortress called the Grianan of Aileach, from Grianan, a palace or royal residence, and Aileach or Oileach, which signifies a stone fortress. It was also called Aileach Neid, having derived its name, according to O'Flaherty, from Neid, one of the Tuath-De-Danan princes (see Ogygia, v. II. p. 28). This fortress was for many ages the seat of the ancient kings of Ulster. It was built in a circular form of great stones without cement, and was of immense strength, in that style denominated Cyclopean architecture, and some of its extensive ruins remain to this day. This fortress, according to the Annals of the Four Masters, was taken and plundered, A.D. 937, by the Danes, on which occasion they took prisoner Muirheartach O'Neill, then the celebrated prince of Aileach, who, however, was soon afterwards released. A.D. 1101, Murtoth O'Brien, king of Munster, with a powerful force, invaded Ulster, marched to Easroe (Ballyshannon), proceeded to Inisowen, and took the fortress of Aileach, which he totally demolished, in revenge of the destruction of the palace of Kincora, the royal seat of the kings of Munster in Clare, by Donal Mac Loughlin, king of Ulster, A.D. 1088. This palace of Aileach is supposed to have been the Regia of Ptolemy, the celebrated Greek geographer, in the second century, and the river marked Argita on his Map of Ireland, is considered to have been the Finn, which is the chief branch of the Foyle river. The territory surrounding the fortress of Aileach, obtained the name of Moy Aileach, or the Plain of Elagh.

Tir Eogain obtained its name from Eogan, or Owen, one of the sons of Niall of the Nine Hostages, monarch of Ireland, who conquered this territory in the beginning of the fifth century, and hence its name, Tir Eogain, or the country of Owen, afterwards anglicised into Tiroen, or Tyrone. In consequence of the conquest of this country by Eogan, when it was taken from the old possessors of the race of Ir, or Clanna Rory, its sovereignty was transferred to the race of Heremon. From the circumstance of its being possessed by the descendants of Eogan, called Cinel Eogain, or Kinel Owen, the territory also obtained the name of Kinel Owen. According to the Books of Leacan and Ballymote, and other authorities, this territory was divided between the ten sons of Eogan, whose descendants gave names to the various districts. In the note on the kingdom of Meath, it has been stated that the Hy Nialls, or the descendants of the monarch Niall of the Hostages, were divided into two great branches, namely, the Southern and Northern. The southern Hy Nialls, as already explained, were kings of Meath, and many of them monarchs of Ireland. The northern Hy Nialls, of which there were two great branches, namely, the race of Eogan, who were princes of Tyrone, and the race of Conall, who were princes of Tirconnell, also furnished many monarchs of Ireland; but the descendants of Eogan were the most celebrated of all the Milesian clans; and of them, a great many were kings of Ulster, and, according to O'Flaherty, sixteen were also monarchs of Ireland. The race of Eogan took the name of O'Neill in the tenth century, from Niall Glundubh, monarch of Ireland, who was killed in a great battle with the Danes, near Dublin, A.D. 919. A branch of the O'Neills took the name of O'Loughlin, from Mac Loughlin, from Loughlin, one of their ancient chiefs. In the Annals, during the eleventh and twelfth centuries, several princes and kings of Ulster of the Mac Loughlins are mentioned; and some of them were also monarchs of Ireland; presumptive to the throne of Ireland, the defender of Leath Cuinn (or the northern half of Ireland), against the English and the people of Leath Mogha Nuadhat (or the southern half of Ireland), a man who had given neither hostages nor tributes to either English or Irish, who had gained many victories over the English, and defeated them with great slaughter, and who had but the O'Neills afterwards recovered their supremacy, and made a distinguished figure in Irish history, down to the seventeenth century, as princes of Tyrone, and kings of Ulster. The O'Neills had their chief seat at Dungannon, and were inaugurated as princes of Tyrone, at Tullaghoge, a place between Grange and Donagherry, in the parish of Desertereight, in the barony of Dungannon, where a rude seat of large stones served them as a coronation chair. This, however, was broken by order of the lord deputy Mountjoy, in the reign of Elizabeth.

The chiefs and clans of Tir Eogain, and the territories possessed by each in the twelfth century, are collected from O'Dugan as follows:—O'Dugan commences with the territory of Aileach of the Kings, of which he gives—I. O'Neill and Mac Loughlin as princes or kings. II. O'Cathain, or O'Kane, who was of the race of Eogan, or a branch of the O'Neills, and who was the chief of Cianacht of Gleanna Geibhin, or Keenaght of Glengiven. The O'Kanes were also chiefs of the Creeve, now the barony of Colerain, and in after times this powerful clan possessed the greater part of the county of Derry, which was called O'Kane's country; they also possessed, at an early period, part of Antrim, and had their seat at the castle of Dunseverick, as already stated in the note on Duliada. III. O'Conchobhair or the O'Conors, who were chiefs of Cianachta before the O'Kanes, and were descendants of Cian, son of Oilíoll Olum, king of Munster: hence their territory obtained the name of Cianachta, a name still preserved in the barony of Keenaght, county of Derry. IV. O'Duibhdiorna or O'Dooyiorna, sometimes anglicised O'Dermott or Mac Dermott, but a distinct clan from Mac Dermott, prince of Moylurg in Connaught. The O'Dooyiornas are represented by O'Dugan as one of the noblest clans of the Kinel Owen; they were chiefs of Breadach, a territory which lay along the western banks of Lough Foyle, and comprised the parishes of Upper and Lower Moville, in the barony of Inisowen. The name of this district is still preserved in the small river Bredag, which falls into Lough Foyle. V. O'Gairmledhaidh, or O'Gormley, chief of Kinel Moain, or Moen, now the barony of Raphoe, county of Donegal. This district derived its name from Moain, one of the descendants of Eogan. VI. Moy Itha, or Moy Ith, and Kinel Enda, two districts adjoining Kinel Moain, partly in the barony of Raphoe, and partly in the barony of Tirkeeran in Derry. O'Flaherty places Moy Ith in Cianachta, the ancient name of a large territory in this part of Derry. According to O'Dugan, the following were the chiefs of Moy Ith, namely, O'Baoighill, or O'Boyle; O'Maol-breasaill; O'Cuinn, or O'Quinn; and O'Cionaotha, or O'Kenny. VII. O'Bruadair, or O'Brody; O'Maolfabhail; and O'Ho-gain, chiefs of Carruic Braehluighe, still traceable by the name Carriebraek, in the barony of Inisowen. VIII. O'Ilagain, or O'Ilagan, chief of Tulachog, or Tullaghoge, in the parish of Desertereight, barony of Dungannon, county of Tyrone. IX. O'Dunagain, or O'Donegan; Mac Murchadh, or Mac Murrough; O'Fergail, O'Ferrall, or O'Freel; and Mac Ruaidhri, or Rogers, chiefs of Tealach Ainbith, and of Muintir Birn, districts in the baronies of Dungannon and Strabane. X. O'Ceallaidh, or O'Kelly, chief of Kinel Eachaidh, or Corea Eachaidh, probably Corkaghee, barony of Dungannon. XI. O'Tighearnaigh, or O'Tierney; and O'Ciarain, or O'Kieran, chiefs of Fearnmuigh. XII. O'Duibhduanaidh; O'Ilighmaill, or Hamill; and O'Heiteigin, or O'Etigan, chiefs of three districts called Teallach Cathalain, Teallach Duibhraiibe, and Teallach Braecain. XIII. O'Maolfhothartaigh, and O'Heodhasa, or O'Heosey, chiefs of Kinel Tighearnaigh. XIV. O'Cuanaich, or O'Cooney; and O'Boathgalaigh, chief of Clan Fergus. XV. O'Murchadha, or O'Murrough, and O'Meallain, chiefs of Siol Aodha-Eanaigh. XVI. Mac Fiachraigh, chief of Kinel Feradaigh, in the south of Tyrone. XVII. O'Ilairmin, O'Maolfabhail, and the Clan Cathmaoil, chiefs of Kinel Firdhaidh, in the north of Tyrone. In the Annals of the Four Masters, A.D. 1185, mention is made of Gillcreest Mac Cathmaoil, head chieftain of the Kinel Firdaigh, and of the Clan Aongusa, Clan Dubhinreachtaidh, and Clan Fogortaigh, and chief of the councils of the North of Ireland. This name was sometimes changed to Mac Campbell, and Mac Caghwel, and also to Caulfield. The Cathmaoils were a powerful clan in Tyrone, and many of them in Monaghan, Louth, and Armagh. XVIII. The clans of Maolgeimridh, and of Maolpadraig, who possessed the two districts of Kinel Firdhaidh, in the east of Tyrone. XIX. Muintir Taithligh, of Ily Laoghair, of Lough Lir, a name anglicised to Mac Tully. XX. O'Haimbitir, chief of Ily Seaain.

The following chiefs and clans, not given in O'Dugan, are collected from various other sources: I. O'Criochain, chief of Hy Fiachra, a territory which comprised the parish of Ardstraw, and some adjoining districts in Tyrone, and is mentioned in the Annals at A.D. 1200. II. O'Quinn, chief of Moy Lugad, and of Siol Cathusaigh, as given in the Annals at A.D. 1218. Moy Lugad, according to the Books of Leacan and Ballynote, lay in Keenaght of Glengiven, county of Derry. III. The O'Ceabhallains, O'Cairellains, or O'Carolans, a name sometimes anglicised to Carleton: they are frequently mentioned in the Annals as chiefs of Clan Diarmada, now the parish of Clandermot, or Glendermot, in Derry. IV. The O'Brolchains, or O'Brolchans, a name sometimes changed to Bradly. These were a numerous clan near Derry, but originally of the Kinel Firdaigh, in the south of Tyrone, and were a branch of the Kinel Owen. V. Mac Blosgaidh, or the Mac Closkeys, a numerous clan in the parish of Dungen, and some adjoining parts: they were a branch of the O'Kanes. VI. The O'Devlins, chiefs of Muintir Devlin, near Lough Neagh, on the borders of Derry and Tyrone. VII. The O'Looneys, chiefs of Muintir Loney, a district known as the Monter Loney Mountains in Tyrone. VIII. O'Connellan, chief of Crioeh Tullaeh, in Tyrone, a name which has been by some changed to Conolly. IX. O'Donghaile, or O'Donnellys, chiefs in Tyrone, at Ballydonnelly, and other parts. X. O'Nena, or O'Nenys, or Mac Nenys, a name which has been anglicised to Bird. These were chiefs of note, and possessed the territory of Kinel Naena, in Tyrone, bordering on Monaghan. Of this family was Count O'Neny, of Brussels, in the Austrian service, under the Empress Maria Theresa. XI. O'Flaherty, mentioned in the Annals at A.D. 1187, as lord of Kinel Owen. These O'Flahertys, who settled in Tyrone, appear to have been a branch of the great family of the O'Flahertys of Connaught. XII. The O'Murrys, given in O'Connor's Map of Ortelius, as a clan in Derry. XIII. The Mac Shanes, a name anglicised to Johnson, who were a clan in Tyrone. XIV. The O'Mulligans, anglicised to Molineux, who were also a clan in Tyrone. XV. The O'Gneevs, hereditary bards to the O'Neills. This name has been anglicised to Agnew.

The O'Neills, as already stated, maintained their independence down to the end of the sixteenth century, as princes of Tyrone; and in the reigns of Henry VIII. and Elizabeth, bore the titles of earls of Tyrone, and barons of Dungaunon. The last celebrated chiefs of the name were Hugh O'Neill, the great earl of Tyrone, famous as the commander of the northern Irish in their wars with Elizabeth; and Owen Roe O'Neill, the general of the Irish of Ulster, in 1641, and the Cromwellian wars. Several of the O'Neills have been distinguished in the military service of Spain, France, and Austria. In consequence of the adherence of the Ulster chiefs to Hugh O'Neill, in the wars with Elizabeth, six counties in Ulster were confiscated, namely, Tyrone, Derry, Donegal, Fermanagh, Cavan, and Armagh, in the reign of James I. In the survey of Ulster, by Captain Pymmar, A.D. 1619, as in Harris's Hibernica, the following English and Scotch families are given as the settlers in Tyrone, in accordance with the project of locating British colonies, called the Plantation of Ulster. The earl of Abercorn; sir George Hamilton; sir Claude Hamilton; sir Robert Newcomen; sir John Drummond; the earl of Castlehaven; sir William Stewart; sir John Davis; the lord Ridgeway; George Ridgeway; sir Gerrard Lowther; the lord Burley; sir levied tributes both on English and Irish enemies, and contemplated the conquest of all Ireland, died, though it was rather expected that he would have fallen in battle with the English.

Francis Willoughby; sir William Cope; John Leigh; William Parsons; sir Robert Heyborne; Stewart, lord of Uchiltree; Captain Saunderson; Robert Lindsey; Alexander Richardson; Andrew Stewart; David Kennedy; the lord Chichester; sir Toby Caulfield; sir Francis Roe; William Parsons; sir Francis Annesley, and the lord Wingfield.

The following noble families in Tyrone are given from the reign of James I. to the present time. The Le Poers were earls of Tyrone, a title which afterwards passed, by intermarriage, to the Beresfords. The Blounts, viscounts Mountjoy, a title which afterwards passed to the families of Stewart and Gardiner. The Trevors, viscounts Dungannon; the Stewarts, viscounts Castlestewart; the Knoxes, earls of Ranfurley; and the Alexanders, barons of Caledon.

Derry. In the reign of Elizabeth, the lord deputy, sir John Perrott, formed O'Kane's country into a county, which was called from its chief town the county of Colerain; and in the reign of James I., on the plantation of Ulster with British colonies, a company of undertakers, consisting of merchants and traders from London, got grants of the county of Colerain and town of Derry, hence the city and county got the name of Londonderry.

The following noble families derive their titles from this county. The family of Pitt, formerly marquesses of Londonderry, a title now possessed by the Stewarts. The Hamiltons, earls of Abercorn, and barons of Strabane. The families of Hare and Hanger, barons of Colerain.

Ecclesiastical divisions. The following account of the bishops' sees in Tir Eogain, have been collected from Ware, Colgan, Lanigan, and other sources. Clogher, the seat of the diocese of Clogher, is at Clogher, in the county of Tyrone, part of which county it contains. This see was founded by St. Macartin, in the fifth century, and an account of it has been given in the note on Orgiall.

Ardsratha on the river Derg, now the parish of Ardstraw, in Tyrone, was an ancient bishops' see founded by St. Eugene in the sixth century. Ardsrath afterwards got the name of Rathlurig, or Rathlure, from St. Lurec or Lurae, to whom its church was dedicated. The see of Ardsrath or Rathlure, at an early period, was transferred to Maghera, in the county of Derry, and afterwards annexed to Derry in the twelfth century. The bishops of these sees were styled bishops of Tir Eogain or Tyrone, or bishops of Cinel Eogain.

See of Derry: A monastery was founded in the sixth century, by St. Columkille, at a place called Doire Calgach, that is the Oak Wood of Calgach, which St. Adamnanus, abbot of Iona, in the seventh century, in his Life of St. Columkille, translates Roboretum Calgach. It was also called Doire Coluim Cille, or the Oak Wood of St. Columkille, anglicised to Derry Columkille, and gave its name to the city and county of Derry. In these Annals the church of the monastery is called Dubh Reglais, signifying the Black Church, and latinised by Ware, Cella nigra. This abbey was long famous as a seat of learning and religion, and its abbots were also styled bishops. In the twelfth century a regular bishop's see was formed at Derry, to which was afterwards annexed the see of Ardsrath, or Rathlure. A.D. 1164, Maurice Mac Loughlin, king of Ireland, erected a cathedral at Derry, which, together with the abbey and other ecclesiastical establishments, was destroyed by the English, under sir Henry Docwra, in the reign of Elizabeth. The diocese of Derry comprehends the greater part of the county of Londonderry, with nearly half of Tyrone, and a large portion of Donegal, and a very small portion of Antrim.

St. Columkille, so often mentioned in the course of these Annals, was a native of Tir Connell, and born at Gartan, in the barony of Kilmacrenan, county of Donegal, A.D. 521. He was a descendant of Connall Gulban, son of Niall of the Hostages, monarch of Ireland, and consequently of the same race as the O'Donnells, princes of Tirconnell. The name in Irish is Colum, and signifies a dove, latinised to Columba, but he was generally called by the Irish Colum Cille, or Columkille, that is Colum of the Churches, from the many churches and monasteries he had founded, both in Ireland and in North Britain. In the year 563, he proceeded to that part of North Britain called Albany, afterwards Scotland, as a missionary, and converted the inhabitants to Christianity, hence he has been styled the Apostle of the Picts. Having received the patronage and support of his relative Connall, then king of the Albanian Scots, he founded a monastery on an island in the Hebrides, called after him Hy Columkille, afterwards Iona, which was long famous as a seat of learning and religion. St. Columkille died on the 9th of June, A.D. 597, in the seventy-sixth year of his age, and was buried at Iona, but his remains were a long time after removed to Ireland, and interred at Downpatrick. His memory has been always held in the highest veneration as one of the tutelar saints of Ireland. In the year 590, St. Columkille, accompanied by Aidan, king of the Albanian Scots, came to Ireland to attend the great national convention held at Dromceat, in Cianachta, near Glengiven, in Derry, which was attended by the provincial kings, princes, chiefs, bishops, and clergy, to arrange a great contention that arose between Hugh, son of Aimmireach, then monarch of Ireland, and the bards, whose order the king had resolved to suppress, but Columkille opposed their abolition, and advocated their continuance under proper regulations, as a useful national institution, and through his influence the bards were continued, and all differences amicably arranged.

Art, son of Art O'Rourke, was slain by Rannall O'Finn.

Malachy O'Monaghan was killed by his kinsmen.

II. Tir Connall. This territory comprised the remaining portion of the county of Donegal not contained in Tir Eogain, the boundary between both being Lough Swilly; but in the twelfth century the O'Maoldorrys and O'Donnells, princes of Tir Connell, became masters of the entire of Donegal, thus making Lough Foyle and the rivers Foyle and Finn the boundaries between Tir Connell and Tir Eogain. This territory got its name from Connall Gulban, who took possession of it in the beginning of the fifth century. He was brother to Eogan, who conquered Tir Eogain, and son of the monarch Niall of the Hostages, and from him the territory obtained the name of Tir Connall, or the country of Connell, and his posterity were designated Kinel Connall, or the race of Connell, a name which was also applied to the territory.

Some of the earliest events in Irish history are connected with this territory, amongst which the following may be noticed:—Inis Saimer is stated, by the ancient Annalists, as a residence of Partholan, who planted the first colony in Ireland. This is the small island near the cataract, called the Salmon-leap, at Ballyshannon. It got the name Inis Saimer, or the Island of Saimer, from the circumstance of Partholan having there killed Saimer, the favourite greyhound of his queen. This island gave the name Saimer to the river now called the Erne, and to Lough Erne, which in ancient times was called Lough Saimer. The waterfall at Ballyshannon is connected with another early event, namely, the death of Aodh Ruadh, king of Ireland, who was drowned there about five centuries before the Christian era, hence it was called Eas-Aodha-Ruaidh, that is, the cataract of Red Hugh, and hence Eas-roe, or Ashroe, was the ancient name of Ballyshannon. The Fomorians, of whom an account has been given in the note on Dalriada, formed settlements on the coast of Donegal, and, under one of their commanders, named Conning, erected a fortress on an island which was called Tor Conuing, or the Tower of Conuing, and hence the island got the name of Tor Inis, or Tower-Island, in modern times Tory Island. The places along the coast of Donegal and Brefney, or Leitrim, are stated as the scenes of many great battles between the Fomorians and the colony called Nemedians. The plain between the rivers Erne and Drogha, that is, between Ballyshannon and Bundrowes, was called Magh Ceitne, which, as Keating states, derived this name from the frequent payment of

A.D. 1231.

Dionysius O'Moore, bishop of Elphin, having ended his days on Trinity Island, in Lough Key, tributes there, the Fomorians having compelled the Nemedians to deliver up at that place cattle, corn, and even some of their children, as a tribute.

The race of Conall Gulban, who possessed Tir Connell, are celebrated in Irish history, and, according to O'Flaherty and others, furnished ten of the monarchs of Ireland. In the tenth century a branch of the Kinel Connell, or descendants of Conall Gulban, took the name of O'Canannain, many of whom were celebrated chiefs, particularly Roderick O'Canannain, who was distinguished for his great valour and abilities. Charles O'Connor, in his Dissertations on the History of Ireland, states that he was heir presumptive to the crown, and got himself chosen king by military election, and expelled for a time the monarch Congalach from the throne. In A.D. 948, the Danes of Dublin and other parts of Ireland, having collected a powerful army, under Godfred, the son of Sitric, Ivar, and other leaders, marched into Meath. Roderick O'Canannain, at the head of the Irish forces, marched to oppose their progress, and in a great battle fought on the festival of St. Andrew the Apostle (30th of November), at Muine Brocain, the Danes were totally defeated, seven thousand of them being slain, amongst whom was Ivar, one of their generals, but O'Canannain himself, towards the close of the battle, was killed in the thick of the fight. Godfred, the son of Sitric, with the survivors, fled to Dublin. The place where this battle was fought, mentioned as Muine Brocain, is supposed to have been Ardbraccan. Another branch of the race of Conall Gulban took the name O'Maoldoraidh, or O'Muldorrey, and became princes of Tir Connell. In the Annals of the Four Masters in the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth centuries, accounts are given of many contests between the O'Canannains and O'Maoldoraidhs, those rival chiefs of the same race, as contending for the sovereignty of Tir Connell.

The O'Donnells, in the twelfth century, became princes of Tir Connell, and were of the same race as the O'Canannains and O'Muldorreys, being descendants of Conall Gulban. The tribe-name, at an early period, was Clan Dalaidh, from Dalach, one of their chiefs. They are called in O'Dugan's poem, "Clanna Dalaigh na n-donn sgiath," that is, of the brown shields. They afterwards took the name O'Domhnaill, or O'Donnell, from Domhnall, or Donal, one of their ancient chiefs. The O'Donnells, from the twelfth to the end of the sixteenth century, make a very distinguished figure in Irish history, as princes of Tirconnell. The last celebrated chief of the name was Red Hugh O'Donnell, long famous as one of the chief commanders of the northern Irish in their wars with Elizabeth, of whose actions copious accounts are given in the course of these Annals. An interesting Life of Red Hugh O'Donnell is given in that learned work, The Antiquarian Researches, by Sir William Betham. Rory O'Donnell, the last chief of the race, was created earl of Tyrconnell, but died in exile on the Continent, and his estates were confiscated in the reign of James I. Many of the O'Donnells have been celebrated generals in the service of Spain, France, and Austria. The O'Donnells were inaugurated as princes of Tirconnell on the Rock of Doonee, at Kilmaerenan, and had their chief castle at Donegal.

The following clans and chiefs in Tir Connell in the twelfth century, are given by O'Dugan under the head of Kinel Connall: I. O'Maoldoraidh, O'Canannain, and Clann Dalaigh, were the principal chiefs. The Clann Dalaigh was the tribe name of the O'Donnells, as before stated. II. O'Boaighill or O'Boyles, were chiefs of Clann Chindfaoladh, of Tir Ainnireach, and of Tir Boghaine, which territories comprised the present baronies of Boyleagh and Bannagh, Criche Baoghilleach, or the country of the O'Boyles, as mentioned in the Annals, gave name to the barony of Boyleagh, Tir Boghaine was the barony of Banagh. III. O'Maolmagna, probably O'Mulvany, chief of Magh Seireadh; Magh Seireadh may probably be traced in a townland called Massarey, mentioned in the Inquisitions on Donegal. IV. O'Haodha or O'Hugh, chief of Easruadh, that is Ballyshannon, in the barony of on the 15th December, was succeeded by Donogh O'Connor.

Flann O'Connaehty, bishop of Hy Briuin Brefney (Kilmore), died.

Tir Hugh. V. O'Tairecirt, chief of Clann Neachtain, and in the Annals (A.D. 1197 and 1212), of Clann Suedgaile. VI. Mac Dubhain or Mac Duvany, chiefs of Kinel Nenna or Kinel Enda. This district, according to O'Flaherty, lay in Inisowen. VII. Mac Loingseachain or Mac Lynchys, chiefs of Gleann Binne, or Gleann m-Binne, and O'Breislen, chief of Fanaid, on the western shore of Lough Swilly. VIII. O'Dochartaigh or O'Dogherty, chief of Ard Miodhair. The O'Doghertys were a powerful sept, a branch of the O'Donnells, and became chiefs of Inisowen; and in the Annals, A.D. 1197, Eachnareach O'Dogherty is mentioned as chief of all Tirconnell. The O'Doghertys maintained their rank as chiefs of Inisowen down to the reign of James I., when sir Cahir O'Dogherty was killed in a contest with the English. IX. Mac Gillesamhais, chief of Ros Guill, now Rosgull, in the barony of Kilmakrean. X. O'Ceanaehain, or O'Kernaghan; and O'Dalachain, or O'Dullaghan, chiefs of the Tuath Bladhaidh. XI. O'Maolagain or O'Mulligan, chief of Tir Mac Caerthain. XII. O'Donnagain, and Mac Gaiblin, chiefs of Tir Breasail. O'Maolgaoithe, chief of Muintir Maoligaoithe. Some of this name have been anglicised to Mac Ghee, and others to Wynn. XIII. And Mae Tighearnain or Mae Terman, chief of Clan Fearghoile.

The following chiefs and clans not given in O'Dugan, are collected from the Four Masters, and various other sources. I. Mac Suibhne or the Mac Sweenys, a branch of the O'Neills which settled in Donegal, and formed three great families, namely, Mac Sweeney of Fanaid, who had an extensive territory west of Lough Swilly, and whose castle was at Rathmullin; Mac Sweeny Boghainach, or of Tir Boghaine, now the barony of Banagh, who had his castle at Rathain, and in which territory was situated Reachrain Muintire Birn, now Rathlin O'Beirne Islands; and Mac Sweeny Na d-Tuath, signifying Mac Sweeny of the Territories. His districts were also called Tuatha Toraighe, or the districts of Tory Island. This Mac Sweeny's possessions lay in the barony of Kilmakrean. According to O'Brien and others, he was called Mac Sweeny Na d-Tuagh, signifying Mac Sweeny of the Battle-axes, a title said to be derived from their being standard bearers and marshals to the O'Donnells, and chiefs of Galloglasses. A branch of these Mac Sweenys who were distinguished military leaders, settled in Munster in the county Cork, in the thirteenth century, and became commanders under the Mac Carthys, princes of Desmond. II. O'Galehbhair or O'Gallaghers, derived from Gallehbhair, a warrior, were a clan of note in Donegal, in the baronies of Raphoe and Tirlugh, and had a castle at Ballyshannon, and also possessed the castle of Lifford, and were commanders of O'Donnell's cavalry. Sir John O'Gallagher is mentioned in the wars of Elizabeth. III. O'Furanain is given by O'Dugan in his poem as chief of Fiond Ruis, which probably was the Rosses, in the barony of Boyleagh. IV. O'Donggaile or O'Donnelly, chief of Fear Droma, a district in Inisowen, is mentioned in the Annals A.D. 1177. Ferdrom is mentioned in the Inquisitions on Donegal. V. O'Lainidh is mentioned as chief of Kinel Moain, a district in the barony of Raphoe, in the Annals at A.D. 1178. O'Clerigh or O'Clerys, celebrated as the hereditary historians to the O'Donnells, and the learned authors of the Annals of the Four Masters, and many other valuable works on Irish history and antiquities. They had large possessions in the barony of Tirlugh, and resided in their castle at Kilbarron, the ruins of which still remain situated on a rock on the shore of the Atlantic near Ballyshannon. VII. Mae Anbhaird, or the Mac Wards, were a clan in Donegal, and many of them bards to the O'Donnells, and were very learned men.

Tir Connell was formed into the county Donegal by the lord deputy, sir John Perrott, in the reign of Elizabeth, and on its confiscation, and the settlement of British colonies called the Plantation of Ulster, in the reign of James I., the following families of English and Scotch settlers are given as the possessors of this county, in Pymar's Survey, A.D. 1619. John Murray got all Boyleagh and Banagh, being ten thousand acres. The following had various districts:—

Stephen O'Brien, airineach of Mayo, died.

Celechair O'Dobhailen (or O'Devlin), airineach of Camma,¹ a man eminent for charity, piety, and learning, died.

Fethfoilage, daughter of Conor Mac Dermott, and wife of Murtoth Muimnagh, son of Torlooh More, who was the mother of Manus, son of Murtoth, of Conor, of Roderick, of Tuathal, and of Torlooh the priest, prior of the church of SS. Peter and Paul, died.

Duvchovlagh, daughter of Conor Mac Dermott, died in the monastery of Boyle.

Flaherty O'Flanagan, chief of Clan Cathail,² son of Muireadhach Muilleathan, died on his pilgrimage, in the monastery of Boyle, and his wife Duvhemragh, daughter of O'Quinn, also died.

Ualgarg O'Rourke, lord of Brefney, died on his pilgrimage to the river (Jordan).

Giolla-Iosa Mac Samhradhain, chief of Teallach Eachdach,³ and Duinnin O'Mulconary, chief poet and historian of Siol Murray (Roscommon), died.

Conor Gott O'Hara, lord of Lieney, died.

Donall O'Donnell, lord of Tirconnell, and Angus Mac Gillefinen, of Fermanagh, marched their forces into the territory of Cathal O'Reilly; conveyed their vessels to Lough Uachtair,⁴ plundered Eo Inis, and carried away all the provisions and treasure of the entire town.

Felim, son of Cathal Croidcarg, was made prisoner by Mac William Burke, at Meelick, in violation of the faith of the English nobles of Ireland.

A.D. 1232.

Fachtna O'Hallgaith, coarb of Drom Mochuda,¹ and official of Hy Fiachra, a man who kept a house of hospitality for the entertainment of the learned, and for the relief of the sick and indigent, died.

The church of Kilmore, in Tir Briuin of the Shannon, was consecrated by Donogh O'Conor, bishop of Elphin, and canons were appointed there by Conn O'Flanagan, prior of that place.

Tiopraid O'Brien, the coarb of St. Comman,² a man learned in divinity, history, and laws, died at Inis Clothran, while on a pilgrimage there.

Hugh, the son of Awlave, son of Donal O'Ferrall, chief of Anally, was burned on the island of Lough Cuille, by the sons of Hugh Ciabhach, son of Murogh O'Ferrall, having been chief of Anally for nine years after Murogh Carragh O'Ferrall.

Manus, son of Awlave, son of Teige Mac Mulroony, a luminary of hospitality, generosity, and piety, died.

Donogh, the son of Tomaltach Mac Dermott, a man eminent for hospitality, and generosity to the distressed of Connaught, died of an epidemic.

Conor, son of Hugh, son of Roderick O'Conor, captain Thomas Dutton; Alexander Cunningham; John Cunningham; James Cunningham; Cuthbert Cunningham; sir James Cunningham; James Mac Cullagh; William Stewart; Laird of Dunduff; Alexander Mac Awley, alias Stewart; the Laird of Lusse; sir John Stewart; Peter Benson; William Wilson; Thomas Davis; captain Mansfield; sir John Kingsmill; sir Ralph Bingley; sir Thomas Coach; sir George Marburic; sir William Stewart; sir Basil Brooke; sir Thomas Chichester; sir John Vaughan; John Wray; Arthur Terrie; captain Henry Hart; captain Paul Gore; Nathaniel Rowley; William Lynn; and captain Sandford.

The following have been the noble families in Donegal since the reign of James I. The Fitzwilliams, earls of Tyrconnell. Richard Talbot, lord lieutenant of Ireland in the reign of James II., was created duke of Tyrconnell. The families of Brownlow and Carpenter have been subsequently earls of Tyrconnell. The Chichesters, earls of Donegal. The Conynghams, earls of Mountcharles. The Cockaynes, barons of Cullen. And the Hewitts, barons of Lifford.

Amongst the great landed proprietors resident in this county, may be mentioned, Lord George Hill, a nobleman justly estimated by Mrs. Hall, and other tourists, as one of the most excellent landlords in Ireland.

Diocese of Raphoe. The see of Raphoe was founded by St. Eunan, whom Lanigan considers to have been the same person as Adamnan, the celebrated abbot of Iona, in the seventh century, who was a native of Tyrconnell. The diocese comprehends the greater part of the county of Donegal. On the Island in Lough Derg, in the county of Donegal, is the celebrated place of pilgrimage, called St. Patrick's Purgatory.

A. D. 1231.

1. Camma or Camcha, a parish in the barony of Athlone, county of Roscommon.

2. Clan Cathail, a district in Roscommon near Elphin, and the tribe were so called from Cathal, son of Muireadhach Muilleathan, king of Connaught, who died A. D. 700.

3. Teallach Eachdach, now the barony of Tullaghaw, in the county of Cavan, of which the Mac Samhradhains were chiefs, a name that has been changed to Mae Gauran, and by some anglicised to Somers.

4. Loch Uachtair. This was Lough Oughter, a chain of large lakes lying between Cavan, Killeshandra and Belturbet in the county of Cavan, or as it was called O'Reilly's country. Eo Inis or the Holy Island, which was plundered, was probably Trinity Island in Lough Oughter, where there was an abbey founded by this Cathal O'Reilly, prince of East Brefney; or perhaps it may have been Urney, where there was an abbey and small town, near Lough Oughter.

A. D. 1232.

1. Dromamucadha, now the parish of Dromaeoo, in the barony of Dunkellin, county of Galway. This parish was in Hy Fiachra, a territory co-extensive with the diocese of Kilmacduagh.

2. Coarb of St. Comman, that is, abbot of Roscommon.

having escaped from the English, was joined by the sons of some chiefs of Connaught, with whom he marched into the Tuatha (in Rosecommon), to make seizures there, but was slain by the Tuatha, along with Gillkelly O'Heyne, Gillereest the son of Donogh Mac Dermott, and many others. On that day the people of Tuatha had all white handled battle-axes, from which arose the adage, "The man with the white axe slew the son of Hugh."

Hugh, the son of Roderick O'Conor, was again appointed king of Connaught, by Mac William Burke,³ and made peace with him after he had made Feilin, the son of Cathal Crovdearg, prisoner.

The castle of Bona Gaillmhe was erected by Riekard de Burgo, and the castle of Dun Iomgain⁴ was commenced by Adam Stanton.

Giolla-na-neev O'Daly, a man learned in poetry, and who kept a house of hospitality both for rich and poor, died.

Maoleoin, the Deaf, O'Mulconery, took Cluan Bolcain.

Feilim, the son of Cathal Crovdearg, was set at liberty by the English.

Conor, son of Niall O'Gormley, chief of Kinel Maoín, died.

Donal O'Loughlin, lord of Tyrone, marched with a force consisting of English and Irish into Tireonnell, on which expedition he plundered Fanat, and took hostages from Donal O'Boyle, and from O'Tairceirt.

O'Donnell marched his forces into Tyrone, and arrived at Tullaghoge, where he killed the cattle, burned the corn, plundered the country, and returned home in triumph.

Midbeach and Eaghinish⁵ were plundered by the Kinel Owen, to which place they took their shipping, but a party of the Kinel Connell, headed by the son of Niall O'Donnell, attacked and slew many of them, but was himself killed in the midst of the fight.

A. D. 1233.

Geoffrey O'Doighre, aireineach¹ of Derry Columkille, died.

Maolisa O'Maonaigh, a dignified priest and psalmnist, died.

Donagh, archdeacon of Achaigh Fobhair,² an arbiter who settled all disputes and contentions, a man of dignity and honour, died on the 15th day of December.

Feilim O'Conor, son of Cathal Crovdearg, led his forces into Connaught, and Cormac, the son of Tomaltagh Mac Dermott, lord of Moylurg, went to meet him, and brought him with him to Moylurg, where they constructed a camp at Druim Gregraghe, and were joined by Cormac, by Conor his son, and the people of the three Tuatha, and by the two sons of Murtogh Mac Dermott, Donogh and Murtogh. They then held a council, in which they resolved to go in pursuit of Hugh, king of Connaught, and the other sons of Roderick; they attacked and defeated Hugh, the son of Roderick, slew himself, Hugh Muimnagh his brother, his son, and Donogh More Mac Dermott, son of Roderick, with many others. There were also slain Raghallagh O'Flanagan, Thomas Biris, constable of Ireland, John his brother, and John Guer, with many other Englishmen. This was after they had been cursed and excommunicated by bell, crozier, and the extinguishing of candles, by the clergy of Connaught, for Hugh Muimnagh had violated and plundered Tibohine (in Rosecommon), and many other churches, so that he and his adherents fell in vengeance of the dishonour they had done to the saints by violating their churches. The kingdom and government of Connaught were that day wrested from the sons of Roderick, the son of Torlogh. Feilin, the son of Cathal Crovdearg, then assumed Iniselothran, an island in Lough Ree, on the Shannon, between Rosecommon and Longford, where there was a famous abbey.

3. Mac William Burke, so often mentioned at this period, was Richard de Burgo, son of William Fitzadelm de Burgo. He succeeded Geoffrey de Marisco as lord justice, and was also lord deputy of Ireland.

4. Caislean Dun Iomgain was the castle of Dunamon, near the river Suck, in Rosecommon. The other castle was at Galway.

5. Eaghinis and Midhbheach, now Agbinis and Mevagh, near Lough Swilly, barony of Kilmakrenan, county of Donegal.

A. D. 1233.

1. Aircineach, sometimes written Airchindech, as already explained, according to Lanigan, meant originally an archdeacon, and has been translated by Colgan, archidiaconus, hence in these Annals the word will in future be translated archdeacon.

2. Achad Fobhair, now the parish of Aughagower, in Mayo, where St. Patrick founded a church, and placed over it St. Senach.

the sovereignty of Connaught, and demolished the castles which had been erected by the sons of Roderick O'Connor and Mac William Burke, namely, the castle of Bona Gaillmhe, Caislen-na-Circe,³ Caislen-na-Caillighe, and the castle of Dun Iomgain.

William, the son of Hugo de Lacy (whose mother was daughter of king Roderick O'Connor), marched, with the English of Meath, into Brefney against Cathal O'Reilly, where they committed great depredations; but a party of O'Reilly's people overtook de Lacy and his chiefs, while conveying the plunder, and gave them battle, in which William Brit, and a number of the English nobles, were slain, and William de Lacy with many others were wounded; they were driven from the country without prisoners or plunder, and de Lacy, Charles, the son of Cathal Gall O'Connor, Feorus Fionn, the son of the English queen, and Dermot Bearnagh O'Melaghlin, died of the wounds they received in the battle of Mona-Crann-Chaoín,⁴ and Niall Sionagh O'Catharnaidh, lord of the men of Teffia, also died of the wounds he received in this battle, in his own house, after making his will and receiving extreme unction.

A. D. 1234.

Angus O'Maolfoghmayr, bishop of Hy Fiachra (Kilalla); Giolla-na-nceiv, son of Art O'Breen, archdeacon of Roscommon; Maolisa, son of Daniel O'Gormley, prior of Inis Mac Nérin; Maol Peter O'Cormacain, prior of Roscommon; and Giollisa O'Gibellan, monk and anchorite of Trinity Island (in Lough Key), died.

Donal, son of Hugh O'Neill, lord of Kinel Owen, and heir presumptive to the crown of Ireland, was slain by Mac Loughlin (i. e. Donal), and by the Kinel Owen themselves; and Donal assumed the lordship.

Aongus Mac Gillifinén, lord of Lough Erne, having revolted against O'Donnell, went to plunder Tirconnell; but O'Donnell, i. e. Donal More, attacked and slew him in revenge of the death of Eigneaghan (O'Donnell).

Hugh O'Hara, lord of Lieney, was slain by Donogh, son of Duarcán O'Hara, after he (Donogh) had burned his (Hugh's) house, out of which he (Hugh) escaped, in revenge of the death of his (Donogh's) brother and five nephews, who had been slain by Hugh, who also put out the eyes of another brother (of Donogh).

Dermot O'Quinn, chief of Muintir Giollgain,¹ was slain.

Rickard, son of William Mareschal, having rebelled against the king of England, came over to Ireland and settled in Leinster. The English of Ireland, who were in favour of the king of England, collected their forces to oppose him: these were Mac Maurice, the lord justice of Ireland, Hugo de Lacy, earl of Ulster, and Walter de Lacy, lord of Meath. Having marched to Cuir-each Lifi,² in Leinster, they attacked Mareschal and slew him, and took Geoffrey Mareschal prisoner, for Mareschal had none to fight the battle, having been betrayed by his own people.

A. D. 1235.

Isaac O'Maolfoghmayr, archdeacon of Kilalla, died.

Mattheus, prior of Trinity Island (on Lough Key), died.

Madden O'Madden, lord of Siol Anmchadha, died.

Loughlin, son of Echtigirn O'Kelly, was slain by the sons of the Giolla Riavach O'Boyle.

Taithleach, son of Hugh O'Dowd, lord of Tyravley and Tireragh, was slain by the cast of a dart, while interposing in a quarrel in the fortress of Feilim (O'Connor), son of Cathal Crovdearg.

A. D. 1234.

3. Caislean-na-Circe, or the Hen's castle, was situated on an island in Lough Corrib, county of Galway, and belonged to the O'Flahertys. The other castles at Dunamon and Galway have been already mentioned under A. D. 1232. Caislean-na-Caillighe, or the Hog's castle, was also in the neighbourhood of Lough Corrib.

4. Mona Crann Chaoín. The place where this battle was fought signifies the bog or marsh of the handsome trees, and was situated on the borders of Cavan and Meath. Feorus Fionn, or Feorus the Fair, here mentioned as son of the English queen, must have been the son of Isabella, widow of king John, who was married to the Count of La Marche in France.

1. Muintir Giollgain, a district in Anally, or Longford, of which the O'Quinns were chiefs. See notes on Anally and Teffia.

2. Cuireach Lifi was the ancient name of the Curragh of Kildare. Mareschal, above mentioned, was the celebrated Richard Mareschal, earl of Pembroke, who was treacherously killed on the Curragh of Kildare by the contrivance of Geoffrey de Marisco, and the other English barons. Mac Maurice, so often mentioned at this period, was Maurice Fitzgerald, lord justice of Ireland.

The English of Ireland, having collected their forces under Rickard Mac William Burke, and the following leaders, namely, Mac Muiris (Mac-Maurice), lord justice of Ireland, Hugo de Lacy, earl of Ulster, Walter Riddlesford, chief baron of Leinster, with the English of Leinster, and John Cogan, with the English of Munster, and the Routes (or lords of the Marches) of Ireland, proceeded across the Shannon at Athlone, to Roscommon, and burned the town; from thence they went to Elphin, where they burned the great church, and from thence to the monastery of Athda-la-arg at Boyle, on the night of Trinity Sunday. A party of their soldiers attacked the monastery, broke open the scripta (sacristy or sanctuary), and took therefrom the chalices, vestments, and other precious articles. The English nobles were much displeased at this act, and sent back every thing they could find, and paid for such as could not be recovered. On the following day they sent scouting parties to Creit, to Cairthe Muilchen, and to the tower of Glen Fearna,¹ from which they carried away great booty to the lord justice at Ardearne. The English then privately resolved, at the request of Owen O'Heyne (in order to be revenged of the people of Munster and Donogh Cairbreach O'Brien, for the wrongs he had sustained), to return back the same way through Tir Maine, Maonmoy, and from thence to Thomond, and to come unawares on the people of Munster; and in their progress they committed great plunders. When Felim, son of Cathal Croidhearg, perceived that the English had departed, he resolved to lead his forces to join the men of Munster, and having arrived at their quarters, several fierce engagements took place every day, but at length the Conacians and Munster men gave the English a general battle, in which they fought bravely, but were, however, finally defeated by the superior numbers of the English, whose cavalry and infantry were clad in armour. Many were slain on both sides, but the Munster men suffered most loss, through the mismanagement of Donogh Cairbreach O'Brien. The Conacians then returned home, and on the following day, O'Brien made peace with the English, and gave them hostages. The English then returned to Connaught, and first went to Hugh O'Flaherty, who made peace with them for the protection of his people and property. In the mean time, Felim, son of Cathal Croidhearg, determined on carrying away all the cattle in Conmaicne Mara and Conmaicne Cuile,² of those who would be counselled by him, and took along with him the son of Manus and Conor Roe, son of Murtogh Muinagh (O'Conor), with whom he proceeded to O'Donnell's country (i. e. Donal More), and left the territories quite bare to the English. After this the English came to Dun Mughdord, and sent a message to Manus, son of Murtogh Muinagh, demanding hostages, but Manus would yield them neither submission nor hostages. The English then sent a very strong force from Mughdord,³ against the sons of Roderick, plundered Eccuil, and carried away great spoils to the English at Druimni. Hugh O'Flaherty and Owen O'Hyne, marched round with another large force, and brought boats with them to Lionan-chinn-mara. This force, with the boats, met the lord justice from Druimne, at the port of Inis Aonaigh; Manus, who at this time had his vessels on the sea at Inis Aonaigh, made frequent attacks on the English; and they also attacked him, but they desisted for a time, removed their camp, and drew their boats round to the rear of a large strand in that place. As soon as Manus perceived this movement he sailed to Inis Raithne, and sent a party of his people into Inis Aoinaigh. When the English saw that Manus and his people landed on those islands

A. D. 1235.

1. Glen Fearna, that is, the Glen of the Alder Trees, now Glenfarne, a large valley surrounded by high mountains, near Manorhamilton, in the county of Leitrim. Cairthe Muilchen, now Glenear, another large valley in the parish of Killasnet, county of Leitrim. Creit, afterwards called Crey, in the parish of Kiltoghert, in Leitrim. Ardearne was near Boyle.

2. Conmaicne Mara, or the barony of Ballynahinch, in Conamara. Conmaicne Cuile Tola, now the barony of Kilmaine, in Mayo.

3. Dunmughdord, an ancient fortress in the parish of Auggaval, barony of Murrisk, county of Mayo. Druimni, now Druimneen, near Westport, in Mayo. Lionan-chinn-mara, now Leenan, near Killery Harbour, county of Galway. Inis Aonaigh, an island in Killery Bay, between Mayo and Galway. Inis Raithin, another of those islands in Killery Bay. Insi Modh, a general name applied to the islands in Clew Bay, county of Mayo. Umaili, or Hy Malia, formerly the county of the O'Mallies, now the baronies of Murrisk and Burishoole, county of Mayo. Eccuil, now Aehill Island, county of Mayo. Lughbardan, now called Luffertan, in the parish of Ballintobber, barony of Carra, county of Mayo.

they conveyed their boats along the strand, and, having launched them on the sea, quickly filled them with well armed men clad in armour, and proceeded to the islands on which Manus's men were, except Inis Raithin, on which Manus himself was posted, and slew all the people they found on the islands. Manus and his men, who were on Inis Raithne, took to their shipping and sailed from the island; but had Manus been on friendly terms with the O'Malleys, they would have sent their shipping against the English. The English carried off all the cattle of Insi Modh in one day, and the inhabitants would have left the islands, together with their cattle, from excessive want, had they not been prevented. Many of the common people were slain that night by the English. On the following day, being Friday (Good Friday), the English invaded the islands north of Umhaill, but the officers of the army, out of respect to the crucifixion of Christ, commanded that no person should be put to death on that day. After the English had devastated and spoiled Hy Malia, both by sea and land, they proceeded with the cattle and booty to Lughbardan, from whence they marched to Eas Dara (Ballysadare), and plundered O'Donnell, in consequence of his having protected Felim O'Conor, who had fled to him for refuge. From this they proceeded to Corrsliabh-na-Seghsa (Curlew mountains), and to the harbour of the Rock on Lough Key,⁴ for the purpose of taking it from the people of Felim O'Conor, and Cormac, son of Tomaltagh (Mac Dermott), who guarded it. The English and the lord justice gave protection and Termon (sanctuary), to Clarus Mac Maoilin, archdeacon of Elphin, and to the canons of Trinity Island, in honour of the Holy Trinity; and the lord justice himself, accompanied by the English nobles, went to inspect that place and to offer up their prayers, after which they constructed wonderful engines, with great ingenuity and invention, by which they took the Rock of Lough Key from the people of Felim and Cormac, and, after taking possession of it, the lord justice left a garrison there, with as much provisions and ale as were necessary. The English on that expedition rendered Connaught bare of food, raiment, and cattle; deprived it of peace and happiness, and left the inhabitants nothing but discord, and mutual plunder and slaughter. The English, however, obtained neither hostages nor submission on that occasion. Felim (O'Conor) made peace with the lord justice, and they (the English), gave him the five districts of the king free of purchase and rents.

Cormac Mac Dermott regained possession of the Rock of Lough Key twenty days after it had been taken by the English, in the following manner: The constable, attended by a large party of his men, having gone out at night, one of their own garrison, named O'Hostin, closed the gates after them, and delivered up the fortress to Cormac. The English were conveyed by a guard to Trinity Island, and safely sent out of the country, after which the fortifications of the Rock were demolished by Cormac, in order that the English might not take possession of it again.

Donal and Murtoth, the sons of Muiredagh O'Malley, were slain by Donal, son of Manus, son of Murtoth O'Conor, aided by Niall Roe, son of Cathal, son of Conor, at Clíara (Claremorris), where he was also interred.

Tuathal, son of Mortogh O'Conor, was slain by Conor Buidhe, son of Torlogh O'Conor, and by Conor, son of Hugh Muinagh.

The castle of Meelick was demolished by Felim O'Conor.

A. D. 1236.

Mac Raith Mac Maolin, priest of Kilmactreana, in Tírerrell (in the county of Sligo), died.

Hugh O'Gibellain, priest of Kilrodan (in the county of Sligo), and afterwards canon of Trinity Island, died on Christmas night.

The lord justice, that is, Mac Maurice (Fitzgerald), having summoned the English of Ireland to a convention held by him at Athfearaine, Felim, son of Cathal Crovdearg O'Conor, king of Connaught, came to the meeting; but it was determined amongst them to act treacherously towards Felim, although he was gossip to the lord justice. The motive of the English in assembling at that place

4. The Rock of Lough Key was a fortress of the Mac Dermotts at Lough Key, near Boyle, in the county of Roscommon, from which a part of that family were afterwards designated as the Mac Dermotts of the Rock.

being such, Felim, who had received intelligence of their intention, fled from the meeting, with a few horse, to Rosecommon, but was pursued thither, and from thence as far as the bridge of Sligo; and he placed himself under the protection of O'Donnell. As they did not succeed in capturing him, they committed great devastations in the territory of Teige O'Connor, and carried into bondage and captivity a great number of fair women, after which they returned with these captives to Druim Gregraidhe in Moylurg, as it was there that the lord justice was awaiting their movements. The above-mentioned meeting was held after Mac William (Burke) had gone to England. The lord justice and the English returned to their homes, and left the government of the country in the hands of Bryan, son of Torlogh (O'Connor), by whom and the English soldiers of the lord justice, great depredations were committed on the sons of Hugh, son of Cathal Crovdearg, and on many others of Felim's people. The sons of Hugh, in retaliation, plundered the English, and the Irish enemies who supported them, so that the country was altogether laid waste between them.

Conor O'Connor, son of Hugh Muinagh, was slain by Manus, son of Mortogh O'Connor.

Maolmuire O'Laughnan, having been elected to the see of Tuam, went to England, and after receiving the Pope's letters, was, with the consent of the king, consecrated.

Mac William (Burke) returned from England, but it was not known whether for peace or war.

Felim, son of Cathal Crovdearg, returned to Connaught, having been invited thither by some of the Conaicians, namely, by O'Kelly and O'Flynn, the sons of Hugh, the son of Cathal Crovdearg, and the son of Art O'Melaghlin, all forming four strong battalions. They marched to Rinn-Duin, where Bryan, son of Torlogh (O'Connor), Owen O'Heyne, Conor Buidhe, son of Torlogh, and Mac Costello, had all the cattle of the country. Felim's men crossed over the rampart and ditch which fortified the island, and every leader of a troop, and chief of a band, drove off each a share of the cattle as they found them on the place; and they then separated with their booty, leaving of the four battalions only four horsemen with Felim. As Bryan, son of Torlogh, and Owen O'Heyne, with their party, perceived that Felim's forces were scattered with their booty, they set out quickly and actively, with a small party of horse and many foot soldiers, to attack O'Connor and his few men. Conor Buidhe, son of Torlogh, did not perceive them until he came up, and, mistaking them for his own party, was killed by Roderick, son of Hugh, son of Cathal Crovdearg. Felim (the king), loudly calling his men, commanded them to leave their booty, and attack the enemy; and many of the party were killed by Felim and his followers in the battle, both on and outside of the Island, and amongst the killed were many notorious for their crimes and evil deeds. Teige, son of Cormac, son of Tomaltagh Mac Dermott, was amongst the slain. When Mac William heard of the defeat of all those who had opposed O'Connor, he joined him to subdue them. Dermot, son of Manus, having heard of these events, proceeded to attack Manus, son of Murtogh O'Connor.

After this Mac William went to Tuam, unnoticed and unperceived, and from thence to Mayo, of the Saxons; and he left not a riek or measure of corn at the great church of Mayo, or in the church of Teampull Michil, the Archangel; and his troops carried off from these churches eighty measures of corn. They afterwards went to Turlogh, and plundered his place in a similar manner. They then sent a party to plunder the people of Dermot, son of Manus, and, meeting with the people of Conor Roe and of Turlogh, the three parties plundered these places indiscriminately. Manus was obliged to banish and expel the people of Dermot, and on the following day Conor Roe went to Mac William, and made peace with him; and the cattle of which he had been plundered were restored, and all the property which had been taken from the churches, and could be recognised as belonging to them, was also restored. Dermot, son of Manus, submitted to the English, and claimed protection for his people and property.

Mac William proceeded to Balla, where he remained one night: from thence he went to Tuam; and he left Connaught without peace, happiness, or provisions, either in churches or country.

Hugh O'Flaherty, lord of West Connaught, died.

The eyes of Dermot, son of Niall O'Rourke, were put out by Cuchonaght O'Reilly.

Cathal Riabhaich, son of Giolla Buidhe O'Rourke, lord of Hy Briuin, died.

Great storms and rain and violent wars prevailed in this year.

The sons of Roderick, and Conor, son of Cormac Mac Dermott, were defeated in the battle of Cluan-Catha,¹ by Felim O'Conor.

Gillpatrick Mac Giollaroidh (or Mac Gillroy), lord of Kinel Aongusa, died.

Termon Caollaine² was burned by the lord justice.

O'Donnell (Donal More) led his forces into Ulidia as far as Iubhar-chinn-choiche,³ plundered every place through which he passed, and exacted hostages and submission from the greater part of Ulster.

A. D. 1237.

Thomas O'Ruadhain, bishop of Luighne (Achonry), died.

Giolla-Iosa, son of the historian O'Tormaigh (or O'Tormey), bishop of Conmaicne (Ardagh), died.

Giolla-na-neag O'Monaghan died in the monastery of Boyle.

Felim, son of Cathal Crovdearg, marched his forces into Connaught, to attack the descendants of Roderick O'Conor, namely, Bryan, son of Turlough, Murtogh and Donal, sons of Dermot, son of Roderick, and Conor, son of Cormac, son of Dermot. In this expedition Felim was aided by Cuchonaght O'Reilly, with all the Hy Briuin (or people of Cavan), and Cathal Mac Rannall, at the head of the people of Conmaicne (or the people of Muintir Eoluis, in Leitrim). Felim, with his forces, crossed the Curlew Mountains northward, and arrived at Druim Raide, in pursuit of the people of Roderick, with the soldiers of the lord justice, and prepared to give them battle. Felim commanded his men not to lose time in discharging their arrows, or throwing missiles, but to charge and come to close quarters at once; they did so accordingly, and the (English) soldiers did not long sustain the charge, but were defeated and driven back to their own people, and a great number of them slain, amongst whom was the son of Milrig.

When Roderick perceived that their forces were put to flight, they retreated from the position they had taken up, without losing any of their own men; but after this defeat they became dispersed, and had no footing in Siol Murray (Roscommon). All their people were plundered by Felim, and much depredation was committed on Conor, the son of Cormac, in Tyrerrell. Felim's party, after that, conveyed their vessels to Lough Key, from which they expelled Cormac Mac Dermott, lord of Moylurg, and plundered the entire of Moylurg; and they put Donogh, son of Murtogh Luath Shuileach (the Quick Eyed), in possession of the government of the country, and of the lake.

The lord justice made peace with Felim, and the five districts of the king were given him, free of purchase or rents.

Manus, son of Dermot, son of Manus, was slain by Donal, son of Dermot, son of Roderick O'Conor.

Murtogh, the son of Dermot, son of Roderick O'Conor, was slain by the son of Manus, son of Murtogh Muinagh.

Conor, son of Cormac, committed depredations on Roderick O'Gara; and the brother of Roderick was slain.

The hostages of Conor, son of Cormac, were slain by Felim, son of Cathal Crovdearg.

A monastery of canons was founded by Clarus Mac Mailin, on Trinity Island, in Lough Uachtair,¹ under the recommendation and patronage of Cathal O'Reilly.

The English barons of Ireland, having settled in Connaught, commenced building castles there.

A. D. 1238.

Felix O'Ruanadha (O'Rooney), archbishop of Tuam, who had previously resigned his bishoprick in honour of God, and had taken the monastic habit in Mary's Abbey, in Dublin, died.

A. D. 1236.

1. Cluan Catha, a place now called Battlefield, in the barony of Corran, county of Sligo.

2. Termon Caollaine, supposed to be the abbey of Callan, in the county of Kilkenny.

3. Iubhar-chinn-choiche, probably the same as Iubhar-chinn-traighe, the ancient name of Newry.

A. D. 1237.

1. Loch Uachtair, or Lough Oughter, in the county of Cavan, on an island in which, called Trinity Island, this monastery was founded and endowed by Cathal O'Reilly, prince of Brefney. See Ware.

Donogh Uaithnagh, son of Hugh, son of Roderick O'Connor, was slain by Teige, son of Hugh, son of Cathal Crovdearg.

Donogh, son of Duarcán O'Hara, lord of Lieny, was taken prisoner by Teige, son of Hugh, son of Cathal Crovdearg, and as he was brought to be confined, he was slain by his own kinsman, the son of Hugh O'Hara, in Ily Briuin of the Shannon.

Flaherty Mac Cathmaoil, head chief of Kinel Fereadaigh, and chief of Clan Congail, and of O'Ceannfhoda, in Tir Manaeh, the most distinguished for bravery and hospitality in Tir Eogain, was slain by Donogh Mac Cathmaoil, his own kinsman.

Donogh, son of Murtogh (Mac Dermott), having proceeded into Brefney, to O'Reilly, from which he marched with a great force into Connaught, plundered the people of Cluain Coirpthe,¹ and killed many of the chiefs of Muintir Eoluis, and of the Tuatha, who pursued him to recover the booty.

Mulroony, son of Donogh O'Dowd, was slain by Malaehy, son of Conor Roe, son of Murtogh Muimnagh, and by the son of Tiarnan, son of Cathal Migarain O'Connor.

Castles were erected in Muintir Murchadha,² in Connaicene Cuile, and in Ceara, by the English barons before mentioned.

Mac Maurice, lord justice of Ireland, and Hugo De Lacy, earl of Ulster, marched with their forces into Kinel Connell. They deposed Mac Loughlin (i. e. Donal), and gave the lordship of Kinel Owen to Bryan, the son of O'Neill, and they themselves took the hostages of the north of Ireland.

The Cloiteach of Eanach Duin,³ was erected. Cathal Mac Riabhaigh, chief of Scedne,⁴ died.

A. D. 1238.

1. Cluain Coirpthe, or Cairpthe, was a place in Kinel Dobhltha, a district which lay along the Shannon, in the present barony of Ballintobber, county of Roscommon. A church was founded here by the abbot, St. Beraeh, in the sixth century.

2. Muintir Murchadha, in Connaicene Cuile, now the barony of Kilmain, county of Mayo. Ceara, now the barony of Carra, county of Mayo.

3. Eanach Duin, and Cloiteach. Eanach Duin, now the parish of Annadown, in the county of Galway, an ancient bishop's see. Cloiteach is derived by some from Cloch, a stone, and teach, a building or house; by others from Clog, a bell, and teach, a house, and is therefore supposed by some to signify a belfry, while others have translated it a round-tower. O'Reilly gives the word Cloigtheach, a steeple or belfry; O'Brien gives Clogas, as a belfry or steeple.

A. D. 1239.

Murtogh, the son of Donal O'Brien, died.

The battle of Carn Siadhail¹ was fought by Donal Mac Loughlin, in which the following chiefs were slain, namely, Donal Tamhnaighe O'Neill, Mac Mahon, Sorly O'Gormly, Caoch Bearnais O'Gormly, and the chiefs of Kinel Moain, with many others; and Donal Mac Loughlin re-assumed the lordship, but was deprived of it, soon after the battle.

Torlogh, son of Roderick O'Connor, King of Connaught, died.

Fergal, son of Cuchonacht O'Reilly, lord of Dartry,² of Clan Firmaighe, and, according to some books, of Brefney, from the mountain eastward, was slain by Mulroony, son of Fergal, and Conor, son of Cormac, while attacking the sons of Niall, son of Congalagh, after having plundered them and stormed their house; and Murtogh, the son of Niall, surrendered, on his word of honour, but he was seized, and immediately slain, after the son of O'Reilly had been killed.

The English of Ireland committed depredations on O'Donell, and plundered Carbury, (in Sligo); and the lord justice himself was at Ballysadare, directing their movements, and his scouts went to Drumcliff.

Lasarina, daughter of Cathal Crovdearg O'Connor, and wife of O'Donnell, gave half a townland of her marriage dowry, viz., Rosbirn, to Clarus Mac Maolin, and to the confraternity of the canons of Trinity Island, on Lough Key, in honour of the Trinity, and of the Virgin Mary.

Cormac, the son of Art O'Melaghlin, died.

A. D. 1240.

A monastery was erected in Waterford, by sir

4. Scedne was a district in Moylurg, the present barony of Boyle, county of Roscommon. The name Mac Riabhaigh has been made by some Mac Reavy, by others Mac Colreavy, and anglicised by others into Gray.

A. D. 1239.

1. Carn Siadhail, supposed to be Carnteel, a parish in the barony of Dungannon, county of Tyrone. Caoch Bearnais O'Gormley, that is, the blind O'Gormley of Bearnais, or Barnesmore, in the county of Donegal.

2. Dartry, now the barony of Roselagher, county of Leitrim; and Clan Firmaighe was another place adjoining it, of which places it appears O'Reilly became chief at this time, though it was part of O'Rourke's country. The other chiefs here mentioned were also of the O'Reilly clan.

Hugo Pursel, for the brothers of the order of St. Francis.

Giolla-na-neev O'Dreain, archdeacon of Ardcarne, died.

Cuchonaght O'Reilly marched with a great force against Cormac Mac Dermott; he plundered the entire country, as far as Ardcarne, and slew many persons, in revenge for his son's death; he deposed Cormac, son of Tomaltagh; and Donogh, son of Murtogh, assumed the lordship of Moylurg.

Felim O'Conor went to England, to the king, to lodge complaints against both English and Irish, and having received great honours from the king, he returned home safe.

Hugh, son of Giolla-na-neev Crum O'Shaughnessey, was slain by Conor, son of Hugh, son of Cathal Croidearg, and by Fiachra O'Flynn.

Sadhbh¹ (Sabina), daughter of O'Kennedy, the wife of Donogh Cairbreach O'Brien, died.

The monastery of Tighe Molaga,² in Carberry, in Munster, in the diocese of Ross, was founded for brothers of the order of St. Francis, by Mac Carthy Riabhaich, lord of Carberry, and his own tomb was constructed in the choir (or chancel). The Barry Mores, the O'Mahonnys of Carberry, and the barons de Courcy, are also interred there.

A. D. 1241.

Murtogh O'Flaherty, bishop of Eanagh Dune, died.

The church of the friars minors (Franciscans), at Athlone, was consecrated by the successor of St. Patrick.

Donal More, the son of Egnaghan O'Donnell, lord of Tirconnell, Fermanagh, and North Connaught, as far as the Curlew mountains, and of Orgiall, from the Clar¹ northwards, died in a monastic habit, having gained the palm of victory over the world and the devil, and was interred,

A. D. 1240.

1. Sadhbh signifies goodness, and was a frequent name of women among the Irish. It has been made into Sabina.

2. Tighe Molaga, signifying the house of St. Molaga, now the parish of Timoleague, partly in the baronies of Barryroe and Carberry, county of Cork.

A. D. 1241.

1. Clar signifies a plain, and therefore this passage appears to mean that his power extended over Orgiall, from the plain of Louth, northwards, including Monaghan.

with great honours and solemnity, in the monastery of Eas Roe (Ballyshannon), in the harvest of this year.

Malachy O'Donnell was appointed lord of Tirconnell in his father's place. O'Neill (i.e. Bryan), after having been expelled by Donal Mac Loughlin, came to O'Donnell, who, with his forces, accompanied O'Neill to Tyrone, and they fought with Mac Loughlin the battle of Caimcirge,² in which were slain Donal O'Loughlin, lord of Kinel Owen, and nine of his kinsmen, together with all the chiefs of Kinel Owen; and Bryan was then appointed lord of Kinel Owen.

Dermod, son of Manus, son of Torlogh More O'Conor, a man eminent for hospitality and generosity, died.

Sitrick Mac Oiraghty, chief of Clan Tomalty, died.

Walter de Lacy, lord of the English of Meath, and chief counsellor of the English of Ireland, died in England.

Teige, son of Roderick O'Gara, died.

Teige O'Conor plundered Dartry and Clan Fermaighe (in Leitrim).

The lord justice, Maurice Fitzgerald, having collected a great army, marched into Moy Aoi (in Roscommon), where he plundered Fiachra O'Flynn and Donogh Mac Dermott. A small party of O'Conor's people overtook them, and slew Nar Mac Giolla Kelly, and many others.

Donal Mac Clancy, chief of Dartry (in Leitrim), died.

A. D. 1242.

Donal Mac Airtin died a canon at Kilmore.

A great chapter was held by the primate of Armagh, and by the abbots of the canons of Ireland, at Lughmadh (Louth), on which occasion were exhibited the relics which St. Mochteus had brought from Rome.¹

A. D. 1242.

1. St. Mochta, or Mochteus, a disciple of St. Patrick, was the founder, and first bishop of the see of Louth. The archbishop of Armagh at this time, was Albert of Cologne.

2. Caimcirge, probably the parish of Cumber, in the barony of Tirkeeran, county of Derry; or the place might be near the Camawen or Cameron river, in the barony of Omagh, county of Tyrone.

Donogh Cairbreagh O'Brien, lord of the Dalcassians, the tower of generosity and excellence of the south of Ireland, and his son Torlogh, died.

Conor O'Brien assumed the sovereignty of Thomond.

Hugh O'Conor, surnamed Athehleirach, the son of Hugh, son of Roderick O'Conor, was slain by Torlogh, son of Hugh, son of Cathal Croidéarg.

Bryan Dearg (or the Red), son of Donogh O'Dowd, lord of Tireragh, Tyrawley, and Erris, was slain on his journey to perform a pilgrimage at the monastery of Boyle.

The lord justice, with the English of Ireland, and Felim, the son of Cathal Croidéarg, marched with a powerful force into Tireconnell, in pursuit of Teige O'Conor, who had fled thither; they encamped at Druim Tuama (Drumhome), and committed great ravages on that expedition, although Teige was given up to them.

Teige O'Conor was afterwards taken prisoner by Cuchonaght O'Reilly, at the instigation of Felim, son of Cathal Croidéarg.

A. D. 1243.

Petrus Macraith, after spending his life with the canons of Trinity Island, Lough Key, died, and was buried on St. Martin's day.

Finachta O'Lughadha, the coarb of St. Benen,¹ died.

Maoleoin O'Creehain, archdeacon of Tuam, after his return from beyond the seas as a professor, died in Dublin.

Cathasach O'Snedhiusa, dean of Muintir Maolroony (Moylurg, in Rosecommon), died at Ardearne on the 10th of August.

Teige, son of Hugh, son of Cathal Croidéarg, was set at liberty by O'Reilly, who came along with him to the monastery of Boyle with his forces, and having proceeded to the house of Mac Dermott, that is, Cormac, the son of Tomaltach, he took himself and his wife prisoners (namely Etaoin, the daughter of Fingin, who was also Teige's own mother), and gave her to Cuchonaght O'Reilly, which he did in reward of his own liberation.

Teige O'Conor went again, with a small party, to attend a meeting appointed by O'Reilly, who treacherously took Teige prisoner, slew his people, and kept himself in confinement until the following feast of St. Bearraich.

The king of England having collected a great army to oppose the king of France, sent messengers commanding the attendance of the English of Ireland to his aid. Richard Mac William Burke was among those who went, and he died abroad with the same army.

Cathal, son of Hugh O'Conor, the ward of Muintir Reilly, having turned against them, and plundered Murtoigh Mac Suiligh, in Moy Nisse (in Leitrim), took Murtoigh himself prisoner, and slew him at Kilseisin. He immediately after plundered Clan Firmaighe and Dartry.

Moyrein² was plundered by Cathal O'Conor, and a war ensued between O'Conor and O'Reilly.

A. D. 1244.

Donagh, son of Fingin, son of Malachy, son of Hugh, son of Torlogh O'Conor, bishop of Elphin, died on the 23rd of April, on Inis Clothran, and was interred in the monastery of Boyle.

The archdeacon of Tuam was drowned in Glas Linn of Cluan¹.

Donogh More O'Daly², a learned man, and pre-eminent in poetry, died, and was buried in the monastery of Boyle.

Teige, son of Hugh, son of Cathal Croidéarg, had his eyes put out, and was hanged by Cuchonaght O'Reilly, on the feast of St. Bearraidh, on Inis-na-conaire, in Lough Allen, (in Leitrim), after having been in confinement from the feast of St. Martin to that time.

Roderick, son of Hugh, his brother, was drowned and by some identified with Muintir Eoluis, or Mac Rannall's country.

A. D. 1244.

1. Glas Linn of Cluan; or the grey pool of Cluan; supposed to be Cluainfois, near Tuam, where there was an abbey and celebrated school in the sixth century.

2. Donagh More O'Daly, according to O'Reilly, in his Account

A. D. 1243.

1. Coarb of St. Benen; that is, successor of St. Benen, or Benignus, who was archbishop of Armagh, and a disciple of St. Patrick, but had been previously placed by him over the church of Drumlinas, now the parish of Drumlease, county of Leitrim, and diocese of Kilmore.

2. Moyrein, sometimes called Conmaicne Moyrein, was a territory in the south of Leitrim, with some adjoining parts of Longford, on the Cuirin Conachtach, at Athleague of the Shannon (Lanesborough), on the 9th day of March, and was interred in the monastery of Cluan Tuaisceart, (Clontuskert), with solemnity and honour.

Conor, son of Hugh, son of Cathal Crovdearg, died within a month of spring.

Felim, son of Cathal Crovdearg, marched with his forces eastward into Brefney, against O'Reilly, to be revenged for his ward and kinsman Teige O'Conor; they remained a night encamped at Fiodhnach, of Moy Rein.³ The abbot was not at home on that night, and the church of Fiodhnach being unroofed, a party of the soldiers burned the tents and huts which were erected in the inside, without the permission of their leaders, and the alumnus of the abbot was smothered. The abbot himself came the following day, very much incensed and enraged at the death of his alumnus, and demanded his Eraic⁴ from O'Conor, who answered, that he would grant him his own demand. "My demand," said the abbot, is, "that the best man among you be given up as an Eraic for my alumnus." "That person," said O'Conor, "is Manus, son of Murtogh Muimnagh." "I am not indeed," replied Manus, "but the chief commander is." "I shall not part with you," said the abbot, "until I obtain my Eraic." The party after that, marched out of the town, and the abbot having followed them, they proceeded to Ath-na-Cuire, on the river Geirethigh, but the flood so overflowed its banks, that they could not cross it; and in order to pass over, they broke up the chapel house of St. John the Baptist, which was adjacent to the ford, and placed the timber across the river. Manus, son of Murtogh Muimnagh, went into the house, accompanied by Conor, son of Cormac Mac Dermott, and while Manus was giving directions to the man that was on the top of the house, stripping the roof, he pointed up his sword and said "There is the nail which prevents the beam from falling"; and on saying so, the top rafter of the house fell on his head, which it smashed, and killed him on the spot. He was buried on the outside of the door of the church of Fiodhnach, and three times the full of the kings' bell of money were given as an offering for his soul, and also thirty steeds; so it was thus that the coarb of St. Caillin obtained an Eraic for his alumnus. A monument of cut stone, and a handsome carved cross, were raised over the body of Manus, but after some time they were broken by the people of O'Rourke.

Cormac, son of Tomaltagh, son of Conor Mac Dermott, lord of the entire of Clan Maolroony, died in the habit of a grey friar, in the monastery of Boyle, in harvest, having gained the victory over the world and the devil, and having been twenty-six years in the lordship.

Fergal Mac Tagadain was slain by Conor Mac Tighernain, on Inis Fraoich, in Lough Gill (county of Sligo).

A. D. 1245.

Donal O'Flanagan, abbot of Cong, died.

Conor Roe, son of Murtogh Muimnagh, son of Torlogh O'Conor, was wounded with a dagger by O'Timmaith, his own steward, which happened in consequence of a dispute arising between them at Port-na-Leige; but the steward was slain by Gillcreest, son of Ivar O'Beirne, and Conor Roe was conveyed to the monastery of Boyle, where he died of the wound, and was interred there, after the benefit of extreme unction and repentance.

The castle of Sligo was erected by Mac Maurice Fitzgerald, lord justice, and by the Siol Murray; for Felim (O'Conor), was commanded to build it at his own expense, and to draw to it stones and lime, together with the materials of the hospital-house of the Trinity, after the same place had been given by the lord justice to Clarus Mac Maoilin, honour of the Holy Trinity.

The king of England marched with a great army into Wales, and encamped at the castle of Gannoc, where he summoned to his aid the lord justice, with the English of Ireland, and Felim, son of Cathal Crovdearg, with their forces. When they went thither, Wales was devastated by them, but however, they took no hostages on that expedition. Felim O'Conor and his forces were highly honoured by the king.

of Irish Writers, was abbot of Boyle, and a famous poet, who, from the sweetness of his verses, was called the Ovid of Ireland.

3. Fiodhnach of Moyrein, was the celebrated abbey of Fenagh, in Leitrim.

4. Eraic or Eric, was the term applied to a fine or compensation either in value or person, as a reparation for crimes and injuries, according to the laws and customs of the ancient Irish.

The castle of Ath-an-chip, on the borders of Moy Nisse,¹ was erected by Miles Mac Costello.

Fiachra, the son of David O'Flynn, chief of Siol Maolroony, (in Rosecommon), died.

Carroll Buidhe, son of Teige, son of Aongus Findabragh O'Daly, died.

The castle of Suicin was erected.

Rannall O'Mulloy was slain by the Conacians.

Murtogh, son of Maurice, son of Cathal Mac Dermott, was slain by the men of Brefney.

O'Donnell (Malaehy), marched with a force against the English and Irish of North Connaught, and they carried away much cattle and property on that expedition.

A. D. 1246.

John O'Hugroin, the son of the coarb of St. Mochua, bishop of Elphin, died at Rath Aodha Mic Bric.¹

John Mac Geoffrey² having come to Ireland as lord justice, Maurice Fitzgerald was removed.

Druim Leathan³ was burned this year.

Malaehy, son of Conor Roe, son of Murtogh Muinnagh O'Conor, was slain by Murtogh O'Dowd, for which, Murtogh was banished across the seas.

Maurice Fitzgerald marched with a force into Tireconnell; he gave the half of Tireconnell to Cormac, son of Dermod, son of Roderick O'Conor; took hostages from O'Donnell for the other half, and left them in the castle of Sligo.

O'Donnell, (Malaehy), and the chiefs of Kinell Connell, came on the first of November to Sligo, and burned the outworks of the town, but could not, however, take the castle; and the garrison hanged their hostages in their sight, having suspended them from the top of the castle, namely O'Mianain, the tutor of O'Donnell, and his foster brother.

A. D. 1245.

1. Moy Nissi was a district on the eastern side of the Shannon, in the county of Leitrim, near Carrick-on-Shannon.

A. D. 1246.

1. Rath Aodha Mac Bric, now Rathlugh, in the barony of Moycashel, county of Westmeath, where Aodh or Aidus, the son of Bric, founded a monastery in the sixth century.

2. Johu Mac Geoffrey; or, Fitzgeoffrey, was the son of Geoffrey de Marisco, formerly lord justice of Ireland.

3. Druim Leathan, now Dromlane, in the county of Cavan, where a monastery was founded by St. Moeg, in the sixth century.

4. Airthera, signifying the eastern districts, now the barony of Murtogh O'Hanlon, lord of Airtherr,⁴ was slain, by command of Bryan O'Neill.

Hugh, son of Hugh O'Conor, was taken prisoner, and plundered.

Torlogh, son of Hugh O'Conor, made his escape from the Cranog⁵ of Lough Leisi, in harvest, and drowned those who guarded him, namely, Cormac O'Murray, and the two O'Ainmiraghs.

Torlogh was again taken prisoner, from the protection of the bishop of Clonfert, and, having been delivered into the hands of the English, he was confined in the castle of Athlone.

Albert Almaineach,⁶ Archbishop of Armagh, retired to Hungary.

A. D. 1247.

Conor O'Murray, bishop of Fiachra Aidhne (Kilmaeduaigh), died in Bristuma.

Hugh Mac Conchailleadh, abbot of Cluan Eois (Clones), died.

Malaehy O'Donnell, lord of Tirconnell, Kinell Moain, Inisowen, and Fermanagh, was slain by Maurice Fitzgerald. This happened in the following manner: Maurice Fitzgerald and the English collected a great force, and, having first marched to Sligo, they proceeded thence to Eas Aodha Ruaidh Mic Baduirm.¹ Conor, son of Dermod, son of Roderick O'Conor, joined them, on the Wednesday after the feast of SS. Peter and Paul. O'Donnell collected the forces of Tireconnell and Tyrone to oppose them, and prevent either the English or Irish from crossing Ath Seanaigh (Ballyshannon), for an entire week, upon which they determined to send Cormac O'Conor, with a large body of cavalry, through the plain, westward, and then to advance high up, and along the bog, eastward, which they did unperceived, until they arrived at Bel-atha-chul-uain (Belleek), on the Erne.

Orior, in Armagh, of which the O'Hanlons were chiefs, as given in the note on Orgiall.

5. Cranog signified a fortified place on a lake.

6. Albert Almaineach, that is Albert the German, namely, Albert of Cologne, archbishop of Armagh.

A. D. 1247.

1. Eas Aodha Ruaidh Mac Baduirm, that is, the cataract of Red Hugh, son of Badurn. This is the waterfall called the Salmon-leap, at Ballyshannon, where Aodh Ruadh, or Red Hugh, monarch of Ireland, the son of Badurn, was drowned, about five centuries before the Christian era, which circumstance gave that name to the place.

The men of Tirconnell did not know of this movement until they saw the cavalry advancing at their rear, on the same side of the river, and then turned round to meet them; but when the English saw that their attention was drawn towards the cavalry, they advanced up the rising ground, being well aware that the Tirconnellians could not attend to the attack of their forces on both sides, and, having crossed the ford, (at Ballyshannon), the Tirconnellians were thus encompassed by them on all sides. O'Donnell was slain, and also the Cammuinelach (Crooked Necked) O'Boyle, the head chief of the three districts, Mac Sorley,² lord of the eastern Irish, and many chiefs of Tirconnell. A great many of Fitzgerald's forces were slain and drowned there; others of them were drowned in the Finn, northward; and many more at Termon Dabeg (at Lough Derg), in pursuit of plunder, and amongst these were William Brit, sheriff of Connaught, and a young knight, his brother. The country was then spoiled and plundered by the English, and they appointed Roderick O'Canannain to the government of Tirconnell.

Eachmarcach O'Kane, lord of Cianacht and of the men of Creeve, was slain by Manus O'Kane, the former having gone to plunder his country to Airther-Maighe (or the Eastern Plain) in Dal Riada (Antrim).

Torlogh, the son of Hugh O'Conor, made his escape from Athlone.

Miles Mac Costello made an incursion into the Feadha of Conmaicne, and expelled Cathal Mac Rannall; he also took the Cranog of Claonlough,³ and left a garrison there of his own men. Cathal and Torlogh, the sons of Hugh O'Conor, united with Mac Rannall, to expel Mac Costello from the Feadha of Conmaicne, they took the Cranog on the lake, demolished the castle of Lecce Derge, on the Saturday of Whitsuntide, and Torlogh went to Trinity Island to wait on the archdeacon, Clarus Mac Maoilin, because the English would not evacuate the castle, except under the protection of the archdeacon, and to be escorted safely by him across the Shannon, westward, to Tuaim Mna.⁴ They afterwards came out with Clarus, and the Clan Costello were entirely expelled from that country.

A great war was commenced by Torlogh, son of Hugh O'Conor, and by Donogh, the son of Amchadha, son of Donogh O'Gillpatrick, (or Mac Gillpatrick), of Ossory, against the English of Connaught. Torlogh collected the sons of the chiefs of Connaught, and marched to Fidh O'Diarmada (in Roscommon), and to Muintir Fathaidh, where they slew many people. They proceeded from thence to the castle of Bona Gaillmhe (at Galway), and burned the town and the castle. Many were killed by them, along with Mac Elget, the seneschal of Connaught, who was slain by Donogh Mac Gillpatrick. After that the English pursued them and engaged them in battle, in which a great number of the English were slain, and the Irish advanced in despite of them to Carra. Siurtan Dexetra (or Jordan de Exeter), collected the clan Adam and the English of Carra against Torlogh, who evacuated that country, as he had not equal forces to meet them.

The borough of Cinntrachta was burned by Teige, the son of Conor Roe, and Teige, the son of Tuathal, son of Murtogh Muimnagh, and the English of Connaught did not experience, for a long period, so severe a war as that waged against them by the heirs presumptive, for they left neither district nor tract of the English possessions in Connaught without devastation.

Roscommon and Ardearne were burned by the English.

Fionnghuala, the daughter of Roderick O'Conor, died at Cong of St. Feichin.

O'Dowd and O'Boyle sailed with a fleet to plunder the territory of Carbury (in Sligo), and the crew of one of the vessels was drowned, along with O'Boyle, among the Islands of Tuatha Ross (the Rosses in Donegal).

A. D. 1247.

2. Mac Sorley. This was the son of Sorly Mac Donnell, from the Hebrides, who had settled in Antrim, with a number of Scots, and is here called lord of the eastern Gaels.

3. Claon Lough, probably Lough Clian, in the barony of Dromahaire, county of Leitrim. Cranog, as already explained, signifies a fortress on a lake, supposed to have been a wooden fortress. Feadha of Conmaicne signified the woody district of Conmaicne, part of Mac Rannall's country in Leitrim.

4. Tuaim Mna, now Tumna, in the barony of Boyle, county of Roscommon.

Teige, the son of Conor Roe, set fire to the island of Insi Moire, on Claonlough, and twenty-eight of the English were burned to death.

A monastery was founded in Galway, in the arch-diocese of Tuam, by William Burke, lord of Claurickard, for the friars of St. Francis, and many tombs were constructed in that monastery for the nobility of the town.

The monastery of Ennis, in Thomond, in the diocese of Killaloe, was erected by O'Brien, in which is the burying place of the O'Briens.

Maurice Fitzgerald, and the English, marched with a great force to Eas Roe (Ballyshannon), at the invitation of Geoffry O'Donnell. Roderick O'Canannain opposed them, but he was not sufficiently supported by the people of Tirconnell.

A. D. 1248.

Dermod O'Cuaana, the chief priest of Elphin, died, and was interred in Kilmore.

Master Gilbert O'Carroll died.

O'Fichin Guer was slain by Giolla-Mochoinne O'Cahall.

An insurrection was raised by the son of Manus, and by the son of Conor Roe (O'Conor) against the English; and they burned the castle of Mac Henry, that is, of Pierce Poer, took his constable prisoner, and carried away the spoils of North Umail to Insi Modh.¹ Jordan de Exeter, John Butler, Roblein Laigles (Lawless), and many others, collected their forces, and marched to the town of Tubberpatrick, and from thence to Aghagower, and plundered Umail north and south on the following day. Henry Poer came with a great force into Umail, his own country, for it was there that his residence was. Pierce Poer son of Henry, made peace with Donal, son of Manus; and Donal promised to supply him with men and vessels to oppose his kinsmen. The sons of O'Conor, who were on the isles of Modh, received intelligence that the son of Henry had sent for his forces and vessels to Donal; and O'Conor's sons being assured of this, they proceeded to attack them, and slew O'Huain, the son of the Galsighe (or English hag), and John, the son of the English priest. Dermot the son of Manus also slew, in that insurrection, Senaitt Guer and a number of his people, but the victory was without joy, for the valiant hero and experienced warrior, Dermot, son of Manus, was himself slain.

Teige, son of Conor Roe, (O'Conor), was slain by the English. He was the terror of all the English and Irish who opposed him.

Maurice Fitzgerald led his forces into Tireconnell, which he plundered and devastated. He banished Roderick O'Canannain into Tyrone, and left the government of Tirconnell in the hands of Geoffry, son of Donal O'Donnell.

The men of Tyrone and O'Canannain collected a force, marched into Tirconnell, and gave battle to Geoffry O'Donnell; but Roderick O'Canannain and many others were slain in the engagement.

The lord justice of Ireland marched with another army into Tyrone against O'Neill. The people of Tyrone came to the resolution of making peace and giving hostages, in consequence of the superiority in forces of the English over the Irish. On that expedition the English built the bridge of the Bann, and the castle of Drom Tairsigh.

Bryan O'Neill, lord of Tyrone, conveyed boats from Lough Foyle in Moy Ith, across Termon Dabog (at Lough Derg), until he came to Lough Erne, where he committed great depredations, and demolished a castle.

The entire of Conmaicne Mara (Connemara), was plundered by the English; they marched their forces against O'Flaherty, who defeated and slew many of them.

Murtogh O'Dowd, that is the aitheleireach, lord of all the country from Kildarbile² to the strand, was slain by Felim O'Conor.

William Burke having died in England, his remains were conveyed to Ireland, and buried at Athiseal (Athassel Abbey, in Tipperary).

The King of France went to Jerusalem on a crusade.

A. D. 1248.

1. Islands of Modh, called Insi Modh, the name of the islands in Clew Bay, county of Mayo. Umailia, where these events happened, was the ancient territory of the O'Malleys, now the baronies of Murrisk and Burrischoole, in the county of Mayo.

2. Kildarbile, now Termon Dervilla, in the barony of Erris, county of Mayo. The strand here mentioned is Traigh Eothuille, or the strand of Eohuil, near Ballysadare, in the county of Sligo.

John Tyrrel was slain by Giolla-na-neev O'Ferrall.

Felim, son of Cathal Croiddearg, gave Rath-na-Romanagh to the canons of Kilmore,³ at the request of Teige O'Mannachain, in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary, and of St. Augustine.

Awlave, son of Cathal Riavagh O'Rourke, was slain by Con Carrach Mac Donogh.

Fogartach O'Dobhailen (or O'Devlin), lord of Coran (county of Sligo), died.

Raighned (Reiner), archbishop of Armagh, came from Rome after receiving the Pallium, in which he celebrated Mass at Armagh, on the festival of SS. Peter and Paul.

A. D. 1249.

Maolmuire O'Laghnan, archbishop of Tuam, and master of the canons, died in winter, shortly after Christmas.

Andrew Mac Gilla Ger, coarb of St. Feichin,¹ died.

Maolciarán O'Lenaghan, a dignified priest of Tumna, (in Roscommon), a man who kept a house of hospitality for the clergy and laity, died on his way to Ardcarne, to attend a sermon there, on the Friday before Lammas, and was buried with honour and solemnity on Trinity Island in Lough Key.

Con O'Flanagan, prior of Kilmore of the Shannon, died.

More, daughter of Donogh O'Dowd, and wife of the Giolla Muinelach O'Boyle, died.

Teige O'Monaghan, lord of Hy Briuin of the Shannon, died on the 6th day of June, and was interred in Kilmore of the Shannon.

Fingin Mac Carthy waged war, and inflicted many evils on the English of Desmond.

Pierce Poer, son of Henry, David Drew, and many other young Englishmen, proceeded with Mac Feorais (Birmingham), through Connaught, to the castle of Sligo. The son of Felim O'Conor went to oppose them, and a fierce engagement ensued between them, in which Pierce Poer, David Drew, and many others of the English, were slain; and their bodies were conveyed for burial to Ballysadare. After this the son of Felim (O'Conor), proceeded to Tyreragh, and through the territory of Bermingham, which he completely plundered from the Moy to the Strand of Eothuile the carpenter (near Ballysadare). Geroit Bermingham pursued them (his forces), and overtook Donogh, the son of Manus, and wounded him, and Donogh, after receiving the wound, was taken prisoner, and conveyed to Dun Contreathain (near Dromore West). The son of Felim followed them, (Geroit's forces), and, after having slain Geroit, he released the son of Manus, whom he took with him, but who, however, shortly afterwards died of his wounds, and was much lamented.

Mac Maurice, having collected his forces, entered Connaught, and took from Felim all the plunder he could. Felim, son of Cathal Croiddearg, received intelligence that the English were in his neighbourhood; and, as he had done them several injuries, he sent all his moveable property across the Shannon eastward into Brefne, and the north of Ireland. The lord justice collected the English of Meath and Leinster, and marched with a great force to Athlone, and from thence into Siol Murray, (Roscommon), while Mac Maurice with the English of Connaught and Munster marched on the other side until both armies met at Elphin. After having plundered Siol Murray in every direction, they summoned to them Torlogh, son of Hugh, son of Cathal Croiddearg, and appointed him king in place of Felim, son of Cathal. After this they plundered the territory of Brefne, committed many evils in every quarter of it, and carried away therefrom immense booty. They were twenty days in Siol Murray, ravaging it, and they plundered Lough Key, with its islands, and also the Rock. After this the lord justice proceeded to Meath, while Mac Maurice went to Sligo; and they left Torlogh to govern Siol Murray. The presumptive heirs of the crown of Connaught, Torlogh and Hugh, sons of Hugh, son of Cathal Croiddearg, marched with an army to Ath-na-riogh (Athenry), which they burned and plundered about Lady Day in Harvest. The sheriff of Connaught was before them in the town, and many of the English along with him, and they demanded a truce on that day from the sons of the king of Connaught, in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary, as that was her festival day; but this favour was not granted them, for although Torlogh endeavoured to prevent his people from attacking the town, the chiefs of the army attacked it, in despite of him. When Jordan and the English saw their intention, they marched out of the town, armed and clad in armour, to oppose them; and the young soldiers of the Irish perceiving the English advancing in battle array, they became dismayed, and fled, through the miracles of the Virgin Mary, for having refused to grant the demanded truce in honour of her festival. Of their chiefs the following were slain:—namely, Hugh, son of Hugh O'Connor; Dermot Roe, son of Cormac O'Melaghlin; the two sons of O'Kelly; Bryan-an-Doire (of the Oak Wood), son of Manus; Carraidh-an-Siubhail (the Traveler), son of Niall O'Connor; Baothghalach (Boetius) Mac Egan; the two sons of Lughlin O'Connor; Donal, son of Cormac Mac Dermott; the Fionnanach Mac Brenan; Cu-mumhan Mac Cassarly, and many others.

3. Kilmore, a parish in the barony of Ballintobber, county of Roscommon, where there was an abbey of canons regular.

A. D. 1249.

1. The Coarb of St. Feichin was either abbot of Cong, in Mayo, or of Fore, in Westmeath.

Donogh O'Gillpatrick (or Mac Gillpatrick), that is, the son of Anmchadh, son of Donogh of the Ossorians, was slain by the English, in retaliation for the burnings, plunders, and slaughters he had perpetrated on them. This Donogh was one of the three Irishmen who committed the greatest number of depredations on the English; and these three were Conor O'Melaghlin, Conor Mac Coghlan of the Castles, and the before-mentioned Donogh, who was in the habit of reconnoitering the market towns (of the English), by visiting them in the different characters of a beggar, a carpenter, a turner, an artist, or a pedlar, as recorded in the following verse:

"He is now a carpenter, or turner,
Now a man of books or learned poet,
In good wines and hides, a dealer sometimes;
Every thing by turns as suits his purpose."

Dunmore² was burned by the sons of the king of Connaught.

O'Donnell (i. e. Geoffrey), having led his forces into North Connaught, plundered and devastated the country from the Curlew mountains to the river Moy, and returned safe and triumphant, with much booty and many hostages.

2. Dunmore, in the county of Galway, where the de Berminghams, barons of Athenry, had a castle.

A. D. 1250.

Thomas O'Meallaidh, bishop of Enagh Dune, died.

The bishop of Imleach Iubhair (Emly), died.

Congalach Mac Cidneoil, bishop of Brefney (Kilmore), died.

Torlogh, son of Murtogh Muinagh O'Connor, prior of the church of SS. Peter and Paul, died.

Felim O'Connor set out from the north, with a great force from Tyrone, and marched into Brefney, and from thence into the Tuatha (in Roscommon), accompanied by Conor Mac Tiarnan (O'Rourke). Both then entered Tir Maine, and drove Torlogh O'Connor out of Connaught, who again sought the protection of the English. Felim collected all the moveable property of Connaught, which he conveyed northward across the Curlew mountains, but the English sent messengers after him, and peace being made between them, he was restored to his sovereignty.

The English put out the eyes of the hostages of Connaught in Athlone.

Felim (O'Connor) committed great depredations on Cathal O'Connor, and drove him a second time out of Connaught.

Cairbre O'Melaghlin was treacherously slain by David Roche.

Dermot O'Hara, lord of Lieney, died while imprisoned by Fitzgerald.

Maurice Fitzgerald, Cathal O'Reilly, Cuchonacht O'Reilly, and all the chiefs of Hy Briuin (Cavan and Leitrim), marched with a great force into Tyrone, and remained three nights at Tullaghoge, where they met much loss and opposition; and they did not succeed in taking hostages from the O'Neills on that expedition. On their return they entered Tirconnell; and Maurice Fitzgerald made a prisoner of O'Canannain, lord of Tirconnell, who was under the protection of the bishop O'Carolan,¹ and they slew O'Canannain while endeavouring to escape.

Fingin Mac Carthy was slain by the English of Desmond.

A. D. 1250.

1. The bishop O'Carolan was Florence O'Carolan, the bishop of Derry.

A. D. 1251.

AIGHNED (Reiner), archbishop of Armagh, went on a pilgrimage to Rome.

Florent Mac Floinn (or Flynn), was, on Christmas day, appointed archbishop of Tuam, on account of his great learning and wisdom.

A monastery was erected at Kilnamullagh,¹ in the diocese of Cork, by the Barry; and it was afterwards selected as the burying place of the Barrys.

Giolla Mocoinne, son of Giolla Mocoinne O'Ca-hal, was slain by Conor, son of Hugh, son of Cathal Croidearg.

Teige, son of Tuathal, son of Murtoth Muinagh O'Conor, was slain by the English.

The two sons of Rory O'Neill were slain in Kilmore of Hy Niallain.²

Ardgal O'Flaherty, the torch of bravery and hospitality of the north of Ireland, died.

Gillcreest O'Breisleen, chief of Fanad (in Donegal), and his brother, were slain by Ceallach Balbh (the Stammerer) O'Boyle.

Donogh Mac Cathmoil, chief of Kinel Feredaigh (in Tyrone), was slain by the people of Orgiall.

Iovar Mac Madden, chief of Clan Ruadrach, was slain.

Conor, son of Cormac, son of Tomaltagh Mac Dermott, a man eminent for hospitality and generosity, died.

Flaherty O'Carroll, chief of Calry,³ was slain by Art, son of Art O'Rourke.

Muiredhach O'Teige died.

A great shower of rain fell in Hy Briuin, on the festival of SS. Peter and Paul, so that boats floated round the town of Kilmore of the Shannon, and a mill might grind with the stream which flowed from the rising grounds to Ath-na-faithche, in Fenagh, during the time that the vespers were chaunted.

Flan O'Loughnan, chief of the Two Backs (in county of Mayo), died.

A. D. 1252.

Maol Maodhog O'Beollain, coarb of Columkille at Drumcliff (in Sligo), a man of great dignity and affluence, distinguished for his hospitality, and who had received the greatest honour and respect, both from the English and Irish in his time, died.

The castles of Caol Uisce,¹ and Moy Coba, were erected by the son of Maurice Fitzgerald.

Conor O'Dogherty, chief of Ardmiodhair (in Donegal), the tower of hospitality and bravery of the North, died.

Conor Mac Cathmoil, chief of Kinel Feredaidh, and of many other districts, the peace-maker of Tirconnell, Tyrone, and Oriell, was slain by the people of Bryan O'Neill, while defending his wards against them, he being the surety for O'Gormley and O'Kane.

Cuchonacht Mac Consnamha, chief of Muintir Kenny,² died.

Giolla Iosa O'Carroll, chief of Calry of Drum-cliff, died.

Manus Mac Gilduff, chief of Teallach Gairbheth,³ died.

The lord justice of Ireland marched with a great force to Armagh; from thence he went to Iveagh, and he afterwards returned back to Cluain Fiachna,⁴ where Bryan O'Neill submitted to him, and gave his brother Rory O'Neill to him as a hostage. It was on this expedition that a dispute arose in the camp (of the English) at Dundalk, between the men of Meath and of Munster, in which many of the men of Munster were slain.

Great heat and drought prevailed this summer,

A. D. 1251.

1. Kilnamullach was the ancient name of Buttevant, in the county of Cork, where a great Franciscan monastery was founded by the Barrys, barons of Barrymore.

2. Kilmore in Hy Niallain, now the parish of Kilmore, in the barony of O'Neilland, county of Armagh.

3. Calraigh or Calrigia, sometimes called Calraigh of Drum-cliff, an ancient district on the borders of Leitrim and Sligo, part of which is now known as the parish of Calry, county of Sligo.

A. D. 1252.

1. Caoluisge signifies the Narrow Water, and is a name given to the Newry river; hence this castle was near Newry. Moycoba was the plain or district about Downpatrick where the other castle was erected.

2. Muintir Cinaith, a district along Lough Allen, in the parish of Innis Magrath, county of Leitrim, of which Mac Consnamha was chief. This name has been anglicised to Ford.

3. Teallach Gairbheith was Tullygarvey barony, in the county of Cavan.

4. Cluain Fiachna, probably Clonfeacle, in the barony of Dungan-nannon, county of Tyrone.

so that the people passed with dry feet over the principal rivers of Ireland. The people commenced reaping the corn twenty days before Lammas, (1st of August), and the trees became ignited by the heat of the sun.

New money was ordered by the king of England to be coined in Ireland, and the old money hitherto in circulation was discontinued.

Murogh O'Fallon, high constable of Connaught, was slain by the men of Brefney, in Moyrein.

Geoffrey O'Donnell marched with a predatory force into Tyrone, and took therefrom much cattle and many hostages; but on his return he was overtaken by Bryan O'Neill, and a fierce battle ensued, in which the people of Tyrone were defeated with great loss, and many of their chiefs were slain.

A. D. 1253.

Alinn O'Sullivan, bishop of Lismore, died.

David Maekelly O'Gillpatrick, bishop of Clonmaenoi, died; and Thomas O'Quinn, a friar minor, was consecrated at Rome his successor.

Gillkelly O'Ruadhain, bishop of Hy Fiaehra (Kilalla), died. John O'Laidig, a friar of the order of St. Dominick, was appointed his successor at Kilalla of Hy Fiaehra, and was consecrated at Tuam, on the second Sunday in Lent.

A monastery was founded for friars of the order of St. Dominick, in Sligo.

A monastery was founded for the same order of friars at Athleathan,¹ in Lieney.

A court was built at Kiltessin,² by Tomaltagh O'Conor, bishop of Elphin.

Owen O'Heyne, lord of Hy Fiaehra (in Galway), died.

The daughter of the earl of Ulster, wife of Miles Mac Costello, died, and was buried in the monastery of Boyle.

The English of Ireland, headed by Mac Maurice (Fitzgerald), marched with a great force into Tyrone to attack O'Neill, but obtained no hostages, for they were defeated with great slaughter on that expedition.

Bryan O'Neill, prince of Tyrone, waged war against the English, and, having gone to Moy Coba (Downpatrick), demolished its castle and many others, burned Stradbhaile (Dundalk), and cleared (from the English) the entire plain of Ulidia.

Donal O'Reilly, the Caeoh O'Reilly (i.e. the one-eyed O'Reilly), Cathal O'Conor, and Giollana-neev O'Ferrall, having collected their forces, marched into Muintir Eoluis to attack Cathal Mac Rannall, and plundered the entire of the country. They encamped for two nights at Tully Alain, and the third night at Eanach Dhuibh. Giollana-neev O'Ferrall separated from them there, and the O'Reillys, with Cathal O'Conor, proceeded to Cluain Conmaiene,³ where they remained encamped for a night. When Hugh, son of Felim O'Conor, received intelligence of this, he quickly collected his forces, and followed them to Cluain, where a fierce engagement ensued, in which O'Reilly's party were defeated, and Donogh, son of Giolla Iosa, son of Donogh O'Reilly, Mac Giolla Toedog O'Biobhsaigh, and many others, were slain.

The monastery of St. Francis in Ardfert, was erected by Mac Maurice of Kerry.

A. D. 1254.

Maolfinnen O'Beollan, eorb of Drumeliff, died.

Murogh O'Melaghlín was slain by the son of Sionagh O'Catharnaigh.

Aindilis O'Henery, the tower of generosity of the north of Ireland, died.

Pierce Pramister (Birmingham), lord of Conmaiene of Dunmore,¹ died.

The monastery of the friars of St. Dominick at Athlone, was burned.

Pierce Ristubard lord of Siol Maolruain (in

A. D. 1253.

1. Athleathan in Lieney. A Dominican monastery was founded here by the de Exeters or Mac Jordans, lords of Athleathan. This place was situated in the present parish of Templemore or Strade, in the barony of Gallen, county of Mayo, and was in the ancient territory of Lieney, and now the diocese of Achonry.

2. Kiltessin, probably Kiltinstin, in the county of Rosecommon, where the O'Conors had a castle.

3. Cluain Conmaiene, that is, Cloone, in the barony of Mohill, county of Leitrim. Eanach Dubh, now the parish of Annaduff, barony of Mohill, county of Leitrim.

A. D. 1254.

1. Conmaiene of Dunmore. now the barony of Dunmore, county of Galway, of which the de Berminghams, barons of Athenry, were lords.

Roscommon), and a baron, was slain on Lough Ree by Murrough O'Melaghlin.

Sitrig Mac Seanlaoigh was taken prisoner by Felim, son of Cathal Croidearg O'Conor; and the Seanshaileach Mac Seanlaoigh's eyes were put out by him for his evil intentions, as he had been informed that they had conspired to betray him.

Donogh Mac Donogh, son of Tomaltagh, and Awlave O'Biobhsaigh were slain by the Conacians at Cluain Conmaicne.

Manus O'Gara was slain in a quarrel by the people of Felim O'Conor.

The king of France returned from Jerusalem, after having established a peace of three years' duration, between the Christians and the Saracens.

The monastery of Kildare was founded by the earl of Kildare; and the family have a splendid tomb there, in the chapel of St. Mary.

A. D. 1255.

Dunslevey O'Flynn, abbot of the church of SS. Peter and Paul, at Armagh, died; and Patrick O'Murray, prior of the same house, was elected to the abbacy.

Thomas Mac Dermott, archdeacon of Elphin, died. He was parson of Moylurg, Airteach, and Clan Cuain.

O'Laidigh, archdeacon of Eanach Dune, died.

Hugh, son of Felim O'Conor, went into Tyrone, and made peace between his father and the people of the north of Ireland; and he brought back with him all the Conacians who had been in exile there, together with their property, through the midst of his inveterate enemies, namely, the sons of Roderick O'Conor and the English, who did not venture to molest them.

Mac Carroll assumed the archbishoprick of Cashel of Munster.

Florence Mac Flynn, archbishop of Tuam,

A. D. 1255.

1. Tochar Mona Coinneadh signifies the bog pass of the conference, and obtained its name from the above circumstance, which occurred on the borders of Roscommon and Galway, where a great battle was fought, as given in the Annals under the year 1316.

A. D. 1256.

1. Luke, who had been dean of St. Martin's in London, was then archbishop of Dublin.

crossed the sea to confer with the king of England; and all the favours that he requested were honourably granted him by the king; after which he returned home.

Mahon O'Monaghan was slain at Buimlin.

Dermod O'Quinn, Awlave his son, and the chiefs of Muintir Giolgain, were slain at Faradhan of Moy Treagh (in Longford), by Giolla-na-neev O'Ferrall, who afterwards plundered their property.

A great conference was held between O'Conor (i. e. Felim) and Mac William Burke, at Tochar Mona Coinneadh.¹ A peace was ratified between them, and all his rights and possessions were conceded to Felim.

Juliana, daughter of the coarb of St. Cailin, (at Fenagh), and Giolla-na-neev, her brother, died.

Ragnailt, daughter of O'Ferrall, died in a bath.

A. D. 1256.

Flann (or Florence) Mac Flynn, archbishop of Tuam, died in Bristuma (Bristol).

The archbishop of Dublin¹ died.

Giolla Coimdhe O'Cinfaola, abbot of Eanach Dune, died.

O'Giollaraine, abbot of the church of the Trinity at Tuam, died.

A party of O'Reilly's people were slain by Hugh, son of Felim (O'Conor), namely, Cathal O'Reilly, lord of Muintir Maolmordha and of the tribe of Hugh Fionn; his two sons, namely, Donal Roe and Niall; his brother Cuchonacht; the three sons of Cathal Dubh O'Reilly, namely, Geoffry, Fergal, and Donal; and Annadh, the son of Donal O'Reilly, was slain by Conor Mac Tiarnan. Niall Caoch (the One-eyed) O'Reilly; Tiarnan Mac Brady; Giolla Michil Mac Taichlich (Mac Tully); Donogh O'Biobhsaigh; Manus Mac Gilduff, and upwards of sixty other chiefs, were slain. This was called the Battle of Moy-slecht,² and was fought on the border of

2. Moy-slecht, where this battle was fought, was the ancient name of the plain of Fenagh, in the county of Leitrim. Muintir Maolmordha was the tribe name of the O'Reillys of Cavan, from Maolmordha, one of their ancient chiefs. O'Reilly is mentioned here as the chief of the tribe of Hugh Finn, that is of Hugh the Fair, an ancient king of Connaught, who was an ancestor of the O'Reillys and O'Rourkes, princes of both Brefneys, or Cavan and Leitrim. An account of the other chiefs mentioned here, as fighting under the O'Reillys, is given in the note on Brefney, in this Number.

Ath Deirg, at Alt-na-hellte, above Beallach-na-Bethaidhe. The O'Reillys also slew many of the chiefs opposed to them, among whom were Dermot O'Flanagan, Flann Mac Oiraghty, Murrough Fionn O'Ferrall, and many others. The O'Reillys' Glasslaith (or Green-clad Chiefs), three times broke through the foremost ranks of their opponents, but at length the main body of the hostile party overpowered O'Reilly's people at Sailten-nangasan, and pursued them to Ait-Tighe-Meguirin, and from thence to the field of the great battle.

A lord justice³ arrived in Ireland from the king of England, and he and Hugh O'Conor had a conference at Rinn Duin (in Roscommon), when a peace was established between them, on condition, that while he was lord justice no part of the territory or lands of Connaught should be taken from O'Conor.

Roderick O'Gara, lord of Sliabh Lugha (in Sligo), was slain by David, son of Ricard Cuisin.

Hugh, the son of Felim O'Conor, plundered the lands of Mac Ricard Cuisin, in revenge for the death of O'Gara; he demolished his castle, slew all the people that were in it, and took the entire islands of Lough Techet (Lough Gara in Sligo).

Ranall Mac Brannan, lord of Corc Achlann,⁴ died.

Mac William Burke marched with a predatory force against Roderick O'Flaherty, and plundered Gno More and Gno Beag, and took the entire of Lough Oirbsen.⁵

Donogh Mac Senlaich died in the monastery of Boyle.

A great war arose between Hugh O'Conor and Con O'Rourke, that is, the son of Tiarnan, although they had long been friends before that time; O'Rourke then joined the English, and made peace with them, for himself and for his people, without the concurrence of Felim, or of his son Hugh O'Conor, who plundered O'Rourke's country, the Wednesday before Christmas, after which they made peace.

Athlone and Dun Doighre⁶ were burned in one day.

O'Donnell, that is, Geoffrey, led his forces into Fermanagh, where he took goods and hostages, and proceeding thence into Brefney O'Rourke, they submitted to his conditions.

A. D. 1257.

Mae Robiss, the abbot of Cluan Eoais (Clones), died.

Murrough, son of Maolbride O'Fairchellaidh, coarb of St. Maadhog,¹ died.

Maolpatrick Mac Cele, archdeacon of Kilalla, was slain.

Thomas O'Maolkiaran, chief sage of Ireland, died.

The monastery of the Virgin Mary at Roscommon was consecrated by the bishop Tomaltagh O'Conor, for the friars of St. Dominick.

Con, son of Tiarnan O'Rourke, having gone to the residence of O'Conor and his sons, to ratify a peace with them, he conceded to them their own demand on the lands of Brefney, together with Cloch Inse-na-d-Torc on Lough Fionnmuighe, into which Hugh, the son of Felim (O'Conor), sent a garrison.

Cathal Cuirrach, son of Hugh, son of Cathal Crovdearg (O'Conor), and Hugh, the son of Conor, son of Hugh, son of Cathal Crovdearg, had their eyes put out, by Hugh, son of Felim, son of Cathal Crovdearg, through hatred and rivalry, in violation of the guarantees of the clergy, and compact of the chiefs of Connaught.

Con, the son of Cathal O'Reilly, chief of Muin-tir Maolmordha, died.

Cloch Innse-na-d-Torc on Lough Fionnmuighe was burned by O'Rourke, and he turned the garrison out of it.

Hugh O'Conor appointed Sitric, the son of Ualgarg O'Rourke, as joint lord along with Conor, the son of Tiarnan O'Rourke, in consequence of which Donal, the son of Conor, slew Sitric.

3. The lord justice who came at this time was Geoffrey Alan de la Zoueh.

4. Corc Achlann, a district in the barony of Ballintobber, county of Rosecommon, of which the Mae Brannans were chiefs.

5. Lough Oirbsen, that is, Lough Corrib, county of Galway. Gno More and Gno Beag were two ancient districts west of Lough Corrib, in the barony of Moyeullen, county of Galway, of which the Mae Conrys were chiefs.—OGYIA II., p. 312.

6. Dun Doighre, now Duniry, in the barony of Leitrim, county of Galway, where the Mae Egans had a castle.

A. D. 1257.

1. Coarb of St. Maadhog, that is, successor of St. Moeg, who is given by Arehdall as abbot of Dromlane, in the county of Cavan, which abbey was founded by St. Moeg, first bishop of Ferns, in the sixth century, who was a native of Brefney. O'Fairchellaidh was probably the same name as O'Farrelly.

A conference was held between Felim O'Conor and the lord justice of Ireland, Mac William Burke, and all the English chiefs, at Athlone, where they made peace.

Hugh O'Conor committed great depredations on O'Rourke about Easter.

A brilliant battle was fought by Geoffrey O'Donnell, lord of Tirconnell, against the lord justice of Ireland, Maurice Fitzgerald, and the English of Connaught, at Credrain Cille,² in Roscede, in the territory of Carbury, north of Sligo, in defence of his principality. A fierce and terrible conflict took place, in which bodies were hacked, heroes disabled, and the strength of both sides exhausted; the men of Tirconnell maintained their ground, and completely overthrew the English forces in the engagement, and defeated them with great slaughter, but Geoffrey himself was severely wounded, having encountered in the fight Maurice Fitzgerald in single combat, in which they desperately wounded each other. By this fortunate victory the English and the Geraldines were driven from North Connaught. Mac Griffin, a noble knight, was taken prisoner by the people of O'Donnell on the same day, after which they burned and completely plundered Sligo. Donogh, the son of Cormac O'Donnell, was slain in the thick of the fight. They (the people of Tirconnell), then returned home in consequence of the dangerous wounds of O'Donnell, for otherwise he would have pursued the defeated English to the Moy. On Geoffrey's return home he demolished the castle of Caoluisce, which had been erected by the English to keep the people of Tirconnell in subjection.

Maurice Fitzgerald, lord justice of Ireland, for a long period the destroyer of the Irish, died.

The king of England granted a charter (or patent) to Felim O'Conor, for the five districts of the king.

A great war arose between Conor O'Brien, and the English of Munster, who were slaughtered by him.

Teige O'Brien also committed immense depredations on the English.

Conor, the son of Tiarnan O'Rourke, was slain at Ath-na-Failme, by Giolla Bearaigh O'Lamhduibh, one of his own people, and by the people of Matthew O'Reilly.

Cathal O'Mannachain died on the 6th of December.

A. D. 1258.

Abraham O'Conellan, archbishop of Armagh, received a Pallium from the court of Rome, in which he celebrated mass at Armagh, on the second day of the month of June.

Walter de Salerna, archbishop of Tuam, and chief dean of London, died in England, having been appointed by the king of England to those dignities the preceding year.

Tomaltach O'Conor, bishop of Elphin, was translated to the archiepiscopal see of Tuam.

Gillcreest O'Carmacain, dean of Elphin, died.

Anmanach O'Cuirnin, a man distinguished for his piety, died.

Matthew, son of Giolla Roe O'Roduibh, that is, the Master, died.

The bishop's court at Elphin, and the court of Kilsesin, were demolished by Hugh O'Conor.

O'Donnell (Geoffrey), was confined by his mortal wounds at Lough Beathach,¹ for the space of a year after the battle of Credrain. When O'Neill (Bryan) received intelligence of this, he collected his forces for the purpose of marching into Tirconnell, and sent messengers to O'Donnell demanding sureties, hostages, and submission from the Tirconnellians, as they had no lord capable to govern them after Geoffrey. The messengers having delivered their commands to O'Donnell, returned back with all possible speed. O'Donnell summoned the Connellians from all quarters to wait on him, and having assembled at their lord's call, he ordered them, as he was not able to lead them, to prepare for him the coffin in which his remains should finally be conveyed, to place him therein, and to carry him in the very midst of his people; he told them to fight bravely as he was amongst them, and not to submit to the power of their enemies. They then proceeded in

2. Credrain, where this battle was fought, is a rising ground near the town of Sligo, to the north.

A. D. 1258.

1. Lough Beathach, probably the lake in the parish of Gartan, near Kilmakrennan, county of Donegal.

battle array at the command of their lord to meet O'Neill's force, until both armies confronted each other at the river called Suileach (Swilly). They attacked each other without regard to friend or relative, until at length the Tyronians were defeated and driven back, leaving behind them many of their men, horses, and much property. On the return of the Connellian force from their victory, the coffin in which O'Donnell was borne was laid down on the place where the battle was fought, where his spirit departed, from the mortification of the wounds he had received in the battle of Credrain; and his death was not dishonourable, for in all his expeditions he was victorious over his enemies. When O'Neill received intelligence of the death of O'Donnell, he again sent messengers to the Connellians demanding hostages and submission from them, upon which the Connellians held a consultation to determine what they should do, and to decide to what chief they should yield obedience and submission, for they had no acknowledged lord to command them after the death of Geoffrey. While thus deliberating, they beheld Donal Oge,² the son of Donal More O'Donnell, who had arrived from Scotland, a noble and intelligent youth, in his eighteenth year, on whom the Connellians conferred the chieftainship. That was a proper election, for he was by right their own lawful lord. The Connellians informed him of their choice, and at the same time communicated to him the message they had received from O'Neill, at which he expressed his indignation and contempt; and on that occasion he made use of that excellent old saying in the Albanian Gaelic (Scottish Gaelic), which they used in conferring with the messengers, viz.:

"go mbiadh a doimhan fein ag gach fear."

"That every man should have his own country."

Similar to the return of Tuathal Teachtmair over the seas from Albain (Scotland), when the chieftains of Ireland were expelled by the Aithech Tuatha,³ was the return of Donal Oge O'Donnell from Albain (Scotland), in supporting the rights of princes, in reconciling chiefs, and in defending his own territory from foreigners, from the day he was inaugurated in the lordship to the day of his death.

The monastery of Claen (Clane), in Leinster, in the diocese of Kildare, was founded for brothers of the order of St. Francis.

Hugh, the son of Felim (O'Connor), and Teige O'Brien, marched with a great force to Caol Uisge (near Newry,) to hold a conference with Bryan O'Neill, to whom the foregoing chiefs, after making peace with each other, granted the sovereignty over the Irish; and they agreed that the hostages of Hugh O'Connor should be given to him as sureties for the fulfilment of this compact, and that the hostages of O'Reilly's people, and also those of Hy Briuin,⁴ from Kells to Drumcliff, should be likewise given to Hugh, the son of Felim (O'Connor).

Mac Sorley (Mac Donnell) sailed round Connaught with a fleet from Insi Gall (the Hebrides), until he came to Conmaicne Mara (Connamara), where he captured a merchant vessel, and seized on the cargo, which consisted of wine, cloth, brass, and iron. Jordan Dexeter, the sheriff of Connaught, pursued Mac Sorley to the island at which he stopped, and near which his ships were anchored. A conflict ensued, in which Jordan was slain, and also Pierce Agabard, a knight belonging to his party, with many others. Mac Sorley and his people returned to their own country joyfully and enriched.

Donal, son of Conor, son of Tiarnan O'Rourke, who was kept in confinement on behalf of his father by Felim O'Connor and his son Hugh, was set at liberty by them, and appointed to the lordship of Brefney⁵ in the place of his father.

Macraith Mac Tiarnan, chief of Teallach Dun-

2. Donal Oge O'Donnell, the son of Donal More, prince of Tirconnell, was born A. D. 1240; his mother was the daughter of Cathal Crovdearg O'Connor.

3. Aithech Tuatha, a name translated to Attacots, was applied to the Firbolgs, who in the second century by a temporary insurrection defeated the Milesians, and set upon the throne of Ireland a monarch of their own race, namely, Cairbre Ceann Cait, but the Milesian monarchy was soon after restored under Tuathal Teachtmair, or Tuathal the Acceptable.

4. Hy Briuin. This was the name applied to the territory of both Brefsies, as explained in the note on Brefney; and this passage shews that Hy Briuin, or Brefney, extended from Kells in Meath, to Drumcliff, in the county of Sligo; thus comprising the counties of Cavan and Leitrim, with a portion of Meath, and a part of the barony of Carbury in Sligo, O'Rourke being prince of West Brefney or Leitrim, and O'Reilly of East Brefney or Cavan.

5. 1. Brefney. This ancient and extensive territory comprised the present counties of Cavan and Leitrim, and was part of the kingdom of Connaught down to the reign of Elizabeth, when it was formed into the counties of Cavan and Leitrim, and Cavan was added to the province of Ulster. Some of the earliest events in Irish history are recorded as having taken place in this territory.

chadha,⁶ was slain by Donal, son of Tiarnan O'Rourke. The Conacians, and the men of Brefney in general, then deprived Donal of the lordship, and the people of Teallach Dunchadha slew his

About nine centuries before the Christian era, according to our ancient annalists, Tigearmas, monarch of Ireland, of the race of Heremon, was the first who introduced Druidism and the worship of idols into Ireland; and it is stated, that while worshipping the idol Crom Cruach, the chief deity of the Irish Druids, along with a vast assemblage of his subjects at Magh Sleacht in Breifne, on the feast of Samhuin, (one of their deities, the day dedicated to whose rites was the same as the last day of October), he himself, with three-fourths of his people, were struck dead by lightning, as a punishment from heaven for his introduction of idolatry into the kingdom. Magh Sleacht signifies either the Plain of Adoration, or the Plain of Slaughter, and obtained its name from the Druidical rites performed there, or from the human sacrifices which the Pagan Irish offered up to the deities of Druidism, as the Canaanites offered up their's to Moloch. In this place stood a famous temple of the Druids, with the great idol Crom Cruach surrounded by twelve minor idols, composed of pillar stones, and decorated with heads of gold. This temple and its idols were destroyed by St. Patrick, who erected a church on its site. Of these events accounts are given in the Life of St. Patrick by Jocelyn the monk, in Cambrensis Eversus, O'Flaherty's Ogygia, and Vallancy's Collectanea. Magh Sleacht was situated in the present barony of Mohill, county of Leitrim, and afterwards received the name of Fiodhnach, which may signify a wild or woody district. Fenagh in after ages had a celebrated monastery and college, and was long famous as a seat of learning and religion. Cromleacs of huge stones and other Druidical remains are to be seen at Fenagh to this day.

Brefney was inhabited in the early ages by the Fir-Bolgs, who are called Belgæ or Belgians by various writers, afterwards by the Milesians of the race of Ir, or the Clanna Rory, and lastly by the Milesians of the race of Heremon. The Fir-Bolgs who possessed Brefney, are mentioned by the ancient writers under the names of Ernaidhe, Ernaians, and Ernaechs, which names are stated to have been given them from their inhabiting the territories about Lough Erne. Ptolemy, the great Greek geographer of the second century, denominates them Ernidi, Ernidoi, or Erdinoi, as given in his Map of Ireland by Ware, O'Connor, and others. These Ermeans possessed the entire of Brefney, and make a remarkable figure in the history of the early ages, from the various great battles fought between them and the Milesian kings.

The name Breifne is sometimes also written Brefne, and Breghne, latinised Brefnia and Brefinia, and anglicised Brefney, and is generally called by the old English writers, the Brenny. In Seward's Topography, the name Breifne is derived from Bre, a hill, and therefore signifies the country of little hills, or the hilly country, a derivation which may not appear inappropriate as descriptive of the topographical features of the country, as innumerable hills are scattered over the counties of Cavan and Leitrim. These hills, of different sizes, are chiefly of a round or conical form, very beautiful and fertile, producing various crops, and capable of cultivation to their very summits; and many fertile valleys are interspersed among them. From the productive soil of these hills, and their having been cultivated from the earliest times, the name Breifne may probably be derived from Bre, a hill, and feine, husbandmen, and hence may signify the hills of the husbandmen; or, it may be derived from Bre, hills, and fine, people, that is, the hills of the people, or the hills inhabited by the people. On a vast number of these hills over Cavan and Leitrim are found those circular earthen ramparts called forts or raths, and some of them very large, which circumstance shews that those hills were inhabited from the earliest ages. As several thousands of those raths exist even to this day, and many more have been levelled, it is evident that there was a very great population in ancient Brefney. The erection of these raths has been absurdly attributed to the Danes, for it is evident that they must have formed the chief habitations and fortresses of the ancient Irish many centuries before brother Cathal, the son of Conor. After that the government of Hy Briuin was given to Art, the son of Cathal Riavagh O'Rourke, viz. from the mountain eastward.

the Danes set foot in Ireland, since they abound chiefly in the interior and remote parts of the country, where the Danes never had any permanent settlement. In Cavan and Leitrim are many magnificent mountains and extensive bogs, the remains of ancient forests, in which have been frequently found the huge horns of the Irish elk; there are also many large and beautiful lakes, and several fine rivers, including the mighty Shannon, which has its source at the foot of the towering Cuileagh, one of the Cavan mountains. Amongst the mountains of Brefney may be mentioned Sliabh-an-Iarain, or the Iron Mountain, in Leitrim, famous for its mines of coal and iron.

Brefney also bore the name of Hy Briuin Breifne, or Hy Briunc Brefney, from its being possessed by the race of Hy Briuin. The Hy Briuin race derived their name from being the descendants of Bryan, king of Connaught, in the fourth century, son of Eochaidh Muighmeadhoin, who was monarch of Ireland from A. D. 358 to A. D. 366, and was of the race of Heremon. The name Muighmeadhoin is derived from Magh, a plain, which in the genitive makes Muighe, and meadhoin, which Dr. O'Connor, in his translation of the Annals, renders a cultivator; and he calls this monarch Eochius camporum cultor, that is, Eochaidh the cultivator of plains. Bryan, above-mentioned, had twenty-four sons, whose posterity possessed the greater part of Connaught, and were called the Hy Briuin race. Of this race were the O'Conors, kings of Connaught; the O'Rourkes; O'Reillys; Mac Dermotts; Mac Donoghs; O'Flahertys; O'Malleys; Mac Oiraghtys; O'Fallons; O'Flynn; O'Malones; Mac Gaurans; Mac Tiernans, or Mac Kernans; Mac Bradys, and some other clans. From Fiachra, brother of Bryan, king of Connaught, were descended the race of Hy Fiachra, of whom were the O'Dowds, O'Heynes, O'Shaughnessys, and other clans in Connaught, as hereafter explained. From Niall of the Nine Hostages, monarch of Ireland, another of Bryan's brothers, were descended, as mentioned in the notes on Meath, Tir Eogain and Tir Conaill; the O'Melaghlins, kings of Meath; the O'Neills, kings of Ulster, and princes of Tyrone; the O'Donnells, princes of Tirconnell, and some other chiefs of Ulster: thus these three great branches, descended from Eochaidh Muighmeadhoin, were the chief rulers of the kingdoms of Meath, Ulster, and Connaught.

The O'Rourkes and O'Reillys derived their descent from Aodh Fionn, or Hugh the Fair, king of Connaught, who died in the beginning of the seventh century, A. D. 611, and was buried at Fenagh. This Aodh Fionn was a descendant of Bryan, king of Connaught, before-mentioned; and from him the O'Rourkes and O'Reillys were called Clann Aodha Finn, that is, the posterity of Hugh the Fair. The O'Ruarachs, O'Ruaircs, O'Ruacs, or O'Rourkes, took their name from one of their ancient chiefs, Ruarc, who was prince of Brefney in the tenth century. The name Ruarc may be derived from Ruadh, valiant, and arg, a champion; or from Ruadh, red, and arg, a champion, and hence it may signify the valiant champion, or the red-haired champion. Mention is made by the Four Masters in the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth centuries of many celebrated chiefs of the O'Rourkes: these chiefs often contended with the O'Conors for the sovereignty of Connaught; and in the tenth century, one of them, namely, Fergal O'Rourke, became king of Connaught, and reigned from A. D. 960, to A. D. 964, when he was killed in a battle with the men of Meath. In the twelfth century Tiarnan O'Rourke was king of Brefney, and is frequently mentioned in these Annals, on account of the abduction of his wife, Dervorgal, (who was daughter of Murtogh O'Melaghlins, king of Meath), by Dermot Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, which led to the English invasion under Strongbow and his followers. The O'Rourkes had the title of kings of Brefney and Connaught, and in later times that of princes of West Brefney, that is, of the county of Leitrim, the O'Reillys becoming princes of East Brefney, or the county of Cavan. Ancient Brefney was, in the tenth century, divided into two principalities, the O'Rourkes, Bryan Mac Samradhain (Mac Gauran), lord of Teallach Eachdach (Tullaghagh in Cavan), was slain by the Conacians.

Awlave, the son of Art O'Rourke, lord of Brefney, from the mountain westward, died.

Thomas O'Beirne died.

Ardgal O'Connor, son of the coarb of St. Coman, died.

as princes of West Brefney, being the principal chiefs, and the O'Reillys, as princes of East Brefney, possessing the territory of the present county of Cavan. O'Rourke's country was called Brefney O'Rourke, and O'Reilly's country Brefney O'Reilly. O'Rourke's ancient principality comprised the present county of Leitrim, with the present barony of Tullaghagh, and part of Tullaghounoh, in the county of Cavan, the river at Ballyconnell being the boundary between Brefney O'Rourke and Brefney O'Reilly. Brefney O'Rourke was separated from Fermanagh or Mac Guire's country, by Lough Melvin, Lough Mac Nean, and Cuileagh mountain. It appears also that a small portion of the barony of Carbury, in the county of Sligo, belonged to Brefney O'Rourke. Conmaicne, also called Conmaicne of Moy Rein, of which the O'Rourkes were also lords, was an ancient territory which derived its name from Conmac, one of the sons of Meva, the celebrated queen of Connaught, at the beginning of the Christian era; it comprised the southern part of Leitrim, namely, the baronies of Carrigallen, Leitrim, and Mohill, with a portion of the northern part of Anally, or county of Longford, extending nearly to Granard. It appears also that O'Rourke's rule extended at one period over a portion of Roscommon, for, in the Annals under the year 1562, it is stated that the power of O'Rourke extended from Caladh, in the territory of Ily Maine, (in the county of Roscommon), to Droghais, that is Bundroos, on the borders of Leitrim and Donegal, and from Granard in Teffia, in the county of Longford, to the strand of Eothuille, in the barony of Tírerell, near Ballysadare, in the county of Sligo. In the Annals at the year 1470, it is recorded that the O'Rourkes were inaugurated as princes of Brefney at a place called Cruachan O'Caprain, supposed to be Croaghan, near Killeshandra, as it is stated that the O'Reillys and the people of Tullyhunco met O'Rourke's party at Ballyconnell, to oppose the inauguration. The O'Rourkes had their chief castles at Dromahaire, Leitrim, Cloncorick or Carrickallen, and Castle Car, near Manorhamilton. They maintained their independence, as princes of West Brefney, down to the reign of James I., and had considerable possessions even until the Cromwellian wars, when their estates were confiscated. Several of the O'Rourkes have been distinguished in the military service of foreign states, as count Owen O'Rourke of the Austrian service, under the empress Maria Theresa; count John O'Rourke, a distinguished soldier of fortune, who served as a commander in the armies of France, Russia, and Poland, between the years 1760 and 1780, and his brother count O'Rourke, who was a colonel of cavalry in the Imperial Austrian service, at the same time, and was married to a niece of field marshal de Laey. Accounts of these officers and the genealogy of the O'Rourkes, as princes of Brefney, by Charles O'Connor of Belenagar, are given in Walker's Hibernian Magazine for 1782. There is at present a count O'Rourke in the military service of Russia.

The O'Reillys, as above stated, were descended from the same ancestor as the O'Rourkes, namely Aodh Fionn, or Hugh the Fair, king of Connaught, in the beginning of the seventh century. They took the name O'Raighilligh or O'Raghallaigh, pronounced O'Railligh, and rendered into O'Reilly, from Raghallaich, one of their celebrated chiefs, in the tenth century. The name Raighallaich may be derived from Raigh, an arm, and all or allach, strong or powerful; hence it may signify, strong of arm, an epithet very applicable to a warlike chief. The O'Reillys also took the tribo-name of Muintir Maolmordha, or the people of Maolmordha, from Maolmordha, another of their celebrated chiefs. This name Maolmordha, or Mulmora, latinised Milesius, and anglicised Miles, was a favorite name with the O'Reillys, and was borne by many of their chiefs.

The principality of Brefney O'Reilly comprised originally the greater part of the present county of Cavan, the boundary between it and Brefney O'Rourke being, as already stated, the river at Ballyconnell, and being separated from Fermanagh, or Mac Guire's country, by the Ballyconnell mountains; but in after times the O'Reillys extended their dominion over the entire of the county of Cavan, and at one period over a great part of Leitrim, as it is stated in the Annals, under the year 1239, that Fergal, son of Cuchonacht O'Reilly, was lord of Brefney, of Dartry, and of Clan Firmaighe, from the mountains eastward, which shows that he possessed the territory of Dartry, in the barony of Rossellogher, in the county of Leitrim. It appears also that the O'Reillys extended their territory and authority into the borders of the English Pale, as far as Kilmainham wood, to the Black Water near Kells, and to Crossakeele and Oldecastle in Meath, from thence as far as Granard in Longford, and to parts of Westmeath. In O'Reilly's Irish Writers, at the years 1380 and 1415, it is stated that Thomas, son of Mahon O'Reilly, lord of Clan Mahon, and prince of Brefney, destroyed eighteen castles of the English in the Pale, and overran the country from Drogheda to Dublin. According to other authorities this Thomas O'Reilly erected a castle at Ballinlough, in Westmeath. The O'Reillys, exercising an independent sovereignty, as princes of Brefney, coined their own money; as appears by a Parliament held at Trim, A.D. 1447, in the reign of Henry VI., by sir John Talbot, earl of Shrewsbury, lord lieutenant; and by another Parliament held at Naas, A.D. 1457, by the lord deputy, Thomas Fitzgerald, earl of Kildare, in which Acts were passed prohibiting the circulation of the Irish coinage, called O'Reilly's money, in the English Pale. From the thirteenth to the sixteenth century many valiant chiefs of the O'Reillys are mentioned, who fought several battles with the English forces of the Pale, over whom they gained many victories, as appears in these Annals. The O'Reillys located on the borders of Meath were obliged to maintain an incessant warfare to defend the frontiers of Ulster against the English of the Pale, who made constant incursions into the northern territories. Camden, writing in the reign of Elizabeth, says that the O'Reillys were famous for cavalry; and Fynes Morrison, in his account of the wars of Hugh O'Neill, earl of Tyrone, against Elizabeth, states that the O'Reillys of Brenny brought to the standard of O'Neill eight hundred foot, and two hundred horse. The O'Reillys maintained their independence down to the reign of James I., and possessed great property and influence even until the Cromwellian wars, after which their estates were confiscated. Maolmora O'Reilly, commonly called Miles the Slasher, was a celebrated chief, distinguished for his great strength and undaunted valour: he fought many battles in Cavan and other places during the Cromwellian war, and fought at the battle of Benburb, under Owen Roe O'Neill. The O'Reillys were elected and inaugurated in early times as princes and tanists of Brefney, on the Hill of Seantomán or Shantomán, a large hill between Cavan and Ballyhaise, on the summit of which may still be seen the remains of a Druidical temple, consisting of several huge stones standing upright. In after times the O'Reillys were inaugurated on the Hill of Tullymongan, above the town of Cavan. The O'Reillys had castles at Tullymongan, Ballynacargy, Tullyvin, Liscannon, Belturbet, Ballyconnell, Cloughoughter, Kilmore, Lisnora, and Cauett, near Crossdoney; at Tonagh, and Ballinrinke, near Lough Sheelin; at Kilnacrott, Loughramor, and Mullagh; at Tonragee, now Balleborough, and at Muff near Kingscourt, the ruins of some of which castles still remain. An interesting account of the O'Reillys in the reign of James I., is given in the works of Sir John Davies. Several of the particulars above mentioned concerning the O'Reillys have been collected from the Book of Cavan, an ancient record, chiefly compiled by the learned Chevalier O'Gorman, from the works of O'Cuirrin, Historiographer of Brefney, and other ancient Irish MSS., together with family papers. The original of this curious and interesting MS. is in the possession of the publisher of these Annals, Mr. Geraghty, of Anglesea-street. The O'Reillys are extremely numerous, being estimated at about 20,000 persons of the name in the county of Cavan, and there are many respectable families of them in the counties of Cavan, Meath, Westmeath,

A great war arose between the English and Conor O'Brien, during which Ardrathan,⁷ Kilcolgan and many other country towns, with the corn of the country, were burned.

Longford, Louth, Down, Dublin, Kildare, and Queen's County. Many of the O'Reillys have been distinguished commanders in the military service of foreign states, and among them may be mentioned Count Alexander O'Reilly, who, between the years 1770 and 1800, was Generalissimo of the Spanish armies, and was of the same stock as the O'Reillys of Baltrasna, in Meath; of Kilnacrott, in the county of Cavan; and of Thomastown castle in Louth. Count Andrew O'Reilly, of the family of Ballinlough in Westmeath, was for more than fifty years a distinguished general in the Austrian service, and died at Vienna, in 1832, in the 90th year of his age. Count Michael Charles Joseph Reillé, a distinguished general of cavalry in the service of France, in all Buonaparte's campaigns, and at present a peer of France, is descended from one of the Irish O'Reillys, who was an officer in the service of France in the last century.

The chiefs and clans of Brefney and the territories they possessed in the twelfth century, are, according to O'Dugan, as follows: I. O'Ruair or O'Rourke, who is designated by O'Dugan, Ardriogh Breifne as buan smacht, that is, chief king of Brefney of lasting sway, and to whom, he states, the rents or tributes of Connaught were paid. II. O'Raghallaigh or O'Reilly, chief of Muinter Maolmordha, designated as—

"Ríoghthaoiseach na ruathar n-garbh, O'Raghallaigh na ruadh arm."

"Head chief of fierce conflicts, O'Reilly of the red arms or shields."

III. Mac Tighearnain or the Mac Tiernans, also rendered Mac Kiernan or Mac Kernan, and by some anglicised to Masterson, who were chiefs of Teallach Dunchadha, signifying the tribe or territory of Donogh, so called from one of their chiefs, a name which has been made Tullaghonoh, now the barony of Tullyhuno, in the county of Cavan. Mac Tiernan is designated as "the true defender of valiant chiefs." The Mac Kernans are still very numerous in the counties of Cavan and Leitrim, and several of their chiefs are mentioned in the course of these Annals. IV. Mae Samhradhain, designated "a bond of strength," who was chief of Teallach Eachach, or Eachaidh, which signifies of the tribe or territory of Eachy, so called from one of their chiefs, and now the barony of Tullaghagh, county of Cavan. This name is now generally made Mac Gauran, and by some anglicised, or rather translated, Somers, from the word Samhradh, which signifies summer. The Mac Gaurans in modern times are very numerous in the counties of Cavan and Leitrim, and many chiefs of the name are mentioned in the Annals. V. Mac Consnauiha, chief of Clan Cionnaith, or Clan Kenny, now known as the Muinter Kenny mountains, and adjoining districts, near Lough Allen, in the parish of Innisnagragh, county of Leitrim. This name has been anglicised to Ford, and there are several of the clan still in those districts. Mac Consnauiha is mentioned as a chief in those Annals, A. D. 1252. VI. Mae Cagadhain, chief of Clan Fearmaighe, a district south of Dartry, and in the present barony of Dromahaire, county of Leitrim. This name has been anglicised Cogan or Coggan. O'Brien, in his Dictionary, at the word Eagan, states that the Mae Egans were chiefs of Clanfearamuighe in Brefney; hence Mae Cagadhain and Mae Eagain may probably have been the same clan. VII. Mae Darchaidh, which O'Brien writes Mae Dorehuighe, chief of Kinel Luachain, a district in the barony of Mohill, county of Leitrim, which may probably be traced in the name of the townland of Laheen. This name has been by some anglicised to Darey. VIII. Mac Flannelhadha, a name rendered into Mac Claney, who was chief of Dartraidhe or Dartry, an ancient territory co-extensive with the present barony of Rossclough in Leitrim. Several chiefs of the Mac Claney are mentioned in the course of these Annals, and they are designated by O'Dugan as the mighty Mae Claney. IX. O'Finn and O'Cearbhail or O'Carroll, who were chiefs of Calraighe, a district adjoining Dartry, in the present barony of Dromahaire, county of Leitrim, and which appears to have comprehended an adjoining portion of Sligo, near the present parish of Calry, in that county. This district is mentioned by Lanigan, (vol. i. p. 256), under the name of Calrigia, and comprised the parishes of Drunlease and Killargy in Leitrim, with part of the parish of Calry in Sligo. X. Mae Maoiliosa, chief of Magh Braeraighe, a district on the borders of Leitrim and Longford. XI. Mae Fionnhair or Finnevar, chief of Muinter Greadain or Gearadhain, a district in the southern part of Leitrim. XII. Mae Raghnaill or Mae Rannall, a name anglicised to Reynolds, who were chiefs of Muinter Eoluis. This territory was sometimes called Conmaicne of Moyrein, and comprised almost the whole of the present baronies of Leitrim, Mohill and Carrygallen, in the county of Leitrim, with a portion of the north of Longford. The Mae Rannalls were powerful chiefs, and are often mentioned in the course of these Annals. They were of the race of Ir, or Clanna Rory, and of the same stock as the O'Ferralls, princes of Anally, or Longford. They had castles at Rinn, Leitrim and Lough Seur. Of this family was George Nugent Reynolds, esq., of Letterfian, in Leitrim, a celebrated wit and poet, who is stated to have been the author of the beautiful song called "The Exile of Erin," though its composition was claimed by Thomas Campbell, author of "The Pleasures of Hope." XIII. O'Maolmiadhaigh or O'Mulvey, chief of Magh Neise or Nisi, a district which lay along the Shannon in the west of Leitrim, near Carrickon-Shannon.

A conference was held between the English and Irish concerning Felim O'Connor, and peace was established between them.

The following Clans in the counties of Cavan and Leitrim, not given by O'Dugan, are collected from various other sources: I. Mae Bradagh or Mac Brady. Tiarnan Mac Bradaigh is mentioned in the Annals, at the year 1256, as one of the chiefs who fought under the O'Reillys, in a great battle at Moysleacht, or Fenagh. The Mac Bradys sometimes called O'Bradys are given by Mae Geoghegan, as a branch of the O'Carrolls, chiefs of Calry, a territory in Leitrim, in the barony of Dromahaire, as already explained in the preceding part of this article; and they are in fact often called O'Carrolls at the present day, particularly by persons speaking in Irish, who designate them Carullaghs. The Mac Bradys are extremely numerous in the county of Cavan, particularly in the barony of Loughtee; and there are many respectable families of the name in various parts of Ireland. Baron Thomas Brady, a distinguished field marshal for many years in the Austrian service, and who died at Vienna in 1827, was a native of the county of Cavan. II. The Mae Gobhains, Mac-an-Ghobhains, or O'Gobhains, a name which has been anglicised to Smith, are very numerous in the county of Cavan, particularly in the parishes of Lavey, Laragh, and Killinkere, among whom have been many respectable families. The Mac Gowans are also very numerous in Rossinver in the county of Leitrim, as explained in the note on Dalaradia, or county of Down. The Mac Gowans are of the race of Ir, or Clanna Rory, descended from the famous warrior Conall Cearnach, or Conall the Victorious, who was chief of the Red Branch Knights of Ulster, about the commencement of the Christian era; and many of the name have proved their distinguished descent, being remarkable for great strength and bravery, and having been chiefs of gallowglasses under the O'Reillys. The Mac Gowans, originally a powerful clan in Dalaradia, or the county of Down, in early times produced many eminent ecclesiastics, learned men, and poets, too numerous to be here mentioned; and in modern times there are many highly respectable families of the name of Smith in many parts of Ireland, and several have been eminent lawyers, some of whom, no doubt, may trace their descent from the Milesian Mae Gowans. III. Mae Giolladuibh or Mae Gilduff. In the Annals, at the year 1252, Manus Mac Giolladuibh is mentioned as chief of Teallach Gairbheith, now the barony of Tullygarvey, in the county of Cavan. IV. Mae Taihghigh or Mae Tully. Giolla Miehil Mac Taihghigh, is mentioned in the Annals, at 1256, as one of the chiefs who fought under the O'Reillys at the battle of Fenagh. The Mac Tullys were chiefs of a district comprising the greater part of the parish of Drung, in the barony of Tullygarvey. V. Mac Cebes, a clan originally from Monaghan, but settled for many centuries in the county of Cavan, where they are very numerous, particularly in the baronies of Tullygarvey and Clanke. The Mac Cebes were a warlike Clan, and are frequently mentioned in the Book of Cavan, as commanders of battle-axe men under the O'Reillys in their wars with the English of the Pale. VI. The O'Sheridans, an ancient clan in the county of Cavan, and still numerous, particularly in the barony of Clannmahon. Of this clan were several persons distinguished in the literary world for the most brilliant abilities, as the Rev. Dr. Thomas Sheridan, president of the great school of Cavan, the friend and favourite companion of Dean Swift, and distinguished for his great wit and talents; Thomas Sheridan, his son, a celebrated actor, and author of an English Dictionary and other works; and Richard Brinsley Sheridan, the son of Thomas, well known for his splendid genius, and one of the most eminent men of his age as an orator, dramatist, and poet. Many other members of this family, too numerous to be here mentioned, have also been highly distinguished in the literary world. VII. The O'Corrys or O'Currys, given in the Map of Ortelius as a clan in Cavan, in the barony of Tullygarvey. They were located about the place afterwards called Cootehill. Of this family was James Curry, M.D., the celebrated writer on the civil wars of Ireland. VIII. The O'Clerys or Clarkes, a branch of the O'Clerys of Connaught and Donegal, and of the same stock as the celebrated authors of the Annals of the Four Masters, numerous in the county of Cavan, particularly in the baronies of Tullygarvey and Clanke, and many of whom have been distinguished for literary acquirements. IX. The O'Dalys and O'Mulligans, clans in the county of Cavan, who were hereditary bards to the O'Reillys, and of whom accounts may be found in O'Reilly's Irish Writers. X. The Fitzpatrick's, a numerous clan in the county of Cavan, chiefly located in the baronies of Tullyhannoo and Loughtee. They were originally of the Fitzpatrick's of Ossory, but have been settled for a long period in the county of Cavan. XI. The Fitzsimons, a numerous clan in the county of Cavan, chiefly in the barony of Castlerahan, who came originally from the English Pale, being of Anglo-Norman descent, but have been long located in the county of Cavan. XII. The O'Farrells, a numerous clan, particularly in the parish of Mullagh, county of Cavan. XIII. Several other clans in considerable numbers, in various parts of the county of Cavan, as the O'Murrays, Mac Donnells, O'Conaghtys, O'Connells, Mac Manus, O'Lynches, Mac Gilligans, O'Fays, Mac Gaffneys, Mac Hughs, O'Dolans, O'Droins, &c. XIV. Several clans in the county of Leitrim not mentioned by O'Dugan, as the Mac Gloins of Rossinver; the Mac Ferguses, who were hereditary arcnachs of the churches of Rossinver, and whose name has been anglicised to Ferguson; the O'Cuinnins, an ancient clan in the barony of Dromahaire, and many of whom were celebrated bards and historians; the Mac Kennys or Keanes; the Mac Cartans, O'Murrays, and O'Meehans, are also numerous in the county of Leitrim.

A. D. 1259.

Cormac O'Luimluin, bishop of Clonfert of St. Brenan, and the chief sage of Ireland, died a venerable divine at an advanced age.

Brefney O'Rourke was formed into the county of Leitrim, and so called from the town of Leitrim, in the reign of Elizabeth, A.D. 1565, by the lord deputy, sir Henry Sidney, and large grants of lands were given, in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I., to various British settlers there, the chief of whom were the Hamiltons, who erected a castle at Manorhamilton: the family of Villiers, dukes of Buckingham, had also large grants of lands in it. The Sherrards were in after times barons of Leitrim; and the family of Clements are at the present day earls of Leitrim.

Brefney O'Reilly was formed into a county, by the lord deputy, sir John Perrott, A. D. 1584, in the reign of Elizabeth, and called Cavan, from its chief town. On the confiscation of six counties in Tomaltaeh, son of Torlogh, son of Malachy O'Conor, returned from Rome after having been consecrated archbishop of Tuam in the Pope's palace, having brought with him a Pallium, and great favours for the clergy besides.

Ulster, as stated in the note on Tyrone, in the reign of James I., the county of Cavan, in accordance with the project called the Plantation of Ulster, was planted with British colonies, and in Pynnar's Survey of Ulster, A. D. 1619, as given in Harris's Iliernia, the following were the families of English and Scotch settlers in the county of Cavan: In Clanke, sir James Hamilton, John Hamilton, William Hamilton, and William Bailie. In Castlerahan, sir Thomas Ashe, Captain Culme, and sir John Elliot. In Tullygarvey, Captain Hugh Culme, Archibald Moore, John Ashe, and Captain Richard Tyrrell. In Loughtee, John Taylor, Thomas Waldron, John Fish, sir Hugh Wirral, sir Stephen Butler, sir George Mannering, and Peter Ameas. In Clannmahon, lord Lambert, Archibald Moore, and Captain Fleming. In Tullyhannoo, sir Claude Hamilton, sir James Craig, and Archibald Acheson. In Tullaghagh, Captain Culme, Walter Talbot, sir Richard, and sir George Grimes, and William Parsons. The following natives obtained grants of the forfeited lands: In Castlerahan, Shane Mac Philip O'Reilly, nine hundred acres. In Tullygarvey, Mulmora Mac Philip O'Reilly, one thousand acres; Captain O'Reilly, one thousand acres; Mulmora Oge O'Reilly, three thousand acres; and Maurice Mac Telligh (or Mac Tully), three thousand acres. In Clannmahon, Mulmora Mac Hugh O'Reilly, two thousand acres. In Tullaghagh, Mac Gauran, one thousand acres.

The following have been the noble families in the county of Cavan, since the reign of James I. The Lamberts, earls of Cavan; the Maxwells, earls of Farnham; the Cootes, earls of Bellamont; the Popes, earls of Belurbet; and the Verneys, barons of Belurbet. Amongst the great landed proprietors, but not resident in the county, are the marquess of Headfort; the earl Annesley; and the earl of Gosford; and of the landed proprietors resident in the county, the chief are the earl of Farnham, and the families of Sanderson, Pratt, Burrows, Clements, Coote, Southwell, Humphreys, and Nesbitt.

The see of Kilmore was founded by St. Feidlimidh or Felimy, in the sixth century. The bishops of Kilmore were in early times styled Bishops of Brefney, of Hy-Briune Brefney, and sometimes of Tir Briune, a name latinised by Ware to Triburna. The diocese comprises almost the entire of the county of Cavan, with the greater part of Leitrim, a large portion of Fermanagh, and a small portion of Meath.

II. Fermanagh, an ancient territory, the same as the present county of Fermanagh. It is written in the Irish, Feara Manach, Fearnanach, and Feara Monach. The origin of the word is difficult to determine, but it might be derived from Feara, men, and manach, of monks, which might originate from its famous monastery at Devinish; or, it might be derived from Feara, men, and monach, of marshes, that is, men inhabiting a marshy country.

About eight centuries before the Christian era, in the reign of Fiacha Labhrúine, monarch of Ireland, as stated by all the ancient annalists, the lake afterwards called Lough Erne suddenly burst forth and overflowed a great tract of land, which was called Magh Geannain, or the Plain of Geannan, so called from Geannan, one of the Fir Bolg kings. This lake, as explained in the note on Tircennail, had at first the name of Lough Saimor (and is called by Cambrensis, Sanarius), but afterwards obtained the name of Lough Erne, which, according to Peter Walsh, in quoting Cambrensis Eversus, derived the name of Erne from Erna, the favourite waiting-maid of Meav, the famous Queen of Connaught, who was drowned there. The ancient inhabitants of this territory, as explained in the note on Brefney, were the Erneans, of the race of the Fir Bolgs, who were conquered in a great battle by the above-mentioned monarch, Fiacha Labhrúine, leaving the Milesians masters of the country. In the tenth century, as stated by various historians, the Danes had a large fleet on Lough Erne.

The Giolla Cam Mac Gillechiarain, a man distinguished in literature and poetry, died.

Hugh O'Connor gave the residence of Awlave, the son of Art, to Art Beag, the son of Art

In the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth centuries, the head chief of this territory was O'Dubhdara, and several of the name are mentioned in the Annals of the Four Masters; amongst others, Giolla Criost O'Dubhdara, Prince of Fermanagh, who was killed by the men of Fermanagh at Daimlinis, or Devinish Island, in Lough Erne, A.D. 1076. The O'Dubhdaras were probably of the same race as the Mac Guires, who afterwards became princes of Fermanagh. The name in Irish is Mac Uidhir, sometimes written Maguibhir, which is pronounced Mac Ivir, and has been made Mac Guire and Maguire. The Mac Guires took this name from Uidhir, one of their ancient chiefs; and they are of the race of Clan Colla, of the same descent as the Mac Mahons, lords of Monaghan; the O'Hanlons, chiefs of Orier, in Armagh; the O'Kellys, lords of Hy Maine, in Galway and Roscommon; and other clans, of whom a full account has been given in the note on Orgiall. Many valiant chiefs of the Mac Guires are mentioned in the course of these Annals; and in O'Dugan's Topography of the twelfth century, Mac Uidhir, or Mac Guire, is given as chief of Fera Monach, or Fermanagh, and designated in terms which may be thus translated:

"Mac Guire, the head of the batallions,
Over the mighty men of Monach,
At home munificent in presents,
The noblest chief in hospitality."

The Mac Guires were inaugurated as princes of Fermanagh on the summit of Cuilcagh, a magnificent mountain near Swanlinbar, on the borders of Cavan and Fermanagh, and sometimes, also, at a place called Sciathl Gahhra, now Lisnaskea. They possessed the entire of Fermanagh, which was called Mac Guire's country, and maintained their independence as lords of Fermanagh down to the reign of James I., when their country was confiscated like other parts of Ulster; but Conor Roe Mac Guire obtained re-grants of twelve thousand acres of the forfeited lands of his ancestors, and was created baron of Enniskillen—a title which was also borne by several of his successors. Several chiefs of the Mac Guires are mentioned during the Cromwellian and Williamite wars, and many of them were afterwards distinguished officers in the Irish Brigade, in France, and also in the Austrian service. The Mac Guires produced several eminent and learned ecclesiastics; amongst whom may be mentioned Cathal, or Charles Mac Guire, archdeacon of Clogher, in the fifteenth century, the author of the celebrated Annals of Ulster. An interesting account of the Mac Guires in the reign of James I., is given in the works of Sir John Davies, who, amongst other particulars, states that the lands of Fermanagh were divided into three great portions, one of which was entirely possessed by Mac Guire, and another by the church, while the third was allotted to the rhymers and gallowglasses, that is, to the bards and swordsmen. The Mac Guires are still numerous, particularly in the counties of Fermanagh and Cavan; and many respectable families of the name exist in various parts of Ireland.

The following chiefs and clans of Fermanagh, and the territories they possessed in the twelfth century, have been collected from O'Dugan's Topography: I. O'Maolduin, or O'Muldoon, chief of Muintir Maolduin and Fera Luirg. This territory is now known as the barony of Lurg. The O'Maolduins are mentioned in the Annals, as early as the latter end of the tenth century; and Dubhdara O'Maolduin, lord of the men of Lurg, is stated to have been killed, A.D. 1000. II. Muintir Taithligh, or Mac Tullys, chiefs of Hy Laoghaire of Lough Lir, a district which lay in the barony of Lurg, near Lough Erne, towards Tyrone. III. Mac Duilgen, not mentioned in O'Dugan, is given in the Annals, which state that Fergus Mac Duilgen, lord of Lurg, was killed by the men of Brefney, A.D. 924. IV. O'Flannagain or O'Flanagan, chief of Tuath Ratha, that is, the district of the fortress, a territory which extended from Belmore to Belleek, and from Lough O'Rourke, and he took prisoner Art, the son of Cathal Riavach O'Rourke, after he had displaced Awlave.

Hugh O'Connor went to Derry Columkille, to Melvin to Lough Erne, comprising the present barony of Mahera-boy. It contained the ancient districts of Iarthar Maighe and Magh Niadh, and its name is still retained by the mountain Tura. At the year A.D. 1498, in these Annals, it is stated that Achaidh More was the town or residence of O'Flanagan. Of this ancient family were James O'Flanagan, a lieutenant general of Dillon's regiment in the Irish Brigade in France, and his brother, John O'Flanagan, who was a colonel in the Austrian army. V. Mac Giolla Finein or Mac Gillfinnen, chief of Muintir Peodachain of the Port. This territory, on the borders of Fermanagh and Donegal, is still traceable in the name of Pettigoe. At the years A.D. 1231 and 1234 in the Annals, Mac Gillfinnen is mentioned as a warlike chief, who made expeditions in his ships along with O'Donnell; and he is styled lord of Lough Erne: he is also mentioned in several other parts of the Annals. VI. Mac Giolla Michil, chief of Clan Congail. In the Annals at A.D. 1238, it is stated that Clan Congail and O'Ceanfoda lay in Tir Manach. Tirkenney barony is probably Tir O'Ceanfoda. The name Mac Giolla Michil, has been anglicised to Mitchell. VII. O'Maolruana or O'Mulrooney, and O'Eignigh or O'Heignigh, probably O'Heaney, who were chiefs of Muintir Maolruanaidh, and of Maoith Leirg Monach. VIII. Mac Domhnaill or Mac Donnell, chief of Clann Ceallaigh, now the barony of Clankelly.

The following clans in Fermanagh are not given in O'Dugan: I. The Mac Manus, formerly a numerous clan, chiefly in Tirkenney, who had the controul of the shipping on Lough Erne, and held the office of hereditary chief managers of the fisheries under Mac Guire. II. The Mac Cassidys, who were hereditary physicians to the Mac Guires, and many of the name also learned ecclesiastics and historians, amongst whom may be mentioned Roderick Mac Cassidy, archdeacon of Clogher, who partly compiled the Annals of Ulster. III. The O'Criochans or O'Creehans, a numerous clan in Fermanagh, and many of whom changed the name to Creighton. IV. The Magraths, who held some possessions at Termon Magrath, where they had a castle in the parish of Templecarne.

Fermanagh was formed into a county by the lord deputy Sir Henry Sydney, A.D. 1569, in the reign of Elizabeth. On the plantation of Ulster with British colonies, in the reign of James I., the following families of English and Scotch settlers obtained extensive grants of the confiscated lands in Fermanagh, as given in Pymar's Survey, A.D. 1619, in Harris's Hibernica. Sir James Belford; Mr. Adwick; sir Stephen Butler, ancestor of the earls of Lanesborough; John Sedborow; Thomas Flowerdew; Edward Hatton; sir Hugh Wirral; sir John Davies, who was attorney-general to King James I., and a celebrated writer; sir Gerrard Lowther; John Archdall; Edward Sibthorp; Henry Flower; Thomas Blennerhasset; sir Edward Blennerhasset, Francis Blennerhasset; sir William Cole, ancestor of the earls of Enniskillen; sir Henry Folliot; captain Paul Gore; captain Roger Atkinson; Malcolm Hamilton; George Humes; sir John Humes; and John Dunbar. Two or three of the natives obtained grants, namely, Con Mac Shane O'Neill, 1,500 acres; Bryan Maguire 2,000 acres at Tempodassell; and Conor Roe Maguire, who obtained large grants, and was created baron of Enniskillen, as before stated. The following have been the noble families in Fermanagh since the reign of James I. The Coles, earls of Enniskillen; the Creightons, earls of Erne; the Corrys, earls of Belmore; the Verneys, viscounts of Fermanagh; and the Butlers, barons of Newtown-Butler, and earls of Lanesborough. The family of Loftus, earls of Ely, have a seat in Fermanagh.

In the ecclesiastical division the chief part of Fermanagh is comprised in the diocese of Clogher, but a considerable portion of the county is in the diocese of Kilmore. The abbey on Devinish Island in Lough Erne, founded by St. Molaise or Laisrean, in the sixth century, was celebrated for many ages as a seat of learning and religion, and some of its venerable ruins still remain, together espouse the daughter of Dubhghall (Dugald), the son of Sorley (Mac Donnell).

Cathal Mae Consnamha, chief of Muintir Kenny (in Leitrim), had his eyes put out by Hugh O'Connor, who also put out the eyes of the hostages of Donal O'Rourke, namely, Niall Mac Donogh, and Bryan Mac Neill, and likewise those of the hostages of Hy Briuin.

Hugh O'Connor and Bryan O'Neill held a conference at Daiminis (Devinish Island), on Lough Erne.

Hugh O'Connor made peace with Donal O'Rourke, and gave him the lordship of Brefney.

Taichleach Mae Dermott died.

Miles Mac Costello died.

Hugh O'Connor took Gilbert Mac Costello prisoner, and plundered the entire of Sliabh Lugha (in the county of Sligo). Gilbert gave his three sons as hostages for his own release, and Hugh O'Connor set him at liberty.

Teige O'Brien, heir presumptive of Munster, died.

Sidhrídh O'Boyle was slain by his own kinsmen.

O'Donnell (Donal Oge), collected a great force and marched into Tyrone; Hugh Buidhe O'Neill marched with another force to join him, and they plundered the adjoining territories and proceeded into Oriel, and all submitted to them wherever they came, after which they returned home.

Felim O'Tuathail (O'Toole), lord of Siol or Hy Muiredhaigh,² died.

A. D. 1260.

Cionaeth O'Beirne, prior of Kilmore, (in Roscommon,) died.

Maolfinnen O'Mithigen died.

The archbishop of Armagh consecrated Malachy O'Connor¹ a bishop at Dundalk.

with one of the ancient round towers, a beautiful structure, in perfect preservation.

6. Teallach Dunchadha, now the barony of Tullyhuneo, in the county of Cavan, of which the Mac Tiarnans or Mac Kernans were chiefs, as explained in the note on Brefney.

7. Ardrathan, a parish in the baronies of Kiltartan, Loughrea, and Dunkellin, in the county of Galway. Kilcolgan another parish in the same baronies.

A. D. 1259.

1. Aodh Buidhe or Hugh Buidhe O'Neill, that is Hugh O'Neill, the Yellow, prince of Tyrone, who about this time took possession of a great part of the counties of Down and Antrim, which districts were called from him Upper and Lower Clanaboy, as explained in the note on Dalaradia.

2. Siol or Hy Muiredhaigh, sometimes called I Mail, was an

The battle of Drom Deirg² at Dundalcathghlas (Downpatrick) was fought by Bryan O'Neill and Hugh O'Connor against the English of the north of Ireland, in which many of the Irish chiefs were slain, namely, Bryan O'Neill, the chief ruler of Ireland; Donal O'Cairre; Dermot Mac Loughlin; Manus O'Kane; Kane O'Hennerly; Donslevey Mac Can; Conor O'Duvdiorma, and his son; Hugh O'Kane; Murtoth O'Kane; Awlave O'Gormley; Cu-ula O'Hanlon; and Niall O'Hanlon; and in the whole fifteen chiefs of the O'Kanes were slain there. A number of the chiefs of Connaught were also killed there, namely, Gillereest, son of Conor, son of Cormac, son of Tomaltach (Mac Dermott), lord of Moylurg; Cathal, son of Tiarnan O'Connor; Maolrooney Mae Donagh; Cathal Mac Donagh, the son of Murtoth; Hugh, son of Murtoth Fionn; Teige, son of Cathal, son of Bryan O'Mulrooney; Dermot, son of Teige, son of Murrogh, son of Tomaltach O'Mulrooney; Conor Mac Gillarraith; Teige, the son of Kian O'Gara; Gillbarraigh O'Cuinn (O'Quinn); Carolus Mac Anespoig O'Murray, with many others of the chiefs, and common soldiers of the Irish.

Mae William Burke marched with a force to attack Felim O'Connor, and plundered the country before him, until he came to Roscommon; he did not, however, attempt to proceed further, for Felim and his son Hugh-na-n-Gall were in the Tuatha prepared to meet him, and the Conacians were at their back in the recesses; so they came to a resolution on both sides to make peace, which they accordingly did; and Mac William returned home.

Mac Maurice marched with his forces into Thomond to attack Conor O'Brien, who was then at Coill Bearrain,³ where the chiefs of his people assembled to support him; the English were ancient territory in the county of Wicklow, of which the O'Tuathails or O'Tooles were chiefs.

A. D. 1260.

1. Malachy O'Connor, bishop of Elphin, is the person here mentioned, who died A. D. 1262.

2. The Battle of Drom Deirg, at Downpatrick. Stephen Longespée or Longsword, earl of Salisbury, then lord deputy of Ireland, commanded the English in the battle of Down. Bryan O'Neill, prince of Tyrone, who fell in this battle, is generally designated by the Irish writers, Brian-Catha-Duin, that is, Bryan of the battle of Down.

3. Coill Bearrain was probably Kilbarron, near Burrisokane in Tipperary, on the borders of the Shannon or Lough Derg, opposite the county of Clare, a place where there were some ancient castles.

defeated by them in the first onset ; and David Prendergast, who was a powerful knight ; the Failgeach ; the parson of Ardrathan ;⁴ Thomas Barret, and many others whose names have not been recorded, were slain.

Manus, son of Hugh Mac Oiraghty, was slain by Donal O'Flaithimh.

Loughlin, son of Awlave, son of Art O'Rourke, and Tiarnan, his brother, were killed by Hugh O'Conor, after they had been delivered to him by Donal, son of Niall, son of Congallach O'Rourke.

Donal, son of Conor, son of Tiarnan O'Rourke, was killed by the people of Tullyhuncho (in Cavan) ; and Murtoogh, his brother, was slain soon afterwards by Hugh O'Conor.

Art Beag, son of Art O'Rourke, was slain by Hugh O'Conor.

Teige Duv, son of Niall, son of Congalach, was slain by Malachy, son of Awlave, son of Art (O'Rourke).

A great depredation was committed by Hugh O'Conor, in Tuaith Ratha (in Roscommon), on which occasion Conor Mac Brannan, chief of Core Achlan ; Murtoogh O'Maonaigh ; the son of Bryan O'Fallon, and many others, were slain.

A depredation was committed by Mac Maurice on O'Donnell ; but a party of O'Donnell's people overtook him at Bennan Brechmoighe, where they burned some of his people, and slew others.

An immense depredation was committed by O'Donnell on Mac Maurice ; and he, (O'Donnell), plundered the whole of Carbury (in Sligo).

The fortress of Conor O'Kelly (in Galway), was burned by the people of Hugh O'Conor.

Sitrick Mac Seanlaigh was slain in Athlone by Don-cathach Mac Oiraghty and Tomaltagh Mac Oiraghty.

O'Donnell marched with a predatory force into Tyrone, after the battle of Dun (Down), and plundered and burned the greater portion of Tyrone on that occasion.

Abraham O'Conellan, coarb of St. Patrick, (archbishop of Armagh), died.

A. D. 1261.

Maolpatrick O'Scannail (or O'Scanlan), bishop of Rathboth (Raphoe), was elected archbishop of Armagh.

Sixteen of the most distinguished of the clergy of Tirconnell, together with Conor O'Firgil, were slain by Conor O'Neill and the people of Tyrone, at Derry Columkille. Conor O'Neill was soon afterwards killed by Donn O'Breislein, chief of Fanad (in Donegal), through the miracles of God and Columkille.

Hugh, son of Malachy O'Conor, was slain by Maolfavaill O'Heyne.

Cathal O'Hara, together with five others of the people of Lieney, were slain by the English, at the instigation of Bermingham, in the great church of St. Fechin at Ballysadare.

Fingin, son of Donal Mac Carthy, and his brethren, waged war and committed many depredations on the English.

The Geraldines marched with a great force into Desmond, to attack Mac Carthy (Fingin), who encountered and defeated them in an engagement in which eight barons, five knights, and several others of the English gentry, were slain, together with John Mac Thomas, and Barry More ; an innumerable host of their common soldiers also fell in that battle.

Fingin Mac Carthy was slain afterwards by the English ; and his brother, the Aithchleireach Mac Carthy, assumed the lordship of Desmond.

Art, son of Cathal Riavach O'Rourke, made his escape from Hugh O'Conor ; and the chiefs of Brefney and Conmaicne gave him the government of Brefney.

Donal O'Hara plundered the sons of Bermingham in revenge for the killing of Cathal O'Hara, and violating the church of St. Fechin (at Ballysadare) ; and he slew Sefin, son of Bermingham, the weapon with which he killed him being the bell which he (Bermingham), had carried away from the church of Ballysadare.

Bryan Roe O'Brien burned and demolished the castle of O'Conaing (Castleconnell in Limerick), and slew all the garrison.

The fortress of Hugh O'Conor, at Snamh-

4. Ardrathan, a parish in the county of Galway. The chief called Failgeach was probably O'Conor Failgeach, that is, O'Conor, lord of Offaly in the King's county. Mac Maurice mentioned above, as commander of the English, was sir Gerald Fitzgerald, baron of Offaly, who was son to Maurice Fitzgerald, formerly lord justice of Ireland.

an-Redaigh,¹ was burned by the men of Brefney.

Cluan Suilionn, the fortress of Felim O'Conor, was burned.

Torlogh Oge, son of Hugh O'Conor, was sent to Art O'Rourke to be fostered.

A great prey was taken by Hugh O'Conor in Brefney; who marched as far as Druim Leathan (Dromlane in Cavan), where a part of his forces were encountered and defeated, and many of his common soldiers slain.

Hugh Buidhe O'Neill was deposed, and Niall Culanaeh O'Neill was appointed in his place.

Niall O'Gormley, chief of Kinel Moain, died.

Niall Culanaeh O'Neill was defeated in battle by O'Donnell; and many of the chiefs of Tyrone were slain and taken prisoners, amongst whom were Mae Cathmoil, chief of Kinel Feredaigh, and many other chiefs (in Tyrone), not recorded.

A. D. 1262.

Maolpatrick O'Seannail, archbishop of Armagh, celebrated mass in a Pallium, on the Octave of John the Baptist, at Armagh.

Malachy, son of Teige O'Conor, bishop of Elphin, died.

The English of Ireland marched with an immense force to attack Felim, son of Cathal Crovdearg (O'Conor), and his son Hugh-na-n-Gall; upon which O'Conor sent the greater portion of the cattle of Connaught into Tireonnell, to secure them from the English, while he himself remained at Inis Saimer (Ballyshannon), to defend his property and people. Mae William Burke proceeded with his forces from the west across Tochar Mona Coinneadha, and arrived at Elphin. The lord justice of Ireland and John de Verdun came by Athlone to Roscommon. They sent out scouting parties into Kinel Doblthia Mic Aongusa,¹ and plundered all those that remained in Connaught after O'Conor; and they also marked out the place for a castle at Rosecommon. Hugh O'Conor at the same time collected his forces, marched into the west of Connaught, and plundered all the country eastward from Mayo of the Saxons and Balla, burned their (the English) towns and corn as far as Sliabh Lugha (in Mayo), and slew many people between those places. He sent his chiefs and young officers into South Connaught, and they burned and plundered the country from Tuam to Athlone, and slew all the fighting men whom they met between those places. After this the English sent messengers to O'Conor and his son, offering them terms of peace. Hugh (O'Conor) went to Ath-Doire-Chuire to hold a conference, in which they made peace, neither party yielding to the other hostages or securities, on the occasion. Hugh O'Conor and Mac William Burke slept together that night, after the peace, in the same bed, cheerfully and amicably; and on the following day the English departed, after taking leave of O'Conor.

Hugh Buidhe O'Neill was again restored (to his principality), and Niall Culanaeh was deposed.

A great depredation was committed by the English of Meath on Giolla-na-neev O'Ferrall, lord of Anally; and his own party, having conspired with the English, deposed him, and conferred the lordship on the son of Murrough Carraeh O'Ferrall. After this Giolla-na-neev committed many evils, depredations, plunders, damages, spoliations, and slaughters on the English, and succeeded in recovering by main force, the lordship of Anally, from which he expelled the son of Murrough Carrach.

Donslevey Mae Cathmoil, chief of Kinel Feredaigh, was slain by Hugh Buidhe O'Neill.

Mac William Burke and the English of Ireland marched with an army into Desmond, to attack Mae Carthy, and proceeded as far as Mangartach of Lough Lein,² where Mac Carthy slew Gerald Roehe, who was considered one of the three best barons in Ireland in his time; but the victory was without joy to the people of Desmond, for Cormac, son of Donal Gud Mae Carthy, was also slain in that engagement, and many of the Irish as well as of the English fell on the previous day at Mangartan.

A. D. 1261.

1. Snamhanredaigh, probably Drumsna, on the Shannon, on the borders of Leitrim and Roscommon

A. D. 1262.

1. Kinel Doblthia Mic Aongusa, a district along the Shannon, in the barony of Ballintobber, county of Roscommon. The lord justice mentioned at this time was Richard de Rupella.

2. Mangartach of Lough Lein, that is, the Mangartan mountains at Loughlone, one of the lakes of Killarney, in the county of Kerry.

Donal O'Monnaghan was slain by the sons of Roderick and Teige O'Conor.

O'Donnell (Donal Oge), marched with a force first into Fermanagh, and from thence to Gairbh-Trian-Connacht (or the Rough District of Connaught, in Leitrim), and as far as Granard of Teffia (in Longford); and in all the places through which he passed the people paid him tribute and yielded him submission; after which he returned home victoriously.

A. D. 1263.

Thomas O'Kelly, bishop of Clonfert, and Mulkiaran O'Maoileoin (or O'Malone), died.

David O'Finn, abbot of the monastery of Boyle, and Gillpatrick Mac Giolla-na-Guisen, prior of Doirein,¹ a man eminent for piety and hospitality, died.

Donn O'Breslein was slain in the bishop's court at Raphoe, by Donal O'Donnell.

Mac William (Burke)² having marched a force to attack Felim O'Conor and his son, came as far as Roscommon; but the Siol Murray (O'Conor's people), fled before them into the north of Connaught, and the English found nothing to plunder on that expedition. Donogh O'Flynn and Teige his son, attacked their forces, and slew one hundred of them, both officers and common soldiers, amongst whom were Aitin Russel, and his son, the five sons of Cuchonaght O'Conor, and many others, after which the army (of the English) returned to their homes much dismayed. Maolfavaill O'Heyne was slain by the English.

Dermot Clerach, son of Cormac Mac Dermott, died.

Aindiles Mac Fionnvar,³ chief of Muintir Gearadhain, died.

A castle was built by Mac William Burke at Athangail in Corran (in the county of Sligo).

Machair O'Ruadhain was slain by the English in the porch of the church of Kilsesgnen.⁴

Etaoin, daughter of O'Flanagan, died.

O'Donnell (Donal Oge), led his forces into Connaught, and joined Hugh O'Conor at the Curlew mountains, from whence they proceeded to Cruachan,⁵ westward across the river Suck, and from that into Clanricard; they completely plundered and devastated the country as far as Echtge and to Galway, where Hugh O'Conor parted from O'Donnell to return home; O'Donnell then proceeded across Sruthair and Rodhba, through Tyrawley, and across the Moy, and enforced tributes and submission from all.

Hugh, son of Felim (O'Conor), committed great depredations on the English of Sliabh Lugha and of Ciarraidhe (in the county of Mayo), slew many of them, and carried away a great number of cattle.

A. D. 1264.

Aongus O'Clumain, bishop of Lieney (Achonry), died in the monastery of Boyle, he having long before resigned his bishopric.

A war broke out between Art O'Melaghlin and the English of Meath, and he slew and drowned many of them in a battle at the river Brosnach (in King's county).

Murtogh, son of Donal O'Hart, was slain, and his people's property burned by Donogh Maguire (in Fermanagh).

The people of Dealbhna¹ committed a great depredation in the territory of Siol Anmchadha,

A. D. 1263.

1. Doirein, supposed to be Ballagherreen, in the parish of Kilcoleman, barony of Clanmorris, county of Mayo, where a Carmelite Friary was founded by the Prendergasts in the thirteenth century.

2. Mac William Burke, so often mentioned at this period, was Walter de Burgo or Burke, son of Richard de Burgo, formerly lord justice of Ireland, and grandson of William de Burgo; hence he is called by the annalists Mac William Burke. Walter having married the daughter of Hugh de Lacy the younger, earl of Ulster, obtained, in right of his wife, the earldom of Ulster; and, besides being earl of Ulster, was also styled lord of Connaught. He was the most powerful nobleman in Ireland in his time, and formed alliances with many great families, by the intermarriage of five of his daughters, one of whom was married to Robert Bruce, king of Scotland; two others to the Fitzgeralds, earls of Kildare and Desmond; another to de Bermingham, earl of Louth; and the fifth to the earl of Gloucester, in England. He died A.D. 1271. See Lodge's Pecrage by Archdall.

3. Mac Fionnbhar or Mac Finn timer, chief of Muintir Geradhain, a district in Muintir Eoluis, county of Leitrim.—See note on Brefney.

4. Kilsesgnen, an old church in the parish of Killasser, barony of Gallen, county of Mayo.

5. Cruachan, near Elphin in Roscommon. Echtge, a district in the south east of Galway, on the borders of Clare, so called from the mountain Echtge, now Slieve Aughty. Sruthair and Rodhba are the rivers Shrulie and Ballinrobe.

A. D. 1264.

1. Dealbhna, or Delvin, here mentioned, was Dealbhna Eathra, and slew the five sons of O'Madden on that occasion.

A conference was held at Athlone between the lord justice of Ireland (accompanied by the English, the earl of Ulster, and Maurice Fitzgerald, with their united forces), and Felim O'Conor, together with his son. The English were much perplexed and dismayed in mind when they beheld the king of Connaught and his son advancing with a great force to attend the meeting, and they came to a resolution to sue for peace. Felim and the chiefs of his people consented to make peace with them, and they afterwards separated on peaceable terms.

A war broke out between Mac William Burke, earl of Ulster, and Mac Maurice Fitzgerald; and the greater portion of Ireland was laid waste between them. The earl took all the castles in Connaught belonging to Fitzgerald, burned his manors, and plundered his people.

Art O'Melaghlin burned all the castles and towns in Delvin,² in Calraigh, and in Breaghmaine, and expelled all the English therefrom, and afterwards took hostages from their chiefs.

The lord justice of Ireland, with John Cogan, and Tiboid (Theobald) Butler, were taken prisoners by Maurice Fitzgerald³ in a consecrated church.

The castles of Lough Mask (in Mayo), and Ardahan, were taken by Mac William (Burke).

Maolpatrick O'Scannail, archbishop of Armagh, brought the friars minor to Armagh; and it was Mac Donnell, the Galloglaoch (according to tradition), who commenced the building of that monastery.

A. D. 1265.

Thomas, son of Fergal Mae Dermott, bishop of Elphin, Thomas O'Maicin (or O'Miachain), bishop of Lieney (Achonry), and Maolbride O'Gruagain (O'Grogan), archdeacon of Elphin, died.

Maurice, son of Niall O'Conor, was elected to the see of Elphin.

The castle of Sligo was demolished by Hugh O'Conor and by O'Donnell, and they also burned and destroyed the castles of Beannada and of Rath-Arderoibhe.¹

The monastery of Tobberpatrick (in Mayo) was burned.

Teige Mae Fionnvar was slain by Conor Mac Rannall and the son of Donal O'Ferrall.

Felim, son of Cathal Crovdearg O'Conor, king of Connaught, the defender and protector of his province, and of all his friends; the spoiler and exterminator of his enemies; a man eminent for hospitality, generosity, and magnanimity; a patron of religious orders, of the clergy, and of learned men; a worthy heir to the crown of Ireland for his nobility, his personal figure, bravery, wisdom, justice, and truthfulness, died after the victory of extreme unction and penance, in the monastery of the friars of St. Dominick, at Roscommon, which he himself had dedicated to God, and granted to that order.² Hugh O'Conor, his son, was appointed his successor as king of Connaught, who made his regal plundering excursion into Offaley, and, on his return to Athlone, put out the eyes of Cathal, son of Teige O'Conor, of which punishment he died.

Murtogh, son of Cathal, son of Dermod, son of Teige O'Mulrooney, lord of Moylurg, died.

Giolla-na-neev O'Quinn, chief of Muinter Giollgain (in Longford); Cathal Mae Rannall, chief of Muintir Eoluis, and Muireagh O'Carroll, chief of Calry (in Leitrim), died.

A conference was held by Tomaltagh O'Conor, archbishop of Tuam, with David Prendergast and the Mac Murchadas; and many of the archbishop's people were slain by them on that day, at Kilmeadhain (Kilmaine, county of Mayo). Dearvornow the barony of Garrycastle, in the King's county, and not Delvin in Westmeath. Siolanmehadha, now the barony of Longford, in the county of Galway, was O'Madden's territory.

2. Delvin barony in Westmeath. Breaghmaine, the barony of Brawney in Westmeath. Calraigh was an ancient territory comprising part of the barony of Clonlunan, in Westmeath, and, according to Mae Geoghlegan, part of the barony of Kileourey, in the King's county, of which the Mae Gawleys were chiefs. See note on Meath.

3. Maurice Fitzgerald, so frequently mentioned at this period, was son of the former Maurice Fitzgerald, lord justice of Ireland.

A. D. 1265.

1. Arderoibhe, now Ardelare, in the parish of Kilmaeteige, barony of Lieney, county of Sligo. Beannada, or Banada, a village in the same parish.

2. King Felim O'Conor had a magnificent marble monument in the abbey of Rosecommon, ornamented with beautiful sculptured representations of his body-guard of galloglasses, with their ancient arms and armour.

gall, daughter of O'Dowd (the mother of the archbishop Tomaltach O'Conor), died, after receiving the rites of the church.

A.D. 1266.

O'Scopa, a friar of the order of St. Dominick, was consecrated a bishop at Armagh for the see of Raphoe. Thomas O'Maolconry, archdeacon of Tuam, and Maolisa O'Hanainn, prior of Roscommon and Athleague, died.

Thomas O'Miadhachain (O'Meehan), became bishop of Lieney (Achonry).

A bishop elect came from Rome to Clonfert¹ of St. Brenan, and he, together with Thomas O'Meehan, were consecrated bishops at Athenry, on the Sunday before Christmas.

Donal O'Hara, lord of Lieny, was slain by the English while he was burning Ardnaree.

Mahon, son of Cethernach O'Keirin, lord of Ciarraidhe (in Mayo), was slain by the English.

Mahon O'Cuilein, lord of Claonglaise,² was killed by his wife with a thrust of a knife, which she gave him through jealousy.

The castle of Tighe-da-Coinne³ was demolished, and the entire of Conmaicne was laid waste.

Torlogh, son of Hugh, son of Cathal Croiddearg (O'Conor), died in the monastery of Knoemoy.

Dermot Roe, son of Conor, son of Cormac Mac Dermott, and Donnecathach, son of Duinoig Mac Oiraghty, had their eyes put out by Hugh O'Conor.

The borough of Beol-an-Tachair⁴ was burned by Flann Roe O'Flynn, who slew many of the English of the town.

Hugh O'Conor, king of Connaught, marched into Brefney to depose Art, son of Cathal Riavach (O'Rourke), and he conferred the lordship of Brefney on Conor Buidhe, son of Awlave, son of Art O'Rourke, and took hostages from all the chiefs of Brefney.

William Burke marched with a force to attack O'Melaghlin; and many of his men were drowned at Ath Crochda,⁵ and he was obliged to return without succeeding or gaining hostages.

A party of O'Conor's people, namely, Loughlin Mac Dermott; the son of Murtoigh Mac Carney; and the son of Donal Duv O'Hara, committed great slaughter on the Welsh and Leinster men, in the west of Connaught, and brought thirty-one of them prisoners to O'Conor.

Cormac, son of Gillereest Mac Dermott, received a wound, of which he died.

Sava, daughter of Cathal Croiddearg (O'Conor), and Maoleoin Bodhar O'Mulconry, historiographer of Siol Murray (in Roscommon), died.

Maolpatrick O'Scannail, primate of Armagh, brought friars minor to Armagh; and he caused a deep and broad ditch to be constructed round their church.

A. D. 1267.

The bishop of Clonfert, that is, the Roman, went to the court of the Pope.

Murogh Mac Sweeney was taken prisoner in Hy Malia (in Mayo), by Donal, son of Manus O'Conor, who delivered him into the hands of the earl (Burke, earl of Ulster), and he died in prison.

Bryan, son of Torlogh, son of Roderick O'Conor, died in the monastery of Knockmoy.

Mac William (Burke) made a predatory attack on O'Conor, and plundered Tir Maine and Clan Uadach (in Roscommon).

The English of the west of Connaught committed depredations in Carbury of Drumcliff, and plundered Ballysadare.

Donogh, son of Roderick, son of Hugh O'Conor, was slain by the English.

The king of Connaught was seized with a grievous disease, the report of which was made known all over Ireland.

A. D. 1266.

1. Clonfert. The bishop of Clonfert here mentioned was John, an Italian, the Pope's Nuncio, who, being appointed to the see of Clonfert, was consecrated at Athenry, and the year following went to Rome, but returned soon afterwards, and continued bishop of Clonfert until A.D. 1296, when he was translated to the see of Benevento in Italy. Robert, a monk of Christ Church, Canterbury, succeeded as bishop of Clonfert, and died A. D. 1307. See Ware's Bishops, by Harris.

2. Claonglaise, an ancient territory in Limerick. See note on Thomond.

3. Tighe-da-Coinne, probably Tiaquinn, in the county of Galway.

4. Belantachair, probably Ballintogher, barony of Tyrerrell, county of Sligo.

5. Ath Crochda was the ancient name of a ford on the Shannon, at the place now called Shannon Harbour.

Alise, daughter of Mac Cargavna (in Westmeath), died.

Hugh O'Murray, chief of the Lagan,¹ was slain at Kilalla by O'Maolfoghmayr, the coarb of the church, on Sunday, after hearing Mass.

A. D. 1268.

Hugh, son of Conor O'Flaherty, the official (vicar general) of Anadown (in Galway), died.

The great church of Armagh was commenced to be built by the primate, Gillpatrick O'Sean-nail.

Conor Roe O'Brien, lord of Thomond, his son John, his daughter, his daughter's son, that is, the son of Roderick O'Gara, Duvloghlin O'Loughlin, Thomas O'Beolan, and many others, were slain by Dermot, the son of Murtoth O'Brien, but he himself was soon afterwards killed.

Bryan, son of Conor O'Brien, then assumed the lordship of Thomond.

Torlogh Oge, son of Hugh, son of Felim, son of Cathal Crowdearg (O'Conor), the ward of the Hy Briune, died.

Awlave O'Ferrall, the tower of defence of the Conmacnians (in Longford), was treacherously slain by the English.

Conor O'Kelly, lord of Hy Maine; Aongus O'Daly, a man eminent for poetry, and who kept a house of hospitality; Manus Mae Oiraghty, chief of Clan Tomalty; Donal O'Grady, chief of Kinel Dungaille; and Dubhgall Mac Rory, lord of Innsi Gall, and of the eastern Irish, died.¹

Maurice Roe Fitzgerald was drowned at sea, along with all the crew of a ship, on his passage from England.

Hugh O'Conor marched with his forces to attack the English of Athlone, who met him at the Feadha (woody district), and an engagement ensued, in which the English were defeated, and many of them slain.

Donn, son of Teige O'Monaghan (in Roscom-mon), and ten of his people, were slain by Teige O'Flanagan and Gillcreest O'Beirne.

Fergal O'Mulloy, chief of Ferkale (King's County), and Malachy Mae Coghlan, were slain by the English.

Aongus O'Maolfoghmayr was slain by the O'Murrays (in Mayo), in revenge for the death of their chief.

A. D. 1269.

David O'Brogain, bishop of Clogher, died, and was interred in the monastery of Melifont, for he was one of the monks of that place.

Teige, son of Niall, son of Morogh O'Conor, was slain at Elphin by a young man of his own kinsmen, who was put to death for that deed.

Ivar O'Beirne, a young chief, the confidential friend of Hugh O'Conor, abandoned the cares of the world, and retiring from the midst of his family and property, entered the monastery of Rosecommon, where he spent the remainder of his days amongst the brothers of St. Dominick.

Bryan, son of Donal Duv O'Hara, was slain by the English at Sligo.

Benmidhe, daughter of Torlogh, son of Roderick (O'Conor), the wife of Maolmuire Mac Sweeney; Geoffrey, son of Donal Clannach Mae Gillpatrick, lord of Slieve Bloom (in Ossory); and Hugh Feenaghty, an eminent minstrel, died.

Echmilidh Mac Arten (in the county of Down), was slain by O'Hanlon (of Armagh).

Donal O'Ferrall and Hugh his son, men distinguished for friendship, hospitality and benevolence, were slain by Giolla-na-neev O'Ferrall and the English.

Christina, daughter of O'Naghten, the wife of Dermot Midheagh Mac Dermott, the most distinguished woman of her tribe for hospitality and benevolence, and the most bountiful benefactress to the order of grey friars, died after the victory of repentance.

A. D. 1267.

1. Lagan a district in the north of the barony of Tyrrawley, county of Mayo, of which the O'Murrays were chiefs.

A. D. 1268.

1. O'Kelly was lord of Hy Maine, in Galway and Roscommon.

Mac Oiraghty was chief of Clan Tomaltaigh in Roscommon. O'Grady was chief of Kinel Dungaille, a district in the county of Clare. Dubhgall or Dugald Mac Rory, lord of Innsi Gall, that is, lord of the Hebrides. The Mac Rorays were a branch of the Mac Donnells of the Hebrides, and are styled lords of the eastern Irish, as they had large possessions in the counties of Down and Antrim.

The castle of Sligo was re-built by Mac Maurice Fitzgerald, after it had been destroyed by Hugh O'Connor and O'Donnell.

The castle of Roscommon was built by Robert de Ufford, lord justice of Ireland, taking advantage of the illness of Hugh O'Connor, king of Connaught, who on that account could not engage the English in battle, nor oppose them in building the castle, and Connaught was plundered a hundred times over by the English before his recovery.

Flaherty O'Maoilfhiona (O'Mulleeney), chief of the half of Calraighe of Moy Heleog,¹ was slain by O'Gaibhteachain (O'Gavaghan) his co-partner chief.

A. D. 1270.

Maolpatrick O'Scannail, archbishop of Armagh, went to England to be presented to the king, who received him honourably, and he returned invested with great authority.

A great war arose between O'Connor and the earl of Ulster, Walter Burke, who together with the lord justice (Robert de Ufford), collected the nobles of the English of Ireland, and also their Irish allies, with whom they marched into Connaught, and came to Roscommon the first night, and on the second to Elphin, from whence they proceeded to Port Lecce, where they halted and encamped for that night; on the following day they proceeded to Ath-Cara-Conaill (Carrick-on-Shannon), across the Shannon eastward. The king of Connaught was at this time with a few of the chiefs of his people, in Moy Nise,¹ prepared to meet the English, and the lord justice with a small portion of the English army, remained on the eastern side of the Shannon, to watch their movements. When the earl had passed Ath-Caradh-Conaill, a small division of O'Connor's forces attacked the English in the woods of Conmaicne, and slew many of them, after which they returned to Moy Nise, where they encamped for the night. They then held a council, and came to the resolution of making peace with the king of Connaught, and agreed to deliver the earl's brother (William Oge, the son of Rickard Mac William), into the hands of O'Connor's people, while he himself (O'Connor), should be at the earl's residence ratifying the peace. This having been done, O'Connor's people immediately made the earl's brother prisoner, and slew John Dolofin and his son. When the earl received intelligence of this, he became enraged, and he spent that night in sadness and in sorrow, and early on the following morning he mustered his English and Irish forces, and marched towards O'Connor's residence, until they arrived at Ath-an-chip, where they met Torlogh O'Brien front to front, who was on his march to aid O'Connor. The earl personally attacked Torlogh, and remembering his enmity to him, he slew him on the spot. The Conacian forces at this time advanced up to the ford, and fell on the English with their horse and foot, broke their van guards, dislodged their reer ranks after much opposition; and slew nine of their chief knights at the ford, along with Rickard (Burke) of the Wood, and John Butler, with many of their other officers and of the common soldiers. They also took immense booty from them, consisting of arms, armour, horses, &c.

After the battle the earl's brother was slain by O'Connor as an Eraic (in retaliation) for the son of O'Brien, who was slain by the earl.

The castle of Ath-an-Gaile, the castle of Sliabh Lugha, and the castle of Kill Colmain² were pulled down by O'Connor, and Roscommon, Rinn-Duin, and Uillinn Uanach, were also burned by him.

Bryan Roe O'Brien turned against the English; he committed great plunders on them, and took the castle of Clar-Ath-da-Caradh.³

A. D. 1269.

1. Calraighe of Moy Heleog, an ancient district in the county of Mayo, now the parish of Crossmolina, of which O'Maoilfhiona was head chief, from whom Crossmolina derived its name.

A. D. 1270.

1. Moy Nise was a district along the Shannon in the county of Leitrim, near Carrick-on-Shannon; and the events here narrated occurred about that place, and in those parts of Roscommon on the opposite side of the Shannon.

2. Kilcolmain Castle was in the parish of Kilcoleman in the barony of Costello, county of Mayo. Sliabh Lugha a mountainous district in the barony of Costello, county of Mayo. Uillinn Uanach. Sliabh Cairpre in Longford, according to O'Reilly, was originally called Sliabh Uilinn, hence probably Uilinn Uanach and Sliabh Uillinn were the same, the castle of which might be on the opposite side of the Shannon to that of Rinn Duin, now St. John's, a peninsula running into Lough Ree, on the Roscommon side of the Shannon.

3. Clar-Ath-da-Caradh, now Clarisford near Killaloe, in the county of Clare.

The earl (of Ulster) and the English of Connaught committed great plunders in Tírerell, on the people of Hugh O'Connor, and David Cuisin was slain on that occasion.

The son of Murrough Carrach O'Ferrall, a bear in agility, a leopard in activity, and famous for feats of arms, was slain by the English.

Tannaidhe More, son of Duinnin, son of Nedhe, son of Conaing Buidhe O'Maolconry, was appointed chief Historiographer of Connaught; and Dubhsuileach O'Maolconry and Dunlaing O'Maolconry were removed from that professorship.

Sligo was burned by O'Donnell and the people of Tyrconnell; and Mae Breallagh-an-chaírn O'Maolbrennan was slain on that occasion.

A. D. 1271.

Simon Magrath, dean of Ardcarne, died.

Walter Burke, earl of Ulster, and lord of the English of Connaught, died in the castle of Galway of a short sickness, after the victory of repentance.

Thomas Mac Maurice died in the town of Lough Mask.¹

Ivar O'Beirne, the confidential friend of Hugh O'Connor, died in Roscommon after the victory of repentance, and was buried there.

Hugh O'Connor, the son of the coarb of St. Coman, was slain by Thomas Butler, at Muine-Inghine-Crechain (in Roscommon).

Donal O'Flynn was slain by the son of Robin Lawless on the same day at the upper end of Sruthra.²

Mahon O'Connor was slain by the English of Dunmore (in Galway).

Nicholas, son of John Verdun, lord of Oriel, was slain by Geoffrey O'Ferrall.

Conor, son of Tiarnan O'Connor, was slain by Malachy, son of Art O'Rourke, and by the Clan Fermuighe (in Leitrim).

A. D. 1271

1. Lough Mask. The town here mentioned was called Ballyloughnask or Loughnask castle, near Lough Mask, in the county of Mayo. Thomas Mac Maurice here mentioned, was Thomas, the son of Maurice Fitzgerald.

2. Sruthra, now the parish of Shrule, barony of Kilmain, county of Mayo.

3. Templehouse Castle or Caislean-Tighe-Templa, was a house of the knights templars, founded by the English in the thirteenth

The castle of Templehouse,³ the castle of Sligo, and the castle of Athleague were demolished by Hugh O'Connor.

Hugh, son of Niall O'Dowd, (in Sligo), died.

A. D. 1272.

Henry Butler, lord of Umalia (in Mayo), and Hoitse Medbriek, were slain by Cathal, son of Conor Roe (O'Connor), and by the sons of Murrough O'Connor.

The castle of Rosecommon was demolished by Hugh O'Connor, king of Connaught.

Teige Dall (the Blind), son of Hugh, son of Cathal Croidearg (O'Connor), died, and he was the most eligible candidate for the crown of his tribe, until he was blinded by the people of O'Reilly.

James Dodaly,¹ lord justice of Ireland, was slain by O'Braoin and by the Conacians.

Maurice, son of Donogh, son of Tomaltagh O'Mulrooney (in Roscommon), the most hospitable and generous man of his tribe, died in the fortress of O'Donnell at Murbaeh (in Donegal), and his remains were conveyed to the monastery of Boyle, where he was buried.

Donogh, son of Giolla-na-neev Mac Gauran, was slain by his brother Thomas.

Richard Tuite, the most noble of the English barons, died.

Hugh O'Connor burned Meath as far as Granard, and also burned Athlone, and broke down its bridge.

O'Donnell (Donal Oge) collected his vessels and boats on Lough Erne, with which he proceeded to Lough Uachtar, and seized on the property of the adjoining places, (namely, on the islands of that lake), which he carried away, plundered the people, and reduced them in all the neighbouring parts under his sway and subjection.

Edward I.² was proclaimed king of England, on the 16th of November.

century, near Ballymote, county of Sligo, now the residence of Colonel Pereival, Member of Parliament for the county.

A. D. 1272.

1. James Dodaley was sir James Audley, then lord justice of Ireland. O'Braoin in the text means O'Eyrne, but probably it should be O'Brien, as Audley was killed in Thomond.

2. Edward I. King Henry III. died on the 16th of November, A. D. 1272, and was succeeded by his son Edward I.

A. D. 1273.

LAN O'Tierney, lord of Ceara,¹ was slain by O'Murray, concerning the lordship of Ceara, through the influence of Hugh, son of Felim O'Conor.

Conor Buidhe, son of Awlave, son of Art O'Rourke, lord of Brefney, was slain by the sons of Conor, son of Tiarnan O'Conor, for he (O'Rourke) had killed the best of the sons, namely, Tiarnan.

Eochy Mac Mahon, lord of Oriel (Monaghan), and many others along with him, were slain by O'Hanlon and by the people of Tyrone.

Jordan Dextra having committed a depredation in Corran (in Sligo), was overtaken by some of the young chiefs of Connaught, who imprudently attacked him by advice of some of their soldiers, in consequence of which Donal, son of Donogh, son of Manus; and Manus, son of Art (O'Conor); Aireachtach Mac Egan; Hugh O'Beirne, and many others were slain.

Mac Maurice Fitzgerald marched with a great force into Thomond, and took hostages from O'Brien and brought him under subjection.

Cormac Mac Dermott, son of Roderick, died.

Donal of Erris, son of Manus, son of Murtoth Muinagh (O'Conor), was expelled from Umalia and from Erris, and Roderick O'Flaherty was expelled from West Connaught.

O'Donnell (Donal Oge) mustered a great force of the chiefs of Tirconnell and of Connaught, with which he marched into Tyrone and spoiled the country.

Donal O'Quinn, chief of half of Aicideach (in Longford), was slain by O'Duffy.

A. D. 1273.

1. Ceara now the barony of Carra, in the county of Mayo.

A. D. 1274.

Hugh, son of Felim, son of Cathal Crovdearg O'Conor, king of Connaught, a prince who laid waste all parts of Connaught in possession of both English and Irish enemies, who often defeated the English, who demolished their courts and castles, and slew their champions and warriors; who took the hostages of Hy Briuin and of the race of Hugh Fionn; a king who was most dreaded and victorious; the most eminent for hospitality and magnanimity; and who, though sometimes a spoiler, was also an improver of Ireland, died after the victory of repentance on a Thursday, being the third day of summer. Owen, son of Roderick, son of Hugh, son of Cathal Crovdearg (O'Conor), was appointed king in his place, but he reigned only three months, when he was slain by one of his own kindred, namely, by Roderick, son of Torlogh, son of Hugh O'Conor, in the church of the friars at Roscommon; and Hugh, the son of Cathal Dall (the Blind), son of Hugh, son of Cathal Crovdearg (O'Conor), was elected king by the Conacians, but his reign was not long, being slain in a fortnight after by Mac Oiraghty (Tomaltagh) and O'Beirne; and Teige, son of Torlogh, son of Hugh, son of Cathal Crovdearg, was appointed king over the Conacians.

Tiarnan, son of Hugh O'Rourke, lord of Brefney; and Donal, son of Manus, son of Murtoth Muinagh (O'Conor), the most eminent man in Ireland for hospitality and generosity, died.

Giolla-na-neev, son of Hugh, son of Awlave O'Ferrall, lord of Anally, the mainstay of hospitality and generosity of the Clanna Rory, a man full of dignity and abilities, intrepid against his enemies, but kind to his friends, died after the victory of repentance.

Malachy, son of Awlave, son of Art O'Rourke, lord of Dartry and of Clan Fermuighe (in Leitrim), was slain by Conor, son of Donal, son of Niall O'Rourke.

Teige, son of Carroll Buidhe O'Daly, chief poet to Hugh O'Conor, died.

Donal Oge, son of Donal, son of Art O'Rourke; and Cathal Mac Clancy, chief of Dartry (in Leitrim), died.

Fergal O'Caithniadh, lord of Erris (in Mayo), died in Hy Maccaechain.

A. D. 1275.

O'Laidigh, bishop of Killala; and Cairpre O'Scuapa, bishop of Raphoe, in Tireconnell, died.

Roderick, son of Torlogh O'Conor, was taken prisoner by O'Conor (Teige, son of Torlogh his brother): Roderick made his escape through the assistance of Conor O'Hanley, who accompanied him, but their pursuers overtook them, and slew Conor O'Hanley.

Teige, son of Cathal Mac Dermott, was plundered by O'Conor.

Conor, son of Fergal, son of Donogh, son of Murtogh (O'Conor), was slain by his own kinsmen.

Art, son of Cathal Riavach O'Rourke, lord of Brefney, was slain by Mac Fionnvar and by the English at Granard, and many of his people were killed.

The English sustained a great defeat in Ulster, in which they lost two hundred of their cavalry, both men and horses, besides what were slain of common soldiers.

Thomas Mac Gauran was slain by the people of Kinel Luachain (in Leitrim).

The Tyronians marched into Tireconnell and plundered a great portion of the country; O'Donnell (Donal Oge), having collected his forces pursued them to the foot of Sliabh Truim, defeated them and slew many of their men; a great number of their horses with accoutrements, arms, and armour, were taken by the people of Tireconnell on that occasion.

A. D. 1276.

Giolla-an-Coivde O'Carolan, bishop of Tyrone (Derry), died.

Hugh Muinagh, son of Felim, son of Cathal Crovdearg (O'Conor), went from Munster into Connaught, and from thence went to O'Donnell, who accompanied him with the whole of his forces

A. D. 1276.

1. Echeanach, now the parish of Aughanagh, barony of Tirrell, county of Sligo, where a church was built by St. Patrick.

2. Leath Cathail, now the barony of Lecale, in the county of Down, of which Mac Gilla Muire, or the Mac Gilmors, were chiefs.

A. D. 1277.

1. The earl of Clare here mentioned was Thomas de Clare, son to the earl of Gloucester, who got large grants of land in that part to Echeanach,¹ where O'Donnell parted from him; and Hugh remained in Connaught.

The sons of Torlogh (O'Conor) committed a depredation on the son of Felim and on the sons of Mac Dermott, and Gilereest O'Mulbrenan was slain by them.

A depredation was committed by the son of Felim on the sons of Murtogh (O'Conor), and Giolla-na-Naingéal (servant of the Angels) O'Conroy, was slain by the sons of Murtogh while they were pursuing their plundered property.

Roderick, son of Torlogh, committed a plunder on the people of Naghtan (the Nortons), who, however, defeated him, and recovered their property. Donal (called Giolla-an-ime), son of Niall, son of Congalaeh O'Rourke, and many others of Roderick's people were slain by them.

Gillereest O'Naghtan (or O'Norton), and William O'Naghtan were slain after this by Roderick, son of Torlogh.

Dermot Mae Gillmurry, lord of Leath Cathail,² died.

A. D. 1277.

Braon O'Mulmoicheirghi, abbot of Kells, died.

Brien Roe O'Brien, lord of Thomond, was treacherously taken prisoner by the son of the earl of Clare,¹ and was dragged to death between horses, although they had both previously become gossips to each other, and had exchanged bells and holy relics (or oaths), in confirmation of their friendship for each other.

Gillereest O'Beirne, the bosom friend of Hugh O'Conor, was slain by Giolla-Roe, son of Loughlin O'Conor.

Giolla-na-neev O'Beirne died after repentance.

Hugh Muinaeh, son of Felim (O'Conor), accompanied by the Conacians and by Donall of Thomond afterwards called the county of Clare. Moore in his History of Ireland (v. 3. p. 33,) quotes the Annals of Inisfallen, which give the following account of this affair: "The earl of Clare's son took Bryan Roe O'Brien prisoner very deceitfully after they had sworn to each other all the oaths in Munster, as bells, hachals, and relics of saints, to be true to one another; also after they had become sworn gossips, and for confirmation of this bond of perpetual friendship, drew part of each other's blood, which they mingled together in a vessel. After all these protestations Bryan Roe was taken as aforesaid and bound to a horse and so was tortured to death by the said earl's son."

O'Donnell, demolished the castle of Roscommon.

The people of Teallach Eachdach² committed a great depredation on the Kinel Luachain in Glenda-Duile, on which occasion they slew Conor Mac Dorchaídh and many others.

A. D. 1278.

Thomas O'Quinn, bishop of Clonmacnois, died. Flaherty O'Daimhin,¹ lord of Fermanagh, died.

Teige (O'Conor), son of Torlogh, son of Hugh, son of Cathal Crovdearg, king of Connaught, was slain by the sons of Cathal Mac Dermott.

Roderick, son of Torlogh O'Conor, together with the parson riavach, the son of Tiarnan O'Conor, and many others who are not recorded, were slain by Gillcreest Mac Clancy and the people of Dartry (in Leitrim), on the borders of Dromcliff.

Donogh, Fergal, and Gillcreest, the three sons of Maurice Mac Donogh, son of Tomaltach, were slain by Teige, son of Donal (O'Conor) of Erris (county of Mayo).

Donogh, son of Bryan Roe, and the other sons of Bryan, defeated the son of the earl of Clare in the battle of Cuince;² they burned the church of Cuince on his people (the English), and put great numbers of them to death both by slaying and burning.

Tomaltach Mac Oiraghty, head chief of Siol Murray, was slain by the people of the Tuatha (in Roscommon).

Hugh Muinach, son of Felim (O'Conor), assumed the sovereignty of Connaught.

Bryan O'Dowd and Art-na-Capall (Art of the Horses) O'Hara, lord of Lieney, fought a battle with the Berminghams, in which the Berminghams were defeated, and the two sons of Myler More, with Conor Roc Bermingham, and many more besides, were slain.

A. D. 1279.

Tomaltach, son of Torlogh, son of Malachy O'Conor, archbishop of Tuam, the most eminent man in Ireland for wisdom, learning, and charity, died after the victory of repentance.

Giolla-an-Choivde O'Carolan,¹ bishop of Tyrone, died.

Conor, son of Dermot, son of Manus O'Conor, was slain.

Murrough O'Naghtan (or O'Norton in Roscommon), was slain by Donal O'Naghtan; and Robert, his brother, challenged Donal to a conflict, in which Robert was also slain.

Donal, son of Gillcreest O'Naghtan, was slain by Hugh O'Concannon.

Malachy, son of Torlogh (O'Conor) was slain.

Giolla-Iosa More Mac Fírbis, chief historiographer of Hy-Fiachra (in Sligo), died.

A. D. 1280.

John O'Laidhigh, bishop of Killala; and Matthew, son of Manus O'Conor, abbot of Boyle, died.

A dispute arose between Hugh Muinach (O'Conor), king of Connaught, son of Felim, son of Cathal Crovdearg, and the sons of Murtoth Muinach O'Conor, on which occasion Hugh Muinach was slain in the wood of Dangan;¹ and on the same day they took Malachy, son of Manus (O'Conor), prisoner, whom, however, O'Donnell released, on their receiving a ransom of four hundred cows and twenty horses.

Cathal, son of Conor Roe, son of Murtoth Muinach, son of Torlogh More O'Conor, was elected king after this by the Conacians.

2. Teallach Eachdach, now the barony of Tullagha, county of Cavan, of which the Mac Gaurans were chiefs. Kinel Luachain was a district in the barony of Mohill, county of Leitrim. The Mac Dorchaídh were chiefs of that district. See note on Brefney.

A. D. 1278.

1. O'Daimhin or O'Devin. The O'Devins were formerly a powerful clan on the borders of Tyrone and Derry; and this O'Devin, lord of Fermanagh, was probably a chief, in the northern part of Fermanagh, on the borders of Tyrone.

2. Cuince, anciently called Quincey, now the parish of Quinn, barony of Bunratty, county of Clare; the church which was burned was that of Quinn-abbey, of which some magnificent ruins still remain.

A. D. 1279.

1. O'Carolan, bishop of Tyrone, that is, Derry, here mentioned, was probably the same person as another bishop of the same name whose death has been recorded A. D. 1276.

A. D. 1280.

1. Dangan, a town in the barony of Tiaquin, county of Galway.

Malachy O'Gormley, chief of Kinel Moain (in Donegal), and Conor O'Gormley, were slain by the people of Tellach Modharain.²

A. D. 1281.

Teige, son of Cathal Mac Dermott, lord of Moylurg, a man distinguished for hospitality, generosity, and magnanimity, died.

The battle of Disirt-da-Chrioeh,¹ was fought between the Tireconnellians and Tyronians, Hugh Buidhe (O'Neill), son of Donal Oge, son of Hugh Meth, son of Hugh, generally called the Maeaomh Toinleasg, aided by the English of Ulidia, on the one side; and Donal Oge O'Donnell, lord of Tireconnell, Fermanagh, Orgiall, and of the greater part of the Irish of all Ulster, and nearly of all Connaught, with the entire of Brefne, on the other side. The Tireconnellians were defeated; and Donal O'Donnell, the most eminent man of the Irish for hospitality, generosity, prudence, and magnanimity, in his time, and the most valiant warrior of the west of Europe, was slain in this battle, in the forty-first year of his age, and was buried in the monastery of the friars at Derry Columkille, having through life gained the palm of pre-eminence in every goodness. The following were the most eminent who were slain along with him, namely, Mulrooney O'Boyle, chief of the three territories (in Donegal); Owen, son of Malachy, son of Donal More O'Donnell; Ceallach, son of Giolla Brighde O'Boyle, one of the most distinguished chiefs of his tribe for hospitality and generosity to men of learning and science; Aindileas O'Boyle, and Dugall, his son; Gillcreest Mac Clancy, chief of Dartry (in Leitrim); Donal Mac Gilfinen, chief of Muintir Feodhachain (in Fermanagh); Enna O'Gormley, head chief of Kinel Moain (in Donegal); Cormac, son of the professor O'Donnell, chief of Fanad (in Donegal); Giolla-an-Coivde O'Muldoon, chief of Lurg (in Fermanagh); Cormac, son of Cormac O'Donnell;

2. Tcallach Modharain, a district in the barony of Strabane, county of Tyrone, on the borders of Donegal, near the river Mourne.

A. D. 1281.

1. Disirt-da-Chrioeh, now the parish of Deserteright, in the barony of Dungannon, county of Tyrone.

Giolla-na-Noge Mac Dail-le-docair; Malachy, son of Niall O'Boyle; Aindiles, son of Murtoth O'Donnell; Manus Mae Quinn; Giolla-na-neev O'Heoghagain (or O'Hogan); Murtoth O'Flaherty; Murtoth Mac Nulty; Flaherty Mac Buidheachain; and many others of the sons of lords and chiefs who are not recorded. Hugh, son of Donal Oge O'Donnell, was appointed his father's successor.

A battle was fought between the Barretts and Cusacks,² in which the Barretts were defeated, with the loss of William Barrett, Adam Fleming, and many others. There were assisting the Cusacks in this battle two of the Irish, who were the most accomplished in achievements, bravery, activity, and dexterity, of those who fought, namely, Taichleach O'Boyle, and Taichleach O'Dowd.

Hugh Muinach, son of Torlogh O'Brien, died.

A. D. 1282.

Murtoth Mae Murrogh, king of Leinster, and Art Mac Murrogh, his brother, were slain by the English.

Taichleach, son of Mulrooney O'Dowd, lord of Hy Fiachra, one of the most distinguished of his tribe in his time, for hospitality and bravery, was slain by Adam Cusack, on the strand of Eothuile (in Sligo).

Lasarina, daughter of Cathal Crovdearg O'Conor, the wife of Donal More O'Donnell, and the mother of Donal Oge, the most noble woman of the north of Ireland, died.

Matthew O'Reilly, lord of Muintir Maolmordha (in the county of Cavan); and Giolla Iosa More Mac Tiarnan, chief of Tullaghonoho (in the county of Cavan), died.

Cathal, son of Giolla-na-neev O'Ferrall, lord of Anally, died on Inis Cuan, on the river of Cluain-Lis-Bece,¹ of the son of Conla. Geoffrey, son of Giolla-na-naov O'Ferrall, assumed the lordship of Anally after him.

2. This battle between the Barretts and Cusacks was fought in the county of Mayo.

A. D. 1282.

1. Cluanlis Bece was probably in the parish of Cloongish, barony and county of Longford, through which run the rivers Camlin and Shannon. An abbey may have been situated on Inis Cuan, an island on one of those rivers.

A. D. 1283.

Hugh Buidhe O'Neill, lord of Tyrone, the most illustrious of the Irish for hospitality and bravery, the most eminent man of the north for bestowing favours and gifts, the most dreaded and triumphant man of his race in his time, and the worthy heir presumptive to the throne of Ireland, was slain by Mac Mahon (Bryan) and the Orgiallians, aided by Giolla Iosa Roe, son of Donal O'Reilly.

Teige, son of Donal of Erris (in Mayo) O'Conor, was wounded by the people of Lieney (in Sligo), and, being delivered into the hands of Cathal O'Conor, died of his wound.

Dublin and Christ Church were partly consumed by fire.

A. D. 1284.

Maurice O'Conor, bishop of Elphin, died; and Awlave O'Tomalty was consecrated his successor, but died soon afterwards.

Giolla Iosa Mac Anliatanaigh O'Conor, abbot of Trinity Island on Lough Key, of the order of Premonstratensians, was then elected to the see of Elphin.

Donogh O'Brien, lord of Thomond, was slain by Torlogh O'Brien.

Dubgall, son of Manus O'Boyle, chief of Cloch-Chinn-Faoladh,¹ was slain by the people of O'Maolgaoithe.

Mac-na-hoidhche² Mac Dorchy, chief of Kinel Luachain, died.

Simon de Exeter was slain by Bryan O'Flynn and by the two sons of O'Flanagan, Dermot and Malachy; in consequence of which, war and contentions arose in Connaught, and the English committed great depredations, but restored the plunder to the people of Trinity Island, and to the monks of the monastery of Boyle.

The Castle of Kilcoleman (in the county of Mayo), was demolished by Cathal, son of Conor Roe (O'Conor), king of Connaught.

A. D. 1284.

1. Cloch-Chinn-Fhaoladh, now Cloghaneely, a district near the Atlantic, in the barony of Kilmakrenan, county of Donegal.

2. Mac-na-hoidhche signifies Son of the Night, but has been anglicised to Nicholas. The Mac Dorchys were chiefs of Kinel Luachain, a district in Leitrim, as explained in the note on Brefney.

A. D. 1285.

1. Lough O'Gara and Sliabh Gamh. Lough O'Gara is a large Dunmore (in the county of Galway), was burned by Fiachra O'Flynn.

A. D. 1285.

Simon O'Rourke, bishop of Brefney (Kilmore), died.

Roderick O'Gara, lord of Sliabh Lugha, was slain by Bermingham, at Lough O'Gara.¹

Maurice Maol (the Bald) Fitzgerald, died.

Henry Mac Gillfinnen (a chief in Fermanagh), died.

Manus O'Conor defeated Adam Cusack and the English of the west of Connaught, in a battle at Ballysadare, in which many were slain, and Coilin Cusack, brother of Adam, was taken prisoner.

Philip Mac Costello defeated the people of Manus O'Conor on Sliabh Gamh; and many of Manus's people were slain.

A. D. 1286.

The earl of Ulster marched with a great force into Connaught, and plundered many monasteries and churches throughout that country. He reduced to submission every place through which he passed, took hostages from all Connaught, and brought the Conacians with him into Tirconnell and Tyrone, where he also took hostages; he deposed Donal, son of Bryan O'Neill, and appointed Niall Culanach (O'Neill), to the lordship.

Philip Mac Costello (in the county of Mayo), died.

A. D. 1287.

Florent O'Gibellain, archdeacon of Elphin, an eminent philosopher, died.

Giolla-na-noge O'Monaghan, lord of the three Tuatha (in Roscommon), died.

Dermot Midheach, son of Dermot, son of Ma-lake in the barony of Coolavin, county of Sligo, on the borders of the barony of Costello, county of Mayo. It lay in the ancient district of Sliabh Lugha, partly in the county of Mayo and partly in that of Sligo, of which O'Gara was lord. Sliabh Gamh is a chain of high mountains which separate the barony of Tireragh from that of Lieney, in the county of Sligo. It has been for a considerable time erroneously called by the people of that county Slieve Damh, and translated Ox Mountains, the name by which it is now marked on the maps.

nus, son of Cathal Mac Dermott, lord of Siol Maolruain (in Roscommon and Galway), the best, the oldest, and the most noble of his race, died.

Malachy, son of Tomaltach Mac Oiraghty, was slain by Torlogh, son of Owen O'Connor, in revenge for his father, who had been killed by the aforementioned Tomaltach.

Adam Cusack; Bean Munhan, daughter of O'Kane; and Donal O'Hanley, chief of Kinel Dobhtha (in Roscommon), died.

A. D. 1288.

Stephen (de Fulburn), archbishop of Tuam, died.

Michael Mac Antsaoir (or Macintire), bishop of Clogher, died.

Manus, son of Conor Roe O'Connor, with all whom he could procure to join him of the Conacians, of the Hy Briune, and of the Conmaenians (people of Cavan and Leitrim), marched to Athslisen (in Roscommon), where his brother, the king of Connaught, was then with his forces. A battle ensued between them, in which Cathal's (the king's) forces were defeated, and he himself taken prisoner; Manns took by force the sovereignty of Connaught, and deposed his brother. Torlogh, son of Owen O'Connor, stormed the house of Manus, at Rossmore, where Manus and Niall Gealbuidhe O'Connor were wounded; and Rannall Mac Rannall, chief of Muintir Eoluis (in Leitrim), was slain by the cast of a javelin. Manus O'Connor, after his wound was healed, led his forces into Siol Murray, where he gained power and took hostages.

The Red Earl,¹ Richard, son of Walter, earl of Ulster, son of William the Conqueror, having marched with his forces, to attack the people of Connaught, arrived at Rosecommon, where there were then assembled, Manns, son of Conor Roe, king of Connaught, with Fitzgerald and the king's forces, who collected there to support him; and, having intimidated the earl from proceeding further, he came to the resolution of leaving the country, and dispersed his forces.

A. D. 1289.

Miles, bishop of Conmaiene,¹ that is, the English bishop; and Simon O'Feenaghty, archdeacon of Elphin, died.

Matthew O'Sgingin,² chief historiographer of Ireland, died.

Teige O'Flanagan, chief of Clan Cathail (in Roscommon), died.

Richard Tuite, with the English of Meath, and Manus O'Connor, king of Connaught, marched with a force to attack O'Melaghlin, who collected his forces to resist them, and marched to Cross Sliabh³ in their vicinity. A battle ensued, in which Richard Tuite, the great baron, together with his kinsmen, and Siecus O'Kelly, were slain.

Fiaehra O'Flynn, chief of Siol Maoilruain (in Roscommon), one of the chiefs of Connaught, and celebrated for his hospitality and generosity, having gone to make a marriage alliance with the English, was treacherously slain by Mae Rickard Fionn Burke, Mae William, and Bermingham.

Bermingham and the English of the Lieney's,⁴ marched with a great force against Calvaeh O'Connor; and a battle ensued, in which the English were defeated; Myler Dexter, with many

A. D. 1288.

1. The Red Earl here mentioned was Richard de Burgo, earl of Ulster, and lord of Connaught, son of Walter the former earl of Ulster. His ancestor, William de Burgo is here called William the Conqueror, from his being the first of that family who had conquered a part of Connaught. Richard was called the Red Earl from the colour of his hair, and was celebrated for his military exploits; he was commander in chief of the Anglo-Irish forces under Henry III. and Edward I., in their wars in Ireland, Scotland, Wales and Gascony. In his day he was the most powerful nobleman in Ireland, and erected many castles, and founded several monasteries. A short time before his death he retired to the monastery of Athassel in Tipperary, which was founded by his ancestors, where he died, A.D. 1326. See Lodge's Peerage by Archdall, on the House of Clanricarde.

A. D. 1289.

1. Miles, bishop of Conmaiene, here mentioned as the English bishop, was Miles de Dunstable, bishop of Ardagh.

2. Matthew O'Sgingin. The O'Sgingins were in early times historiographers to the O'Donnells, princes of Tírconnell, an office afterwards held by the O'Clerys, who had intermarried with the O'Sgingins. See note on Tírconnell.

3. Cross Sliabh or Cross Mountain, where this battle was fought, was probably the place now called Crosswood, near Athlone, in the parish of St. Mary's, barony of Brawney, county of Westmeath; or perhaps it might have been the place called Cross, in the parish of Rathaspic, barony of Moygoish, in Westmeath. O'Melaghlin here mentioned was styled king of Meath.

4. Lieney's. This term was applied to the barony of Lieney in the county of Sligo, and some adjoining parts of the barony of Costello in the county of Mayo; hence the diocese of Achonry, others of the English, being slain, and a great number of horses and much booty being taken from them.

A. D. 1290.

O'Sedachain, bishop of Kilmacduach, died.

Carbry O'Melaghlin, king of Meath, the most valiant young warrior in Ireland in his time, was slain by Mac Coghlan (of the King's County.)

Donal, son of Bryan O'Neill, marched with a force into Tyrone, from whence he forcibly expelled Niall Culanach O'Neill; and he himself assumed the lordship of Tyrone by strong hand.

Hugh, son of Donal Oge O'Donnell, was deposed by his brother, Torlogh O'Donnell, through the influence of his mother's family, namely, the Clan Donnell (Mac Donnells), and several other Galloglaechs (Scots); and he took the lordship by force.

A. D. 1291.

Edru Magrath, abbot of the monastery of the Trinity, on Lough Key (in Rosecommon), died.

Torlogh, son of Owen O'Connor, the most celebrated man in Ireland for hospitality, generosity and valour, in his time, was slain by Niall Gealbuidhe O'Connor.

Conor Conallach O'Dowd, lord of Hy Fiachra, was drowned in the Shannon.

Congalach Mac Geoghegan, chief of Kinel Fiachach, (in Westmeath), died.

Rickard Burke, earl of Ulster, called the Red Earl, marched with an army into Tyrone, where he deposed Donal, son of Bryan O'Neill, and appointed in his place Niall Culanach O'Neill, but after the earl had left the country, Niall Culanach was slain by Donal O'Neill. This affair did not turn out fortunate for Donal, for Bryan, son of Hugh Buidhe O'Neill, was, through the influence of the earl, appointed to the lordship by Mac Martin and Mac John, who expelled him (Donal) from Tyrone.

The earl marched with a force into Tirconnell against Torlogh, son of Donal Oge (O'Donnell), and he plundered the country, both clergy and people, after which he proceeded to Elphin in Connaught; and the Conacians gave him hostages.

An insurrection was raised by Cathal O'Connor, Niall Gealbuidhe, and their allies among English and Irish, to depose Manus (O'Connor); and a battle was fought between them at Cul Maile,¹ in which Cathal was wounded, and Murrogh, son of Teige (O'Connor), with many others that are not recorded, were slain; but Manus, however, was defeated and forced to surrender, having lost many of his cavalry. The people of Cathal O'Connor and Niall Gealbuidhe, after Cathal had been wounded, committed great depredations in Carbury (county of Sligo), but the Siol Murray, his own supporters, and the English of Roscommon, came to the assistance of Manus on the following day; and they went to meet those who had taken the plunder, and came up to them on the marshy plain, where they were collected, and took the booty from them. Niall made his escape by means of his activity and valour. On this occasion Thomas Mac Costello was slain, and his brother, David Mac Costello, taken prisoner, and put to death in prison. Many others, both of the English and Irish, were either routed or slain. Niall after this returned to his own country on obtaining terms of peace, and his own lands were restored to him, but great complaints and dissensions afterwards arose between them (the O'Conors), and Niall was compelled to leave the country.

Bryan O'Flynn, lord of Hy Tuirtre (in Antrim), died.

Manus O'Connor committed a great depredation on Niall Gealbuidhe (O'Connor).

Hugh O'Fallon (in Roscommon), was slain.

A. D. 1292.

Aindilis O'Dogherty, chief of Ard Miodhair

A. D. 1291.

1. Cul Maile, mentioned as Coolmoney in the Down Survey, now called Collooney, a post town in the county of Sligo.

anciently called the diocese of Lieney, comprises part of the county of Mayo. The Lieney are designated by the people of that country Lieney O'Hara, and Lieney Costello.

(in Donegal) a man of general hospitality; and Donogh, son of Owen O'Connor (in Rosecommon), died.

Sorley O'Gormley was slain by O'Neill.

Niall Gealbuidhe O'Connor was slain by Teige, son of Andrew O'Connor, and Tuathal, son of Murtogh.

Mae Coghlan, lord of Delvin More (in King's County or Westmeath), was slain by Sifin Mac Feorais (Birmingham), at the instigation of the earl (of Ulster).

Congalach O'Kelly, lord of Bregia (in Meath), died.

The Red Earl marched with a force against Manus O'Connor to Rosecommon, but departed thence without taking hostages or gaining any advantage; Manus, however, followed him to Mee-lick and paid him his tribute.

A. D. 1293.

Florence O'Carolan, bishop of Derry, died.

A. D. 1293.

1. Saints Patrick, Columkille, and Bridget. The accounts of this matter quoted by Lanigan from Ware, Usher, Colgan, and others, differ from that of the Four Masters. St. Patrick died at Sabhal, or Saul, near Downpatrick, and was buried in the church he himself had founded at Downpatrick. Jocelin, the monk, in his Life of St. Patrick, says, that his body was buried in a very deep grave under a stone five cubits deep in the earth, to prevent its removal, for it appears that a great contest arose between the people of Ulidia, or Down, and those of Orgiall, the latter wishing to have his remains buried at Armagh; this contest was, however, amicably arranged, and the saint's remains were buried at Downpatrick. According to Colgan and Usher, part of St. Patrick's remains or reliques were, after some time, removed to the cathedral of Armagh, which removal might be the circumstance here mentioned by the Four Masters, as occurring under Nicholas Mae Maolisa, archbishop of Armagh. St. Bridget was buried in the monastery of Kildare, but during the wars of the Danes in the ninth century, Kildare having been plundered, Ceallach, the abbot or bishop of Kildare, about A. D. 850, caused the rich shrine containing the remains of St. Bridget to be removed for safety to Downpatrick, and buried there near the remains of St. Patrick. St. Columkille was buried in the abbey founded by him on the island of Iona in the Hebrides, but his remains were also removed to Down in the ninth century, to preserve them from the ravages of the Danes, who had plundered Iona. According to the Annals of Ulster, Dermot, abbot of Iona, came to Ireland A. D. 851 with the rich shrine containing the remains or reliques of Columkille, which were buried in Downpatrick, along with those of St. Patrick and St. Bridget. The Four Masters say that this removal of his reliques took place A. D. 875; though, according to Lanigan, it occurred A. D. 878 (see Lanigan, v. 3, pp. 274, 326). Thus it appears, that the remains of the three titular saints of Ireland were buried in Downpatrick, as universally believed both from history and tradition. In the twelfth century, as stated by Colgan, Usher, and other authorities, and quoted by Lanigan (vol. 4, p. 274, &c.) the place where the remains of the three saints lay in the church of Down was revealed in a vision to Malachy, bishop of Down, in the year 1185, who

Nicholas Mac Maolisa, coarb of St. Patrick (archbishop of Armagh), having had a revelation that the reliques of SS. Patrick, Columkille, and Bridget were deposited in Saul, he had them raised, and great miracles and wonders were afterwards wrought by them, and having been solemnly covered, they were finally deposited in a shrine.¹

Murtogh O'Melaghlin, king of Meath, died.

Manus O'Connor, king of Connaught, a valiant warrior, the most dreaded and the most illustrious of the Irish for bravery and hospitality in his time, died, after three months' illness, and Hugh, son of Owen (O'Connor), was appointed to succeed him as king, through the influence of the lord justice;² and on the tenth day after his appointment he was taken prisoner by Fitzgerald, and fifty of his men were slain, and others of them plundered.

Cathal O'Connor was slain by Roderick, son of Donogh Riavaeh (O'Connor).

Cathal Roe O'Connor assumed the sovereignty of Connaught after Hugh, son of Owen, had been taken prisoner, but in three months afterwards he caused the floor to be dug up and the remains of the bodies put into three distinct coffins. Malachy having communicated what had occurred to John de Courey, then the English chief governor of Ulster, who resided at Downpatrick, they determined on sending messengers on the subject to Pope Urban III.; and Cardinal Vivian, the pope's legate, coming to Ireland soon afterwards, went to Downpatrick, and in his presence, and that of Thomas O'Connor, archbishop of Armagh, fifteen other bishops, and a numerous attendance of abbots and other clergy, the remains of the three saints were solemnly translated, and placed in one monument in the cathedral of Downpatrick in the year 1186, on the 9th of June, the festival of St. Columkille. According to Cambrensis the following inscription was engraved on the monument:—

"Hi tres in Duno tumulo tumulantur in uno, Patricius, Brigida atque Columba pius."

Thus translated by the old chroniclers:—

"In Down three saints one tomb do fill, Patrick, Bridget and Columkille."

The cathedral of Downpatrick was for many centuries decorated with beautiful marble statues of the three saints, but in the reign of Henry VIII. A. D. 1538, the lord deputy, Leonard Grey, having invaded Ulster, plundered and burned the town and cathedral of Downpatrick; and he and his barbarian soldiers broke and defaced the statues of SS. Patrick, Bridget, and Columkille. Representations of the statues of the three saints from Messingham's Florilegium are given in a plate prefixed to the life of St. Patrick by Jocelin, a Cistercian monk of Furness-abbey, in Lancashire, written in the twelfth century, translated from the original Latin by Edmund Swift, and published in Dublin at the Hibernia press in the year 1809.

2. The Lord Justice and Fitzgerald. William de Vessey was then lord justice of Ireland. The de Vesseys came from Normandy to England with William the Conqueror, and had large grants of lands in Yorkshire, with the title of barons of Knapton. William de Vessey, baron of Knapton, was appointed lord justice of Ireland by King Edward I., obtained large grants of lands in was slain by Roderick, son of Donogh Riavach O'Conor. Hugh, son of Owen, being after this set at liberty, resumed the government of Connaught, through the influence of the lord justice and of the people of the king (of England).

Kildare, and was styled lord of Kildare; but, during his administration, he had frequent disputes with John Fitzthomas Fitzgerald, baron of Offaley, who charged him with treason. Both parties repaired to England to lay their complaints before the king, and having challenged each other to battle in single combat, a day was appointed, and great preparations were made, but in the mean time de Vessey fled to France, and his estates in Kildare, becoming forfeited to the crown, were conferred by the king on Fitzgerald, who was afterwards created the first earl of Kildare. This Fitzgerald, earl of Kildare, so often mentioned in the Annals at this period, was a celebrated warrior, and had frequent contests with Richard de Burgo, earl of Ulster; these two noblemen, then the most powerful in Ireland, contending for mastery. On the invasion of Ireland by Edward Bruce, in 1315, the earl of Kildare commanded the Anglo-Irish forces in several engagements, in some of which he defeated Bruce. The earl died A. D. 1316, and was buried in the Franciscan Friary of Kildare. See Lodge's Peerage on earls of Kildare, and barons of Knapton; and Willis's Lives of Illustrious Irishmen.

I. North Connaught. The terms Tuaisceart Conacht, or North Connaught, and Deisceart Conacht, or South Connaught, frequently occur in these Annals. In this article on North Connaught will be given the history and topography, with the chiefs and clans of the ancient territories comprised in the present counties of Sligo and Mayo. In the succeeding number will be given a full account of the ancient territories comprised in the present counties of Galway and Roscommon. An account of the county of Leitrim has been given in the note on Brefne. A portion of Connaught was also called Iar Conacht, or West Connaught, which comprised Connemara in the county of Galway. The ancient kingdom of Connaught comprised the present counties of Galway, Mayo, Sligo, Roscommon, and Leitrim, together with Clare, now in Munster, and Cavan, now a part of Ulster, as explained in the note on Brefne. The territory which forms the present county of Clare, as stated in Charles O'Connor's Dissertations on the History of Ireland (p. 289), was taken from Connaught in the latter end of the third century by Cormac Cas, son of Oilíoll Olum, king of Munster, or by Lughaidh Mean, king of Munster, in the third century, another descendant of Oilíoll Olum, and added to part of Limerick under the name of Tuadh-Mumhain, or North Munster, a word anglicised to Thomond (see O'Brien's Dictionary at the word Tuadh). The O'Briens of the Dalcassian race became kings of Thomond. Conacht, according to Keating, O'Flaherty, and others, derived its name either from Con, one of the chief druids of the Tuath de Danans, or from Conn-Cead-Cathach, that is Con of the hundred battles, monarch of Ireland in the second century, whose posterity possessed the country; the word iacht, or iocht, signifying children or a posterity, and hence Coniocht means the territory possessed by the posterity of Con. The more ancient name of Connaught, according to O'Flaherty and Charles O'Connor, was Olnegmacht, and was so called from Olnegmacht, an ancient queen of the Firbolgs; and hence the inhabitants were called Fir Olnegmacht. Sligo derived its name from the river Sligeach, which was probably derived from slig, a shell; and the word may signify abounding in shells, a probable inference, as the tide in its course up the river carries with it many sea shells. Mayo, in Irish Magh-Eo, or Muigh-Eo in the genitive, is supposed to take its name from magh, a plain, and eo, a yew tree, and therefore may signify the plain of the yew trees.

The territory of North Connaught is connected with some of the earliest events in Irish history, as mentioned in all our ancient annalists. In the time of Partholan, who planted the first colony in Ireland, the lakes called Loughs Con, and Measc or Mask, in Mayo, Fergal O'Reilly, lord of Muintir Maoilmordha (county of Cavan), died.

More, daughter of Felim O'Conor, died.

Murtogh O'Flanagan, chief of Clan Cathail (in Roscommon), died.

and Lough Teithed, or Techet, now Lough Gara in Sligo, on the borders of Roscommon, suddenly burst forth, as stated in Ogygia, and in the Book of Leacan, folio 273. The lakes of North Connaught are numerous, and many of them large and very beautiful, as Loughs Mask, Con, and others in Mayo; Lough Gara, Lough Arrow, Lough Gill, and others in Sligo. There are many magnificent mountains in it, some of them ranging between two and three thousand feet above the level of the sea, as those of Croagh Patrick, Muilrea, Partry, Furnamore, Nephin, Bengorm, Bengoriff, and others in Mayo; and those of Slieve Gann, corruptly changed to Slieve Danih, and anglicised the Ox Mountains; the King's Mountain, Truskmore, Bengulban or Benbulbin, Knocknarea, and Keis Corran, in Sligo; together with the Curlew Mountains on the borders of Sligo and Roscommon. In some of the mountains of Mayo are still found herds of red deer, which in former times inhabited the ancient forests in vast numbers. The coasts of Mayo and Sligo along the Atlantic abound in wild and sublime scenery, such as towering ocean cliffs, and immense rocky caverns, and contain Achill, and other interesting islands, and many fine bays, inlets and harbours, as those of Killery, Clew, Blacksod, Broadhaven, Killala, and Sligo.

On the arrival of the colony of Firbolgs, or Belgians, in Ireland, a division of them landed on the north-western coast of Connaught, in one of the bays now called Blacksod, or the Broad Haven. These Firbolgs were named Fir-Domhnan, which has been anglicised to Firdonnians, and sometimes Damnonians. The place where they landed was called Inbhear-Domhnan, or the Bay of the Damnonians, and the adjoining country Iarras, or Irras-Domhnan, a name probably derived from Iar, the west, and ros, a promontory or peninsula, and which, therefore, may signify the western promontory or peninsula of the Damnonians, a term exactly corresponding with the topographical features of the country; and the name has been retained in that of the barony of Erris, in Mayo, to the present day.

When the colony called Tuatha-De-Danan first invaded Ireland they landed in Ulster, and proceeded thence to Sliabh-an-iarain (the iron mountain) in Brefne, and forward into the territory of Connaught. The Firbolgs having collected their forces to oppose their progress, a desperate battle was fought between them at a place called Magh Tuireadh, or the Plain of the Tower, in which the Firbolgs were totally defeated, ten thousand of them being slain, together with Eochaidh, son of Eirc their king, who was buried on the sea shore, a cairn of large stones being erected over him as a sepulchral monument, which remains to this day. This place is on the strand near Ballysadare, in the county of Sligo, and was called Traigh-an-Chairn, or the Strand of the Cairn, from the cairn erected there to the Firbolg king; and in later times it obtained the name of Traigh Eothuile-an t-Saoir, that is, the Strand of Eothuile the carpenter. This was called the battle of South Moyturey, and took place on the borders of Lough Mask, between Ballinrobe and Cong, in the county of Mayo. In thirty years afterwards the Fomorians, aided by the Firbolgs, fought another great battle with the Danans for the recovery of the kingdom, but were defeated. This was called the battle of North Moyturey, or Moyturey of the Fomorians, and took place near Lough Arrow, in Tirerrill, in Sligo, on the borders of Roscommon, about fifty miles distant from the place of the first battle. The townland of Moterra, in the parish of Kilmaetramny, in the barony of Tirerrill, points out the place where this battle was fought. An account of the Fomorians has been given in the notes on Dalriada and Tirconnell. After the battle of North Moyturey the Danans became possessors of Ireland, which they ruled for nearly two centuries, until the arrival of the Milesian colony from Spain, who conquered them, and became masters of Tuathal, son of Murtogh O'Conor, was slain by the O'Haras.

The castle of Sligo was given to John Fitzthomas (one of the Fitzgeralds), who soon afterwards went to England.

Ireland. The Firbolgs, who were defeated and dispossessed by the Danans, having assisted the Milesians in the conquest of the Danais, were in consequence restored by the Milesians to a great part of their former possessions, particularly in Connaught, in which province they were ruled by their own kings of the Firbolg race for more than a thousand years, and down to the third century, when the Milesian kings of the race of Heremon became chief rulers of Connaught. The Firbolgs appear to have been an athletic race, and those of Irros Domhnán, in Mayo, in the early ages, about the commencement of the Christian era, are described in O'Flaherty's Ogygia, under the name of Gamarradians, as celebrated champions and wrestlers. The Clanna Morna of Connaught, under their chief, Goll, son of Morna, are also celebrated in the Ossianic poems and ancient annals, as famous warriors in the third century. Many of the Firbolg or Firdonnian race are still to be found in Connaught, but blended by blood and intermarriages with the Milesians.

The ancient city called Naginata by the Greek geographer, Ptolemy, in the second century, in his map of Ireland, is supposed to have been situated near Sligo; but, according to others, near Galway.

Cormac, the celebrated monarch of Ireland, in the third century, as stated in O'Flaherty's Ogygia, and the book of Ballymote, was born in Corran, at the place called Ath-Cornaic, or the Ford of Cormac, near Keis Corran, in Sligo, and hence was called Cormac of Corran.

The territory of North Connaught is connected in a remarkable manner with the mission of St. Patrick in Ireland. Coill Fochlath, or the Forest of Fochluth, in Tir Amhalgaidh, now Tyrawley, in the county of Mayo, is mentioned in the various Lives of St. Patrick as the scene of his vision respecting the conversion of Ireland, and a place which he afterwards visited in the course of his mission, and where he converted to Christianity Enda Crom, king of the territory, with his seven sons, and baptized twelve thousand persons in the water of a well called Tobar Eadharach. The place where St. Patrick held the assembly was called Forach Mae Amalgaidh, and is now known as Mullagh Farry, near Killala. The wood of Fochluth was situated between Ballina and Killala; and the village of Foghill, near Killala, is supposed to retain the ancient name. Croagh Patrick mountain, in Mayo, was long celebrated for the miracles the saint performed there, and has continued a famous place of pilgrimage to this day.

In the sixth century, A. D. 555, or, according to others, A. D. 561, was fought in the territory of Carbury, near Sligo, the great battle of Cula Dreimhne, between the forces of Meath and Leinster, under Diarmaid, monarch of Ireland, and the people of Tir Eogain and Tir Conaill, commanded by the princes Fergus and Donmall, sons of Murtogh Mac Earca, former monarch of Ireland, and aided by Aodh or Hugh, king of Connaught, with his forces; in which battle the army of the monarch Diarmaid was totally defeated, three thousand of his men being slain, and he himself having hardly saved his life by flight.

Hy Fiachra or Hy Fiachrach was a name applied to the territories possessed by the race of Fiachra, one of the sons of Eochaidh Muighmeadhoin, monarch of Ireland in the fourth century, of the race of Heremon. The following accounts of the race of Hy Fiachra have been collected from the Books of Leacan and Ballymote, O'Flaherty's Ogygia, and other authorities. Fiachra was for some time King of Connaught, and was a celebrated warrior, and commander-in-chief of the Irish forces under his brother Niall of the Hostages, Monarch of Ireland; and according to the Book of Ballymote, folio 145, on his return home victorious from a great battle which he had fought with the men of Munster, A. D. 402, he died of his wounds at a place called Hy Mac-Uais

A. D. 1294.

Great depredations were committed by Hugh, son of Owen (O'Conor), on the sons of Murtogh. Murtogh, son of Manus O'Conor, the most in Meath, where he was buried with great honours, and where a monument was erected to his memory with an inscription in Ogham characters, on which occasion fifty prisoners taken in the battle were, according to the Pagan customs, sacrificed around his tomb. The place called Hy Mac-Uais is now the barony of Moygoish in Westmeath. Dathi, son of Fiachra, was king of Connaught, and afterwards Monarch of Ireland; he was one of the most celebrated of the Irish monarchs, and carried his victorious arms to Gaul, where he was killed by lightning at the foot of the Alps, A. D. 429. His body was brought to Ireland and buried in Relig-na-Rioghl, the ancient cemetery of the Irish kings at Cruachan, near Elphin. Dathi was the last Pagan monarch of Ireland. Oilioll Molt, son of Dathi, was also king of Connaught and monarch of Ireland in the fifth century. Amhalgaidh, another son of Fiachra, was also king of Connaught, and from him the territory of Tir Amhalgaidh or Tirawley in Mayo obtained its name. Dathi the Monarch had a son called Fiachra Ealgach, whose posterity gave name to the territory of Hy Fiachrach Muaidhe or Hy Fiachra of the Moy, also called Tir Fiachrach, and afterwards Tireragh barony, in the county of Sligo. This Fiachra had a son called Amhalgaidh, who raised a cairn of great stones called Carn Amhalgaidh, where it appears great assemblies of the people were held and where Amhalgaidh himself was buried. It is supposed that this cairn was on the hill of Mullaghearn, near the town of Killala. On this hill are some remains of an earthen rampart or fort, with some very large stones arranged in a circular form, apparently the remains of a Druidical monument, which the writer saw a few years ago. At Carn Amhalgaidh the chiefs of the O'Dowds were inaugurated as princes of Hy Fiachra, though according to some accounts the O'Dowds were sometimes inaugurated on the hill of Ardnarea near Ballina. Bryan, king of Connaught, ancestor of the Hy Briuin race, and Niall of the Hostages, Monarch of Ireland, ancestor of the Hy Nialls, of whom accounts have been given in the notes on Meath and Brefney, were brothers of Fiachra, son of Eochaidh Muighmeadhain, monarch of Ireland; and hence these three brothers were the progenitors of the kings and head chiefs of Meath, Ulster and Connaught. The territories possessed by the race of Fiachra also obtained the name of Hy Fiachra, and comprised the present counties of Sligo and Mayo with a great portion of Galway. The territory of Hy Fiachra in Galway, or southern Hy Fiachra, was called Hy Fiachra Aidhne from Eogan Aidhne, son of Eochaidh Breac, son of Dathi, monarch of Ireland. The posterity of Eogan Aidhne, the chief of whom were the O'Heynes, O'Clerys, and O'Shaughnesseys, possessed this territory, which was co-extensive with the diocese of Kilmacduagh; and an account of its chiefs and clans will be found in the note on South Connaught. The chiefs of North Hy Fiachra in Sligo and Mayo were the O'Dowds, &c. According to O'Dugan and Mac Firhis, fourteen of the race of Hy Fiachra were kings of Connaught, some of whom had their residence at Aidhne, in Galway; others at Ceara, now the barony of Carra, in Mayo; and some on the plain of Muaidhe or the Moy, in Sligo.

The Clans of Hy Fiachra are thus designated by O'Dugan:—

"Binn shugh nam-borb cliathach."

"The music-loving hosts of fierce engagements."

O'Dubhda, a name sometimes anglicised O'Dowda, but more frequently O'Dowd, and by some O'Dowde, by others O'Dooda and O'Doody, was the head chief of North Hy Fiachra, whose territory comprised nearly the whole of the present county of Sligo, with the greater part of Mayo. The name Dubhda appears to be derived from Dubh, dark or black, and dath, a eligible heir to the province (of Connaught) of his family, was slain by Teige (O'Connor), and Donal, son of Teige.

Malachy O'Flanagan, chief of Clan Cathail, was colour, which, by the elision of the two last letters, which have no sound, makes Dubhda, and might signify a dark-haired chief. Taithleach was a favourite name amongst the chiefs of the O'Dowds, and may be derived from Tath a ruler, and laech or laoch a warrior; hence it may signify the ruling warrior. The O'Dowds are descended from Fiachra Ealgach, son of Dathi, monarch of Ireland above mentioned, and took their name from Dubhda, one of their ancient chiefs. Several celebrated chiefs of the O'Dowds are mentioned in the Annals of the Four Masters, in the tenth, eleventh and twelfth centuries. At A.D. 981, Aodh O'Dubhda or Hugh O'Dowd, who is styled lord of North Connaught, died. By a typographical error in O'Connor's Rer. Hib. Scrip. the name is translated O'Duffy instead of O'Dowd. In the Annals at A. D. 1097, is recorded the death of Murchartach O'Dowd, lord of Hy Amhalaigh. Many valiant chiefs of the O'Dowds are mentioned in these Annals down to the seventeenth century; and they had large possessions in the county of Sligo until the Cromwellian wars, when their estates were confiscated. The O'Dowds were inaugurated as princes of Hy Fiachra or North Connaught at Carn Amhalaigh, near Killala, as above stated. They appear from history to have been a valiant race; and many of them even down to modern times were remarkable for their great strength and stature; indeed, it may be observed that most of the clans of Sligo and Mayo furnished many men of great size and strength.

The following chiefs and clans of Hy Fiachra, and the territories they possessed in the twelfth century in the present counties of Sligo and Mayo, have been collected from O'Dugan and other authorities: I. O'Maolclaiche, or O'Mulclohy, chief of Cairbre, now the barony of Carbury, county of Sligo. Carbury derived its name from Cairbre, one of the sons of King Niall of the Hostages. This name has been anglicised to Stone, and there are still many of the family in Carbury. II. Mac Diarmada or Mac Dermott, chief of Tir Oiliolla, now the barony of Tirerrill, in Sligo, which derived its name from Oilioll, one of the sons of Eochaidh Muighmeodhain, monarch of Ireland. The Mac Dermotts were also princes of Moylurg, a large territory in the county of Roscommon, of which an account will be found in the note on south Connaught. They afterwards became chiefs of Coolavin, as successors to the O'Garas, lords of Coolavin, and have to the present day estates in Coolavin, and retain the title of princes of Coolavin, being the only family of the Milesian clans who have preserved their ancient titles to the present time. III. Mac Donchaidh, that is, Mac Donogh, a branch of the Mac Dermotts, afterwards chiefs of Tirerrill and of Coran, now the barony of Corran in Sligo. Several chiefs of the Mac Donaghs are mentioned in the course of the Annals; and they were great patrons of learned men, as mentioned in the subsequent part of this article, in the account of the Book of Ballymote. O'Donchathach is given as a chief by O'Dugan in Corran, and is also mentioned in the poem of Giolla Iosa More Mac Firis, in which he is styled O'Dun-chadha of the "learned men," and it is stated that his territory extended as far as the beauteous stream of the salmon, by which was meant the river of Ballysadare. This name has been anglicised O'Donagh or O'Donaghy. IV. O'Dobhalen or O'Devlin, is given as another chief in Corran; and some chiefs of the name are mentioned in the course of the Annals. V. O'Headhra or O'Hara, chief of Luighne, now the barony of Lieney in the county of Sligo; but Lieney anciently comprised part of the baronies of Costello and Gallen in Mayo. The O'Haras were descended from Cormac Gaileang, son of Teige, son of Cian, son of Oilioll Olunn, king of Munster in the third century, of the race of Heber, and therefore of the same stock as the Dalcassians of Thomond, of whom the O'Briens were kings. From this Cormac Gaileang, who lived in the fourth century, the territory of Galinga, now the barony of Gallen in Mayo, took its name. The territory of Luighne or Lieney derived its name from Luighne, a slain by Cathal, son of Teige Mac Dermott, in the street of Sligo.

Cathal, son of Teige Mac Dermott, lord of Moylurg, died soon afterwards, and Maolrooney, brother of Cormac Gaileang. The O'Haras took their name from Eaghra, lord of Lieney in the tenth century, whose death is mentioned in the Annals at A. D. 926. Many chiefs of the O'Haras are mentioned in the Annals in the tenth, eleventh and twelfth centuries, amongst others Donal O'Hara, lord of Lieney, who was killed A. D. 1023; and from the twelfth to the seventeenth century they held their rank as lords of Lieney, and had large possessions to the period of the Cromwellian wars, when a great deal of their property was confiscated, though they still hold considerable estates in the barony of Lieney. In the reigns of Queen Anne and George I., the O'Haras were created barons of Tyrawley and Kilmartin, in Mayo, and some of them were distinguished generals in the British service. The O'Haras are thus designated by O'Dugan.

"Righ Luighne na m-bladhla; Luighne na laoch lann."

"The lords of Lieney of high fame;
The men of Lieney, of warlike swords."

VI. O'Gadhra or O'Gara, given by O'Dugan as a chief of Lieney, but in after times lord of Cuil O'bh-finn, now the barony of Coolavin in the county of Sligo, and sometimes styled lord of Moy O'Gara, of Coolavin, and also Sliabh Lugh, which latter district extended into a part of the barony of Costello in Mayo. The O'Garas derived their descent from Teige, son of Cian, son of Oilioll Olunn, being exactly of the same stock as the O'Haras. They took their name from Gadhra, one of their ancient chiefs. Some chiefs of the O'Garas are mentioned in the Annals as early as the beginning of the eleventh century, amongst others, Roderick O'Gara, lord of Luighne, who died A. D. 1056. Many other distinguished chiefs are mentioned in the course of the Annals; it appears that they retained considerable rank and possessions in the county of Sligo down to the seventeenth century; and one of them, Fergal O'Gara, lord of Moy O'Gara and Coolavin, is justly celebrated as a great patron of learned men, particularly of the O'Clerys and other authors of the Annals of the Four Masters, the beautiful dedication of which work may be seen prefixed to the First Number of this publication, as addressed to their patron Fergal O'Gara. VII. O'Cearnachain and O'Huathmhairin, given by O'Dugan as chiefs in the territory of Lieney. VIII. O'Muireadhaigh or O'Murray, chief of Ceara, now the barony of Carra, in Mayo. The O'Murrays were of the race of Hy Fiachra, and were also chiefs of the Lagan, a district in the northern part of the barony of Tyrawley in Mayo. Several chiefs of the O'Murrays are mentioned in the course of the Annals. IX. O'Tighearnaigh or O'Tierney, a chief in Carra. Several of the O'Tierneys are mentioned as lords of Carra in the Annals. X. O'Gormog, also given as a chief in Carra. XI. O'Maille or O'Malley, chief of Umhall, which O'Dugan states was divided into two territories. The name has been rendered sometimes into Umalla and Hy Malia. This territory comprised the present baronies of Murrisk and Burrishoole in the county of Mayo. The O'Malleys are of the Hy Briuin race, descended from Bryan, king of Connaught in the fifth century, who was also the progenitor of the O'Connors, kings of Connaught, of the O'Rourkes, O'Reillys, Mac Dermotts and other chiefs, as explained in the note on Brefney. The O'Malleys were celebrated chiefs, and many of them are mentioned in the course of these Annals. They are thus designated by O'Dugan:

"Duine maith riamh ni raibhe,
D'ibh Maille acht na inharuidhe,
Faidhe na sine sibhe,
Dine baidhe is braitheirsi."

"A good man yet there never was,
Of the O'Malleys, who was not a mariner,
Of every weather ye are prophets,
A tribe of brotherly affection and of friendship."

son of Gillcreest Mac Dermott, succeeded him in the lordship.

Donogh, Mac Consnamha, chief of Muintir Kenny (in Leitrim); Durkan Mac Tiarnan, lord or chief of Tullaghanoho (in the county of Cavan); and Dearvail, daughter of Teige, son of Cathal Mac Dermott, died.

The castle of Sligo was demolished by Hugh, son of Owen O'Connor.

Rickard Burke, the Red Earl, was taken pri-

The O'Malleys were valiant chiefs and particularly distinguished in naval engagements, having a considerable fleet always under their command. In the reign of Elizabeth, Grace O'Malley, daughter of Mac William Burke, and wife of the chief O'Malley, was a celebrated heroine, commanded her fleet in person, and performed many remarkable exploits against the English. Her memory was long famous among the Irish, and celebrated in their songs, and even to the present day is held in esteem under the designation of Graine ni Mhaille or Graine Wale. The head of this ancient family is sir Samuel O'Malley, and there are at the present day many respectable families of the O'Malleys in Mayo. XII. O'Taleharain, chief of Conmaicne Cuile, now the barony of Kilmain, county of Mayo.

The following chiefs and clans not given in O'Dugan, have been collected from various other sources: I. O'Caithniadh, chief of Iorru, now the barony of Erris, in Mayo. Several chiefs of the O'Caithniadhs are mentioned in the Annals; the name was anglicised to O'Caheeney, but few of the family exist at the present day. II. O'Ceallachain or O'Callaghan. The O'Callaghans were chiefs in Erris, but of a different race from the O'Callaghans of Munster. III. O'Caoinhain, a name anglicised to O'Keevan and O'Cavanaghs, a senior branch of the O'Dowd family, and chiefs of some districts on the borders of Sligo and Mayo, in the baronies of Tireragh, Corran, and Costello. IV. O'Gaibhtheachain or O'Gavagan, and O'Maolfhionn or O'Mulleeney, chiefs of Calraighe of Moy Heleog, a district in which was comprised the present parish of Crossmolina, in the barony of Tyrawley, in Mayo. V. O'Gairmiallaigh or O'Gormley; and O'Dorehaidhe, a name anglicised to Dorely, and by others to Darey. These were chiefs of Partraighe or Partry, an ancient territory at the Partry mountains in Mayo. The present parish of Ballyovey, also called the parish of Partry, shews the situation of this ancient territory. The O'Doreeys were a distinguished clan, and many families of them in Mayo and Galway, having anglicised the name to Darey or D'Arely, have been erroneously supposed to be some of the D'Areys of Meath, of English descent. VI. O'Laelthain or O'Loughnan, by some anglicised to Loftus. The O'Loughnans were chiefs of a territory called the Two Baes, now the parish of Baes, situated between Lough Con and the river Moy in Mayo. VII. O'Maolfoghmair and O'Maolbrennuin, chiefs of Ily Eachach Muaidhe, a district extending along the western banks of the Moy, between Ballina and Killala. This name O'Maolbrennuin has been anglicised to Mulrennin, and the name O'Maolfoghmair has been by some rendered into Milford. VIII. The O'Mongans or O'Mangans, chiefs of Breach Magh, a district in the parish of Kilmore Moy in Sligo. IX. O'Conniallain or O'Connellan, chief of Bun-ai-Conniallan, now Bunyeonellan, a district in the barony of Gallen, county of Mayo, and also of Clooneonellan, in the barony of Kilmain. This clan are a branch of the southern Ily Nialls, descended from Laoghaire, monarch of Ireland in the fifth century, and are of the same family as the O'Coindalbhains or O'Kendellans, princes of Ily Laoghaire in Meath, but long settled in the counties of Mayo, Sligo, and Roscommon. They are mentioned in these Annals at A.D. 1295, as a clan in Roscommon; and under the year 1316 in the Annals one of their chiefs, Thomas O'Connellan, is recorded as having been slain in the great battle fought at Athenry. X. O'Ceirin or O'Keerin, chief of Ciarraighe Loeh-na-nairneadh, an ancient territory in the barony of Costello, county of Mayo, comprising the parishes of Aghamore, Bekan, and Knoek.

There are various other clans, many of them still numerous, in the counties of Mayo and Sligo, as the O'Bannans, O'Brogans, Mac Coubains, O'Beuns or Whites, O'Beolans, O'Beirnes, O'Flattelleys, O'Creans, O'Careys, O'Conachains or O'Conaghtys of Cabrach, in Tireragh, O'Flannelleys, O'Coolaghaus, O'Burns, O'Iughes, O'Huada or O'Fuada, and O'Tapa, names anglicised to Swift, O'Loingsys or O'Lynches, O'Maolmoicheirghe, anglicised to Earley, O'Mulrooneys or Rooneys, O'Morans, O'Muldoons, O'Meehans, O'Caffreys, O'Finnegans, O'Morrisseys, Mac Geraghtys, O'Spillans. The O'Donnells and Mac Sweeney from Donegal who settled in many parts of Sligo and Mayo, particularly when the O'Donnells, princes of Tircennell, extended their power into Sligo. Many families of the O'Donnells and Mac Sweeney in Sligo and Mayo have been very respectable. Sir Neill O'Donnell has large estates in the county of Mayo.

The O'Conor Sligo. A branch of the O'Conors of Roscommon, descendants of the the kings of Connaught, settled in Sligo, and became very powerful in the sixteenth century. The head of the family was designated The O'Conor Sligo, and appears to have extended his power over the greater part of that county. In the learned work, the Irish Antiquarian Researches, by sir William Betham, Ulster King of Arms, accounts are found of the O'Conor Sligo, the O'Donnells, princes of Tircennell, together with many other Irish chiefs, and much interesting information on curious points of Irish history and antiquities.

The Mac Firbises, called Clan Fírbisigh, were a branch descended from the same stock as the O'Dowds, princes of Ily Fiachra. Their original territory was Magh Broin in Tyrawley; they afterwards settled in Rosserk, between Ballina and Killala, and lastly at Leacan in the parish of Kilglass, barony of Tireragh, east of the river Moy, where they had estates and a castle, the ruins of which still remain. The Mac Firbises held the office of Ollamhs, that is, of historiographers and poets of Ily Fiachra, and at one time of all Connaught. From the Annals of the Four Masters, and other authorities, the following account of the Mac Firbises has been collected:—

A. D. 1138. Awlave More Mac Firbis, ollav, or historiographer of Hy Fiachra, died. O'Reilly's Irish Writers.

A. D. 1279. Giolla Iosa More Mac Firbis, ollav of Tir Fiachra, died. Four Masters.

A. D. 1301. Giolla Iosa Mac Firbis, chief historian of Tir Fiachra, &c., died. Annals of Clonmacnoise.

A. D. 1376. Donogh Mac Firbis, an eminent historian, died. Four Masters.

A. D. 1379. Fearbisigh Mac Firbis, a learned historian, died.

A. D. 1418. Giolla Iosa More Mac Firbis, the famous antiquary of Leacan, one of the chief compilers of the book of Leacan, and Maol Iosa Mac Firbis, another learned writer, and poet, died. O'Reilly's Irish Writers.

Dubhaltach, Duaid, or Dudley Mac Firbis, of whom accounts may be found in the Dissertations of the learned Charles O'Connor of Belenagar, in his preface to Ogygia Vindicated, in O'Flaherty's Ogygia, and in the works of Ware by Harris, was one of the most celebrated of the historians of Leacan, and was instructed in the Brehon laws by the Mae Egans, hereditary Brehons of Ormond. O'Connor says that "Duaid Mac Firbis closed the line of the hereditary antiquaries of Leacan, in Tir Fiachra, on the Moy, a family whose law reports (on Brehonism) and historical collections have derived great credit to their country. This last of the Mae Firbises was unfortunately murdered at Dunfin in the county of Sligo, and by his death our antiquities received an irreparable blow." The learned Roderick O'Flaherty, author of Ogygia, was the pupil of Mac Firbis, of whom he speaks with the highest praise, as the chief ornament and support of Irish antiquarianism while living, and an irreparable loss to it when dead. Mac Firbis was killed in the year 1670, about the eightieth year of his age; and it is stated in some accounts that he was buried in the old church of Kilglass. It is also mentioned in Ware's works by Harris, under the account of John de Burgo, archbishop of Tuam in the fifteenth century, soner by Fitzgerald, which circumstance occasioned great commotions in Ireland.

Fitzgerald and Mac Feorais (Bermingham) treacherously committed great depredations on the people of Connaught, and attempted to depose

Hugh, son of Owen (O'Connor); and they spoiled the country, but did not, however, establish their power over it, and only disturbed its peace.

David Mac Gillaraigh (in Sligo), was slain by the sons of Donal Duv O'Hara.

that Duald Mac Firbis was a short time before his death employed by sir James Ware in collecting and translating Irish MSS. There are still some of the family of Mac Firbis about Leacan, some of whom have changed the name to Forbes.

The Book of Leacan, so called from being composed at Leacan, was compiled by the Mac Firbises, from the twelfth to the fifteenth century, and is one of the greatest and most authentic works on Irish history and antiquities. It is a very voluminous MS., written on fine vellum, and comprises the history of Ireland from the earliest ages to the fifteenth century. The original book of Leacan is in the Library of the Royal Irish Academy, from which the translator of these Annals, who had the honour of being appointed to the office of Irish Historiographer to their late Majesties George IV. and William IV., transcribed a copy, which is now deposited in the Royal Library at Windsor.

The Book of Ballymote, so called from having been in the possession of the Mac Donoghs at their castle of Ballymote in Sligo, or, according to others, from having been partly composed at the monastery of Ballymote, was compiled in the latter end of the fourteenth century, chiefly by Solamh O'Droma, or Solomon O'Drom, and Manus O'Duigenan, learned antiquaries and historians. Tomaltagh Mac Donogh, lord of Tirerrill and Corran, in Sligo, was the patron of these learned men; and the Book of Ballymote remained a long time in possession of this family, but was purchased from one of the Mac Donoghs, in the year 1522, by Hugh Duv, son of Hugh Roe, son of Niall Garv O'Donnell, of Donegal, the price given for the Book being one hundred and forty milch cows. The Book of Ballymote is a large folio M.S. on vellum; it contains the ancient history of Ireland from the earliest period to the end of the fourteenth century, and is considered a very authentic work and of great authority. The original is deposited in the library of the Royal Irish Academy; and a copy of it, with a full account of its contents, was made by the translator of these Annals as Irish Historiographer, and is deposited in the Royal Library at Windsor. Further accounts of the Books of Leacan and Ballymote and of their learned authors are to be found in O'Reilly's Irish Writers.

The Annals of the Four Masters, of which a copious account has been given in the introduction to the first number of the present publication, were compiled by the O'Clerys and other learned writers, under the patronage of Fergal O'Gara, lord of Moy O'Gara and Coolavin, in the county of Sligo; and thence it happens that these three great works on Irish history and antiquities, are intimately connected with Sligo, giving that county a peculiarly honourable position in respect to ancient Irish literature.

In the twelfth century John de Courcy made some attempts with his Anglo-Norman forces towards the conquest of Connaught, but did not succeed to any extent. The de Burgos, or Burkes, in the reign of king John, obtained grants in various parts of Connaught, and carried on fierce contests for a long period with the O'Connors, kings of Connaught, and various chiefs. They made considerable conquests in the country, and were styled lords of Connaught; but it appears that in the fourteenth century several chiefs of the Burkes renounced their allegiance to the English government, and some of them then took the surname of Mac William, and, adopting the Irish language and dress, identified themselves with the ancient Irish in customs and manners. One of them, namely, Edmund de Burgo, took the name of Mac William Oughtor, or Mac William the Upper, who was located in Galway, and another, Mac William Eighter, or Mac William the Lower, who was located in Mayo. Some branches of the Burkes took the surnames of Mac David, Mac Philbin, and Mac Gibbon, from their respective ancestors. The other families of Anglo-Norman, or English, descent who settled in Mayo, were the following, viz.: The de Angulos, or Nangles, of whom an account has been given in the note on Meath, and who also settled in Mayo and took the Irish surname of Mac Costello, and from whom the barony of Costello derived its name. The de Excters, who took the name of Mac Jordans, and were styled lords of Athleathan, in the barony of Gallen. The Barretts, some of whom took the surnames of Mac Watten and Mac Andrew; the Stauntons, in Carra, some of whom took the name of Mac Aveeley; the Lawlesses, Cusacks, Lynots, Prendergasts, and Fitzmaurices, the Berminghams, who changed their name to Mac Feorais; the Blakes, Dillons, Binghams, &c. &c. The Mac Philips are placed on the map of Ortelius in the barony of Costello; their principal seat is at Cloonmore, and they are a branch of the Burkes, who took the name of Mac Philips.

In Sligo the Anglo-Normans under the Burkes, and the Fitzgeralds, earls of Kildare, made some settlements, and had frequent contests with the O'Connors, and with the O'Donnells, princes of Tirconnell, who had extended their power over a great part of Sligo.

Mayo, according to some accounts, was formed into a county as early as the reign of Edward III, but not altogether reduced to English rule till the reign of Elizabeth. In Speed's Theatre of Great Britain, published A. D. 1676, Mayo is stated to be "replenished both with pleasure and fertility, abundantly rich in cattle, deer, hawks, and plenty of honey."

Sligo was formed into a county A. D. 1565, in the reign of Elizabeth by the lord deputy, sir Henry Sydney.

The following have been the noble families in Mayo and Sligo since the reign of James I. In Mayo the Burkes, viscounts Clanmorris and earls of Mayo. The Brownes, barons of Kilmain, barons of Westport, and barons of Oranmore. The Binghamms, barons of Castlebar; and the Savilles, barons of Castlebar. The Dillons, barons of Costello-Gallen, and viscounts Dillon. The O'Haras, barons of Tyrawley and Kilmain. In Sligo the Taaffes, barons of Ballymote, and viscounts of Corran. The Cootes, barons of Collooney. The Scudamores, viscounts of Sligo. And the Browns, marquesses of Sligo.

Ecclesiastical divisions. At Cong, in Mayo, a monastery was founded and dedicated to the Blessed Virgin by St. Feichin, a native of Sligo, a man eminent for his learning and sanctity, in the seventh century. This abbey, possessed by Augustinian monks, was a celebrated seat of learning and religion for many centuries, and became a bishop's see, which was united to the see of Tuam in the twelfth century. Cong was also the residence of some of the kings of Connaught; and Roderick O'Connor, the last Milesian monarch of Ireland died there A. D. 1193, and was buried at Clonmacnois.

Mayo. A monastery was founded here in the seventh century by St. Colman, an Irishman, who had been bishop of Lindisfarne, in Northumberland, but leaving England, returned to his own country, and founded this monastery, chiefly for the use of English monks, whom he had brought over with him. A college also was founded here which was long famous as a seat of learning, and, being established chiefly for the use of the English, was called Magh-Eo-na-Saxon, or Mayo of the Saxons. Alfred, king of Northumberland in the seventh century, was according to some accounts educated at Mayo, and by other accounts Alfred the Great, king of England, in the ninth century, also received his education there. Mayo likewise became a bishop's see, and in the sixteenth century, A. D. 1559, was annexed to the see of Tuam.

The see of Killala or Cill Alaidhe was founded by St. Patrick in the fifth century, and the bishops are sometimes styled bishops of Tir Amhlagaidh or Tyrawley, also bishops of Tir Fiachra, and of Hy Fiachra, and sometimes of Hy Fiachra Muaidhe, that is, of Hy Fiachra of the Moy, so called to distinguish it from Hy Fiachra Aidhne or the diocese of Kilmacduagh in the county of Donal O'Hara, lord of Lieny, died.

 Dermot O'Caemhain (in Sligo), died.

A. D. 1295.

The Red Earl was set at liberty from his confinement by Fitzgerald, by command of the king of England, and good hostages of his own kindred were taken in exchange for him.

Bryan, son of Hugh Buidhe O'Neill, lord of Tyrone, was slain by Donal, son of Bryan O'Neill, and many of the English and Irish were slain along with him.

A contest arose in Tireconnell between Hugh, son of Donal Oge O'Donnell, and Torlogh his brother, respecting the lordship, so that a great part of the country was spoiled between them, both clergy and people; Torlogh was deposed and expelled from Tireconnell to the people of Tyrone and to the Clan Donnell (Mac Donnells).

Donal O'Kelly, lord of Hy Maine, the most wise of counsel in his time, died in a monastic habit, and was interred in the monastery of Knockmoy.

Mac Branan, chief of Core Achlan (in Roscommon), died, and Tomaltagh Mac Branan, the chief who was appointed his successor, was slain by Muintir Connellan in revenge of their father who had been killed by him.

The castles of Baile Nui,¹ Moy Breeraighe, and Moy Dumha, were demolished by Geoffrey O'Ferrall.

A. D. 1296.

Giollaisa Mac Anliatanaigh (O'Conor), bishop of Elphin; and Maolpeadar O'Duigenan, arch-

Galway. The diocese of Killala comprehends a great part of the county of Mayo and a portion of Sligo.

The see of Achonry or Achadh Chonaire, was founded in the sixth century by St. Finian, bishop of Clonard, in Meath, who placed over it his disciple St. Nathy, its first bishop. The bishops of Achonry were in early times styled bishops of Luighne or Lieney, which was the ancient name of the territory. The diocese of Achonry comprehends a large portion of the county of Sligo, with a considerable part of Mayo.

Drumcliff in Sligo. A monastery was founded here by St. Columkille in the sixth century, and was long famous as a seat of learning and religion. It became a bishop's see and its abbots were styled bishops. It was united to the see of Elphin in the sixteenth century. See Ware's Bishops by Harris, Archdall's Monasticon, and Lanigan's Ecclesiastical History.

deacon of Brefney,¹ from Drumcliff to Kells, died.

Hugh, son of Owen O'Conor, was deposed by his own people, who brought in the Clan Muirheartaigh, and the government was conferred on Conor Roe (O'Conor), son of Cathal, to whom they gave hostages. The entire country both clergy and laity was spoiled through that deposition. A great force was collected to the aid of Hugh O'Conor, composed of English and Irish, with William Burke and Theobald Burke, whom he invited to the country, and they continued four days and nights plundering and devastating the country of property and corn. The chiefs of the country waited on him afterwards, and he brought them before the earl to make peace with them; as to the sons of Murchertagh they burned and spoiled the entire district of Carbury (in Sligo), and plundered its churches, but God, the Virgin Mary, and Columkille, were avenged of them soon after for having violated their churches. As to the forementioned chiefs, after promising they would be tributary to Hugh they returned to their homes, but did not continue long at peace with him, for they again joined the sons of Murtoigh. Hugh, son of Owen, having then come into the Tuatha (in Rosecommon), and having brought with him thither O'Ferrall and Mac Rannall with their forces, he sent messengers to Mac Dermott and O'Flanagan, who having turned against the sons of Murtoigh and separated from the other clans, joined Hugh. Conor Roe (O'Conor) having received intelligence of this, attacked Mac Dermott, and, aided by his supporters, committed depredations on him; Mac Dermott having gone in pursuit of his plundered property, an engagement ensued, in which Conor Roe was slain, and Loughlin, son of Conor, and Manus, son of Tomal-

A. D. 1295.

1. Baile Nui, that is Newtown, was probably the place now called Newtown-Forbes, in the county of Longford; or it might be Newtown-Gore, in the parish of Carrigallen, county of Leitrim, on the borders of Longford, where there are some ruins of a castle. The castle of Moyduma was that of Moydow, in the parish of Moydow, county of Longford.

A. D. 1296.

1. Archdeacon of Brefney, that is, of the diocese of Kilmorc, which, as stated here, extended from Kells in Meath to Drumcliff in Sligo.

tagh, were taken prisoners. Great numbers were slain on both sides; Mac Dermott brought the prisoners to Hugh O'Conor, who with O'Ferrall, Mac Dermott, Mac Rannall, and the clans before-mentioned committed a retaliatory depredation on the people of Clan Muirheartaigh the same day; and Loughlin, son of Conor, afterwards had his eyes put out, and died of his wounds.

The king of England marched with an army into Scotland and gained great power over that country. The nobles of the English of Ireland were in that army, namely, Rickard Burke, earl of Ulster; Gerald Fitzgerald; and John Fitzthomas (Fitzgerald), and they plundered Scotland both churches and people; a monastery of friars in that country was plundered by them, and they levelled it to the ground so as not to leave one stone upon another on its site, after they had slain a number of its clergy, besides many of its people both male and female, which acts were indeed disgraceful.

A. D. 1297.

Malachy Mac Brien, abbot of Boyle, was elected to the see of Elphin, and Marian O'Donnabair, a friar of the order of St. Dominick was also elected, and they both having gone to Rome, Malachy died.

Henry Mac Oiraghty,¹ bishop of Conor, a monk, died, and was buried in the monastery of Drogheda.

William O'Duffy, bishop of Clonfert, fell from his horse, of which fall he died.

Conor, son of Taichleach Mac Dermott, lord of Moylurg and of Airteach, the most famous man in battle, in conflict, in attacks, in bravery, in valour, in defending and giving protection, in power and integrity, in his time, died, and was buried in the monastery of Boyle.

Manus O'Hanley, chief of Kinel Dobhtha (in Roscommon), died.

A. D. 1297.

1. Henry Mac Oiraghty is mentioned here in the Annals as bishop of Condeire, that is, of Conor; he is not to be found in Ware's Bishops of Conor, but Henry Mac Oiraghty, a Cistercian monk, is given in Ware as bishop of Achonry, and his death placed A.D. 1297; therefore it appears probable that the translator made a mistake, and confounded Achad Conaire or Achonry with Condeire or Connor. Henry Mac Oiraghty, a Cistercian monk, was called Henry of Ardagh from the place of his birth, in Longford; he is given by Ware as bishop of Derry for a short time, namely, Cu-uladh O'Hanlon, lord of Orior (in Armagh), Aongus Mac Mahon, and many others of the chiefs of their people were slain by the English of Dundalk, who were returning home from the earl (of Ulster).

A. D. 1298.

Thomas O'Hairectaigh, abbot of Eas Roe (at Ballyshannon), died.

Sabina, daughter of Hugh Buidhe O'Neill, and wife of Teige, son of Andrew O'Conor, died.

Bryan Breaghach Mac Gauran, chief of Tullaghaw (in Cavan), was slain by Hugh Brefney O'Conor and the sons of Murtoigh (O'Conor).

Donogh, son of Donal O'Hara, one of the most distinguished chiefs' sons for hospitality and defending his country, was slain by his own kinsman Bryan Carrach O'Hara.

Thomas Fitzmaurice, a baron of the Geraldines, called Oidhre Cam (the Crooked Heir), died.

A. D. 1299.

Nicholas Mac Maolisa, archbishop of Armagh, the most pious and devout ecclesiastic of his time, died.

Feargal O'Firgil, bishop of Raphoe, died. He was the most eminent ecclesiastic in his time for charity, humanity, piety, and benevolence.

Alexander Mac Donnell (of Antrim), the most distinguished of his name, either in Ireland or in Scotland, for hospitality and feats of arms, was slain by Alexander Mac Dugall, together with many of his people.

A. D. 1300.

Congalach O'Loughlin, bishop of Corc Modruadh,¹ a man distinguished for learning, piety, and hospitality, died.

from A. D. 1295, to 1297, and Ware conjectured that he might have been the same person as Henry Mac Oiraghty, bishop of Achonry. On the whole it appears probable that this Henry Mac Oiraghty might have been a bishop for a short time in each of those sees.

A. D. 1300

1. Corc Modruadh or Corcomroe, a parish and also a barony in the county of Clare. There was a celebrated Cistercian abbey called Corcomroe, of which extensive ruins still remain. It is Felim Mac Carthy, heir to the lordship of Desmond, died.

The castle of Atheliath of Corran, that is, of Ballymote, was commenced to be built by the earl (of Ulster).

John Prendergast was slain by the son of Fiachra O'Flynn.

Theobald Butler, a noble baron, died.

Adam Staunton, another great baron, died.

Seoinin Oge Fitzmaurice was slain by Conor O'Flynn, and many others with him.

A. D. 1301.

Fionnguala, daughter of Felim O'Conor, the abbess of Killeraobhnad,¹ died.

Cairbre, son of Cormac O'Melaghlin (of Meath), was slain at the instance of his kinsman, the son of Art O'Melaghlin.

William Mac Clancy, chief of Dartry (in Leitrim), was slain by Ualgarg, son of Donal, son of Art O'Rourke.

Great depredations were committed by Hugh, son of Cathal O'Conor, and by the sons of Murtogh (O'Conor) on Tcige, the son of Andrew, in Moy Cedne.²

The king of England marched with an army into Scotland, accompanied by Fitzgerald, Bermingham, and all the chief barons of Ireland, together with the earl of Ulster, and they remained in Scotland from a fortnight after Lammass until November, but did not gain complete power during that period.

A. D. 1302.

Stephen O'Braccan (or O'Brogan), archbishop also called the parish of Abbey. The see of Kilfenora, anciently called Fenahore, had its seat in the barony of Coreomroe; hence the bishops were styled bishops of Coreomroe, and therefore this Congalach O'Loghlin was bishop of Kilfenora.

A. D. 1301.

1. Kill Craobhnad, now probably the parish of Kilkeevan, in the barony of Ballintobber, county of Rosecommon, where there are some remains of an abbey at Moor, and of a church at Kilkeevan, which is a burying place of the O'Conors Don.

2. Moy Cedne, or the plain of Cedne, given on the map of ancient Ireland in O'Conor's Dissertations as Moy Cetney, was the ancient name of the district extending from the river Erne at Belleek and Ballyshannon, along the sea shore to Lough Melvin and Bundrowes in Leitrim; and, according to O'Conor, comprising also part of Carbury in Sligo. This territory is mentioned in these Annals at A. D. 1536. Moy Cedne is celebrated by the old an-of Cashel; Miles, bishop of Limerick, who was grandson of the earl of Leinster; and the bishop of Cork,¹ died; he was a monk previous to his being consecrated a bishop.

Donal Roe Mac Carthy, lord of Desmond; Donncarrach Mag Uidhir (or Mac Guire), the first lord of Siol Uidhir (the clan Mac Guire) in Fermanagh; and Roderick, son of Donal O'Hara, heir to the lordship of Lieney, died.

Hugh, son of Cathal (O'Conor), committed great depredations on Tcige, son of Bryan, and on Sitrick, son of the Carnach Mac Clancy, in Moy Cedne (in Leitrim).

A. D. 1303.

Malachy Mac Brien, bishop of Elphin,¹ died, and Donogh O'Flanagan, abbot of Boyle, succeeded him in the see.

Torlogh, son of Donal Oge O'Donnell, called Torlogh Cnuic-an-madhma (or the Hill of Victory), lord of Tireconnell, a tower of war, battle, and defence, the Cuchulain of the Clan Dalaigh in valour, was slain by his brother Hugh, after a long contention, in which much of the country was spoiled between them; and many of the Tyronians and of the English nobility of the north, and also of the Connallians themselves were slain, among whom were Murtogh Mac Clancy, chief of Dartry (in Leitrim); Donogh O'Kane, lord of the men of Creeve and of Keenaught (in Derry); Donagh Mac Meanman; Hugh Mac Meanman; the two sons of the professor O'Donnell; Niall, son of Niall O'Boyle, heir to the chieftancy of the three districts (in Donegal); Mac Hugossa, with his son and brother; Adam Sandal; and many more of the English and Irish. Hugh, son of nalists as the scene of many battles in the early ages between the Nemeditans and Fomorians, as already shewn in the note on Tireconnell.

A. D. 1302.

1. Bishop of Cork. Robert Mac Donogh, a Cistercian monk, was the bishop of Cork, who died at this time. Miles, mentioned here as the bishop of Limerick, was probably Gerald de Mareschal, who is given by Ware as bishop of Limerick, and died in 1301 or 1302. He may have been of the family of the Fitzgeralds, earls of Kildare.

A. D. 1303.

1. Bishop of Elphin. Malachy Mac Brien has been already mentioned at A. D. 1297 as having gone to Rome and died there. Ware places his death in the year 1302, at Rome.

Donal Oge, afterwards enjoyed the lordship of Tirconnell happily and prosperously while he lived.

Donal Oge Mac Carthy, lord of Desmond, died.

Dermod O'Flanagan, chief of Tura (in Fermanagh); his two sons; and many others with them, were slain by a party of people from the house of Donal, son of Teige O'Conor, at Bun Duibhe (Bunduff in Sligo), while endeavouring to carry off a prey from Moy Ceidne.

Manus Mac Gauran, chief of Tullaghaw (in Cavan); and Niall Mac Gillfinnen (in Fermanagh), died.

Gerald Fitzgerald died.

The sons of Murtogh (O'Conor) committed great depredations on Muintir Kenny (in Leitrim); and Murtogh Mac Consnamha, heir to the chieftancy of Muintir Kenny, was slain on that occasion.

The king of England again led a great army into Scotland, and the earl (of Ulster), and many of the English and Irish went with a large fleet from Ireland to assist him; they took many cities, and gained full power over Scotland on that expedition; and Theobald Burke, the earl's brother, after his return from that army, died on Christmas night, in Carrickfergus.

A. D. 1304.

Conor, son of Hugh O'Conor, was slain by Hoberd O'Flaherty, after he had betrayed Donogh O'Flaherty, and Hoberd himself was killed immediately afterwards.

The countess, wife of Richard Burke, earl of Ulster, that is, the Red Earl; and Walter Burke, heir to the same earl, died.

A. D. 1305.

O'Conor Failge,¹ that is, Murtogh; Maolmordha, his brother; the Calvach O'Conor, with twenty-nine of the chiefs of their people were treacherously and deceitfully slain, by sir Pierce Bermingham, in his own castle.

The new castle of Inisowen (in Donegal) was built by the Red Earl (of Ulster).

Hugh, son of Cathal (O'Conor), and the sons of Murtogh (O'Conor), defeated the O'Reillys in a battle, in which Philip O'Reilly, with the heir of Clansweeney (in Donegal), and Mac Buirche, the chief of the galloglasses, together with one hundred and forty others, were slain.

Matthew Oge O'Reilly was slain by the people of Tullaghonoho (in Cavan).

Torlogh, son of Niall Roe O'Brien (of Thomond) died.

Hugh Oge O'Ferrall (of Longford), died.

A. D. 1306.

Donogh O'Flaherty, bishop of Killala, the most eminent of the Irish in piety, died at Dunbuinne (Dunboyne), on his way to Dublin, and was honourably interred in the house of the Virgin Mary at Muillionnchearr (Mullingar).

Petrus O'Toole, vicar of Killeaspuic Broin;¹ and Master Thomas O'Naan, archdeacon of Raphoe, and bishop elect (or coadjutor) of the same see, died.

Torlogh O'Brien, lord of Thomond, the most noble, pious, charitable, prosperous, and generous man in Ireland, in his time, died; and his son Donogh was appointed in his place.

Donal Tuirtreach O'Neill was slain in mistake by the people of the house of O'Neill.

Fergal Mac Rannall, chief of Muintir Eoluis (in Leitrim) was slain, by his own brethren, and by a party of his own people.

A great war arose between Hugh, son of Owen O'Conor, king of Connaught, aided by the chiefs of Siol Murray (in Roscommon), and Hugh, son of Cathal O'Conor, joined by a party of the sons of the chiefs of Connaught, and by the chiefs and clans of Brefney; the two armies remained on either side of the Shannon for the space of four months. Parties from Hugh's, the son of Cathal's, forces made several sallies into the Tuatha (in

A. D. 1305.

1. O'Conor Failge, that is O'Conor Failey, which was the title of O'Conor, lord of Offaley, in the King's county. The affair here mentioned took place at the house of Pierce Bermingham in Carbery, in the county of Kildare.

A. D. 1306.

1. Kill Easpuig Broin, now Killaspicbrone, a parish in the barony of Carbury, county of Sligo.

Rosecommon), on which occasions they committed plunders and depredations. Flan, son of Fiachra O'Flinn, heir to the chieftainship of Siol Maoilruain (in Roscommon), Bryan, son of Donogh Riavaeh O'Conor, and many others along with them were slain by the O'Hanleys, who were in pursuit of their plundered property. The following were the most distinguished on that expedition: Roderick, son of Cathal O'Connor; Donogh, son of Conor of the Cup; and the son of Fergal (Mac Dermott), heir to the lordship of Moylurg; all eminent for their prosperity and hospitality to that day. However, those chiefs, with all that survived of their people, proceeded with the booty until they reached the fortress of O'Conor, and they then burned the palace of the king of Connaught, that is, the palace of Cloon-fraoich.² Hugh, son of Owen O'Conor, overtook them after they had burned the royal residence, and took the booty from them, and slew Donogh, son of Conor of the Cup, and some of his people.

The sons of Murtogh (O'Conor) committed a great depredation in the district of Carbury (in Sligo), and David O'Kavanagh, chief from Toomore to the river Gleoir, a wealthy and affluent landed proprietor; Donogh Mac Buidheachain, and many others, were slain in the conflict about the plunder.

O'Flanagan was slain by Bryan Carraeh O'Hara.

A. D. 1307.

Luirint (or Laurence) O'Lachtinan (or O'Loughnan), a grey friar, bishop of Kilmaeduaigh, and Donogh O'Flanagan, bishop of Elphin, died.

Donal, son of Teige, son of Bryan, son of Andrew, son of Bryan Luighneach, son of Torlogh More (O'Conor), tanist (or heir elect) to the crown of Connaught, a man full of generosity and hospitality, and of universal benevolence, was slain by Hugh Brefnach, the son of Cathal Roe O'Conor.

Teige, son of Malachy, son of Donogh, son of Donal, son of Manus, son of Torlogh (O'Conor), a man distinguished for hospitality, was slain by Cathal, son of Donal, son of Teige (O'Conor).

The greater part of the English of Rosecommon were slain by Donogh Muinaeh O'Kelly, lord of Hy Maine, at Atheasgrach Cuan,¹ at which place Philip Muinder (or Montyre), John Muinder, and Matthew Drew, together with many others who are not recorded, were slain, and the following were made prisoners: Dermot Gall Mac Dermott, Corinae Mac Cethernaigh (or Kearney), and the sheriff of Rosecommon; but they were afterwards set at liberty, and they made peace for the burning of the town by Edmond Butler. This Donogh O'Kelly died after these exploits, and his death was not unheroic, being after the performance of deeds of valour and bravery, and after conferring favours and bounties.

Ailve, the daughter of Teige O'Conor, died.

Malachy O'Gormley, chief of Kinel Moain (in Donegal), and Manus Mac Oiraghty (of Rosecommon), died.

Conor, son of Fiachra O'Flynn (of Rosecommon), the most eminent young man of his tribe for hospitality and bravery, died.

Edward II. was proclaimed king of England on the 7th of July.³

A. D. 1308.

The monastery of the friars in Rosecommon was struck by lightning and much damaged.

Maolrooney Mac Dermott committed a plunder on the sons of Donal O'Conor in Carbury (in Sligo), and another plunder was committed on them, by the sons of Murtogh who after having made peace with them and given them hostages, afterwards deceived them. After that the sons of Donal proceeded to Slieve-da-en (in Tirerrill, Sligo), and took nothing with them but their horses, armour and accoutrements. When the English of Tireragh and Lieney received intelligence of this they mustered their forces and pursued them to the top of Slieve Daen; the sons of Donal (O'Conor) turned upon them, and a battle

2. Cloon Fraoich, an ancient residence of the kings of Connaught, was situated near Tusk, in the county of Rosecommon, and near it was the Hill of Carn Fraoich, where the O'Conors were inaugurated as kings of Connaught.

A. D. 1307.

1. Ath Easceira Cuan, or Ahascragh, in the county of Galway.
2. Edward II. King Edward I. died on the 7th of July, A. D. 1307, and was succeeded by his son, Edward II.

ensued, in which the English were defeated; the sons of Donal followed up their victory, and pursued them as far as the Rock of Ballysadare. Thomas Mac Walter, constable of Bunfinne,¹ with his brother, and many others, were slain.

Hugh, son of Cathal (O'Connor), committed a retaliatory depredation on his brother Roderick, son of Cathal, on which occasion Manus, son of Manus (O'Connor), and many others, were slain.

A. D. 1309.

Hugh, son of Owen, son of Roderick, son of Hugh, son of Cathal Croidhearg (O'Connor), king of Connaught, a worthy heir to the throne of Ireland, the most illustrious Irishman of his time for hospitality and feats of arms, was slain by Hugh Brefneach, the son of Cathal O'Connor, in the wood of Cloghan,¹ together with many chiefs of his people; and of those who fell were Conor Mac Dermott; Dermot Roe, son of Teige O'Connor; Dermot, son of Cathal Carrach Mac Dermott; Hugh, son of Murtoth, son of Teige, son of Maolrooney (Mac Dermott), and Dermot O'Healey, the most eminent of the landed gentry of his time. On the other side were slain Giolla-na-neev Mac Egan, chief Brehon of Connaught, and the most learned judge in his time; Fogartach O'Dobailen (or O'Devlin); and many others who have not been recorded. The Siol Murray (of Roscommon) conferred the sovereignty on Roderick, son of Cathal O'Connor, after which he and O'Flynn marched with a large troop of cavalry to the plain and slew Bermingham.

William Burke and such of the Conacians as were his adherents, held a conference with Roderick, the son of Cathal (O'Connor), at Athslisen (in Roscommon); they disagreed, and a conflict ensued, in which Roderick was defeated, and many of his people were slain. William Burke proceeded to the monastery of Boyle, and the sons of Murtoth went into Tirerrill, where they destroyed much corn and burned the country; Mac William afterwards marched across the Curlew mountains northward, and turned Roderick, the son of Cathal (O'Connor) out of his fortress, and Mac William's vanguard slew Donogh O'Feenaghty and many others.

Mac William committed depredations in Clan Fermuighe (in Leitrim), and also as far as Ben Gulban (Benbulbin mountain in the north of Sligo).

Conor, son of Bryan Roe O'Brien (in Thomond), was slain.

A. D. 1310.

Conor O'Brien, the most illustrious heir presumptive in his time, was treacherously slain by the English.

Hugh Brefneach (O'Connor), aided by the sons of Murtoth, committed great retaliatory depredations on Maolrooney Mac Dermott; they plundered Donogh Mac Donogh, took himself and some of the chiefs of his people prisoners, and slew others of them, and burned their properties; they also slew his wife, the daughter of O'Flanagan.

Fergal Mac Dorchy (in Mayo), died.

Fionguala, daughter of Manus O'Connor, and Una, daughter of Hugh, son of Felim, died.

Geoffrey O'Ferrall marched with an army to Dun Uabhair (in Longford), where Donal, son of Hugh Oge O'Ferrall, Hugh, son of Maolisa, and Geoffrey, son of Murtoth, were slain.

Roderick, son of Cathal (O'Connor), Hugh, son of Manus, and the people of Hugh Brefneach (O'Connor), burned the castle of Bunfinne (in Sligo), including the corn-stacks and houses.

Hugh Brefneach O'Connor, a worthy heir to the crown of Connaught, was treacherously slain by Seonag Mac Uidhlin (Mac Quillan of Antrim), who was one of his retainers; and it was for lucre that he committed the deed.

Twenty tuns of wine were driven on shore in Moy Ceidne.¹

A. D. 1308.

1. Bunfinne, that is, the mouth of the river Finn, anglicised Buninne, a place in the parish of Drumard, barony of Tireragh, county of Sligo, where there was in former times a castle.

A. D. 1309.

1. The wood of Cloghan was probably the place called Cloghan in the barony of Athlone, county of Roscommon.

A. D. 1310.

1. Moy Ceidne, as already explained, lay along the coast of Donegal, Leitrim, and Sligo, between Ballyshannon and Bunduff.

The castle of Sligo was rebuilt by the Red Earl.

Felim, son of Hugh, son of Owen O'Conor, succeeded his father (in the government of Connaught).

Cormac O'Flanagan, chief of Tura (in Fermanagh), was slain by Henry Mac Gillfinnen, chief of Muintir Feodachain (in Pettigo).

Macraith Maguire, tanist of Fermanagh, and Donogh Mac Gillmichil, chief of Clan Congaile (in Fermanagh), had their properties burned by Ralph Mac Mahon.

A. D. 1311.

Donal O'Rourke, lord of Brefney, died.

The Clan Muirheartaigh (O'Conors), committed a dreadful depredation in Connaught, on which occasion Gillcreest, son of Maurice, son of Donogh Mac Dermott, Hugh, son of Cormac, Donogh, son of Tonaltach (Mac Dermott), William Mac Gilaraith, and many others were slain by them (the O'Conors).

William Burke marched with a great army into Munster against de Clare, and a battle was fought in which de Clare was defeated; William Burke boldly pursued the defeated party of de Clare, who surrounded him and took him prisoner, but, however, he was victorious in the battle.

Teige O'Hanley (in Roscommon), was slain by Jordan Dexter.

A great war arose in Thomond, and Donogh Mac Namara and his party, namely, the people of Triochad Ced Hy Caisin,¹ gave battle to O'Brien and to the men of Munster, in which Mac Namara was defeated, and himself and Donal O'Grady, lord of Kinel Dungaile, were slain with an immense number of both armies.

Donogh O'Brien, king of Munster, and heir to the crown of Ireland, celebrated for his hospitality and great deeds, was treacherously slain by Murrough, son of Mahon O'Brien; and Murrough O'Brien was appointed his successor.

Loghlin Riavach O'Dea (in county of Clare),

A. D. 1311.

1. Triochad Ced Hy Caisin, that is, the territory or barony of Hy Caisin, now the baronies of Tulla, in the county of Clare, of which the Mac Namaras were chiefs and hereditary marshals to the O'Briens, kings of Thomond. Kinel Dungaile was another ter-was slain by Mahon, son of Donal Connachtach O'Brien.

Seonag Mac Quillan slew Grudeley in the town of Tobarbrighde,² and he himself was soon after killed with the sharp axe by which he had slain Hugh Brefneach (O'Conor, A. D. 1310).

Felim O'Conor, king of Connaught, plundered the Clan Muirheartaigh (O'Conors of Sligo) on the border of Moy Cedne (borders of Sligo and Leitrim), and Malachy, son of Conor, called the leader of the workmen or crowd, was slain there with many others.

Dermod Cleireach O'Brien (of Thomond), died.

Donal O'Beirne, chief of Tir Briuin (in Roscommon), and Giollaisa O'Daly, chief professor of poetry (in Connaught), died.

A. D. 1312.

William Bermingham, archbishop of Tuam, and Benedict O'Braccain, bishop of Lieney (Achonry) died.

Malachy Mac Aodha (or Mac Hugh), bishop of Elphin, was translated to the archiepiscopal see of Tuam.

A. D. 1313.

Teige, son of Andrew, son of Bryan Luighneach, and Cathal, son of Murrough Carrach O'Ferrall (in Longford), died.

Giollaisa Mac Dorchy (in Mayo) was slain by Conor Carrach Mac Dermott.

A. D. 1314.

Matthew Mac Uibhne (or Mac Gevney), bishop of Brefney (Kilmore), died.

Niall Beag, son of Malachy, son of Torlogh Cnoc Anmadhma O'Donnell, was slain by Hugh, son of Hugh O'Donnell.

Matthew Mac Tiarnan (in Cavan) was slain by Cathal O'Rourke.

ritory in Thomond of which the O'Gradys were lords. See note on Thomond.

2. Tobar Brighde, that is, St. Bridget's Well, which gave its name to the town of Ballintobber in Roscommon.

Ralph Mac Mahon (in Monaghan) was slain by his own kinsmen.

The O'Reillys were defeated at Drumlane (in Cavan) by Roderick, son of Cathal O'Conor.

Niall, son of Bryan O'Neill, heir presumptive of Tyrone, a man of affluence and prosperity, died.

Manus, son of Donal O'Hara (in Sligo), was slain by Manus, the son of William O'Hara.

A. D. 1315.

Edward,¹ the king of Scotland's brother, sailed from Scotland to Ireland with a large fleet, and landed on the coast of Ulster; they committed great depredations on the earl's people (Burke, earl of Ulster), and on the English of Meath. The earl collected a great army against the Albanians (or Scots); and Felim, son of Hugh O'Conor, with a large force of the Conacians, marched to join the earl. Roderick, son of Cathal (O'Conor), mustered another great force in Connaught, and he burned and demolished many castles after Felim had left the country.

Hugh Ballach, son of Manus O'Conor, was slain by Cathal, son of Donal O'Conor; and Manus, son of Manus O'Conor, the most famous and noble of the princes of Connaught in that time, and his brother Donal, were also slain by the same Cathal on the following day.

A battle was fought between the armies of the Red Earl and of Edward Bruce, in which the earl was defeated, and William Burke and the two sons of Mac-an-Milidh² were taken prisoners.

Mahon Mac Rannall, chief of Muintir Eoluis (in Leitrim), O'Maolmíaidh, chief of Muintir Cearbhalain,³ and many of their people with them, were slain by Maolrooney Mac Dermott, lord of Moylurg, and Conor Roe, son of Hugh Breifnach, who was on Mac Dermott's side that day, was slain.

O'Donnell, that is, Hugh, son of Donal Oge,

A. D. 1315.

1. Edward here mentioned was Edward Bruce, brother of Robert Bruce, king of Scotland.

2. Mac-an-Milidh signifies the Son of the Knight. The battle mentioned here between Burke, earl of Ulster, and Edward Bruce, was fought at Colerain.

3. O'Moolmíadhaigh, or O'Mulvey, chief of Muintir Cearbhalain, a district in Leitrim, near the Shannon, called also Magh Nise. See note on Brefney.

marched with a great force to the castle of Sligo, took the town, and destroyed much of the adjoining country.

Roderick, son of Donal O'Conor, was slain by a party of galloglasses at the instigation of Der-vorgail, the daughter of Manus O'Conor, who gave them a recompence for committing the act.

Awlave O'Ferrall died.

Teige O'Higgins, a man learned in poetry (in Connaught), died.

A. D. 1316.

A great army was collected by Felim O'Conor, by Bermingham, and by the English of the west of Connaught, with which they marched to Tochar Mona Coinneadh¹. Roderick O'Conor, king of Connaught, marched with the whole of his forces against them, and a battle ensued in which Roderick was defeated, himself slain, and also the following chiefs, namely, Dermot Gall Mac Dermott, lord of Moylurg; Cormac Mac Ceithirnaidh, of Ciarraidhe, and many others of the chiefs of his (O'Conor's) galloglasses, and of his immediate friends. Felim re-assumed the government of Connaught, and collected a great army, with which he marched to attack Athleathan; he burned the town, slew Slemne Dexeter, lord of the town, also Cogan, the most noble baron in Ireland in his time, and many other Englishmen besides, and took much booty.

Felim O'Conor collected a great army, together with the chiefs of the province, along with whom were the following: Donogh O'Brien, with the chiefs of Munster; O'Melaghlin, king of Meath; Ualgarg O'Rourke, lord of Brefney; O'Ferrall, lord of Anally; Teige O'Kelly, lord of Hy Maine; Manus, son of Donal O'Conor, tanist of Connaught; Art O'Hara, lord of Lieney; and Bryan O'Dowd, lord of the Hy Fiachras; all these marched to Athenry,² and at the same time the English of the west of Connaught marched their army against them, namely, William Burke; the baron Bermingham, lord of Athenry, and the greater part of the English of the entire north of Ireland. A fierce and vigorous battle was fought between them, in which the Irish were at length defeated. Felim O'Conor, king of Connaught, was slain, a man from whom the people of Ireland had the greatest hopes, and there were also slain Teige O'Kelly, lord of Hy Maine, and twenty-eight other chiefs of the O'Kellys, together with Manus, son of Donal O'Conor, tanist of Connaught; Art O'Hara, lord of Lieney; Malaehy Carrach O'Dowd; Conor Oge O'Dowd; Murtogh, son of Conor O'Dowd; Dermot Mac Dermott, heir to the lordship of Moylurg; Murtogh, son of Teige Mac Dermott; Murtogh Mae Dermott, son of Fergal; Malaehy Oge Mac Manus; John, son of Murrough O'Madden; Donal, son of Hugh O'Concannon, lord of Hy Diarnada, and Murtogh his brother; Murrough O'Madden; Donal O'Boyle; and Donogh O'Mulloy with many of his people; Morogh, son of Morogh Mac Mahon, with a hundred of his people; Niall Sionach (Fox), lord of the men of Tefia, with his people; Fergal, son of John Gallda O'Ferrall; William, son of Hugh Oge O'Ferrall; Thomas, son of Awlave O'Ferrall; five of the Mac Donoghs, namely, Tomaltaeh, son of Gillcreest; Murrough, son of Donogh; Conor, son of Teige; Murtogh, son of Donogh; and Malachy Mac Donogh; John Mac Egan, the Brehon (or judge) of O'Conor; Giolla-na-neev, son of Dailredoeair O'Devlin, the standard-bearer of O'Conor; and Thomas O'Connellan. It is, however, impossible to ascertain or record all the chiefs of Connaught and of Meath that were slain in that battle, which was fought on the festival day of St. Lawrence. Felim was twenty-three years of age at that time. Roderick Na-bhfheadh (of the Woods), son of Donogh, son of Owen, son of Roderick O'Conor, was appointed to the sovereignty of Connaught.

A. D. 1316.

1. Tochar Mona Coinneadh signifies the bog-pass of the conference, and obtained its name from a conference held there between Felim O'Conor, king of Connaught, and Mac William Burke, as stated in these Annals at A. D. 1255; the place appears to have been situated on the borders of Roscommon and Galway. Ciarraidh and Athleathan were ancient territories in Mayo. See note on North Connaught.

William Burke marched with an immense army into Siol Murray (in Roscommon), and O'Conor, with the Siol Murray, and many of the clans of Connaught and of their chiefs made peace with him; but Mac Dermott, however, did not consent to make peace, and Mac William attacked Moylurg (in Roseommon), committed great depredations in Ath Anchip and in Uaehtar Tire, and burned and spoiled the entire country, but departed without fighting a battle or getting submission. Mac Dermott soon after deposed Roderick (O'Conor) the son of Donogh.

Dervorgaill, daughter of Manus O'Conor, and wife of Hugh O'Donnell, died.

A. D. 1317.

Donogh O'Brien, king of Munster, was slain.

Torlogh, son of Hugh, son of Owen, son of Roderick, son of Hugh, son of Cathal Crovdearg (O'Conor), was appointed king by the Conacians.

Robert Bruce came to Ireland from Scotland with a great army, to assist his brother Edward Bruce to expel the English from Ireland.

Myler Dexeter, lord of Athleathan (in Mayo), was slain by Cathal, son of Donal O'Conor, and Donal, son of Teige, son of Donal, of Erris O'Conor, was also slain by him, together with fourteen of his party, which deeds took place on the banks of the river Methenaigh of Drumcliff (in Sligo).

The castle of Atheliath of Corran, or Ballymote (in Sligo), was demolished.

Malachy Carrach Mac Dermott, heir to the lordship of Moylurg; Conor O'Conor, that is, the son of the coarb of St. Coman (in Roscommon), and Manus O'Flanagan, heir to the chieftaney of Clan Cathail (in Roscommon) together with many others, were slain by Gilbert Mac Costello.

The son of Roderick (O'Conor), and the men of Brefney were defeated in the battle of Kilmore,¹ in which the son of Hugh Brefnach O'Conor was

2. The Battle of Athenry was fought on the festival of St. Lawrence the Martyr, which is placed in the calendars on the 10th of August. Sir William Burke, mentioned in Campion's Chronicle as lord Warden of Ireland, and sir Richard Bermingham, afterwards baron of Athenry, were the chief commanders of the English, who had collected a more powerful army than they ever had before in Ireland, and were perfectly disciplined, well armed, and clad in armour. The Irish forces were suddenly raised, imperfectly disciplined, and without armour. According to sir Richard Cox and others, about eight thousand of the Irish were slain; but this account appears to be exaggerated. The number of the English forces killed has not been stated, but it must have been very great, as the battle was fiercely and long contested on both sides, until Felim O'Conor fell, when the Irish forces gave way, which may account for the victory.

taken prisoner, and the following were slain, namely, two sons of Niall O'Rourke; Conor Buidhe Mac Tiarnan, chief of Tullaghonoho; Mahon Mac Tiarnan; the Giollaroe, son of the erenach Mac Tiarnan; Nicholas Mac Master (or Masterson); and one hundred and forty galloglasses of the forces of Roderick's son, with many others not recorded.

Maolisa Roe Mac Egan, chief professor of Ireland in laws and Brehonism, died.

Rannall Mac Rannall, chief of Muintir Eoluis (in Leitrim), was treacherously taken prisoner, and Geoffrey Mac Rannall was appointed chief in his place.

A. D. 1318.

The English sustained a great defeat in Ely¹ by O'Carroll, in which Adam Mares and many of the English were slain.

Mulrooney Mac Dermott, lord of Moylurg, collected a great force, with which he marched to attack Cathal, son of Donal O'Connor, at Fassa Coilleadh;² and amongst the chiefs who joined him were Torlogh, son of Hugh, son of Owen O'Connor; Ualgarg O'Rourke, lord of Brefney;

Conor O'Kelly, lord of Hy Maine; and Tomaltach Mac Donogh, lord of Tirerrill. After those chiefs arrived at Fassa Coilleadh, Cathal offered them great largesses, which, however, they rejected, and attacked him to the very precincts of his fortress, but he was neither terrified nor daunted at that, for he answered them with firmness and defiance, whereupon a fierce battle ensued, in which Bryan, son of Torlogh O'Connor, the heir presumptive to the crown of Connaught, Conor O'Kelly, Bryan Mac Manus, Cathal, son of Gillcreest Mac Dermott, and many others of the chiefs and of the common soldiers of their forces, were slain by Cathal and his men.

Cathal, the son of Donal (O'Connor), attacked O'Connor and Mac Dermott, and committed immense devastation in Moylurg, and deposed Torlogh, son of Hugh (O'Connor), and he himself assumed the government of Connaught; and Torlogh then fled for protection to William Burke and the English.

John, son of Donal O'Neill, was slain by O'Donnell, that is Hugh, son of Donal Oge, at Derry Columkille, and Mac Donnell, and many others were slain and drowned.

Edward Bruce,³ a man who spoiled Ireland

A. D. 1317.

1. Battle of Kilmore. This battle was fought at Kilmore, in the county of Cavan.

A. D. 1318.

1. Ely, where this battle was fought, was called Ely O'Carroll, of which the O'Carrolls were chiefs, a territory which comprised the present barony of Lower Ormond, in Tipperary, and the barony of Clonlisk, in the King's County.

2. Fassa Coilleadh signifies a woody district, and was situated in the barony of Carbury, county of Sligo, as appears from a passage in the Annals at the year 1397.

3. The invasion of Bruce. The following sketch of Bruce's progress in Ireland has been collected from Hollingshead, Campion, Cox, Leland, Moore, Lodge's Peerage, and other sources. Edward Bruce, brother of the celebrated Robert Bruce, king of Scotland, landed at Oldfleet, in the bay of Larne, on the coast of Antrim, on the 25th of May, A. D. 1315, with a fleet of three hundred sail and six thousand Scots. Amongst his chief commanders were Thomas Randolph, earl of Moray, one of the Scottish chiefs who commanded at Bannockburn; sir Walter Moray; lord Philip Mowbray; lord Allan Stewart; sir John Sandale; sir James Douglas; Walter, lord de Soulis; Fergus of Androssan, &c. The Bruces being maternally descended from the old Scottish kings of the Milesian race, a colony of whom had in early times made a conquest of Scotland, that circumstance was considered by the Irish chiefs a sufficient claim to the crown of Ireland; and, consequently, Edward Bruce was invited to assume the sovereignty of Ireland by Donal O'Neill, prince of Tyrone, and other Irish chiefs. He was also assisted by some of the English, particularly the great family of the de Lacys, in Ulster and Meath, whose forces were commanded by Walter and Robert de Lacy. Joined by these, and great numbers of the Irish, Bruce and his Scots attacked and took from the English garrisons the towns of Carrickfergus, Colerain, and Dundalk, and was crowned king of Ireland at the hill of Knocknemelan, within half a mile of Dundalk. Richard de Burgo, earl of Ulster, having collected the English forces, fought a great battle with Bruce at Colerain, in which the English were defeated with great loss, and sir William de Burgo, the earl's brother, taken prisoner. Bruce, proceeding onwards through Meath and Westmeath, ravaged all the towns of the English Pale, and defeated their forces in various engagements, particularly in a great battle near Kells, in which fifteen thousand of the English, commanded by the lord justice, Roger Mortimer, earl of March, were routed, and great numbers slain. Bruce spent his Christmas, and a great part of the winter, at Lough Seudy, one of the castles of his friends, the de Lacys in Westmeath. Proceeding the next year onwards to Kildare, his progress was opposed by the English barons, who collected a great force, commanded by the lord justice Edmond Butler, earl of Carrick; John Fitzthomas Fitzgerald, earl of Kildare; Arnold le Poer, and others; they encountered the Scots and Irish under Bruce, and a great battle was fought at the moat of Ascul near Athy, in which the English were defeated with much loss; and amongst the slain were two valiant knights, William Prendergast and Hamon le Gras; and on the side of the Scots, Fergus of Androssan and sir Walter Moray. These knights were all buried in the Dominican abbey of Athy. In the course of this year, king Robert Bruce landed at Carrickfergus with a large force to support his brother; and their combined forces, amounting to twenty thousand men, ravaged the English Pale as far as Slane, and, marching thence towards Dublin, arrived at Castleknock, took Hugh Tyrrell, baron of Castleknock, prisoner, and established their head quarters at his castle. It appears that Robert Bruce was after a short time obliged to return to Scotland to defend his own kingdom against the English.

generally, both English and Irish, was slain by the English by force of battle and bravery at Dundalk, and Mac Rory, lord of the Hebrides, Mac Donnell, lord of the eastern Gael (in Antrim), and many others of the Albanian (or Scottish) chiefs, were also slain; and no event occurred in Ireland for a long period from which so much benefit was derived as that, for a general famine prevailed in the country during the three years and a half he had been in it, and the people were almost reduced to the necessity of eating each other.

John O'Ferrall was slain by the cast of a javelin from his own son.

Geoffrey, son of Giolla-na-neev O'Ferrall, lord of Anally, died.

Cathal, son of Gilcreest Mac Rannall, was slain.

Giolla Ancovde, son of Kenny O'Gormley, and Gormley, daughter of Mae Branán, his wife, died.

A. D. 1319.

Henry Mac An-Crossain, bishop of Raphoe, died, and Thomas, son of Cormac O'Donnell, abbot of Easroe, was elected his successor to the see of Raphoe.

The bishop of Derry;¹ O'Banain, bishop of Clogher; and the bishop of Clonfert, died.

Aine, daughter of Mac Dermott, and wife of Mac Consnamha, died.

Echmarcach Mac Branán, chief of Corcachlan (in Roscommon), slew Tomaltach O'Mulbrenán, but he himself did not escape free, for he died three days afterwards of the wounds which Tomaltach inflicted on him.

Edward Bruce proceeded to take Dublin, but the citizens, fearing a siege, resolutely resolved to oppose the Scots, and set fire to the suburbs of the city, by which many churches were burned and St. Patrick's cathedral much damaged. The Scots and Irish overran many parts of Leinster and Munster, taking the towns and demolishing the castles of the English as far as Kilkenny, Cashel, Limerick, and other places. The Butlers, Fitzgeralds, le Poers, and other English barons, collected an army of thirty thousand men to oppose them, but Bruce was generally victorious in many engagements during two years, and is said to have defeated the English forces in eighteen battles. The Scots and Irish were at length compelled by a dreadful famine to retire to Ulster with the remnant of their forces, now reduced to three thousand men. The English having collected a great force, commanded by sir John Bermingham, sir Richard Tuote, sir Miles de Verdon, John Manpas, and other valiant captains, and accompanied by Roland de Jorse, archbishop of Armagh, who incited the English to attack the Scots, and attended to perform the last offices of religion for the dying, both armies marched to Louth, and in a fierce battle fought Donal O'Neill, lord of Tyrone, was deposed a second time by the power of the English and of the Clan of Hugh Buidhe (O'Neills of Claneboy), and having gone to Fermanagh under the protection of Flaherty Mac Guire, the men of Fermanagh plundered his people.

O'Neill, that is, Donal, re-assumed the government of his principality. Bryan, son of Donal O'Neill, tanist of Tyrone, was slain by the people of Claneboy, and by Henry Mac Davill at Rath Luraig (Rathlure in Tyrone).

A. D. 1320.

The monastery of Bantry, on the estate of O'Sullivan, in the diocese of Ross, was founded by O'Sullivan for Franciscan friars, and was selected as the burying place of the O'Sullivans, and many other noble families.

A conference was held between Cathal O'Conor and Mulrooney Mac Dermott, at which they made amicable terms and peace with each other, after which Mac Dermott returned to his own country; but shortly afterwards Cathal acted treacherously towards Mac Dermott on Mullagh Doramhnach, where he made him prisoner; and Graine (Grace) daughter of Mac Manus, and wife of Mac Dermott, was also made prisoner at the port of the Roek;¹ and he moreover took prisoners Maolisa Donn Mac Egan and his son, and Tomaltagh Mac Donogh, lord of Tirerrill, and he completely plundered the country.

Hugh, son of Teige O'Conor, a worthy heir to the crown of Connaught, in person, in dignity, and in hospitality, was slain by Mac Martin, who was himself killed in retaliation.

at the moat of Faughart near Dundalk, on the 28th of May, A. D. 1318, Bruce's forces were defeated, and he himself slain. He was found amidst a heap of the dead, and his head was cut off by sir John Bermingham, who brought it to England and presented it to king Edward, for which signal service he was created earl of Louth. The body of Bruce was buried on the hill of Faughart, and a large pillar stone erected to mark his grave. Edward Bruce was a man of fine person, of great spirit, ambition and bravery, but fiery, rash, and impetuous, wanting that rare combination of wisdom and valour, which so conspicuously marked the character of his renowned brother Robert Bruce.

A. D. 1319.

1. Bishop of Derry. Odo or Hugh O'Neill was the bishop of Derry who died in this year. Gelasius O'Banan, bishop of Clogher, and Gregory O'Broggy, bishop of Clonfert, also died in the year 1319.

A. D. 1320.

1. The Roek here mentioned was the Rock of Lough Key, near Boyle, Co. Roscommon, where the Mac Dermotts had a fortress.

Mahon, son of Donal Conachtach O'Brien, tanist of Munster, was slain by the clan Cuilein (in Clare).

More, daughter of O'Boyle, and wife of O'Ferrall, died.

Mac Martin was slain in his own house by Hugh, son of Teige O'Connor. The sons of Martin and the clan of Hugh Buidhe followed Hugh to Clogher, and slew him.

A. D. 1321.

Graine, daughter of Mac Manus, and wife of Mulrooney Mac Dermott, died.

Roderick of the Woods, son of Donogh, son of Owen O'Connor, was maliciously slain by Cathal, the son of Hugh, son of Owen (O'Connor).

The Rock of Lough Key (the fortress), was demolished by Donal O'Connor.

Manus O'Hanlon, lord of Orior (in Armagh), had his eyes put out by his own kinsman, Niall, son of Cu-uladh O'Hanlon, on Spy Wednesday.

Niall O'Hanlon, lord of Orior, was treacherously slain by the English of Dundalk.

The sons of the king of Offaley¹ received a great defeat in battle by Andrew Bermingham and the English of Meath.

William and Matthew Mac Gilfinnen (in Fermanagh), were slain by Henry Mac Gillfinnen, in his own country.

A. D. 1322.

Matthew O'Heothaigh (or O'Hoey), bishop of Conmaicne (or Ardagh), and Andrew Mac Maoilin, head master of the ancient and modern, civil and canon laws, died.

Luke O'Murray, archdeacon of Cloyne, died.

Murrough, son of Giolla-na-neev O'Ferrall, lord of Anally, was slain by his own brother, Seoinin O'Ferrall, at Cluan-Lis-Beag.

Murtogh, son of Awlave O'Ferrall, was slain the same day by his own kinsmen, Loughlin and Robert; and Loughlin, the son of Awlave O'Ferrall, was afterwards slain by Seoinin.

Donogh, son of Donogh Mac Dermott, died.

Henry Mac Gillfinnen, chief of Muintir Peodachain (in Fermanagh), was slain by the sons of Awlave Mac Guire.

Gilbert O'Kelly, lord of Hy Maine, died.

Mulrooney Mac Dermott was taken prisoner by Conor, son of Teige O'Connor, and by the people of the house of Cathal O'Connor, at Clooncumuisg; and they plundered the town.

Rickard Bermingham, lord of Athenry, died.

Bryan O'Brien (of Thomond), gave the English a very great defeat.

Giolla-na-neev, son of Geoffrey, son of Giolla-na-neev O'Ferrall, assumed the lordship of Anally.

William Liath (the Grey) Burke, the son of William More, died.

Mulrooney, son of Gillcreest, son of Conor, son of Cormac, son of Tomaltach (Mac Dermott), of the Rock, lord of Moylurg, died; and Maurice, son of the coarb, died.

Osgar, son of Loughlin Mac Guire, was slain by Cathal O'Rourke.

Petrus O'Breislen, chief Brehon (or judge) of Fermanagh, died.

Fingin O'Cassidy, head physician of Fermanagh, died.

Fergal Roe Mac Gauran and Giollaisa Mac Gauran were slain by the sons of Awlave Mac Guire.

A. D. 1323.

Giolla Airnin O'Casey, erenach of Cluan-da-rath,¹ died.

Cairpre-an-sgregain, king of Meath, son of Cormac O'Melaghlin, king of Meath, was killed by Donal O'Mulloy.

Maolmordha Mac Geoghegan (in Westmeath), died.

Seoinin O'Ferrall (in Longford) was slain by the sons of John O'Ferrall.

A. D. 1321.

1. King of Offaley. The O'Connors of Leinster were styled kings and princes of Offaley, an extensive territory comprising a great part of the present King's and Queen's counties, with part of Kildare.

A. D. 1323.

1. Cluan-da-rath, now probably Clondra, in the parish of Killashee, near the Shannon, in the county of Longford, where there are some ruins of an ancient church. The Erenachs, as already explained, were managers of church lands.

O'Hara, that is, Fergal (in Sligo), was killed by O'Connmachain, one of his own people.

Roderick Mac Mahon, son of the lord of Orgiall (Monaghan), and Malachy O'Seganain and Mae Maoilduin, were slain by Cathal O'Rourke at Belathaconaill (Ballyconnell in the county of Cavan).

Niall, son of Niall Cam (O'Reilly), was slain by Loughlin and Malachy O'Reilly.

Bermingham and the English marched with a great army to Coill-na-namas (in Longford), to attack Donal, son of John O'Ferrall, on which expedition the Cepach and the Calvach, with many other English, were slain.

Maolmedha, daughter of Mac Tiarnan, and wife of Bryan Mac Gauran (in Cavan), died.

Gillpatrick O'Duigenan, chief historian of Conmaicne (in Leitrim), and Luke, his son, were killed by Conor, son of Garvey Mac Guire; and Loughlin, son of Owen O'Daly, was slain by the sons of Hugh Buidhe O'Neill.

Geoffrey, son of Giollaisa O'Daly, was slain by Bryan, son of Roderick O'Conor.

A. D. 1324.

Cathal (O'Conor), king of Connaught, son of Donal, son of Teige, son of Bryan, son of Andrew, son of Bryan Luighneach, son of Torlogh More, the most celebrated man for courage, goodness, and great prosperity of any in his time, was slain by Torlogh O'Conor in Tir Briuin of the Shannon (in Roscommon); and the son of Donal, that is, Malachy, son of Torlogh Cnuic-an-Madhma, son of Donal Oge, tanist of Tirconnell, after he had been expelled by O'Donnell, that is by Hugh, son of Donal Oge, together with Gillereest Oge Mac Donogh, and many others, were slain there by Cathal O'Conor; and Torlogh after that assumed the government of Connaught.

Rannall Oge Mac Rannall, chief of Muintir Eoluis (in Leitrim), was slain.

William Burke, son of William More, died.

Teige O'Rourke and Tiarnan Mac Rourke were taken prisoners by the sons of Matthew O'Reilly, and were delivered to Mac Mahon, by whom they were put to death in revenge of the death of his son Roderick.

Donogh Mac Gilpatrick, lord of Ossory, died.

Bryan O'Reilly and Gilcreest (O'Reilly), were slain by O'Rourke's people.

A. D. 1325.

Donal, son of Bryan O'Neill, lord of Tyrone, died at Lough Laoghaire.¹

Cu-uladh, son of Donal, son of Bryan O'Neill, a worthy heir to the lordship of Tyrone, was slain by the sons of Niall, son of Bryan, his father's brother.

Gilcreest, the chaplain of Mac Dermott, and Bryan O'Gara, died.

Malachy O'Flanagan, chief of Tura (in Fermanagh), was slain by the sons of Dermot O'Flanagan.

Dermot O'Mulbrennan,² the Manannan of the chiefs of Connaught in his time, died.

Thomas O'Coinderi (O'Connery or O'Conry), dean of Brefney (diocese of Kilmore), died.

The sons of Torlogh O'Brien (of Thomond), defeated the sons of Bryan Roe; and Bryan, the son of Mahon O'Brien, and many others were slain.

Rannall O'Higin, and Nicolas, son of the coarb of St. Moeg (abbot of Drumlane in Cavan), died.

Raghnailt, daughter of Andaidh O'Reilly (in Cavan), and wife of Donogh Mac Brady, died.

Donogh Mac Kenny was slain in the church of Mac Mahon (in Monaghan).

A. D. 1326.

Luirint (or Laurence) O'Lachtnan, bishop of Elphin, died, and John O'Feenaghty was elected to the see.

Richard Burke, that is, the Red Earl, lord of

A. D. 1325.

1. Loch Laoghaire was part of Lower Lough Erne in the barony of Lurg, on the borders of Fermanagh and Tyrone.

2. The O'Mulbrennans or O'Mulrenans are given by O'Dugan as chiefs of Clan Conor in Roscommon. Manannan here mentioned was Manannan Mac Lir or Son of the Sea, a celebrated Danan merchant, and one of the first navigators in the west of Europe, from whom the Isle of Mann took its name. An account of Manannan may be found in O'Flaherty's Ogygia. This O'Mulbrennan is here designated Manannan, because he was the chief naval commander in Connaught.

Ulster and of the greater part of Connaught, the chief of all the English of Ireland, died in the latter end of summer.

Ivar Mac Rannall, chief of Muintir Eoluis, was slain by his own kinsmen.

Nicol O'Heyne (of Galway), Torlogh Mac Anchaioich and Torlogh Mac Mahon (in Monaghan), died.

O'Rourke (Ualgarg) plundered Moy Inis,¹ where Geoffrey Mac Cafrey was slain by Cathal O'Rourke.

Donal Cairbreach Mac Carthy defeated Mac Thomas (Fitzgerald), and the English of Munster; and many knights were slain.

Awlave Mac Guire (in Fermanagh), died.

A. D. 1327.

Flaherty Mac Guire, lord of Fermanagh, died.

Gormley, daughter of Mac Dermott, and wife for some time of Manus, son of Donal O'Conor, tanist of Connaught, afterwards wife of Conor O'Kelly, lord of Hy Maine, and lastly wife of Fergal O'Hara, lord of Lieney, distinguished for her hospitality and nobleness, died after the victory of repentance.

Malachy Riavach, son of Donal, son of Teige O'Conor, died of the small-pox.

Fergal, son of Ualgarg O'Rourke (in Leitrim), Cuilen O'Dempsey (in Kildare), and Sabina, daughter of Mac Egan, died.

A great war arose between the king of England¹ and his queen, who was the daughter of the king of France; and she dethroned the king; and her son assumed the sovereignty against his father in his seventeenth year, at his mother's instigation, and was crowned by the council (or parliament) of England.

A. D. 1326.

1. Moyinnis, now called the parish of Inismacsaint in Fermanagh, where a monastery was founded by St. Nennidh in the sixth century, on an island in Lough Erne.

A. D. 1327.

1. King of England. Edward II. was married to Isabella, daughter of Philip le Bel, king of France. The queen and her favourite, Roger Mortimer, earl of March, having joined the factious barons of England in a rebellion against the king, deposed and imprisoned him in Berkly castle, where he was put to death, and his son, then only in the fifteenth year of his age, was proclaimed king of England as Edward III., on the 24th or 25th of January, A. D. 1327, according to the chronology of sir Harris Nicholas.

Edward III., was proclaimed king of England on the 25th of January.

The king of Scotland² came to Ireland.

A war broke out between the O'Rourkes and the O'Reillys; and the castle of Lough Uachtar³ was burned by Cathal O'Rourke, who abandoned it for a ransom of cattle.

Gilcreest Dall Mac Rannall (in Leitrim), was put to death by O'Maolmiadhaigh, in his own bed.

The small-pox raged through Ireland, of which great numbers died.

A. D. 1328.

O'Cridagain, bishop of Brefney (Kilmore), died.

Thomas O'Malley, bishop of Annaghdone (in Galway), died at Rome.

Maurice O'Gibellain, head master of Ireland in the ancient and modern canon and civil laws, a truly learned philosopher, a genuine poet, a canon of the chapter of Tuam, Elphin, Achonry, Killala, Annaghdone, and Clonfert, an official (or vicar general), and general Brehon (or judge) of the archbishoprick, died.

Giolla-na-naingeal (servant of the Angels), O'Taichlidh (or O'Tully), archdeacon of Insi,¹ died.

Malachy O'Reilly, lord of Muintir Maolmordha (county of Cavan), having been wounded and taken prisoner by the English of Meath, who received hostages for his release, afterwards died in his own house.

Giolla Adamnan O'Firghil (or O'Freel), the coarb of Adamnan (abbot of Raphoe), died.

Awful thunder and lightning occurred in the summer of this year, by which the vegetation and

2. The King of Scotland at this time was Robert Bruce, who had come to Ireland, as already stated, in the year 1317, to support his brother Edward Bruce, but our historians give no account of the second visit of king Robert Bruce to Ireland.

3. Lough Oughter, a large lake between the towns of Cavan and Killeshandra, in the county of Cavan. On an island in this lake the O'Reillys had a strong castle which was called the Castle of Clough Oughter, of which some ruins still remain. In this castle the celebrated Owen Roe O'Neill, general of the northern Irish in the Cromwellian wars, died in November, 1649.

A. D. 1328.

1. Insi was probably Devenish Abbey on an island in Lough Erne, where, according to Archdall's Monasticon, the O'Tullys were erenachs.

fruit of Ireland were extensively destroyed, and the corn blighted.

An epidemic disease prevailed throughout Ireland, called Slaodan,² which continued on every person seized by it for three or four days, and proved almost fatal to them.

William Burke, that is, the Brown Earl, the son of sir John the earl, who was the son of the Red Earl, came to Ireland.

Donogh Roe O'Gara (in Sligo), and five others of his name were slain.

Conor Mac Branan, heir to the chieftaincy of Coreachlan (in Roscommon), was slain by the people of Anally.

Walter Burke marched with a force into Connaught, and plundered many of the immediate friends of Torlogh O'Conor, king of Connaught.

Sir John Bermingham,³ earl of Louth, the most valiant, powerful, and hospitable baron of the English of Ireland, was treacherously slain by his own people, viz., the English of Oriel (Louth); and many of the English and Irish along with him were also slain, among whom was the blind O'Carroll, that is, Mulrooney, who was the chief minstrel of Ireland and Scotland in his time.

Bryan, son of Tomaltagh Mac Donogh (in Sligo), was slain by Bryan, son of Teige Mac Donogh.

The earl of Ulster, together with Torlogh O'Conor, king of Connaught, and Murtoth O'Brien, king of Munster, marched with a great army against Bryan Ban (the Fair) O'Brien, by whom they were defeated; and Conor O'Brien, a worthy heir to the crown of Ireland for his personal figure, wisdom, hospitality, and nobleness, was slain on that expedition, together with eighty of the chiefs and common soldiers.

Teige, son of Torlogh O'Conor, was slain by Dermot O'Gara.

An appointed meeting was held between Walter Mac William Burke and Gilbert Mac Costello on the one side, and Mulrooney Mac Dermott, Tomaltagh his son, Tomaltagh Mac Donogh and the chiefs of Clan Mulrooney (in Rosecommon) on the other side; and an engagement took place, in which Mac Dermott defeated Walter and Gilbert, with their people.

Donogh Gallda, son of Donal O'Conor, was slain by Hugh, son of Teige, son of Malachy, son of Manus (O'Conor).

Matthew Riavach Mac Gafridh was slain by Muintir Gearadhain (in Leitrim).

Ivar Mac Rannall, chief of Muintir Eoluis, was slain by the sons of Gilcreest Mac Rannall.

Duessa, daughter of O'Ferrall, and wife of Mac Murrogh of the mountain, died.

Edina, daughter of Mac Mahon, and wife of Mac Guire (in Fermanagh), died.

Duessa, daughter of O'Helighe (or O'Hely), and wife of Donal, son of Teige O'Conor, died.

Murtogh O'Brien and the Clan Cuilein (Mac Namaras of Clare), marched with their forces to attack Bryan O'Brien a second time, but Murtogh was defeated, and Conor O'Brien, Donal of the Donals, and Mac Namara, with many others were slain.

Mac Geoghegan⁴ gave a great overthrow to the English, in which three thousand five hundred of the English, together with the D'Altons, and the son of the vain-glorious knight, were slain.

Awlave Mac Finevar (in Leitrim), was slain by Cathal O'Rourke.

2. Slaodan signifies a cough or cold; hence this disease appears to have been an epidemic cold or influenza.

3. Sir John Bermingham. A great contention arose at this time amongst the English families of Louth, as the Berminghams, Gernons, Savadges, &c., and a battle was fought between them on Whitsun Eve, the 10th of June, as mentioned by Mac Geoghegan and others, at Ballibragan (probably Balbriggan), in which 160, or according to others 200 of the English, were slain, amongst whom were John Bermingham, earl of Louth, his brother Pierce, and many others of his kindred, and Richard Talbot of Malahide, &c.

4. Mac Geoghegan. This battle, in which the English forces met such a tremendous defeat, was fought near Mullingar, the day before the feast of St. Lawrence, namely, the 9th of August. The Irish clans were commanded by William Mac Geoghegan, lord of Kinel Fiacha, a large territory in Westmeath, comprising the present baronies of Moycashel and Rathcourath. The English forces were commanded by lord Thomas Butler, the Petits, Tuites, D'Altons, Delamers, Tyrrells, Nangles, &c. In Pembridge's Annals, quoted by Mac Geoghegan in his History of Ireland, (Duffy's edition, p. 322), Pembridge says, "The same year on the eve of St. Laurence, lord Thomas Butler marched with a great army towards Ardnoreher, and met there lord Thomas Mac Geoghegan. The lord Thomas Butler and many besides were killed, to the great loss of Ireland." Amongst the English captains killed Pembridge enumerates John, Roger, and Thomas Ledwich; John and David Nangle; Miler and Simon Petit; Nicholas and John White; James Tyrrell; John Warringer; Peter Kent; and William Freyne, with 140 other leaders whose names are unknown. On this battle Henry Marleborough in his chronicle says, "Lord Thomas Butler and divers other noblemen were slain by Mac Geoghegan and the Irish near Molingar." Mac Geoghegan was named William Gallda, from having defeated the English. See his death, at A. D. 1332.

A. D. 1329.

Augustin, abbot of Lisgabhal¹ on Lough Erne, died.

Cathal, son of Donal O'Rourke, a worthy heir to the lordship of Brefney, was slain by the sons of John O'Ferrall and the English of Meath, and many others with them, in the house of Richard Tuíte, at the monastery of Fobhar.²

Murtogh, son of Donal O'Conor, lord of Carbury (in Sligo), and a worthy heir to the kingdom of Connaught, died.

Cathal, son of Hugh, son of Owen O'Conor, was forcibly expelled from the Feadha, and from Tir Maine (in Roscommon and Galway), by the O'Kellys and the people of Hy Maine, at the instigation of Walter Burke,

A great contest arose between Torlogh O'Conor and the Clan Mulrooney (Mac Dermotts); and much devastation was committed on both sides.

A depredation was committed by Tomaltach Mac Dermott on Dermot O'Flanagan, chief of Clan Cathail (in Roscommon).

Aine, daughter of Fergal O'Reilly, and wife of Tomaltach Mac Dermott, died.

Teige, son of Torlogh, son of Mahon O'Conor, was slain by O'Gara (in Sligo), and by the people of Artagh.

Mac William Burke and the earl of Ulster made peace with Mac Thomas (Fitzgerald).

Dabac Don Mac William (Burke), a noble knight of great affluence, died.

Donogh Mac Gilpatrick (of Ossory), was slain by the earl of Ulster.

Maolisa Donn Mac Egan, Ard Ollamh³ (or chief professor) of Connaught, died.

The crops remained unreaped until after Michaelmas throughout Ireland, in consequence of wet weather.

A. D. 1329.

1. Lios Gabhail, now Lisgoole near Enniskillen, in the county of Fermanagh, where there was a celebrated abbey endowed by the Mac Guires.

2. Fobhar, now Fore in Westmeath, where a monastery was founded for canons regular in the seventh century, by St. Feichin; it afterwards became a Benedictine monastery, and a great college being established there, it was for many centuries a celebrated seat of learning and religion, and also a bishop's see.

3. Ardollamh signifies a chief professor; and as the Mac Eigans were hereditary Brehons in Munster and Connaught, it is probable that this Mac Egan was a professor of the Brehon laws.

A. D. 1330.

1. Fiodhanatha signifies the wood of the ford, now called

A. D. 1330.

Maolisa O'Coinel, the coarb of Drumcliff (in Sligo), died.

Benedict O'Flanagan, prior of Kilmore of the Shannon, died.

Manus, son of Hugh Breifnach O'Conor, was slain by Cathal, son of Hugh, son of Owen O'Conor, at Fearan-na-Darach (or the Land of the Oak), and Simon Mac-an-Failgidh was slain along with him.

Giolla Iosa Roe O'Reilly, lord of Muintir Maolmordha, and of all Brefney for a long period, died at an advanced age, after gaining the palm of victory over the world and the devil, and was buried in the habit of a Franciscan friar in the monastery of Cavan, of which he was the original founder.

Malachy Mac Cormac, a wealthy landed proprietor, died.

Ualgarg O'Rourke marched with a great force to Fiodh-an-atha,¹ where he was met by the English of the town, who defeated his people and slew Art O'Rourke, heir to the head lordship of Brefney, Roderick Mac Gauran, and many others.

Torlogh O'Conor, king of Connaught, attacked Walter Mac William Burke in his camp at Leagmoy² in Moylurg, and routed him thence to Cairthe Liag Fada; Gilbert Mac Costello, then lord of Slieve Lughua, came with all his forces to aid Mac William, and Tomaltach Mac Donogh with his people also came to assist Mac William, having turned against O'Conor; their combined forces attacked O'Conor, and a great battle was fought between them, until they came as far as Ath Disirt Nuadan, where Donogh, son of Donal, son of Mahon (or Mac Mahon), Mac Gilla Comdhain, and a few of O'Conor's people were slain at the ford; O'Conor with the chiefs of his people escaped from them until they came as far as the Tuatha. Mac William pitched his camp at Kill Lomad in the neighbourhood of O'Conor; the forces of Connaught, both English and Irish, who had joined him, were collected by Mac William for the purpose of having himself appointed king of Connaught, and he was then prepared to depose O'Conor; when Mac Dermott got intelligence of this, he turned against Mac William, and, taking O'Conor's part, amicable terms and peace were concluded between both parties.

Finæ, a town in Westmeath, situated on the river between Loughs Sheelin and Kinale, which separates the counties of Cavan and Westmeath. This battle was severe and long contested, and great numbers were slain on both sides. The English were commanded by the lord justice sir Anthony Lucy.

2. Leagmoigh, in Moylurg, in the barony of Boyle, county of Roscommon. Cairthe Liag fada, on the borders of the baronies of Costello and Gallen, county of Mayo. Slieve Lughua, a large district in the barony of Costello, county of Mayo, and extending into the barony of Coolavin, county of Sligo, of which Mac Costello was lord. The Tuatha or Districts, a large territory in the baronies of Ballintobber and Roscommon, county of Roscommon, in which Sliabh Baghna, now Slieve Bawn, was situated. Kill Lomad, a parish in the barony of Boyle, county of Roscommon.

Conor, son of Teige, son of Bryan, son of Andrew, son of Bryan Luighneach (O'Conor), gave the people of Dartry (in Leitrim), a great defeat, and slew many of them.

Torlogh O'Conor, with a few of his chiefs waited on William Burke, the Brown Earl, to obtain his aid against Mac William.

Bryan, son of Gilcreest Mac Rannall (in Leitrim), was slain by Teige Mac Rannall.

Hugh and Dermott, the sons of Murrogh O'Ferrall (in Longford), were slain by Hugh O'Ferrall.

Petrus, the son of the coarb of St. Moeg (abbot of Drumlane in Cavan), was slain by the English of Kells.

A. D. 1331.

The coarb of St. Caillin,¹ that is, Giolla-na-neev Mac Ceile, died in the monastery of Maothla.

Mulrooney Mac Dermott, lord of Moylurg, having abdicated his lordship, assumed a monastic habit in the monastery of Boyle, and Tomaltach Mac Dermott, his son, succeeded to the lordship on the 7th day of May.

Fergal, son of Malachy Carrach Mac Dermott, was slain by Teige, son of Cathal, son of Donal O'Conor.

Walter Mac William Burke marched with a force into Moylurg and plundered the entire country, excepting its churches, to which he extended protection and respect. Tomaltach Mac Dermott with his party attacked them, but was repelled by the English, who slew a number of his people; they at length made peace with each other, and Walter left the country.

Myler Mac Geoghegan (of Westmeath), died.

Murrogh Mac Mahon (in Monaghan), was slain by John Mac Mahon and the English of the plain of Oriel (Louth).

Thomas, son of Conchaire O'Flynn, died.

A. D. 1332.

Walter, son of sir William Burke, was taken prisoner by the Brown Earl (Burke), and was conveyed by him to the new castle of Inisowen (in Donegal), where he afterwards died of starvation, in the castle prison.

Tomaltach Mac Dermott and Mac William (Burke), were defeated at Beirne-an-mil (in Roscommon), by the son of the earl (Burke), and Tomaltach Mac Donogh and many of their people were slain.

William Gallda, son of Murtogh More Mac Geoghegan, lord of Kinel Fiacha (in Westmeath), died.

A. D. 1333.

Florent Mac Anoglaigh, archdeacon of Killoran,¹ died.

William Burke, earl of Ulster,² was slain by the English of Ulster, and the English who perpetrated that deed were put to death in an extraordinary manner by the people of the king of England; some of them were hanged, others were slain, and some were torn asunder to avenge his death.

A. D. 1331.

1. Coarb of St. Caillin, that is abbot of Fenagh, in Leitrim. The monastery of Maothla was that of Mohill, also in Leitrim.

A. D. 1333.

1. Killoran was probably Killora, in the diocese of Kilmacduagh in the county of Galway, a parish which is attached to the archdeaconry. There is also Oran, in the county of Roscommon, where there was an ancient church founded by St. Patrick, and there is a parish called Killoran, in the county of Sligo.

2. Earl of Ulster. William de Burgo, earl of Ulster, was murdered in June, 1333, in the 21st year of his age, at a place called the Fords near Carrickfergus, in consequence of some family quarrels, by his own people, headed by sir John Mandeville, who was married to a lady of the de Burgos, the earl's relative. De Burgos was married to Maud, daughter of Henry Plantagenet, earl of Lancaster, grandson to king Henry III., and by her he had a daughter Elizabeth, who was married to Lionel, duke of Clarence, son of king Edward III., who, in right of his wife, was created earl of Ulster and lord of Connaught; hence the title earl of Ulster has been since that time retained in the royal family of England.—Lives of Illustrious Irishmen, and Lodge's Peerage.

Tomaltach Mac Donogh, son of Dermod, lord of Tirerrill, the most eminent man for truth, friendship, and protection of his time, died.

Felim O'Donnell, the most noble and honourable tanist to a lordship, a man of whom the Irish had the highest expectations, died.

Gilbert Mac Costello was treacherously slain on the floor of his own house by Cathal Mac Dermott Gall.

Hugh Mac Consnamha, chief of Muintir Kenny (in Leitrim), died.

Nicholas Oge Mac Clancy was slain by the Connicians, that is, by Torlogh O'Conor, king of Connaught, and by Tiarnan Mac Rourke; and the lordship of Brefney was given to O'Reilly.

Donogh, son of Hugh O'Kelly (in Galway), was taken prisoner by Torlogh O'Conor, king of Connaught.

A general pardon was proclaimed to the sons of William Burke from the king of England.

Conor Mac Brenan, chief of Corcachlan (in Roscommon), died.

Hugh, son of Donal Oge O'Donnell, lord of Tirconnell, Kinel Moain, Inisowen, Fermanagh, North Connaught, and Brefney, and heir to the crown of all Ulster, the most dreaded and formidable to his enemies of any of the Irish in his time, a man by whom most of the English fell, and also of the Irish who were opposed to him; one whose government, laws, and regulations were superior to any of his neighbouring chiefs, the most distinguished man of western Europe for hospitality and benevolence, died after gaining the palm of victory over the world and the devil, in a monastic habit, at Innis Samer,³ and was buried with great honours and solemnity in the monastery of Eas Roe. Conor O'Donnell, his son, succeeded him, but a contention afterwards arose between Conor and Art his brother, respecting the lordship, until Art was slain in a conflict by Conor.

A. D. 1334.

All the Connicians both English and Irish

3. Inis Saimer and Eas Ruadh, as already explained in several places, were names applied to Ballyshannon and its monastery. See note on Tirconnell.

marched with a great army into Munster to attack Mac Namara (of Clare), from whom they took hostages, and reduced him to subjection; a party of these forces set fire to a church, in which there were one hundred and eighty persons and two priests, none of whom escaped from the burning.

Ten of the people of Donogh, son of Malachy Carrach Mac Dermott, were drowned on Lough Techet (Lough Gara in Sligo).

Teige, son of Cathal, son of Donal O'Conor, died.

Donogh Mac Consnamha, chief of Muintir Kenny (in Leitrim), and Seonag, the son of Murtoth More Mac Geoghegan, lord of Kinel Fiacha (in Westmeath), and William Mac Geoghegan, died.

Conor Mac Branan died. John Mac Gilultan was slain by Donal Mac Hugh.

A. D. 1335.

Fionguala, daughter of O'Brien, and wife of Torlogh O'Conor, died.

John, son of Art O'Hara (in Sligo), was taken prisoner by the son of the earl (Burke), who plundered his people.

The sons of Donal O'Conor plundered the people of Maurice Sugach (the Merry) Fitzgerald, on which occasion the grandson of Maurice was slain.

The Clan Maurice, in retaliation, plundered the sons of Donal.

All the west of Connaught was laid waste by Edmond Burke, who committed numerous evils both by burning and slaying on the son of the earl (Burke), and on the Clan Rickard, after which they made peace with each other.

Giolla-na-Naingéal O'Cassidy, chief physician of Fermanagh, died.

A. D. 1336.

Triinnoit O'Naan, head professor in many sciences, and in civil and canon law, died.

Tomaltach Gearr of the Plunders, Mac Dermott, lord of Moylurg, one who triumphed often over his enemies, whose friendship, protection, generosity, and hospitality excelled those of any of his tribe, died on the night of Trinity Sunday in his own house at the port of the Rock (of Lough Key near Boyle), and was buried with honours in the monastery of Boyle. Conor, his son, succeeded him in the lordship.

Theobald Burke Mac William, and Myler, the son of Jordan Dexeter (in Mayo), died.

Owen O'Madden defeated the Clan Rickard Burke, and many of their people were slain, viz., sixty-six in number.

The sons of Dermot Gall, and the son of Felim O'Conor, committed great depredations on the Clan Costello (in Mayo), and Maidiuc Mac Wail-drin was slain while pursuing them.

Edmond Mac William Burke committed depredations on the Clan Cathal (in Roscommon), on which occasion Conor O'Flanagan and many other persons were plundered; and Malachy O'Flanagan was slain in the pursuit of the prey on that occasion, and a brother to Mac Anmilidh was afterwards taken prisoner by the pursuers, and was retained as a hostage.

Conor Mac Dermott, lord of Moylurg; Hugh, son of Felim, son of Hugh O'Conor, with the household of O'Conor; the Mac Donoghs; and Cormac, son of Roderick O'Conor, with the young soldiers of Carbury (in Sligo), went on a predatory excursion into Tireragh, and arrived at Mullach Ratha (near Easkey); the cattle of the country were driven away before them, but they however carried away with them much property, many horses and steeds, and a great quantity of valuable articles; they also slew many people, and returned safe to their own homes.

Dermot O'Flanagan, lord of Clan Cathail (in Roscommon), died.

Torlogh O'Conor, king of Connaught, collected all the light troops of the Tuatha, of Clan Cathail, of Clan Conor, and of Moylurg (all clans of Roscommon), to Artagh; and the great castle of Mac Costello (in Mayo) was taken and demolished by O'Conor on that occasion, and the *Ceithern*¹ who garrisoned the town, surrendered, on the guarantee of Mac Dermott.

Donal, son of John, son of Donal O'Conor, died.

Niall, son of Conor, son of Teige (O'Conor), was slain.

The monastery of St. Francis at Carraic-na-Siúire (Carrick-on-Suir, county of Tipperary), in the diocese of Lismore, was founded by James Butler (earl of Ormond).

Mahon O'Reilly (lord of Clanmahon in the county of Cavan), was slain by the English.

O'Meehan, the coarb of St. Molaise (abbot of Devenish in Fermanagh), died.

A. D. 1337.

Lughaidh O'Daly, bishop of Clonmacnois, died after a well-spent life.

Thomas, son of Cormac O'Donnell, bishop of Raphoe, a man eminent for wisdom and piety, died.

The Master O'Rothlain died.

William (Burke), son of the earl of Ulster, and Bryan Bane (the Fair) O'Brien, made peace with each other, and the lands which he (Bryan) took from the earl's son were set to him for rents.

The king of Connaught pitched his camp at Athleague (in Roscommon), in opposition to Edmond Burke.

John O'Fallon, lord of Clan Uadach (in Roscommon), died.

Teige Mac Clancy, lord of Dartry (in Leitrim), was slain by Cormac, son of Roderick, son of Donal O'Conor, together with many others, in retaliation for the death of John, son of Donal (O'Conor), and he (Cormac) afterwards committed great depredations on Dartry; and the son of Maurice Mac Clancy was slain while pursuing the plunder.

Teige and Malachy, the sons of Ivar Mac Rannall, were taken prisoners by Cathal Mac Rannall, who was soon after slain by the kinsmen of the sons of Ivar, who went to rescue them, having collected a great force, in conjunction with William Mac Mahon and the two other sons of Ivar Mac Rannall, namely, Conor and Tomaltach; they also slew Manus O'Ferrall on the same day, and Teige, the son of Ivar Mac Rannall, was appointed chief.

A. D. 1336.

1. Ceithern, or kerns, were the light-armed troops of the Irish, and the galloglauchs, or gallowglasses were the heavy-armed infantry.

Donal Roe O'Malley (in Mayo), and Cormac, his son, were slain by the sons of Mebric, and others of the English, on the festival of St. Stephen.

Matthew O'Higgin, a man eminent for poetry and liberality, died.

Henry Mac Martin was slain.

Donogh, son of Murtogh More Mac Geoghegan, lord of Kinel Fiacha (in Westmeath) was slain by the people of Offaley.

Hugh Reamhur (the Fat) O'Neill, made peace with the people of Oriel and of Fermanagh.

Donogh More O'Dowd, tanist of Hy Fiachra (in Sligo), died.

A. D. 1338.

Roderick-an-Einigh (the Hospitable), Mac Guire, lord of Fermanagh, a man who, in making presents of money, of clothing, of steeds and other goods to the learned men and professors of Ireland, was the most liberal of all the Clan Mac Guire in his time, died.

Donogh, son of Roderick O'Connor, was slain.

Edmund (Burke), the son of the earl of Ulster, was taken prisoner by Edmond Burke (Mac William) who tied a stone about his neck and drowned him in Lough Mask (in Mayo). The destruction of the English of Connaught and of his own race was the consequence of that deed, for Torlogh O'Connor, king of Connaught, soon after expelled Edmund Mac William Burke out of Connaught, after the country and churches in the west of Connaught had been awfully destroyed between them, and O'Connor then assumed the supreme government of the entire country.

Edmund Burke afterwards collected a large fleet of ships and boats, and remained for a long time on the islands of the sea.

The English of Lieney and of Corran (in Sligo), were plundered and dispossessed of their properties and power, which were transferred to the

I. South Connaught. The name Deiseirt Conacht, or South Connaught, often occurs in the course of the Annals, also sometimes called Uachtar Conacht, or Upper Connaught, as North Connaught is called Tuaisceart Conacht, and sometimes Iachtar Conacht, or Lower Connaught. The history and topography of the counties of Sligo and Mayo have been given in the note on North Connaught, and in the present article will be given the history and topography of the ancient territories comprised in the present counties of Roscommon and Galway, together with their chiefs and clans, compiled from the books of Leacan and Ballymote, O'Dugan's Topography, O'Flaherty's Ogygia, O'Connor's Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores, the Dissertations of Charles O'Connor, de Burgo's Hibernia Dominicana, the Histories of Keating, O'Halloran, and Mac Geoghegan, County Surveys, and various other sources. In the earliest ages the Firbolgs, called also Fir Domnians and Damnonians, by O'Flaherty and others, were the first inhabitants of Connaught, as already stated in the note on North Connaught. The Firbolgs are called by various writers Belgæ, or Belgians, and, according to our ancient annalists, were a colony originally from Scythia, or, according to others, came from that part of Gaul which was called by the Romans Gallia Belgica, now Belgium, and are supposed by others to be the same people as the Belgæ of Britain. The colony called Tuath De Danan, already mentioned in the note on North Connaught, conquered the Firbolgs, and became masters of Ireland. The Danans are represented by our old annalists as originally Scythians, who had settled some time in Greece, and afterwards migrated to Scandinavia, or the countries now forming Norway, Sweden, and Denmark. From Scandinavia the Danans came to North Britain, where they settled colonies, and from thence passed into Ireland. It appears that the Danans were a highly civilized people, far more skilled in arts and sciences than any of the other ancient colonies that settled in Ireland; hence from their great knowledge they were considered as magicians by the Firbolgs and Milesians. O'Brien, in his learned work on the Round Towers of Ireland, considers that these beautiful structures were built by the Danans, for purposes connected with Pagan worship and astronomical observations, an opinion not improbable, when it is considered that the Danans ruled in Ireland about two centuries, or one hundred and ninety-seven years, according to the Psalter of Cashel, and were highly skilled in architecture and other arts, from their long residence in Greece, and intercourse with the Phœnicians. The Fomoraigh or Fomorians, another ancient colony mentioned by the old annalists as settled in the northern parts of Ulster and Connaught, are stated to have been African or Phœnician pirates, descendants of Ham, and are represented as a race of giants. The term Fomaire is derived by O'Brien, in his Irish Dictionary, from Fogh, plundering, and muir, the sea, and hence signifies pirates. These various colonies, according to our annalists, settled in Ireland more than a thousand years before the Christian era. In O'Flaherty's Ogygia (vol. ii. p. 26), it is stated that Orbsen, a chief descended from the Dauans and Fomorians, was a famous merchant, and carried on a commercial intercourse between Ireland and Britain, and that he was commonly called Manannan, on account of his frequent trading to the Isle of Mann, and that he also got the name of Mac Lir, signifying the son of the sea, from his being so expert a mariner. He was killed by Uillinn Abradhruaidh, or Uillinn of the Red Brows, another Danan chief, in a battle in Connaught, at a place called, from that circumstance, Magh Uillinn, or the plain of Uillinn, now the barony of Moycullen, in the county of Galway. The lake near which this battle was fought got the name Lough Orbsen, from the chief Orbsen, who was killed there, and is now called Lough Corrib, in the county of Galway. According to O'Flaherty, the lakes called Lough Cime, now Lough Hacket, Lough Riach or Loughrea, and some other lakes in the county of Galway, and also the river Suc, between Roscommon and Galway, first began to flow in the time of Heremon, son of Milesius; and Loch Ke, in Moylurg, near Boyle in Roscommon, first sprung out in the reign of Tigearmmas, monarch of Ireland, about nine centuries before the Christian era. The territory of South Connaught, bounded on one side by the Atlantic, and on the other by the mighty Shannon, abounds in sublime and beautiful scenery, magnificent lakes, as Lough Corrib and many others, in Galway; Loughs Key, Gara, Allen, and many others, in Roscommon; the Suc, and many other fine rivers; majestic mountains, as Maam Trasna, Maam Turk, Maam Ean, Slieve Baugbta, and the twelve Pins of Benabola, in Galway; with immense ocean cliffs, large inlets, and bays, and many fine islands, as those of Arran, &c., along the Atlantic coast. Amongst the remarkable features of this country may be mentioned the ancient Irish inheritors, after the English had been expelled.

Teige, son of Roderiek, son of Cathal O'Connor, who was called the Bratach righin (that is of the firm Standard or Banner), was taken prisoner by Thomas Mac Gauran (of the county of Cavan), and many of his people were slain.

Mac Gauran (Thomas) went then to the house of O'Connor, and on his return therefrom, the Clan Murtoth (O'Connor of Sligo), and people of Muintir Eoluis (in Leitrim), collected their forces, took him prisoner, and slew many of his people.

Hugh-an-Chlcitigh (of the Plumes), the son of Roderiek O'Connor, while commanding in the rere of his forces, received a wound, of which he died.

Dervoill, daughter of Cathal Mac Murrogh, and wife of Donogh, the son of Hugh Oge, died.

A. D. 1339.

Roderiek O'Kelly, lord of Hy Maine, was slain

by Cathal, son of Hugh, son of Owen O'Connor, while going from O'Connor's house to his own.

Thomas Mac Gauran was set at liberty by the Clan Muirheartaigh.

Hugh Reamhar O'Neill marched with a great force into Tirconnell, and the son of John O'Neill and Geoffrey O'Donnell, of those forces, were slain by the people of O'Dogherty.

Edmond Mac William Burke, who was on the islands of the sea with his fleet, was expelled to Ulster, by Torlogh O'Connor, king of Connaught.

Torlogh O'Connor took to him (as wife) the daughter of Torlogh O'Brien, who was the wife of the earl of Ulster's son, and put away Dervoil, the daughter of Hugh O'Donnell.

A great war arose throughout Meath, between the English and the Irish.

The church of Kilronan (in Roscommon), was erected by Fergal Muinach O'Duigenan.

peculiarly wild and picturesque scenery of Connemara. In Roscommon are many fine mountains, as the Curlews, Slieve Bawn, and many others. Cruachan, in Connaught, was celebrated from the earliest ages, and nearly a thousand years before the Christian era, Muinne, monarch of Ireland, son of Heremon, is stated to have died at Cruachan. Cruachan, or Croaghan, was situated near Elphin, in the county of Rosecommon, and according to Charles O'Connor, was also called Druim na n-Druadh, or the Hill of the Druids, being a great seat of Druidism. Cruachan became the capital of Connaught, and residence of the ancient kings; and the states of Connaught held conventions there, to make laws and inaugurate their kings. Eochaidh Feidhlioch, monarch of Ireland, about a century before the Christian era, erected a royal residence and a great rath there, called Rath Cruachan, which got its name from Cruachan Croidheirg, his queen, mother of Meadhbh. This Meadhbh or Meava, was queen of Connaught, and a celebrated heroine, who, like the ancient queens of the Amazons, commanded her own forces in person, in the seven-years' war with the Red-branch Knights of Ulster, an event famous in the Tain-bo-Cuailgne, and other ancient records. Meava is represented in her gilded war-chariot, surrounded by several other chariots, and wearing on her head her Aislin, or golden crown. At Cruachan was the burial-place of the pagan kings of Connaught, called Reilig na Riogh, or the Cemetery of the Kings. The heroic Dathi, the last pagan monarch of Ireland, having carried his victorious arms to Gaul, and being killed by lightning at the foot of the Alps, A. D. 429, his body was brought to Ireland by his soldiers, and buried in Reilig na Riogh, and a large red pillar-stone erected over his grave, which remains to this day. Dathi was nephew to the famous warrior, Niall of the Nine Hostages, monarch of Ireland, and, like him, made war on the Romans in Gaul and Britain. Dathi's name was Feredach, but he got the appellation Dathi from his great activity, as the word Dathi or Dathe signifies agility, and he is represented to have been so expert in the use of his arms and handling his weapons that, if attacked by an hundred persons at the same time, all discharging their arrows and javelins at him, he would ward off every weapon by his dexterity. A beautiful poem, giving an account of the kings and queens buried at Cruachan, was composed by Torna Eigeas (Torna the Learned), chief bard to the monarch Niall of the Hostages, in the fifth century, commencing thus:

"Ata fudsa ri fionn bh-fear Fail,
Dathi, mae Fiachraeh, fear graidh,
A Cruacha, ro cheilis sin
Ar Ghalluibh, ar Ghaoidhealuibh."

"Under thee lies the fair king of the men of Fail,
Dathi, son of Fiachra, man of fame,
O! Cruacha, thou hast this concealed
From the strangers and Gaels!"

This last line is, literally, from the Galls and Gaels, the word Gaels meaning the Irish themselves, and the term Galls being applied by the Irish to all foreigners, as the Gauls, Danes, English, &c. In the above Ireland is called Fail, as Inis Fail, signifying the Island of Destiny, was the name given to Ireland by the Tuath de Danans, from a remarkable stone they brought with them into Ireland, which was called the Lia Fail, or Stone of Destiny, sitting on which, the ancient kings, both of the Danan and Milesian race, were for many ages crowned at Tara. This stone was sent to Scotland in the sixth century, for the coronation of Fergus, king of Scots, who was descended from the Milesian kings of Ireland, and was used for many centuries at the coronation of the Scottish kings, and kept at the abbey of Seone, from whence it was taken to England by King Edward I., when he invaded Scotland, and placed under the coronation chair in Westminster Abbey, where it still remains, though it has been erroneously stated in some modern publications, that the large pillar stone which stands on the mound or rath at Tara is the Stone of Destiny, an assertion opposed to the statements of O'Flaherty, the O'Conors, and all other learned antiquarians. It may be here observed, that three of the Tuath de Danan queens, namely, Eire, Fodhla, and Banba, gave their names to Ireland, which is mentioned by the various old writers under the names Fodhla, Banba, and Eire, and from Eire has been derived the name Eirin. According to the poem of Torna Eigeas, the following were the kings and queens buried at Cruachan: the three queens of the Danans, Eire, Fodhla, and Banba, and their husbands, Mae Coill, Mae Ceht, and Mae

A. D. 1340.

THE monastery of Oirbeal-aigh¹ at Carraic-an-Chuil, at the eastern end of Lough Lein, in the diocese of Ardfert, in Munster, was founded for Franciscan friars by Mac Carthy, and many of the nobility of the country selected their burial-places in that monastery, and amongst these were O'Sullivan More and the two O'Donoghoes.

Greine, the three Danan kings; also Lughaidh Lamhfada, Daghdha, and Midir, three other celebrated kings of the Danans; several Milesian kings and queens, as Ugaine Mor, or Hugony the Great, who was monarch of Ireland more than three centuries before the Christian era; his daughter, the princess Muireasc; Cobhthach Caol, monarch of Ireland, and son of Hugony; Brea, Nar, and Lothar, the three sons of Eochaidh Feidhleach, monarch of Ireland, a short time before the Christian era, and also his three daughters, namely, Meava, the famous queen of Connaught, Deirbhre, and Clothra; also Eochaidh Aireamb, monarch of Ireland, and brother of Eochaidh Feidhleach; the sons of Feidhlimidh Reachtnar, or Felim the Lawgiver, who was monarch of Ireland in the second century, and other kings, the descendants of Con Cead Cathach, with the exception of Art, monarch of Ireland, who was buried at Trevel, in Meath, and his son Cormac, the famous monarch of Ireland, in the third century, who was buried at Ros-na-Riogh, now Rosnaree, near Slane in Meath; and according to the Book of Ballymote, at folio 142, it is stated that Cormac, who it appears had some knowledge of Christianity, gave orders that he should not be buried at Brugh Boine, which was the cemetery of the pagan kings, but at Ros-na-Riogh, and that his face should be towards the rising sun. Brugh Boine, the town or fortress of the Boyne, was also a great cemetery of the pagan kings of Ireland, and according to some antiquaries, was situated near Trim, but according to others, more probably, at the place now called Stackallen, between Navan and Slane, in Meath. In various parts of the ancient kingdom of Meath, in the counties of Meath, Westmeath, and Dublin, are many sepulchral mounds, usually called moats, of a circular form, and having the appearance of hillocks; these are the sepulchres of kings, queens, and warriors, of the pagan times; there are several of these mounds of great size, particularly along the banks of the Boyne, between Drogheda and Slane, and one of them, at Newgrange, is of immense extent, covering an area of two acres, and about eighty feet in height, and was surrounded by a circle of huge stones standing upright, many of which still remain. The interior of this mound is formed of a vast heap of stones of various sizes, and a passage, vaulted over with great flags, leads to the interior, where there is a large chamber or dome, and in it have been found sepulchral urns, and remains of human bones. Cairns, or huge heaps of stones, many of which still remain on hills and mountains in various parts of Ireland, were also in pagan times erected as sepulchres over kings and chiefs. In the Books of Armagh and Ballymote, and other ancient records, are given some curious accounts of the customs used in the interment of the ancient kings and chiefs. Laoghlaire, monarch of Ireland in the fifth century, was buried in the rampart or rath called Rath Laoghlaire, at Tara, with his military weapons and armour on him, his face turned southwards, as it were bidding defiance to his enemies, the men of Leinster; and

A contention arose between the people of Hy Maine, namely, between Teige O'Kelly, to whom Torlogh O'Connor, king of Connaught, gave the government of Hy Maine, and William, son of Donogh Muinach O'Kelly, who was expelled from the country; and although he had left it, Teige O'Kelly, with his kinsmen and people, pursued and overtook him; William and his party at once turned upon them, and an engagement ensued, in which Donogh, the son of Hugh O'Kelly, was slain, and Teige O'Kelly taken prisoner, after receiving wounds, of which he died.

Malachy O'Gormley, chief of Kinel Moain (in Donegal), died.

The sons of Ualgarg O'Rourke, Donal, Hugh,

Eogan Beul, a king of Connaught in the sixth century, who was mortally wounded at the battle of Sligeach or Sligo, fought with the people of Ulster, gave directions that he should be buried with his red javelin in his hand, and his face towards Ulster, as in defiance of his enemies; but the Clanna Neill, from Ulster, came with a strong force and raised the body of the king, and buried it near Lough Gill, with the face downwards, that it might not be the cause of making them fly before the Conacians. Near Lough Gill, in Sligo, are two great cairns still remaining, at which place was probably an ancient cemetery of some of the kings of Connaught. After the introduction of Christianity the kings and chiefs were buried in the abbeys, churches, and cathedrals; for instance, the monarch Brian Boromhe, who was killed at Clontarf, was buried in the cathedral of Armagh. The kings of Connaught in the Christian times were interred in the abbeys of Clonmacnois, Cong, Knockmoy, Roscommon, &c. There are still some remains of Reilig-na-Riogh at Cruachan, consisting of a circular area of about two hundred feet in diameter, surrounded with some remains of an ancient stone ditch, and in the interior are heaps of rude stones piled upon each other, as stated in Weld's Survey of Roscommon.

Dun Aengus, or the fortress of Aengus, erected on the largest of the Arran islands off the coast of Galway, and situated on a tremendous cliff overhanging the sea, consists of a stone work of immense strength, of Cyclopean architecture, composed of large stones without cement: it is of a circular form, and capable of containing within its area two hundred cows. According to O'Flaherty, in his Ogygia (V. II. p. 20.), it was erected by Aengus and Conchobhar, two of the Firbolg kings of Connaught, about a century before the Christian era, and was also called the Dun of Concoar.

The Milesians are so constantly mentioned in the course of these notes, that a short account of their colony may be necessary. The Firbolgs, as already explained, were conquered by the colony of Tuath De Danan, who ruled over Ireland about two centuries, according to our annalists. The Milesians, according to Keating, O'Flaherty, and the old annalists, were originally a colony from Scythia, near the Euxine and Caspian seas, on the borders of Europe and Asia, about the country now called the Crimea. These Scythians, called by the Roman writers Celto-Scythæ, were the most ancient inhabitants in Europe after the deluge, and descended from Japhet. The Celts peopled the greater part of Europe in those early ages, and the chief nation of them were the Gauls, or ancient inhabitants of France and Belgium. A Scythian chief named Niul, the son of one of the kings of Scythia named Feniusa Fearsa, having settled in Egypt, married the princess Scota, daughter of Pharaoh, king of Egypt, who was drowned in the Red Sea. Niul had a son called Gaodhal; hence his descendants are called Gadelians or Gauls. These Gadelians being afterwards expelled from Egypt, sailed back to Scythia, under Gilereest, and Roderick, went on a predatory excursion against Cathal, son of Hugh Brefnach (O'Connor), whom they plundered, and on the same day they slew Conor, son of Donogh Ria-vach, son of Manus, son of Murtogh Muinach, together with many others; and that was the first conflict between the people of O'Rourke and the Clan of Murtogh Muinach (O'Connor). Cathal, the conduct of their chief Eiber Seut or Eber the Scythian; hence they got the name Cineadh Seut, that is, the race of the Scyths or Scythians, and this name was latinised to Scoti, and anglicised Scots, all of which signify Scythians. The Gadelians or Scythians, again emigrated from Scythia, and having sailed through the Euxine or Black Sea, and the Egean or Archipelago, entered the sea now called the Mediterranean, which is named by the Irish writers Muir Toirriua, and made settlements on the coast of Africa, according to O'Flaherty, in Getulia, a country near ancient Carthage, and from thence sent a colony to Iberia or Spain, who, landing there, defeated the race of Tubal, son of Japhet, who then inhabited that country. The Gadelians formed settlements in that part of ancient Spain called Celtiberia, and carried on wars a long time with the natives, under one of their celebrated chiefs named Breogan, from whom the Gadelians or Milesians got the name of Clanna Breogain, which people some writers state to be the same as the Brigantes. A descendant of Breogain named Gollamh, became king of Spain, and being a famous warrior, got the name of Milidh Easpaine, which signifies the Spanish hero, a name latinised Milesius, and his posterity were called Clanna Mileadh, a term anglicised to Milesians. This Milesius having gone to Egypt as a military commander, married Seota, daughter of the king of Egypt. The Milesians of Spain sent a force under Ith, son of Breogain and uncle of Milesius, a valiant warrior, to Eire or Ireland, but he was killed by the Tuath de Danans. After the death of Milesius, his sons having fitted out a powerful fleet and large force for the invasion of Ireland, and setting sail from the tower of Brigantia, which was erected by Breogain near Corunna in Cantabria, landed at Inver Sceine, now the bay of Kenmare in the county of Kerry, and the Tuath de Danans having collected their forces to oppose them, a great battle was fought between them at Slieve Mis Mountain in Kerry, where the Danans were defeated; but Seota, the widow of Milesius, was killed while commanding in the engagement, and was buried in a valley on the sea shore near Tralee. The commanders of the Milesians were Heber, Heremon, and Ir, the sons of Milesius, together with many other chiefs, who proceeded with their forces towards Tara, and in another great battle fought at Tailten in Meath, totally defeated the Danans, and became masters of Ireland. The island was divided between Heber, Heremon and Ir, and another brother named Amergin, was appointed as chief bard. The period of the arrival of the Milesians in Ireland is placed by our ancient chronologists about a thousand years before the Christian era. The descendants of Heremon, or the Heremonians, divided into various branches, became the kings and chiefs of almost the whole of the ancient kingdoms of Meath, Ulster, Leinster and Connaught. The race of Heber Fionn, or Heber the Fair, called Heberians, became the kings and chiefs of Munster, but some also of the race of Ith, uncle of Milesius, called Ithians, became kings and chiefs in Munster, and several of the race of Heber were also monarchs of Ireland; but the race of Heremon furnished by far the greater number of the monarchs of Ireland. The race of Ir, called Clanna Rudhraidh, from Rudhraidh, one of their ancestors, who was king of Ulster in early times, were chiefly settled in Ulster, of which province they were kings for many centuries, and several of them also monarchs of Ireland. The Irians or Clanna Rory, are mentioned by O'Connor and various writers, under the name of Rudricians, and they continued kings of Ulster to the fourth and fifth centuries, when they were conquered by the Heremonians, as explained in the notes on Tir Eogain, Tir Conaill and Orgiall. It may be observed here, that the colonies of Firbolgs, Danans and Milesians, were all originally Scythians or Celto-Scythians, and all spoke dialects of the same language, namely, the Celtic, which was also the language of the ancient Gauls and Britons. From the Milesians, called also Seoti or Scots, as above explained, Ireland got the name of Scotia; and when a colony of the Milesian Scots from Ireland, in the beginning of the third century, under an Irish prince named Cairbre Riada, settled in that part of North Britain which was called by the Irish Alba and Albain, and by the Romans Caledonia, and conquered the Picts and Caledonians, they became kings of the country, and gave it the name of Scotia or Scotland, and from the ancient Scottish kings of Irish Milesian race were descended the kings of Scotland and the royal house of Stewart. Besides those already enumerated, Ireland is mentioned under various names; by the Greeks it was called Ierne, signifying the sacred Isle, as it was a great seat of Druidism, by the Romans Hibernia, and by Plutarch Ogygia, which signifies the ancient land; in the Christian times it got the name Insula Sanctorum or the Island of Saints.

The Firbolgs having assisted the Milesians against the Danans, were restored in a great measure to their former possessions, and were located chiefly in Connaught, which was ruled over for many centuries by Firbolg kings. According to Charles O'Connor, in his Dissertations, the Cruithnidl or Picts were in early times settled at Moy Naoi or Magh-Aoi, a territory which comprised the central parts of Roscommon, and were probably some of the colony of Picts from North Britain, who had settled in Ulster, in the present counties of Down and Antrim, as explained in the note on Dalaradia. Gennan, one of the earliest of the Firbolg kings, had Connaught. Meava, the celebrated queen of Connaught already mentioned, was married to Oiloll Fionn, a king of the Damnonian or Firbolg race, and after she had reigned over Connaught for ninety-eight years, died in the one-hundred-and-twentieth year of her age, about the beginning of the Christian era, as stated in O'Flaherty's Ogygia (v. ii. p. 156.) In the first century the Firbolgs, having formed a conspiracy to seize on the monarchy, invited the Milesian kings and chiefs to a great assembly and feast in Connaught, and having massacred a vast number of the chiefs, they seized upon the sovereignty, and set up one of their own race as monarch of Ireland, named Cairbre Ceann Cait, or Carby Cat Head, so called, it is said, from his ears resembling those of a cat. The place where the Milesian chiefs were massacred was called Magh Cru, signifying the field of blood, and is supposed to have been near Lough Con in Mayo. Cairbre Ceann Cait reigned from A.D. 90 to 95. About thirty years after the first insurrection of the Firbolgs, a second revolt took place, in which, assisted by the people of Ulster of the Clanna Rory, the Heremonians were defeated in a great battle, and the monarch Fiacha Finioladh was slain, A.D. 126, and Elim, king, of Ulster of the race of Ir, was made monarch. The Firbolgs engaged in these rebellions are called by the ancient annalists Athach Tuatha, signifying according to Dr. O'Connor the giant race, or according to O'Reilly, in his Dictionary, the plebeians. This word has been anglicised into Attacots, and the revolts of the Firbolgs are called by different writers the Attacotie wars.—Tuathal Teachtnar, or Tuathal the Acceptable, son of the monarch Fiacha Finioladh, was forced to fly from the kingdom to North Britain, but returned A.D. 130, and regained the kingdom from the Firbolgs. Tuathal is celebrated as one of the greatest of the Irish monarchs for his wisdom and valour. On his return to Ireland, he landed at Iorras Domhan, now Erris in Mayo, and, collecting his forces, defeated the Firbolgs in many battles in Connaught, as those of Dunha Sealgá, in Magh-Ai, a plain in Roscommon; also at the battle of Orhsen near Lough Corrib in Galway, in which Amergin the chief of the Firbolgs was slain; in the battles of Umhall, now the barony of Marrisk, in Cerra, and at Cruachan Aichle, now Croagh Patrick, all in Mayo; and at Magh Sleaght in Brefney, now Fenagh in the county of Leitrim, and many others, having according to the old annalists fought altogether eighty-five battles for the recovery of the crown. The battle of Magh Cruimhe. Lughaidh Mac Con, a valiant prince of the race of Ith, having been expelled from Munster by Oiloll Olum, who became king of Munster, and being banished to son of Hugh Brefsnach, went in pursuit of his plundered property, and overtook the sons of Ualgarg O'Rourke, on which a fierce engagement ensued, in which Donal O'Rourke, one of the worthiest heirs to the lordship of Brefsnach, and many others, were slain, and Gilcreest O'Rourke and Mac Consnamha were taken prisoners, after the defeat of their people. Teige, son of Rode-

Britain, projected an invasion of Ireland, and, assisted by the Britons and other foreign auxiliaries under the command of Beine Briot, or Beine the Briton, who was one of the most famous warriors of that age, and son of the king of Wales, landed a powerful army in Galway. Art, monarch of Ireland, aided by Oilíoll Olum, king of Munster, who was his brother-in-law, and by Forga, king of Connaught, collected their forces, and fought a great battle, long celebrated by the Irish annalists as most fierce and bloody, in which the foreigners were at length victorious. In this battle the monarch Art was slain, together with Forga, king of Connaught, and also seven out of the nineteen sons of Oilíoll Olum, who were commanders in that engagement. After this victory Lughaidh Mac Con became monarch of Ireland. The battle of Moyvriunhe or Muerom, was fought A. D. 250, according to O'Flaherty, near Athenry, about eight miles from Galway. The head of king Art was cut off after the battle, near a brook or pool, which from that circumstance was called Turloch Airt, a name which O'Flaherty says it retained to his own day, and was situated between Moyvola and Killeornan.

In the third century Cormac, monarch of Ireland, the son of the monarch Art, attacked Aodh or Hugh, the Firbolg king of Connaught, who had incurred his resentment, and according to O'Flaherty totally defeated his forces in the battle of Magh Aoi in Roscommon, upon which the sovereignty of Connaught was taken from the Damnonians, and transferred to the Milesians of the race of Eireuon. This Aodh or Hugh, the last king of the Firbolgs, was son of Garad, and succeeded Lughaidh, the son of Firtri, as king of Connaught, and was descended from Goll, the son of Morna, the famous warrior, who was chief of the Clanna Morna, celebrated warriors in Connaught. Cairbre Liffeachair, the son of Cormac, succeeded his father as monarch of Ireland, and Fiach, son of Cairbre, surnamed Srabhtene, from Dun Srabhtene, in Connaught, where he was nurtured, became king of Connaught, and afterwards monarch of Ireland from A. D. 296, to A. D. 327. Muireadhach Tireach, or Murroch the Patriot, son of king Fiach, succeeded as king of Connaught, and was also monarch of Ireland, from A. D. 331 to A. D. 357. Eochaidh Muighmeadhoin, son of Muireadhach Tireach, became king of Connaught, and was also monarch of Ireland from A. D. 358 to A. D. 366.

Saint Patrick, in the course of his mission in Connaught, as already stated in the note on Brefsnach, and as given in his life by Jocelin the monk, and in the tripartite life by Colgan, quoted in O'Flaherty's Ogygia, having thrown down the temple of the Druids at Moysleacht in Brefsnach, now Fenagh in Leitrim, on which occasion he destroyed the great idol called Crom Crnach, worshipped as a deity by the Druids, and which was made of a large pillar stone, having its head formed of gold and silver, and surrounded with twelve inferior brazen idols, crossed the Shannon, and proceeding onwards into Connaught, came near the royal palace at Cruachan, where he met the two princesses, Ethne and Feidhlíminna, daughters of Laoghaire, then monarch of Ireland, whom he converted to the Christian faith. In O'Flaherty's Ogygia (vol. ii. pp. 293, 295), it is stated that six of the sons of Bryan, king of Connaught, were converted and baptised, together with many of the people, on the plain of Moysleach, in Roscommon, and that he erected a church, called Domhnach Mor, that is, the great church, on the banks of Lough Sealga, now Lough Hacket, and that on three pillar stones which had been raised there in the ages of idolatry, he had the name of Christ inscribed in three languages, on one of them Jesus, on the second Soter, and on the third Salvator, with a cross over each, and also that Ono, a grandson of Bryan, king of Connaught, made a present to St. Patrick of his palace, called Inleach Ona, where St. Patrick founded the episcopal see of Oilfinn or Elphin, which obtained its name from a spring well the saint had sunk there, and on the margin of which was erected a large stone; and thus from Oil, which means a stone or rock, and finn, which signifies fair or clear, the name Oilfinn or Elphin was derived, which meant the rock of the limpid water. O'Flaherty states that this stone continued there till his own time, A. D. 1675, when it fell, on the 9th of October, and the well was inclosed, attended with some remarkable circumstances, of which O'Flaherty gives a curious account.

Connaught, in the seventh century, is described as follows, in the poem called the Itinerary of Ireland, composed by Alfred, king of Northumberland, who had been educated in Mayo, and a translation of this poem was made by the translator of these Annals, from which is taken the following passage:

"I found in Conacht, famed for justice,
Affluence, milk in abundance,
Hospitality, lasting vigour, fame,
In this territory of Cruachan of heroes."

In the ninth and tenth centuries Connaught was often ravaged by the Danes and Norwegians, who destroyed its towns, abbeys, colleges, and churches.

Eochaidh Muighmeadhoin, as already stated, was king of Connaught and monarch of Ireland, about the middle of the fourth century. He was a lineal descendant of Con Ceadeathach, or Con of the Hundred Battles, monarch of Ireland in the second century, of the race of Heremon. The name Muighmeadhoin, pronounced Moyvone, is derived from Muighe, the genitive case of Magh, a plain, and meadhoin, a cultivator; hence the name has been translated by Dr. O'Connor, in his publication of the Annals of the Four Masters, Eochus camporum Cultor, that is, Eochy the cultivator of plains.

Brian, one of the sons of Eochy Moyvone, who became king of Connaught, and was killed in a battle at Damhcluan in Galway, A. D. 403, was progenitor of the race called Hy Briuin or Hy Briune, signifying the descendants of Brian. This Brian had twenty-four sons, and his posterity possessed the greater part of Connaught. Of the Hy Briuin race were the O'Conors, kings of Connaught; the O'Rourkes, princes of West Brefsnach, or Leitrim; the O'Reillys, princes of East Brefsnach, or Cavan; the Mac Dermotts, princes of Moylurg in Roscommon; the Mac Donaghs, lords of Corran and Tirrill in Sligo; the Mac Oiraghtys, sometimes styled head chiefs of Siol Murray, and lords of Clan Tomaltach, &c. in Roscommon; the O'Malleys, lords of Umalia in Mayo; the O'Flahertys, lords of West Connaught in Galway; the O'Brenans or Mac Brenans, the O'Beirnes, the O'Donnellans, O'Flynn's, O'Flanagan's, O'Fennaghtys, O'Concans, O'Monaghans, O'Murrays, O'Hanleys, and O'Hallorans, Mac Manus's, chiefs in Roscommon and Galway; the O'Malones, chiefs in Westmeath; the Mac Consnamhas or Fords, chiefs of Muintir Kenny in Leitrim; the Mac Gaurans, Mac Tiarnans or Mac Kernans, the Mac Bradys, O'Sheridans, and some other chiefs and clans in Cavan; also the Mac Hughes, O'Crollys, O'Bresleins, Mac Egans, O'Creans, O'Finnegans, O'Callinans, O'Finn's, O'Fays, O'Devlins, O'Callanans, and some other clans in Ulster and Connaught. From Fiachra, another son of Eochy Moyvone, were descended the race of Hy Fiachra, as the O'Dowds, O'Heynes, O'Clerys, O'Shaughnesseys, and other chiefs in Sligo, Mayo, and Galway, of whom accounts are given in the present article, and in the note on North Connaught.

Niall Naoi Ghiallach, or Niall of the Nine Hostages, monarch of Ireland in the latter end of the fourth and beginning of the fifth century, was another son of Eochy Moyvone. Niall was a celebrated warrior, and made frequent expeditions against the Romans in Gaul and Britain, in one of which he was killed in Gaul, on the banks of the Loire, A. D. 406. From Niall of the Hostages were descended the Hy Niall race, for many centuries kings of Ulster and Meath, and monarchs of Ireland: They were divided into two great branches, the north and south Hy Nialls; the head of the southern Hy Nialls being the O'Melaghlins, kings of Meath, rick, son of Cathal O'Connor, whom O'Rourke had in prison, was set at liberty in exchange for the liberation of Gilcreest O'Rourke.

Hugh, son of Felim O'Connor, was taken prisoner by the king of Connaught, and sent for confinement to the castle of Roscommon, in consequence of which a great contention and commotion arose between O'Connor and Mac Dermott, of whom an account has been given in the note on Meath; and the head of the northern Hy Nialls being the O'Neills, princes of Tyrone and kings of Ulster, and the O'Donnells, princes of Tírconnell, of whom accounts have been given in the notes on Tír Eogain and Tír Conaill. Thus from Brian, Fiachra, and Niall, the three sons of the monarch Eochy Moysone, were descended the kings and chiefs of the ancient kingdoms of Meath, Ulster, and Connaught.

The Siol Muiredhaigh, or Siol Murray, so called as the descendants of Muiredach Muilleathan, a king of Connaught in the latter end of the seventh century, who died A. D. 700, and a descendant of the above-named Brian, king of Connaught, became the chief branch of the Hy Briune race, and possessed the greater part of Connaught, but were chiefly located in the territory now forming the county of Roscommon; and hence the term Siol Murray was applied to that territory.

The O'Conors, who became kings of Connaught, were the head chiefs of Siol Murray, and took their name from Conchobhar or Conor, who was a king of Connaught in the tenth century. The name Ua Conchobhair, pronounced Concoovar, is derived from Cu or Con, which figuratively signifies a warrior, and Cobhair, aid; hence it signifies a helping warrior. Teige, king of Connaught, in the beginning of the eleventh century, who died A. D. 1030, and was called Tadhg an eich ghil, or Teige of the White Steed, was the first who took the name of O'Connor, from Concovar or Conor, his grandfather, king of Connaught. Between the fourth and eighth centuries fourteen of the race of Hy Fiachra were kings of Connaught, as already stated in the note on North Connaught; and two or three of the O'Rourkes are styled kings of Connaught in the tenth century, in the Annals of the Four Masters. With these exceptions, the ancestors of the O'Conors of the race of Hy Briune and Siol Murray, and the O'Conors themselves, held the sovereignty of Connaught from the fifth to the fifteenth century, for a period of more than a thousand years, and two of them became monarchs of Ireland in the twelfth century, namely, Torlogh, and his son, Roderick O'Connor, who was the last Milesian monarch of Ireland. Torlogh O'Connor, called Toirdhealbhach Mor, or Torlogh the Great, was a valiant monarch, and celebrated for his magnificence, and is called by the Annalists the "Augustus of western Europe." He was many years king of Connaught, and afterwards monarch of Ireland for twenty years, from A. D. 1136 to 1156. He died at Dunmore, in Galway, according to O'Flaherty's Ogygia (vol. ii. p. 386), on the 19th of May, A. D. 1156, in the 68th year of his age, and was buried at Clonmacnois. As stated by O'Flaherty, O'Halloran, and others, after having distributed his precious household furniture, his gold and silver vases, goblets, gems, jewels, musical instruments, chess-boards, his studs of horses, military weapons, &c., he bequeathed to the cathedral of Clonmacnois and other churches, 540 ounces of pure gold, and 60 marks of silver, with gold and silver chalices and crosses. He was buried at the north side of the great altar in the cathedral of St. Kieran, having directed by his will that his favourite horse, arms, bow, and quiver, should be deposited at Clonmacnois. Roderick O'Connor, his son, was the last Milesian monarch of Ireland, and after having reigned eighteen years, abdicated the throne A. D. 1184, in consequence of the English invasion, and retired to the monastery of Cong in Mayo, where, after a religious seclusion of thirteen years, he died, on Sunday, the 27th of November, A. D. 1198, in the 82nd year of his age, and was buried in the same sepulchre with his father, in the cathedral of Clonmacnois. In the first volume of O'Connor's Rer. Hib. Scrip. it is stated that he bequeathed gold, silver, and many other valuable things, for the service of God, to the poor, to the churches of Ireland, and those of Rome and Jerusalem. According to Dr. O'Connor, king Torlogh O'Connor was thrice married; his first wife was Taltenia, daughter of Murtogh O'Melaghlin, king of Meath; his second was Dervorgilla, daughter of Donald O'Melaghlin, prince of Meath; and his third was Duvcola, daughter of Mulrooney Mac Dermott, prince of Moylurg. By his last wife he had a son, Cathal Croydearg O'Connor, the famous king of Connaught, so often mentioned in the course of these Annals. The O'Conors, kings of Connaught, had royal residences at Cruachan, near Elphin, and at Chuan Fraoich, near Tulsk, in Roscommon; also at Dunmore in Galway, and at Cong in Mayo, and many castles in various parts of Connaught. The ancient kings of Connaught were inaugurated at Cruachan, near Elphin, but it appears from these Annals that in after times the O'Conors were inaugurated as kings of Connaught at the hill of Carn Fraoich, near Tulsk, in Roscommon. The O'Conors held their rank as kings of Connaught down to the reign of Elizabeth, in the sixteenth century, and many celebrated and valiant princes and chiefs of them are constantly mentioned in the course of these Annals. In the Memoirs of Charles O'Connor of Belenagar, it is stated, that in the latter end of the fourteenth century the two head chiefs of the O'Conors, namely, Torlogh Roe, and Torlogh Donn, having contended for the lordship of Siol Murray, agreed to divide the territory between them. The families descended from Torlogh Donn called themselves O'Conors Donn, or the Brown; and the descendants of Torlogh Roe called themselves O'Conors Roe, or the Red. The present head of the O'Conors, a lineal descendant from Cathal Croydearg O'Connor, the celebrated king of Connaught in the thirteenth century, is the O'Connor Donn, namely, Dennis O'Connor, of Belenagar, M.P. for the county of Roscommon. Another branch of the O'Conors, as already stated in the note on North Connaught, got great possessions in the county of Sligo, and were styled the O'Conors Sligo.

The O'Conors are thus designated in the topographical poem of O'Dugan, written in the fourteenth century:—

"Riogha na sluagh na senaidh
A Cruachain moir min fheurruigh,
Nir tubhadh thall a d-toradh
Do bhunadh elann Conchubhair.

Duthaidh don t-siol so seach caeh
Siol Muiredhaigh na maol rath,
Fíne fuaidha da faire
Ríghé Cruachna clothaidhe."

"The kings of the hosts refuse nought
To great Cruachan of the fair grassy plains,
Which did not refuse abundant fruits
To the tribe of Clan Conor.

The undisputed patrimony of this race,
Was Siol Murray of the broad mounds,
A warlike tribe defended
The illustrious kings of Cruachan."

The O'Conors are at the present day very numerous, and many highly respectable families of the name exist in Connaught.

Several of the O'Conors, of whom an account is given in the subsequent part of the present article, were eminent literary men, and particularly distinguished in Irish literature.

The following chiefs and clans in Roscommon and Galway, and the territories possessed by them in the twelfth century, have been collected as follows from O'Dugan's Topography, and other sources: 1. Mac Diarmada or Mac Dermott. The name Diarmada is derived by O'Brien in his Irish Dictionary from Dia, a god, and arnaid, the genitive plural of arm, arms, the word thus signifying figuratively a great warrior. The Mac Dermotts derive their descent from the same ancestor as the O'Conors, kings of Connaught, namely, from Teige of the White Steed, king of Connaught in the and great devastations were committed on both sides. O'Connor experienced great danger and distress from the attacks made on him by Mac Dermott as far as Corran, and from thence was forcibly driven to Ballymote, after which they concluded a peace with each other.

Jordan Roe Mac Costello (in Mayo), was slain by Cathal Mac Dermott Gall.

eleventh century, as above stated, and therefore are a branch of the O'Conors. This Teige had a son named Maolruanaidh, the progenitor of the Mac Dermotts; hence their tribe name was Clan Maolruanaidh or Clan Mulrooney. Diarmaid, grandson of Mulrooney, was the head of the clan in the twelfth century, and died A. D. 1165, and from him they took the name of Mac Dermott. The Mac Dermotts had the title of princes of Moylurg, Tir Oilill, Tir Tuathail, Airteach, and Clan Cuain.

Moylurg, called Magh Luirg au Daghdha, in O'Dugan, signifies the Plain of the Track of Daghdha, and got its name from Daghdha, one of the Tuath De Danan kings. This territory comprised the Plains of Boyle, in the county of Roscommon, consisting of some of the finest lands in Ireland, and famous for their fertility and beauty. Tir Oilill is now the barony of Tirerrill in Sligo. Airteach, a district in Roscommon, near Lough Gara, on the borders of Sligo and Mayo. Clan Cuain was a district in the north of the barony of Carra, county of Mayo. Tir Tuathail was a district in the barony of Boyle, bordering on Leitrim and Sligo, towards Lough Allen; thus Mac Dermott's territories comprised the present barony of Boyle, in the county of Roscommon, together with Tirerrill in Sligo, and Clan Cuain in Mayo at Castlebar, which comprised the present parishes of Islandeady, Turlough, and Breaffy. In the topographical poem of O'Dugan, written in the fourteenth century, the Mac Dermotts are thus designated:—

"Clanna Maoilruana an raith
Slogh foisteanaich fíochathlamh
Glan a m-buid da ta gach dreach
Magh Luirg aca agus Airteach.

Tir Oililla is Tir Tuathail
Ar n-dul sios tar sean Chruachain
Ni dith dine an rann re radh
Crich fear tire is Clann Chuan.

Tir Neachtain is Tir n-Enda
Saoirse iad gan Aithmhela
Fir fhialboga do glac goil
Do Mac Diarmada as duthaidh."

"The clan of Mulrooney of prosperity
The host of good order but fierce and active,
Polished are their tables of various colours,
They possess Moylurg and Artagh.

Tirerrill and Tirtohill,
After passing northward of ancient Croaghan,
Numerous the tribes of whom we treat,
They governed Firtire and Clan Cuan,

With the lands of Naghtan and of Enda.
They are freemen without sorrow,
They are mild men of hospitality and valour,
Such is the inheritance of the Mac Dermotts."

The Mac Dermotts had their chief fortress at the Rock of Lough Key, on an island in Lough Key near Boyle, and they held the high and honourable office of hereditary marshals of Connaught, the duties attached to which were to raise and regulate the military forces, and to prepare them for battle as commanders-in-chief, also to preside at the inauguration of the O'Connors as kings of Connaught, and to proclaim their election. Many valiant chiefs of the Mac Dermotts are mentioned in the course of these Annals from the twelfth to the sixteenth century, and several of them distinguished for their religion, bravery, hospitality and patronage of learned men. They held their rank as lords of Moylurg down to the reign of Elizabeth, and considerable possessions down to the period of the Cromwellian wars, when their estates were confiscated; but it is a singular fact, that of all the Milesian chiefs, the Mac Dermotts alone have retained their title of prince, as the Mac Dermott is to this day recognised as prince of Coolavin in the county of Sligo, holding a part of the hereditary possessions of his ancestors. There are several respectable families of the Mac Dermotts in Connaught at the present day, particularly the families of Coolavin in Sligo, and of Mae Dermott Roe of Alderford in Roscommon. The Mac Donoghs, of whom an account has been given in the note on north Connaught, were a branch of the Mac Dermotts, and lords of Tirerrill and Corran in Sligo. It may be observed that O'Dugan gives the following as the ancient chiefs of Moylurg before the time of the Mac Dermotts; he designates them as:—

"The ancient chiefs of Moylurg of abundance
Mac Eoach (or Mac Keogh) Mac Maon the great,
And Mac Riabhaidh (or Mac Revy) the efficient forces."

II. O'Ceallaigh or O'Kelly. The name O'Ceallaigh is derived from Ceallach, a warrior, and was taken from one of their ancestors, Ceallach, a celebrated chief in the ninth century. The O'Kellys are a branch of the Clan Colla of Orgiall in Ulster, and of the same descent as the Maguires, lords of Fermanagh, the Mac Mahons, lords of Monaghan, the O'Hanlons, chiefs of Oirior in Armagh, and some other clans of whom an account has been given in the note on Orgiall. In the fourth century, Maine Mór, or Maine the Great, a chief of the Clan Colla, having collected his forces in Orgiall, on the borders of the present counties of Tyrone, Monaghan and Armagh, marched to Connaught, and having conquered a colony of the Firbolgs who possessed the territory called Magh Seachnoile, expelled the Firbolgs; and to that territory, which was possessed by his posterity, he gave the name of Hy Maine, which has been latinised to Hy Mania and I-Mania. This extensive territory comprised, according to O'Flaherty and others, a great part of south Connaught in the present county of Galway, and was afterwards extended beyond the river Suck to the Shannon, in the south of Roscommon, and comprehended the baronies of Ballymoe, Tiaquin, Killian, and Kilconnel, with part of Clonmacnoon in Galway, and the barony of Athlone in Roscommon. The O'Kellys were styled princes of Hy Maine, and their territory was called O'Kelly's country. Hy Mania is thus described by O'Dugan:—

"Moirthrian Chonnaicht an clarr sin,
Ui Maine na mordhail sin,
O Shionainn sreabha sidlie,
Go Cnoc Meadh na morrighe."

"A great division of Connaught is that plain,
Of Hy Maine of vast assemblies,
Extending from the Shannon of fairy streams
To Cnoc Meadh of the great kings."

According to the Dissertations of Charles O'Connor, the O'Kellys held the office of high treasurers of Connaught, and the Mac Dermotts that of marshals. Several celebrated chiefs of the O'Kellys are mentioned in the course of these Annals from the tenth to the sixteenth century, and amongst these Tadhg or Teige O'Kelly, one of the commanders under Bryan Boroinmhe at the battle of Clontarf. The O'Kellys had castles at Aughrim, Garbally, Gallagher, Monivea, Moylough, Mullaghmore, and Aghrane, now Castle-Kelly in the county of Galway, and at Athlone, Athleague, Corbeg, Galy and Skryne in the county of Roscommon. The chiefs of the O'Kellys, according to some accounts, were inaugurated at Clontuskert, about five miles from Eyre-court in the county of Galway, and held their rank as princes of Hy Maine to the reign of Elizabeth. There are still many highly respectable families of the O'Kellys in Galway, Roscommon, and other parts of Connaught.

III. Mac Oireachtaigh or Mac Oiraghty, a name anglicised Mac Geraghty or Geraghty, descended from the same stock as Cathal Mac Dermott Gall, the best man of his race in his time, in valour, in feats of arms, in sway, and in generosity, was slain by Donogh the O'Conors, kings of Connaught. The name is derived from Oireacht, a territory, hence Oireachtach signifies the man of the territory. They are thus designated in O'Dugan's poem :—

“ Ag Mae Oireachtaigh na n-each,
Muintir Roduibh na righbhreath,
Triath naech iodhalta os eoill euir.”

“ Mae Oiraghty of the steeds was the ruling chief,
Of Muintir Roduiv of rightful laws,
A fearless warrior as he ranged the woods.”

In the Annals at A. D. 1241, Mae Oiraghty is mentioned as chief of Clan Tomaltaigh, and at 1278, as head chief of Siol Murray. The districts of Clan Tomaltaigh and Muintir Roduiv, were situated in the barony of Rosecommon, county of Rosecommon, and the term Siol Murray was applied to the central parts of the county of Rosecommon. Several distinguished chiefs of the Mae Oiraghtys are mentioned in the course of the Annals, and in the sixteenth century, when deprived of their territories, some of the clan settled in Mayo and Sligo, and are to this day the chief possessors of the island of Inis Murray, off the coast of Sligo; their having, it is said, given name to the island from their former title as head chiefs of Siol Murray, and are still governed by a chief of the tribe. As a remarkable circumstance connected with the Mae Oiraghtys who reside at Croagh Patrick in Mayo, an antique bell is kept by them, and is traditionally stated to have been one of those used by St. Patrick. At A. D. 1297 in these Annals, an account is given of Henry Mac Oiraghty, who was bishop of Achoury, and afterwards of Derry and of Conor; and David Mac Oiraghty, who was archbishop of Armagh, died A. D. 1343. One of the chief representatives of this ancient and respectable clan is Mr. Bryan Geraghty, of Anglesea-street, Dublin, the publisher of these Annals.

IV. O'Fionnachta or O'Feenaghtys, chiefs of Clan Conmaigh and Clan Mureladhla, districts in the two half baronies of Ballymoe, in the counties of Rosecommon and Galway. Two distinct chiefs of the O'Feenaghtys are given by O'Dugan, one of Clan Murrogh and the other of Clan Conway, the former being designated “chiefs of Clan Murrogh of the champions.” O'Feenaghty, chiefs of Clan Conway had their castle at Dunamon, near the river Suek, in the county of Rosecommon. Several chiefs of the O'Feenaghtys are mentioned in the course of these Annals, and there are still several respectable families of the name in Connaught; and it is stated by some old authorities, that the O'Feenaghtys, as a head branch of the Siol Murray, had the privilege of drinking the first cup at every royal feast. V. O'Fallamhain or O'Fallons, chiefs of Clan Uadach, a district in the barony of Athlone, county of Rosecommon, comprising the parishes of Cam and Dysart, and had a castle at Milltown. The O'Fallons were originally chiefs in Westmeath near Athlone. Several chiefs of the O'Fallons are mentioned in the course of the Annals. By O'Dugan they are designated in terms which may be thus translated :—

“ The O'Fallons, who marched with every force,
Were chiefs of Clan Uadach of wine banquets,
Men who let not their spears decay,
Of those are the freeborn clans.”

VI. O'Birn or O'Beirnes, chiefs of Mura O'Mannachain, otherwise called Tir Briuin-na-Sionna or Tir Briune of the Shannon. This territory lay along the Shannon in the barony of Ballintobber, in Rosecommon, comprising the parishes of Kilmore of the Shannon, Cloonaff, Aughrim and Kilumod, extending nearly to Elphin. VII. O'Mannachain or O'Monnaghain, was also a chief on the same territory as O'Beirne. Several chiefs of the O'Beirnes and O'Monnaghans are mentioned in the course of the Annals, and it is to be observed that these O'Beirnes are of a different race from the O'Byrnes of Wicklow. They are thus designated by O'Dugan :—

Riavach, the son of Malachy Carrach Mac Dermott, at Lios Scalbhaidh,² in Clan Conor (in Rosecommon).

“ Brave are the defending tribe of Muintir Beirne,
In the fortresses of O'Monaghan,
By strength, by shouts of war and valour,
The country which they conquered still they hold.”

VIII. O'Hainlidhe or O'Hanleys, chiefs of Kinel Dobhtha, a large district in the barony of Ballintobber, county of Rosecommon, along the Shannon. It formed part of the Three Tuatha or three districts. The O'Hanleys were chiefs of note, and many of them are mentioned in the course of these Annals. IX. Mac Branain or Mac Brennan, sometimes made O'Brennan, and O'Mailnichil or O'Mulvihil, sometimes anglicised to Mulville and Mitchell. The Mac Brennans and O'Mulvihils, were chiefs of Corea Achlan, a large district adjoining Kinel-Dobhtha, in the barony of Rosecommon. This district formed part of the Tuatha in which was situated the Sliev Baun Mountain. The O'Hanleys, Mac Brennans and O'Mulvihils, including O'Beirne and O'Monaghan, are thus designated in O'Dugan's poem :—

“ Let us remember the three Tuatha,
The skilful forces of fair Cruachan,
Let us not conceal their fine appearance,
Let us name their three lords,

Brave are the defending tribe of Muintir Beirne,
In the fortresses of O'Monaghan.

Efficient is the power of the Clan Brennan,
And also of the noble Mulmihil,
They command the strong forces
Of Corea Achlan of the herds.

An estate is possessed by the forces of sharp weapons,
Kinel Dobhtha who are compact and brave;
My affection for them is in my heart;
They are the clan of O'Hanley.”

X. O'Flannagain, or O'Flanagans, chiefs of Clan Cathail, a territory in the barony of Rosecommon, north of Elphin. O'Maolmordha; O'Carthaidh, or O'Carthy; and O'Mughiroin, were also subordinate chiefs of Clan Cathail. Many distinguished chiefs of the O'Flanagans are mentioned in the course of the Annals, and are thus designated by O'Dugan :

“ Above all remember Clan Cathail,
From their many chiefs in continued succession;
Their meritorious deeds I therefore recite
Remember the nobility of Roduiv.

Four effective chieftains
Ruled over the Clan Cathail.
Kinsmen who have not been dispraised
Are these four whom we enumerate.

O'Flanagan, chief of the territory,
O'Mulmora whom I praise;
With cheerfulness they were still supported
By the blithe O'Carthy and O'Muroin.

XI. O'Maolbrennain, a name anglicised to O'Mulrenan, were chiefs of Clan Conchobhair, or Clan Conor, a district in the barony of Rosecommon, near Cruachan. Some chiefs of the O'Mulrenans occur in the course of the Annals, and at A. D. 1325 Dermot O'Mulbrenan is mentioned as Mananan, or head naval commander Manus, son of Cathal, son of Donal O'Conor, was slain by Cathal, son of Hugh Brefnach O'Conor.

Bryan Oge Mac Gauran was slain by the people of Tullyhunco (in Cavan).

of the chiefs of Connaught, and they are thus designated by O'Dugan:

"O'Mulbrenan of renown
Was chief of Clan Conor of the fertile plain;
Their men above all others I record,
They are of the tribe of Clan Cathail."

XII. O'Cathalain, chief of Clan Fogartaigh. O'Maonaigh, or O'Meeney, sometimes made O'Mooneys, were chiefs of Clan Murthuile. Clan Fogartaigh and Clan Murthuile were districts in Ballintobher, county of Roscommon. O'Cathalain and O'Mooney are thus mentioned in O'Dugan:

"O'Cathalain is the chartered chief
Of Clan Fogarty of the grassy plains,
And powerful are his conquering forces;
Chief of Clan Murthuile is O'Mooney."

XIII. O'Concanain, or O'Concannon, chief of Hy Diarmada, a district on the borders of Roscommon and Galway, in the baronies of Athlone and Ballymoe. The O'Concannons are thus mentioned in O'Dugan:

"The Hy Diarmada of protecting men,
Their heroes are kinsmen to kings;
Governor of the territory
Is O'Concanain, its undisputed chief."

XIV. Mac Murchadha, or Mac Murrough, sometimes anglicised to Mac Morrow, a chief of Clan Tomaltaigh, in Roscommon, of which Mac Oiraghty was head chief. XV. O'Floinn, or OFlynn, chief of Siol Maolruain, a large district in the barony of Ballintobher, county of Roscommon, in which lay Slieve Uí Fhloinn, or O'Flynn's mountain, and which comprised the parishes of Killkeevan and Kiltullagh, and also part of the parish of Ballynakill, in the barony of Ballymoe, county of Galway. O'Maolmuaidh, or O'Mulloy, is also given as a subordinate chief over Clan Taidhg, or Clan Teige, in the same district. They are thus designated by O'Dugan:

"The Siol Maolruain, and Clan Teige of prosperity,
A host of good order, fierce and active,
O'Mulloy and O'Flynn the hospitable;
The two tribes had a sufficient portion."

XVI. O'Rothlain, chiefs of Coill Fothaidh, a district on the borders of Roscommon and Mayo; they are thus mentioned by O'Dugan:

"O'Rothlain of Coill Fothaidh let us not omit, Chief of the whitestoned goilets and spears."

XVII. O'Sgaithgil, or Mac Sgaithgil, chief of Corca Mogha, a district which comprised the parish of Kilkeeran, in the barony of Killian, county of Galway. O'Broin, anglicised to Burns, was chief of Lough Gealgosa, a district adjoining Corca Mogha. XVIII. O'Talcharain, chief of Conmaicne Cuile, a district in the barony of Clare, county of Galway. XIX. O'Cadhlá, or O'Cawley, chief of Conmaicne Mara, now the barony of Ballynahinch in the county of Galway, and thus mentioned by O'Dugan:

"Chief of the great Conmaicne Mara
Was the head of the hospitable hosts."

XX. Mac Conroi, or Mac Conroy, chief of Gno Mor; and O'Haidhnidh, chief of Gno Beag, districts which lay along Owen O'Heyne, lord of Hy Fiachra Aidhne (in Galway), was slain by his own kinsmen.

Owen, son of Geoffrey Mac Rannall, and Hugh O'Maolmiadh, slew each other (in Leitrim).

the western banks of Lough Corrih, between that lake and the bay of Galway, in the barony of Moycullen, county of Galway. O'Dugan says—

"Mac Conroy possesses in peace
Gno Mor of the numerous harbours."

XXI. Mac Aodha, or Mac Hugh, chief of Clan Cosgraidh, a district on the eastern side of Lough Corrih, thus designated by O'Dugan:

"The race of Mac Hugh on the eastern side
Of the extensive plain of Clan Cosgry,
An active host from the plain of Meadh,
Mild and hospitable are their tribes."

XXII. O'Flaithheartaigh or O'Flaherty, a name derived from Flaith, a chief or hero, and beartaigh, of great deeds; hence it may signify a chief of noble deeds. They are styled by O'Dugan, chiefs of Muintir Murchadha, now the barony of Clare, county of Galway. In the thirteenth century they were expelled from this territory by the English, and having settled on the other side of Lough Corrih, got extensive possessions there in the barony of Moycullen, and were styled lords of Iar Conacht, or West Connaught. Several distinguished chiefs of the O'Flahertys are mentioned in the course of the Annals, and they had the chief naval command about Lough Corrih, on the islands of which they had castles; they are thus designated by O'Dugan:

"Clan Murrough of the fortress of hospitality
Was governed by the Clan Flaherty of swords,
Who from the shout of battle would not flee.
To them belongs the regulation of the fair ports."

XXIII. O'Heidhin or O'Heyne, sometimes anglicised to Hynes. O'Heyne was styled prince of Hy Fiachra Aidhne, so called as being of the race of Hy Fiachra, of whom an account has been given in the previous part of this article, and also in the note on North Connaught. The territory of Hy Fiachra Aidhne, also called South Hy Fiachra, was co-extensive with the diocese of Kilmacdagh, and comprised the barony of Kiltartan, and parts of the baronies of Dunkellin and Loughrea, in the county of Galway. The O'Heynes were descended from Guaire Aidhne, a king of Connaught in the seventh century, who is celebrated by all the ancient annalists for his hospitality to all classes, and charity to the poor; hence it passed into a proverb, in speaking of an hospitable person, that he was "as generous as Guaire;" and the poets in their figurative language stated, that his right hand had become much longer than his left, in consequence of being constantly extended in giving charity. The O'Heynes were celebrated chiefs, and many of them are mentioned in the course of these Annals. They took their name from Eidhin, one of their chiefs in the tenth century, and Maolruanaidh O'Heyne, prince of Hy Fiachra, was a commander under Brian Boromh at the battle of Clontarf; and it may be remarked that Brian Boromh was married to Mor, the daughter of Flann, father of Maolruanaidh O'Heyne. XXIV. O'Seachnasáigh, or O'Shaughnessey, of the same descent as O'Heyne, and chief of Kinel Aodha, sometimes called Kinel Aodha-na-h-Echtge, that is Kinel Hugh of Echtge, a mountainous district on the borders of Galway and Clare. Kinel Hugh was a large district in the barony of Kiltartan, county of Galway. O'Cathail, or O'Cahal, of the race of Hy Fiachra, was also a chief of Kinel Hugh. XXV. Mac Giolla Ceallaigh or Mac Gilkelly, sometimes made Killikelly, also of the race of Hy Fiachra, and another chief of Aidhne. XXVI. O'Cleirigh or O'Clery, a name sometimes anglicised to Clarke, likewise of the race of Hy Fiachra, and chiefs in Aidhne, and sometimes styled chiefs of Hy Fiachra Finn. They took the name from Cleireach, one of their cele-

Philip O'Duigenan, chief professor of Conmaiene (in Leitrim), died.

William, son of Gilbert Mae Costello (of Mayo), brated chiefs in the tenth century. Many of these O'Clerys were highly distinguished in literature, and a branch of them having settled in Donegal, became bards and historians to the O'Donnells, princes of Tyrconnell, and were the authors of the Annals of the Four Masters, of which a full account has been given in the introduction to the present publication. Other branches of the O'Clerys settled in Brefney O'Reilly, or the county of Cavan. XXVII. O'Duibhgiolla, chief of Kinel Cinnamhna; Mae Fiachra, chief of Oga Beathra; O'Cathain, chief of Kinel Sedna; and O'Maghna, chief of Caenridhe, all chiefs in Aidhne. The chiefs of Aidhne are thus designated by O'Dugan:—

"Let us approach Aidhne of steeds,
And their noble chiefs of hospitality;
Let us trace their kings who are not few,
And treat of the host of the free clans.

We treat of Aidhne, a duty uncontroled,
We leave the tribes of Connaught;
We have melodiously sung of her nobles,
Let us record the chiefs of Ily Fiachra.

The noble clan of Mae Gikelly,
The O'Heynes of the sleek and slender steeds,
Whose defence and pride is the strength of their arms,
They are of the race of Guaire the Fair,
Good and hospitable is the chief
O'Clery of the same race.

Two other chiefs of Kinel Hugh,
O'Shaughnessey whom I will not shun,
Together with O'Cahal of the learned men,
Smooth are his fields, and fertile his mountain."

XXVIII. O'Madagain, or O'Madadhain, anglicised to O'Madden, chief of Síol Anmchadha, a name latinised to Silanchia, and which got its name from Anmchadh, one of their ancient chiefs. This territory comprised the present barony of Longford, in the county of Galway, and the parish of Lusmagh, on the other side of the Shannon, in the King's County. The O'Maddens are a branch of the Clan Colla, and of the same descent as the O'Kellys, princes of Ily Maine, and took their name from Madudan More, one of their ancient chiefs. The O'Maddens were chiefs of note, and many of them are mentioned in the course of these Annals. There are several respectable families of the name still in Connaught. The chief representatives of this ancient and respectable family are Sir Edward Madden, Librarian of the British Museum, London; and R. Madden, esq., M.D., an eminent literary man, author of "Travels in the East," "The United Irishmen," and other works. XXIX. O'Iluallachain, or O'Hoolaghan, sometimes anglicised O'Coulaghan and Mac Coulaghan, and also given by O'Dugan, as chiefs of Síol Anmchadha. O'Hoolaghan is thus designated by O'Dugan:

"A noble chief of lasting fame
Rules over the plain of the race of Anmcha,
A valiant rough-fettering warrior,
Of keen-edged weapons, is O'Hoolaghan."

XXX. O'Maolalaidh, or O'Mulally, sometimes made Lally. XXXI. O'Neachtain, or O'Naghten, sometimes made Norton. The O'Naghtens and O'Mulalleys are given by O'Dugan as the two chiefs of Maonmuighe, or Moenmoy, a territory which, according to O'Flaherty, got its name from Moen, one of the sons of Ugaine More, who was monarch of Ireland, more than three centuries before the Christian era. This territory was an extensive plain, comprising a great part of the present baronies of Loughrea and was slain in a plundering incursion in Brefney (county of Cavan), by the people of Tullaghaw.

Rory, son of Manus O'Hara, died.

Leitrim, in the county of Galway. The O'Naghtens and O'Mulalleys are branches of the Clan Colla, and of the same descent as the O'Kellys, princes of Ily Maine, and are thus designated by O'Dugan:

"The chiefs of Moenmoy of the champions,
Whose estate is the fertile plain,
Two who defend that district
Are O'Naghten and O'Mulally,
Their warfare is heavy in battles,
The land is theirs as far as Ily Fiachra."

Several chiefs of the O'Naghtens are mentioned in the course of these Annals; and there were also many respectable families of the name who had considerable possessions in the barony of Athlone, county of Rosecommon. The O'Mulalleys, when dispossessed of their ancient territory, settled at Tullach-na-Dala, near Tuam, where they had a castle. The head of the family having removed to France, a descendant of his became celebrated as an orator and statesman at the time of the French Revolution, and was known by the name count Lally Tollendal, taking his title from his ancient territory in Ireland. Several of the O'Naghtens were celebrated commanders in the Irish Brigade in France, and one of them was created marquis de Lally Tollendal, and a peer of France, by Napoleon. XXXII. O'Conaill, or O'Connell, given by O'Dugan as follows:

"O'Connell's portion of that country,
Of that delightful pleasant land,
From Grian to the great plain,
Whose hosts obey the noble chief."

Grian here mentioned was the name of a river on the borders of Clare, and the plain alluded to was Maenmoy; hence O'Connell's territory appears to have been parts of the barony of Leitrim in Galway, and of Tullagh in Clare. The O'Connells and Mac Eigans were marshals of the forces to the O'Kellys, princes of Ily Maine, and of the same descent as the O'Kellys. XXXIII. Mac Eideadhain or Mac Aodhlagain, anglicised Mac Eigans, were chiefs of Clan Diarmada, a district in the barony of Leitrim, county of Galway, and had a castle at Dun Doighre, now Duniry. The Mac Eigans were celebrated as Brehons in Connaught and also in Ormond, and many of them eminent literary men. They are thus mentioned by O'Dugan:—

"Precedence for his valour and fame
Be given to Mac Egan the noble.
Record him for the activity of his warriors,
Of his prosperity and great renown,
The Clan Diarmada north and south,
To place them in my poem is a duty."

XXXIV. Mac Giolla Fionnagain or O'Finnegans, a name sometimes rendered Finnucane; and O'Ciomaoith or O'Kenny, chiefs of Clan Laitheamhain or Fhlaitheamhain, called also Muintir Cionait, a district in the barony of Moyearn, county of Roscommon. They are thus mentioned by O'Dugan:—

"Mac Giolla Finnegan the mild,
And the valiant Clan Kenny,
Two tribes who are fair to be seen,
Rule over the brave Clan Fiahavan."

There are several respectable families of the O'Finnegans in Clare, who take the name of Finnucane, and of these was Mathias Mahon, son of Anaidh O'Reilly, was slain by Andrew, son of Bryan O'Reilly, who afterwards committed great depredations in the Bolgan (parish of Drumlane, county of Cavan).

Finnucane, one of the judges of the Common Pleas, who died in 1814. XXXV. O'Domhnallain or O'Donnellans, chiefs of Clan Breasail, a district in the barony of Leitrim, county of Galway. The O'Donnellans are thus mentioned by O'Dugan :—

"Noble the blood and achievements,
Of the O'Donnellans of handsome figure,
Rushing to the battle like a torrent,
Such are the yellow-haired Clan Breasail."

Some chiefs of the O'Donnellans are mentioned in the Annals; and at A. D. 1531, one of them is mentioned as chief of Machaire Maonmoy. There are still many respectable families of the O'Donnellans in Connaught, the chief of which is that of Ballydonnellan, between Ballinasloe and Loughrea, in the county of Galway. XXXVI. O'Donchadha or O'Donoghoe, chief of Clan Coruauic, a district in Moemumoy in Galway, which has been already defined. XXXVII. O'Duibhghind or O'Deighan, chief of the twelve Ballys or Townlands of O'Duibhghind, a district near Loughrea, in the county of Galway. XXXVIII. O'Docomlain, chief of Eidhghigh; and O'Gabhrain or O'Gauran, chief of Dal Druithne, districts about Loughrea. XXXIX. O'Maoilbrighde, or O'Mulbrides, or Mac Brides, chiefs of Magh Finn and of Bredach, a large district in the barony of Athlone, county of Roscommon, east of the river Suck. The O'Mulbrides are thus designated by O'Dugan :—

"Chief of the prosperous Magbfinn,
To which St. Bridget gave her blessing;
Still free are the warlike hosts
Of O'Mulbride the ever brave,
Good has he conferred on all men,
This noble chief of Bredach."

XL. O'Mainnin, or O'Mannin, or O'Mannings, chiefs of Sodhan, a large territory in the barony of Tiaquin, which was made into six divisions, called the six Sodhans. The O'Mannins had their chief residence at the castle of Clogher, barony of Tiaquin, county of Galway, and afterwards at Menlough, in the parish of Killascobe, in the same barony. The other chiefs given by O'Dugan on the six Sodhans, were Mac-an-Bhaird or Mac Wards; O'Sgurra or O'Scurrys; O'Leunan or O'Lennans; O'Casain or O'Cashins; O'Gialla or O'Giallain, rendered O'Gealans and Gillys; and O'Maigins, O'Migins, or O'Maginnis. The chiefs of Sodhan are thus mentioned by O'Dugan :—

"The six Sodhans let us not shun,
Their chiefs are not to be forgotten;
Brave are their predatory hosts,
To whom belonged the spear-armed Sodhans."

XLI. O'Cathail or O'Cahill; O'Mughroin or O'Moran; O'Maolruanaidh or O'Mulrooney, were the three chiefs of Crumthan, an extensive territory sometimes called Cruffon, comprising the barony of Killian, and part of Ballymoe, in the county of Galway. These chiefs are thus designated by O'Dugan :—

"O'Cahill and O'Murain the active,
O'Mulrooney of the splendid banquets,
Like trees which shelter the fertile land,
Are the chiefs of Crumthan of the woody plains."

XLII. O'Laodog or O'Laodhaigh, anglicised O'Leahy, chiefs of Caladh, a large district in the barony of Killconnell, county of Galway; they are thus mentioned by O'Dugan :—

"The O'Leahys are heroes I must mention,
They are chiefs of the extensive Caladh,
Men who have taken into their possession
Caladh of the Shannon of clear streams."

The church of Kilonan (in Roscommon), was burned.

Niall O'Higgin, a truly learned poet, was drowned.

The following chiefs and clans not given by O'Dugan are collected from various other sources: XLIII. The O'Dalys, a branch of the O'Donnells of Donegal, princes of Tircconnell, whose tribe name was Clan Dalaigh. The O'Dalys, it appears, settled in Connaught as early as the twelfth century, and accounts of many of them, very eminent as poets and learned men in Connaught, and also in Munster, and several of them distinguished ecclesiastics, are to be found in the Annals of the Four Masters, and in O'Reilly's Irish Writers, from the twelfth to the seventeenth century. The O'Dalys had large possessions in the counties of Galway and Roscommon, and there have been at various times many highly respectable families of the name in those counties. Of the O'Dalys of Connaught were Dennis Daly, one of the judges of the Common Pleas in the reign of James II., and St. George Daly, one of the barons of the Exchequer, and afterwards one of the justices of the King's Bench in the reigns of Geo. III. and Geo. IV. Of the same family is the Right Rev. Robert Daly, bishop of Cashel. XLIV. O'Coindealbhaigh, O'Conghiollain, O'Conniallain, O'Connallain, or O'Connellan. In the Annals of the Four Masters several of this family are mentioned in the tenth and eleventh centuries, as princes of Hy Laoghaire or Hy Leary, a large territory situated in the present counties of Meath and Westmeath, as already shown in the note on Meath. In O'Dugan's Topography, the prince of Hy Leary is thus designated :—

"O'Coindealbhaigh na cuire Rig laomsgairghlic Laoghaire."
"O'Connellan of the champions
Is the great and wise prince of Hy Leary."

Branches of this family, in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries settled in the counties of Roscommon, Galway, and Mayo, as already stated in the note on North Connaught, and are mentioned in these Annals at A. D. 1295, as a clan in Roscommon. At A. D. 1316, one of their chiefs is recorded as having been slain in the great battle of Athenry, who is also mentioned in the Annals of Clonmacnois, as having been a chief in the king's guards, that is, of O'Conor's, king of Connaught. Among various other notices of this ancient family, the translator of these Annals has been kindly favoured with the following by his friend Sir William Betham, Ulster King of Arms, &c. "Donogh Mac Shane O'Connellan, of Rahassan, had a grant of part of the lands of Rahassan, in the barony of Dunkellin, county of Galway, 27th March, 1619." "Dermott Mac Bryan Mac Dermott Roe of Legan, married Rose Connellan, and died 6th January, 1620, by whom he had a son Ferrall Mac Dermott Roe (The Mac Dermott Roe) at 6, 1620." Several eminent ecclesiastics of the name are given in the course of the Annals, among whom may be mentioned Abraham O'Connellan, archbishop of Armagh, and primate of all Ireland, in A. D. 1260; Carbreus O'Conghiollain, or O'Connellan, abbot of Kilkenny in A. D. 1038; Laurence O'Connellan, a native of Sligo, a Dominican friar, lecturer and superior of the Dominican monastery at Louvain, A. D. 1756, according to de Burgo's Hibernia Dominicana. Pedigrees of this clan are given in the Books of Leacan and Ballymote, and also in the Genealogical Book of the O'Clerys. One of the heads of this family is Peter Connellan, esq., deputy lieutenant for the county of Kilkenny. XLV. The O'Hallorans, given in O'Flaherty's Ugygia (vol. ii. p. 296.), as chiefs of Clan Fergaill, a large district on the east side of the river of Galway, near Lough Corrib. From these was descended O'Halloran the historian. XLVI. The O'Callanans and O'Canavans, mentioned by O'Flaherty as hereditary physicians in Galway. XLVII. The O'Dubhthaighs, or O'Duffys, families of note in Galway and Roscommon, and many of them learned men and eminent ecclesiastics, several of them having been archbishops of Tuam, and bishops in Elphin. XLVIII. The O'Briens, a branch of the O'Briens of Thomond, in the county of Conor O'Donnell, lord of Tirconnell, marched with his forces into Connaught.

A. D. 1341.

Murtogh Mac-an-Gobhann, abbot of Clochar,¹ died.

Clare, and lords of the Isles of Arran, off the coast of Galway, which they held from the thirteenth to a late period in the sixteenth century, and, as captains of the sea coasts, kept a large maritime force. XLIX. Mae Cnaimhlin, or Mac Nevins, according to the book of Leacan, chiefs of a district called Crannog Mac Cnaimhlin, or Crannagh Mac Nevin, in the parish of Tynagh, barony of Leitrim, and county of Galway; a chief of the name is mentioned in the Annals of the Four Masters, at A. D. 1159, as having been killed in a battle fought near Ardee in Orgiall, between Murtogh Mac Loughlin, chief of the northern Hy Nialls, and Roderick O'Connor, king of Connaught. There are still some respectable families of the Mac Nevins in the county of Galway. L. Mae Eochaidh, or Mac Keogh, a branch of the O'Kellys, chiefs of Omhlanach, now Onagh, in the parish of Taghmaconnell, in the barony of Athlone, county of Roscommon. There are still many respectable families of the Mac Keoghs, or Keoghs, in Connaught. LI. Mac Giolladuibh, or Mac Gilduffs, sometimes rendered Kilduffs, chiefs in Caladh, along with the O'Leahys, in the barony of Killeconnell, county of Galway. LII. The O'Lorcains, or O'Larkins; the O'Gebenaighs, or O'Gevennys; the O'Aireachtains, anglicised to Harrington; the O'Fahys, or O'Fays; O'Laidins, or O'Lanes; and the O'Horrans, all clans in Hy Maine, in the county of Galway. LIII. O'Cobhthaigh, or O'Coffeys, a branch of the O'Kellys, princes of Hy Maine, frequently mentioned in the course of these Annals, and also in the Books of Leacan and Ballymote, as a clan in Connaught: several of them were eminent ecclesiastics and learned men. The O'Coffeys possessed a large district in the barony of Clonmaenoon, county of Galway, and had their principal residence at a place called Tuam Cathraigh. There are several respectable families of this name in the counties of Galway and Roscommon. LIV. The Mac Manus; Mac Keons; O'Connings; and O'Ronans, clans in Roscommon.

Shortly after the English invasion, William de Burgo, and other Anglo-Norman leaders, led their forces into Connaught, and after fierce contests with the O'Connors and other chiefs, got possession of a considerable part of the country. From Richard, or Rickard de Burgo, a great part of the county of Galway got the name of Clanrickard, which comprised, according to Ware, the baronies of Clare, Dunkellin, Loughrea, Kiltartan, Athenry, and Leitrim. The de Burgos became the most powerful family in Connaught, and were its chief governors under the kings of England. They were styled lords of Connaught, and also became earls of Ulster; but on the death of William de Burgo, earl of Ulster, in the fourteenth century, and the marriage of his daughter, Elizabeth, to Lionel, duke of Clarence, son of King Edward III., his titles passed into the royal family of England, by whom they are still held; the dukes of York having the title of earls of Ulster, and the dukes of Gloucester that of earls of Connaught. In the beginning of the fourteenth century the heads of the two principal branches of the Burkes took the Irish name of Mac William, and adopted the Irish language and customs. Sir William, or Ulick Burke, the progenitor of the earls of Clanrickard, had great possessions in Galway and Roscommon, and took the name Mac William Eighter; and sir Edmond Burke, called Albanach, took the name Mac William Oughter, had large possessions in Mayo, and was ancestor the earls of Mayo.

In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries several English and Welsh families settled in the town of Galway, and other parts of the county; the principal of whom were the Athys, Berminghams, Blakes, Bodkins, Brownes, Blundels, Deanes, Dillons, Darcys, Frenches, Joyces, Kirwans, Lynches, Lawlesses, Morrisseyes, Martins, Whites, &c. It is to be observed that the O'Loinsighs, an-

Mac William Burke completely defeated the Clan Maurice (in Mayo), in which contest Thomas Mac Maurice, Maurice, son of Seonaig Roe, and seventy others of his men were slain.

Donal, Mac Dorehaidh, chief of Kinel Luachain (in Leitrim), died.

glised to O'Lynches, are also an Irish clan; and the O'Loinsighs are mentioned in the Annals in the tenth and eleventh centuries, as chiefs of Ulidia, now the county of Down. The O'Kerovans were also an Irish clan, and the name has been anglicised to Kirwan. The Mac Dorchys or O'Dorchys, were chiefs in Partry, in the county of Mayo, and also in Galway, and many of them anglicised the name to D'Arcy, and were considered to be of English descent. Patrick D'Arcy of Galway, a celebrated lawyer in the reign of Charles I., was one of the Irish O'Darchaidhs. The Martins of Galway, were considered by O'Brien, Vallancey, and others, to be of Firbolg origin, descended from the old race of the Fir Domnians, so frequently mentioned in the old annalists under the name of Mairtínigh, anglicised Martineans. The Joyces, or de Jorses, came from Wales to Galway in the reign of Edward I., and having formed alliances with the O'Flahertys, chiefs of west Connaught, got large possessions in Connemara in the barony of Ross, and towards the borders of Mayo, a large territory which is still called Joyces' Country, where they are very numerous to the present day, and many of them remarkable for immense strength of body and gigantic stature.

Galway was formed into a county in the reign of Elizabeth, by the lord deputy, sir Henry Sidney, A. D. 1565, and got its name from the chief town, called in Irish Gaillimh, pronounced Galliv, and anglicised Galway, which, according to O'Flaherty in his Ogygia, is said to have derived this appellation from the river Gaillimh, as the river derived its name from a woman called Gaillimh, who was drowned there in remote times. De Burgo in his Hibernia Dominicana, p. 322, says that Galway derived its name from the English colony which settled there in the thirteenth century, and from Gall, an Englishman or foreigner, he derives the word Gaillibh, signifying Locus Anglorum, or the place of the English; but de Burgo's derivation is very doubtful, and O'Flaherty's derivation appears more probable, as the place was called Gaillimh long before the thirteenth century. The name Galway is latinised Galivia and Galiva. The bay of Galway is considered to be the Ausoba of the Greek geographer Ptolemy, who wrote in the second century, and the town of Galway is supposed to be the ancient city called by Ptolemy Nagnata.

Roscommon was formed into a county in the reign of Elizabeth, by the lord deputy, sir Henry Sidney, and took its name from the town of Roscommon, which in Irish is Ros Comain, signifying the wood of Coman, and so called from St. Coman, who founded an abbey there in the sixth century.

The following have been the noble families in Galway and Roscommon since the reign of James I. In Galway, the de Burghs or Burkes, earls and marquesses of Clanrickard; the Burkes, viscounts of Galway, and barons of Brittas; the Berminghams, barons of Athenry; the Butlers, and Gores, earls of Arran; the de Massues and Monctons, viscounts of Galway; the le Poer Trenches, earls of Clancarty, viscounts Dunloe, and barons of Killeconnell; the Verekers, viscounts of Gort; the Dillons, barons of Clonbrock; the Frenches, barons French; the Browns, barons of Oranmore; the Blakes, barons of Wallscourt; the Trenches, barons of Ashtown. In Roscommon, the Dillons, earls of Roscommon; the Wilmots and de Ginkles, earls of Athlone; the Kings, viscounts Lorton; the Cootes, barons of Castlecoote; the Croftons, barons Crofton; the Mahons, barons Hartland; and the Sandfords, barons Mountsandford.

Ecclesiastical visions. The see of Roscommon. St. Coman founded in the sixth century an abbey, which was called from him Ros Comain; which afterwards became a bishop's see, and was united at an early period to the see of Elphin. Ardecarne. An abbey was founded at Ardecarne, in the barony of Donogh, son of Nicholas Mac Clancy (in Leirim) was slain by Hugh, son of Teige Mac Clancy.

O'Gormley, chief of Kinel Moain (in Donegal), died.

Cathal Mac Ceitherney was killed by a fall.

Boyle, county of Roscommon, early in the sixth century, by St. Beoidh or Beoy, and it became a bishop's see, which was also at an early period annexed to the see of Elphin. The ancient see of Drumcliff in Sligo, as already stated in the note on north Connaught, was also united to Elphin.

The see of Elphin. A church was founded at Elphin, in Roscommon, by St. Patrick, in the fifth century, who placed over it St. Asicus, one of his disciples, and made it a bishop's see. The bishops of Elphin in ancient times are sometimes styled bishops of East Connaught. The diocese of Elphin comprises the greater part of the county of Roscommon, with considerable portions of the counties of Sligo and Galway.

The See of Clonfert. A monastery was founded at Clonfert, in the present barony of Longford, county of Galway, by St. Brennan, or St. Brendan, in the sixth century, and it became a bishop's see, and was long celebrated as a seat of learning and religion. The diocese of Clonfert comprises a considerable part of the county of Galway, with part of Roscommon, and a small portion of the King's county.

The See of Kilmacduagh. A monastery was founded in the present barony of Kiltartan, county of Galway, in the seventh century, by St. Colman, the son of Duach, hence it was called Cill Mac Duach, signifying the church of the son of Duach, which became a bishop's see, and gave its name to the diocese. The bishops of Kilmacduagh, in ancient times were often styled bishops of Hy Fiachra Aidhne, which was the ancient name of the territory. The diocese of Kilmacduagh comprises a large portion of the county of Galway.

The See of Enaghduane. A monastery was founded at Enaghduane, now the parish of Annaghdown, in the barony of Clare, county of Galway, by St. Brendan, in the sixth century, and it became a bishop's see, which was united to Tuam in the fourteenth century, A. D. 1324.

The See of Galway. The diocese of Galway, which comprises the city of Galway and some adjoining districts, anciently formed part of the diocese of Enaghduane, but was afterwards presided over by an ecclesiastic who had episcopal authority, and was elected by the tribes under the title of warden. The wardenship was instituted in the fifteenth century, in A. D. 1484, by Pope Innocent VIII.; and the wardens of Galway continued till the year 1831, the first year of the pontificate of Gregory XVI., who abolished the wardenship and erected it into a bishop's see.

The See of Tuam. The see of Tuam was founded in the beginning of the sixth century by St. Iarlath, or Jarlath. Tuam is mentioned by the Irish writers as Tuam-da-ghualann. The ancient sees of Mayo, Cong, and Enaghduane, were afterwards annexed to Tuam, and its bishops were often styled bishops of Connaught. The diocese of Tuam comprises the greater part of the county of Galway, and about one-third of Mayo, with a large portion of Roscommon. The suffragan sees under the archbishopric of Tuam are those of Achonry, Killala, Elphin, Clonfert, Kilmacduagh, Kilfenora, and Galway.

On the ancient literature of Connaught. I. O'Maolconaire, or O'Maolconry, anglicised to Conry and Conroy. The O'Maolconrys are a branch of the southern Hy Nialls (who were for many centuries kings of Meath and monarchs of Ireland), and derive their descent from Maine, one of the sons of Niall of the Hostages, monarch of Ireland in the beginning of the fifth century. The O'Maolconrys were originally chiefs in Teffia or Westmeath, as given in the genealogies of Keating, O'Halloran and others, but in the tenth century they crossed the Shannon into Connaught, and many of them being learned men, got large possessions from the O'Conors, kings of Connaught, and were located in the present

The castle of Roscommon was taken by Torlogh O'Conor; and Hugh, son of Felim, who was confined there, was released, and a ransom given for him.

John Mac Mahon was expelled from Oriel (Monaghan).

barony of Roscommon, county of Roscommon towards the Shannon, and were appointed hereditary historians, and also hards of Connaught, which high and honourable office they held for many centuries, one of the duties attached to which was to assist at the inauguration of the kings of Connaught, which ceremony took place on the hill of Carn-Fraoich, near Tulsk, in the county of Roscommon, and an account of which has been transmitted by Torna O'Maolconry, who was chief bard to Felim O'Conor, king of Connaught, at the commencement of the fourteenth century, and who discharged that duty at his inauguration A. D. 1312. Amongst the offices performed, O'Maolconry standing next to the king, recited publicly, before the assembled chiefs, the principal clergy, and the clans, the royal genealogy composed in metre, and placed a white wand, as emblem of sovereignty, in the hands of the elected king, administering the usual oath or admonition, that he would preserve the customs of the country, and the bard finally recorded all these proceedings in the annals of the country. Many of the O'Maolconrys are mentioned as eminent hards and historians in the Annals of the Four Masters, in O'Reilly's Irish Writers, and by Ware and others. Conaing O'Maolconry is mentioned, in O'Flaherty's Ogygia, and in Ware's Writers, in the beginning of the eleventh century, and considered to be the author of the ancient M.S. called the Book of the O'Maolconrys, which is often quoted by ancient writers. The Annals of Connaught, another ancient M.S. often quoted, the original of which was in the possession of Dr. Charles O'Conor, and a copy of which is in the Royal Irish Academy, contains chiefly the provincial history of Connaught, from the thirteenth to the sixteenth century, and is considered to have been compiled chiefly by the O'Maolconrys as historiographers of Connaught. A beautiful M.S. on vellum, folio size, now deposited in the Bodleian Library at Oxford, and containing partly in poetry and partly in prose the history of Fionn Mac Cumhaill, and the celebrated Fenian heroes of Ireland in the third century, with some of the poems ascribed to Ossian, was composed by one of the O'Maolconrys about the fourteenth century. Dr. Drummond, in his Prize Essay on the poems of Ossian, states that Mac Pherson, the celebrated author of Ossian's Poems, on visiting Oxford, was shewn the above-mentioned Irish M.S. as containing the Poems of Ossian, a single word of which he was not able to read. Some learned men of the O'Maolconrys have been mentioned in the introduction to the present publication, as having assisted in the compilation of the Annals of the Four Masters.

A. D. 1136. Tanaidhe O'Maolconry, a celebrated historian and poet, died, several of whose poems are quoted in O'Reilly's Irish Writers.

Neide O'Maolconry, another historian of the same family, died.

A. D. 1266. Thomas O'Maolconry, archdeacon of Tuam; and Maolin O'Maolconry, Historiographer of Siol Murray, died. Four Masters.

A. D. 1270. Tanaidhe More O'Maolconry was appointed chief Historiographer of Connaught; and Duhhsuileach O'Maolconry, and Dunlaing O'Maolconry, were removed from that professorship. Four Masters.

A. D. 1310. Torna O'Maolconry, chief poet and historian of Connaught, attended at the inauguration of Felim O'Conor, and his poems are mentioned in O'Reilly's Irish Writers.

A. D. 1314. Conaing O'Maolconry, chief poet of Connaught, died.

A. D. 1385. Tanaidhe O'Maolconry, an eminent poet of Connaught, died.

A. D. 1404. Donogh O'Maolconry, chief poet of the O'Conors of Connaught, died.

A. D. 1420. Conaing O'Maolconry, poet of Connaught, died.

Bryan O'Flynn, lord of Teallach Curnain (in Roscommon), died.

Cuconacht O'Quinn, chief of Muintir Giollgain (in Longford), died.

Dermod Roe, son of Cormac Oge Mac Dermott, died in a monastic habit, in the monastery of Boyle.

A. D. 1441. Maoin O'Maolconry, chief poet of Connaught, died.

A. D. 1446. Tanaidhe O'Maolconry, an eminent poet of Connaught, died.

A. D. 1511. Carby O'Maolconry, a famous historian of Connaught, died.

A. D. 1566. John O'Maolconry, called by the annalists Ard Ollamh Eirionn, or chief poet and historiographer of Ireland, flourished.

A. D. 1600. Maurice O'Maolconry, an eminent poet of Connaught, died.

A. D. 1629. Died at Madrid, Florence O'Maolconry, a Franciscan friar, and eminent for his learning, who was the founder of the Irish Franciscan monastery of Louvain, and was also appointed Roman Catholic archbishop of Tuam. It may be observed here that several of the O'Maolconrys, were eminent ecclesiastics, and in the beginning of the twelfth century Clarus Mac Maoin O'Maolconry, archdeacon of Elphin, is often mentioned in these Annals, as the founder of many monasteries.

A. D. 1701. Peter O'Maolconry, an eminent poet, flourished. Several poems and other works written by the above named O'Maolconrys, are given in O'Reilly's Irish Writers.

It may be here observed, that the chief representative of the ancient, honorable, and learned family of the O'Maolconrys is Sir John Conroy, Bart., of Arborfield Hall, North Reading, Berkshire.

The Book of Hy Maine, generally called the Book of the O'Kellys, was compiled partly by the O'Dugans, hereditary bards and historians to the O'Kellys, and partly by Faolan Mac an Gobhan or Smith, a learned historian, who is mentioned in O'Reilly's Irish Writers, at A. D. 1423. This Book of Hy Maine is a voluminous MS. on vellum, containing a vast deal of curious and interesting information on the history and antiquities of Ireland, and a full account of it may be seen in O'Reilly's Irish Writers, at the year 1423, in which it is stated that the original is in the library of Sir William Betham, in Dublin.

O'Dugan's Topography. The O'Dugans were hereditary bards and historians to the O'Kellys, princes of Hy Maine; and an account of John O'Dugan, the celebrated author of the ancient topography of Ireland, has been given in the introduction to the present publication; and this topography is embodied in the course of these notes, and numerous extracts are also given, literally translated from the Topographical Poem of O'Dugan.

The Leabhar Brene Mac Aodhagain, or Speckled Book of Mac Egan, an ancient M.S. often quoted by our historians, and containing much curious information, the original of which is in the Royal Irish Academy, was composed by the Mac Egans of Duniry, in Galway, learned Brehons and historians.

The Annals of Boyle. The abbey of Boyle, in Rosecommon, a celebrated Cistercian monastery, was founded in the twelfth century, and amply endowed by the Mac Dermotts, lords of Moylurg; it was long eminent as a seat of learning and religion, and its remaining ruins shew its former magnificence. The Annals of Boyle were composed by the monks of that abbey, and are considered as a most authentic record of the ancient history of Ireland. Dr. O'Connor, in the Index to his first vol. Rer. Hib. Scrip., says that Ware was in error in stating, that the Annals of Connaught and the Annals of Boyle were the same, being two different works. The Annals of Boyle, translated into English, accompanied with commentaries on the general history of Ireland, are now fortunately in progress of publication, by that eminent Irish historian and antiquary, John D'Alton, esq., harrister at law, Dublin.

Cambrensis Eversus, a Latin work, published about the year 1665, was written by John Lynch, a native of Galway, a learned

A. D. 1342.

A contest arose between Torlogh O'Connor (king of Connaught), and Conor Mac Dermott, lord of Moylurg, and Edmond Burke joined Mac Dermott against O'Connor.

Hugh, son of Felim O'Connor, and Donogh ecclesiastic, who was archdeacon of Tuam, and afterwards, R.C. bishop of Killala, and died about A.D. 1670. He published his work under the name Gratianus Lucius, and it contains much learned information on the ancient history of Ireland, and a full refutation of the calumnies of Giraldus Cambrensis against the Irish.

O'Flaherty's Ogygia, a large work written in Latin by Roderick O'Flaherty, a gentleman farmer, in the barony of Moyeullen, county of Galway. He was a man of great learning, and died in the year 1718, in the 89th year of his age. The Ogygia was published in London, A. D. 1685, and translated into English by the Rev. James Healy, and published in Dublin, A. D. 1793. The work contains vast information on ancient Irish history, and is particularly valuable on Chronology.

Dissertations on the Ancient History of Ireland, a very learned work, published about the year 1780, by Charles O'Connor of Belenagar, in the county of Roscommon, who also published O'Flaherty's Ogygia Vindicated, and other learned works.

Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores Veteres. The Rev. Dr. Charles O'Connor, nephew to Charles O'Connor of Belenagar, and librarian to the duke of Buckingham, at Stowe, in England, published in 1824, in four large quarto volumes, this great work, containing various learned dissertations, and translations into Latin, of the chief works of the Irish annalists, as the Annals of the Four Masters, to the English invasion; the Annals of Innisfallen; the Annals of Tigearnach; the Annals of Ulster; of Boyle, &c.

Amongst the learned poets and historians of Connaught, the O'Dalys, as already stated, were eminent; also the O'Duigenans; O'Higgins; O'Gibleans, &c. The O'Duigenans of Kilonan, in the county of Roscommon, composed a learned M.S. work on Irish history, often quoted, and called the Book of the O'Duigenans, and also assisted in the compilation of the Annals of the Four Masters.

The Book of Fenagh, called also the Book of St. Caillin, from St. Caillin, who founded the abbey of Fenagh, in the fifth century. It was partly compiled by St. Caillin himself, and contains some poetical pieces, called the Prophecies of St. Caillin; and much interesting information on the history of the O'Rourkes, and the affairs of Connaught. Patrick O'Maolconry, Teige O'Rody, abbot of Fenagh, and others, are mentioned amongst its compilers, and a fine copy of it is in the possession of Mr. Geraghty, of Anglesea-street, the publisher of these Annals.

The Books of Leacan and Ballymote, compiled by the learned Mac Fiebises and other historians, in Sligo, are two of the greatest works on Irish history and antiquities, and an account of them has been given in the note on North Connaught. Thus it appears that the province of Connaught holds a distinguished rank with respect to ancient Irish literature. In the present article only a short sketch could be given of the works composed in Connaught, and many have not been mentioned; but in the course of these notes full accounts will be given of the ancient literature of Ireland, and of the works composed in the different provinces, with memoirs of the various writers. The history and topography of the ancient kingdoms of Meath, Ulster, and Connaught, are finished in the present number, and in the succeeding numbers will be given the history and topography of Leinster and Munster, together with their chiefs and clans, and the ancient territories possessed by each, commencing with Thomond.

A. D. 1340.

1. Oirbealaigh, afterwards called Muckross Abbey, situated on a peninsula on one of the lakes of Killarney, county of Kerry.

O'Beirne, chief of Tir Briune of the Shannon, confined Torlogh O'Connor in the church of Elphin, after he had gone to make reprisals for a depredation committed by the Muintir Beirne on Hoberd Burke, and they slew some of the galloglasses of O'Connor, together with his constable Mac Rory.

A general commotion arose after that in Connaught, the Clan Murtoigh (O'Conors) having at first joined O'Connor against Mac Dermott, but subsequently sided with Mac Dermott and Mac William; the Clan Maurice then committed a disgraceful treachery in their own country against the Clan William Burke, and slew Thomas Burke; and John Burke was slain on the same occasion by the Clan Rickard, at the instigation of the Clan Maurice and O'Connor.

Cathal, son of Gilcreest Mac Dermott, was slain by Fergal O'Teige in this contest, and Fergal the son of Gilcreest Finn (the Fair), Mac Cormac was also slain.

Mac Dermott with his chiefs made a vigorous attack on O'Connor at Belathslisen (in Roscommon), in which he gained the Ford against him; and Dermot, son of Bryan O'Ferrall, the best man of the Conmacnians (in Longford) of his tribe, with the son of Hoberd Burke, and Conor, son of Donogh Duv O'Healey, were slain on that occasion.

John Mac Mahon, lord of Oriel (Monaghan), went to plunder Hugh, son of Ralph Mac Mahon, and was slain in the rear of the preying party, and many of his galloglasses were slain and drowned.

Cormac, son of Roderick, son of Donal O'Connor, was taken prisoner by Conor, the son of Teige, and by Roderick, the son of Cathal O'Connor; and Conor, the son of Teige, was afterwards taken prisoner by Bryan, the son of Roderick, and he delivered him into the hands of Conor Mac Dermott, who sent him to be confined on the Rock of Lough Key.

Donal O'Dogherty, chief of Ard Miodhair

(in Donegal), and of Triochaced Tire Enda, a man full of hospitality and generosity, died, and was succeeded in the chieftaincy by John O'Dogherty.

All the Siol Murray (clans of Roscommon), with the chiefs who supported them, turned against Torlogh, son of Hugh, son of Owen O'Connor, and the following were the principal chiefs amongst those who united against him on that occasion, namely, Edmond Mac William Burke; Conor Mac Dermott, lord of Moylurg, with his kinsmen and party; Hugh, son of Hugh Brefnach, son of Cathal Roe O'Connor; Teige, son of Roderick O'Connor; Cathal, son of Hugh Brefnach, son of Cathal Roe, with the forces of Brefney and of Conmaicne; and Hugh, son of Felim, son of Hugh, son of Owen O'Connor, all of whom assembled against O'Connor, and expelled him a second time from his country and lands, upon which he was advised by his friends to go secretly, without telling many of it, to Mac Dermott's place, to ascertain if he would make peace with him. The Clan Murtoigh (O'Connor), however, having received intelligence of his intention, and of the particular night on which O'Connor was to come to Mac Dermott's house, they planted themselves in the perilous passes of the way through which O'Connor was to proceed to Mac Dermott's fortress, but Torlogh however escaped them until he got to the road leading to the fortress, when he was attacked, and Cathal, son of Hugh Brefnach Glass, was wounded in the first onset; and although he (O'Connor), with his other three companions were but a few against many, compared to the force which opposed him, he escaped in despite of them, without himself or any of his party losing a drop of blood, or receiving a wound. Mac Dermott had no knowledge of the great danger in which Torlogh was placed until he heard the loud shouting, clamour, and swearing all around the fortress, and being informed of the circumstances, he despatched messengers privately for O'Connor to conduct him safely to the Rock, and have him

2. Lios Sealbhaidh, probably Lissonuff, in the barony of Roscommon.

A. D. 1341.

1. Clochar, or Clogher, in the county of Tyrone, which place, according to the learned Cathal Mac Guire, canon of Armagh, and archdeacon of Clogher, who compiled the Annals of Ulster in the fifteenth century, obtained its name from a celebrated idol of the Druids worshipped there, and called Cloch oir, or the Golden Stone, from its being covered with gold. Saint Patrick founded a church here, over which his disciple, St. Mac Cartin, presided, and it became the seat of the diocese of Clogher, of which an account has been given in the note on Orgiall. The abbey of Clogher was long celebrated as a seat of learning and religion. Mac-an-Gobhan, or Mac Gowan, a name which has been anglicised to Smith, were an ancient clan, of whom an account has been given in the notes on Dalaradia and Brefney.

protected until he could ascertain if he could make peace for him. O'Connor remained there for a week, during which time the chiefs of the country frequently visited him at the request of Mac Dermott, who finding he could not succeed in obtaining terms of peace for him, escorted him with a force of cavalry, and left him at Roscommon.

Conor Roe Mac Geoghegan, lord of Kinel Fiacha (in Westmeath), was slain by the English.

Thomas O'Cinga, Maurice Mac Geoghegan, and Simon, the son of Conor, who was the son of Simon Mac Giollarraidl, one of the chiefs of Lieney (in Sligo), died.

Murrough, son of Tomaltach O'Flanagan (in Roscommon), one of the best men of his name, was slain by the galloglasses of the son of Cathal.

Hugh, son of Hugh Brefnach, the son of Cathal Roe O'Connor, was appointed king of Connaught by the Conacians, and Mac William Burke, on the first Monday of winter after they had deposed Torlogh; and they conferred the Tanistship of Connaught on Hugh, son of Felim O'Connor, and Tírerill (in Sligo), was given to Fergal Mac Dermott.

Teige, son of Tomaltach, the son of Maurice Mac Donogh, was expelled from his own territory (in Tírerill), by Conor Mac Dermott and his kinsmen, and he went to reside with Torlogh O'Connor; and Fergal (Mac Dermott), the son of Tomaltach, then took possession of Tírerill.

The Giolla Duv Mac Guire was drowned in Lough Erne.

Matthew Mac Manus (in Fermanagh), an affluent landed proprietor, who never refused hospitality to any man rich or poor, died.

Conor, son of Hugh, son of Donal Oge O'Donnell, lord of Tírconnell, of North Connaught, Fermanagh, Kinel Moain, and Inisowen, a worthy heir to the sovereignty of Ireland in personal figure, wisdom, hospitality, nobility, prudence, ingenuity, cheerfulness, abilities, strength, valour, piety, and benevolence, was slain by his brother Niall O'Donnell, who had surprised him by night in his fortress at Murbeach (in Donegal), and Niall himself assumed the lordship.

Flann Oge O'Donnellan, chief professor of poetry in Connaught, died.

Donal O'Coinlesg, a learned historian, was slain by the people of Hy Diarmada (in Roscommon), shortly after Easter.

Thomas Mac Gilcoisgley, a man distinguished for hospitality and benevolence, died.

Pierce Albanach (the Scot), was slain by the sons of Myler Bermingham.

A. D. 1343.

John MacEoigh, bishop of Conmaicne (Ardagh), died.

Johannes O'Laithin, bishop of Killala; and Cathal Mac Anliathanaigh, abbot of the Trinity (Trinity Island on Lough Key, county of Roscommon), died.

Donogh Cleireach O'Mulbrenan, a canon of the chapter of Elphin, was slain by the cast of a javelin by the people of Hoberd, the son of David Dunn Mac William (Burke).

Slaine, daughter of O'Brien, and wife of Torlogh O'Connor, king of Connaught, died.

Cathal O'Madden, the most distinguished man of his name for hospitality and nobleness, was slain by the Clanrickard.

Dearvoil, daughter of Hugh O'Donnell, having gone to Inis Doighre on a visit to Mac Dermott, was seized with a fatal disease, of which she died, and was buried with honour and solemnity in the monastery of Boyle; and no lady of her family ever before excelled her in goodness.

Duvcovlagh, daughter of Mac Dermott, and wife of O'Brien, died.

Murtogh O'Brien, lord of Thomond, died, and Dermot O'Brien assumed the lordship, but was, however, dispossessed of it by Bryan O'Brien, to whom the nobility of Thomond made their submission.

Thomas Mac Gauran, chief of Tullaghaw (in Cavan), died.

Ulick Mac Rickard (Burke), the son of William Liath (the grey), the most distinguished young nobleman of the English of Ireland for hospitality and generosity, died.

The Berminghams and the people of Clanrickard, (Burkes), gained a great victory over the people of Hy Maine, (O'Kellys), in which eleven of the chiefs of Hy Maine, along with Conor Cervach O'Kelly were slain.

Niall O'Donnell was deposed from his lordship by Aongus O'Donnell, aided by Donal Duv O'Boyle, Hugh O'Dogherty, and by the influence of Hugh Reamhar O'Neill, and the Clan Sweeney; and Aongus, son of Conor, son of Hugh, son of Donal Oge, (O'Donnell), was appointed to the lordship of Tirconnell.

The Clan Murtogh, (O'Conors of Sligo), were expelled from Brefney by Ualgarg O'Rourke, Torlogh O'Conor, and Teige Mac Rannall. The Clan Murtogh removed to Tir Hugh (in Donegal), under the protection of O'Donnell, and Aongus, that is, O'Donnell, gave them Tir Hugh. A battle took place after that between Aongus and Niall (the O'Donnells) at Achadh Mona, and the Clan Murtogh having joined Aongus against Niall, they defeated Niall and his people; and Andiles O'Boyle, chief of Tir Ainmireach (in Donegal), with his son; Owen, the son of Art O'Donnell, and many others were slain there, and Aongus was victorious.

David Mac Oiraghty, the coarb of St. Patrick (archbishop of Armagh), died.

John Mac Duibhne, archdeacon of Dromleathan, (Drumlane in Cavan), died.

Conor Mac Dermott, lord of Moylurg, the fountain of generosity, and the most eminent of the Clan Mulrooney More, the son of Teige, son of Cathal, son of Conor, died in his own house a week after Lammas, on a Saturday, after having gained the victory over the world and the devil, and was buried in the monastery of Boyle; and Fergal Mac Dermott, his brother, was appointed in his place.

Roderick Mac Craith, chief poet of Leath Mogha (south of Ireland), died.

A. D. 1344.

The bishop of Lieney (Achonry), died.

Murrogh, son of Maolmuaidh O'Hara, abbot of Boyle, and bishop elect of Lieney, died.

Nicholas Magrath, coarb of Termon Dabeog (abbot of Lough Derg, in the diocese of Clogher), died.

Art More the son of Cormac O'Melaghlin, king of Meath, was slain by Cormac Ballach O'Melaghlin, who assumed the government.

Hugh, son of Ralph Mac Mahon, lord of Orgiall (Monaghan), died, and Murrogh Oge Mac Mahon assumed the lordship, but died in a week afterwards, and Manus son of Eochy, son of Ralph Mac Mahon, then assumed the lordship.

William, son of Mahon Mac Rannall (in Leitrim), was slain by the sons of Cathal Mac Rannall.

Mahon Mac Gilcreest, the chaplain of Mac Dermott, was slain by Muintir Heley, on the Curlew mountains.

Bryan, the son of Roderick Mac Guire (in Fermanagh), died.

A. D. 1345.

Giolla-na-neev O'Cianain (O'Keenan), abbot of Lios Gabhail (Lisgoole in Fermanagh), died.

Torlogh, son of Hugh, son of Owen O'Conor, king of Connaught, was killed in harvest by the cast of a javelin, in Fiodh Daradha (the oak wood), in Muintir Eoluis (in Leitrim), he having gone to aid Teige Mac Rannall against the Clan Murtogh Muinach O'Conor, at Lough Airinn (Lough Arrow, in Sligo); the Clan Murtogh, and the other portion of Muintir Eoluis followed him to Fiodh Doradh, and slew him at Guirteen na-Spideoige, and none of the Irish that had been slain for a long time was a greater loss than he. Hugh, son of Torlogh, was appointed his successor.

Bryan O'Ferrall, a worthy heir to the lordship of Annaly, died, a man blameless in every thing he had done through life, and finally gained the victory over the world and the devil.

Hugh O'Neill sailed with a fleet on Lough Neagh, but the Clanaboy (O'Neills of Clanaboy), with their forces attacked him, and many were killed and wounded on both sides; but Hugh, however, escaped in despite of them, in his ships.

Manus O'Flynn of Line (Moylinny in Antrim), was slain by Donal Donn and by Bryan O'Neill.

Cormac, son of Roderick O'Conor, died.

Cormac, son of Murtogh Mac Loughlin, was slain by the sons of Ualgarg, the son of Fergal (O'Rourke.)

A. D. 1346.

A war arose between O'Rourke, that is, Ualgarg, and Roderick, son of Cathal O'Conor, and a battle was fought between them at Calraigh of Lough Gill (in Sligo), in which O'Rourke was defeated, and all his galloglasses slain, viz., Mac Buirce, and the son of Niall Cam, with his party; O'Rourke, being pursued by Roderick O'Connor and the Mac Donoghs, was slain by Mulrooney Mac Donogh, and his death was much lamented.

The four sons of Cathal, son of the Caoch Mac Rannall, were taken prisoners on Lough-an-Sguir (Lough Seur in Leitrim), by Conor Mac Rannall, and were conveyed by Tomaltach Mac Rannall to Caisiol Cosgraigh, where they were slain.

Cu-uladh Mac Cathmail, chief of Kinel Feredaigh (in Tyrone), was killed by Donal Mac Cathmail.

Bryan Mac Mahon (chief of Monaghan), defeated the English in a battle, in which they lost three hundred men.

Niall O'Donnell, with the sons of Murtoigh, son of Felim O'Connor, and Maurice Mac Dermott, having pursued Roderick, son of Cathal (O'Connor), to Culmaoile (Collooney in Sligo), defeated him and the Mac Donoghs in battle, with great slaughter, and afterwards plundered them, and carried away as much booty as they pleased.

Mac Dermott Gall was treacherously slain in his own house, by the sons of Waldrin Mac Costello, and they also killed Cormac Caoch Mac Finin.

Conor O'Beirne (of Roscommon) was slain.

Ivar, son of Murrogh O'Ferrall (in Longford), was slain by Bryan Mac Tiarnan, and by the Clan Mac Murtoigh.

Art, son of Thomas O'Rourke (in Leitrim), was slain by Donal Mac Tiarnan.

A. D. 1347.

Maolmoeg O'Tully, the official (vicar-general), of Lough Erne (diocese of Clogher), died.

Giolla-na-neev, son of Geoffrey, son of Giolla-na-neev O'Ferrall, lord of Annaly (Longford), the chief defender of Conmaiene, in valour, fortitude, hospitality, and nobleness, died at Cluan Lisbeag, having been for a long period in the chief government of Annaly, and after having gained the palm of victory over the world and the devil. Cathal, son of Murrogh, son of Giolla-na-neev O'Ferrall, then assumed the lordship of Annaly.

Maurice Mac Dermott (in Roscommon), was slain by John Roe, son of David Burke.

Teige Mac Rannall, chief of Muintir Eoluis, was taken prisoner by the Clan Murtoigh, (O'Conors of Sligo).

William Mac David (Burke), was slain by Teige Roe Mac Dermott Gall, at Ballintobber.

Thomas Mac Artan, lord of Hy Veach in Ulidia, (county of Down), was hanged by the English.

Owen O'Madden, chief of Siol Anmeha (in Galway), died, and was succeeded in the chieftaincy of Siol Anmeha by his son, Murrogh.

Aongus, the son of Gara O'Madden, died.

The church of Kilronan (in Roscommon), was re-built by Fergal O'Duigenan.

Fionguala, daughter of Mac Finin, and wife of Fergal O'Duigenan, died.

Henry, son of Hugh Buidhe O'Neill; Fionguala, daughter of Malachy O'Reilly (of Cavan); and the Giolla Duv Mac Giollamochua, died.

Donogh, son of Hugh Oge O'Ferrall, died.

Sidredh O'Cuirnin, the learned poet and historiographer of Brefney, died.

A. D. 1348.

Niall Garv O'Donnell, lord of Tircennell, after having experienced much trouble during the period of his government, was treacherously and maliciously slain, by Manus Meabhlaich (the Deceitful) O'Donnell, at the harbour of Inis Saimer (Ballyshannon). Niall was a tower of bravery, strength, and defence, until then, and his death, in such a manner, was a melancholy occurrence.

Aongus, the son of Conor O'Donnell, who was in contention with Niall, assumed the government.

Cathal O'Ferrall, lord of Annaly, died.

Malachy Mac Oiraghty, chief of Muintir Roduiv (in Roscommon); and Donogh Mac Brady, chief of Cuil Brighde (Kilbride, county of Cavan), died.

A contention arose between Fergal Mac Dermott and Roderick, son of Cathal, son of Donal O'Connor, and the fortress of Mac Dermott was burned by Roderick; Mac Dermott, after that, having collected his friends, pursued Roderick to his fortress at Ballymote (in Sligo), and burned the town, both stone and wooden buildings, and they returned home without meeting any opposition; they liberated the son of O'Rourke, who was imprisoned in the town, together with all the other prisoners they found there.

The Berminghams were expelled by Edmond Burke; and Bermingham himself was forced to fly for refuge to the house of O'Connor.

A. D. 1349.

Hugh O'Rourke gained a victory over Flaherty O'Rourke, Donogh O'Donnell, and the people of Dartry (in Leitrim); and Hugh Mac Clancy, chief of Dartry; Gilcreest Mac Clancy; Loghlin, son of Andilis O'Boyle, and many others, were slain in the conflict.

John Duv Mac Donnell was slain by Manus, son of Eochy Mac Mahon (in Monaghan).

Giolla-na-neev O'Higgin, a learned poet (in Connaught), died.

Another commotion arose between Mac Dermott and Roderick O'Conor; Mac Dermott collected all the English and Irish he could, together with the Clan Murtogh (O'Conors of Sligo), and the Tirconnellians, with whom he marched against the son of Cathal (O'Conor), but Roderick fled before them, and they pursued him to Clan Fermaighe (in Leitrim), but he escaped from all the English and Irish together, and they returned without gaining any advantage or obtaining hostages. Roderick then, having collected a force, burned, laid waste, and plundered the greater part of Moylurg.

A great plague raged in Ireland, and particularly in Moylurg (in Roscommon), by which an immense number of people were destroyed; and Matthew, the son of Cathal O'Rourke, died of the same plague.

Donogh Riavach, son of Malachy Carrach Mac Dermott, was taken prisoner by Cormac Bodhar Mac Dermott, and conveyed to Airteach (in Roscommon), where he was put to death, at Dunthaidhe, by the people of Airteach, namely, Gilcreest Mac Tully, and O'Kearney.

Richard O'Reilly, lord of East Brefney (county of Cavan), and the son of the earl, died.

Gilbert O'Flanagan, chief of Tura (in Fermanagh), was slain by the sons of Bryan O'Flanagan.

Murtogh Riaganach Mac Gennis (in the county of Down), was slain by his own kinsmen.

Roderick O'Kane, lord of the Creeve, and of Ard Kianaght (in Derry), died.

Hugh O'Reilly (in Cavan), and the Giolla Caoch Mac Dorchy (in Leitrim), died.

Maurice Mac Donogh, chief of Corran (in Sligo), a man distinguished for knowledge and hospitality, died.

The lord justice and the English of Meath gave a great defeat to O'Mclaghlin and the Irish of Meath, in which many of the chiefs were slain.

A. D. 1350.

William O'Dowd, bishop of Killala, a founder of churches and sanctuaries, a man eminent for his piety, alms-giving, and humanity, died.

Hugh, king of Connaught, the son of Hugh Brefnach O'Conor, who was called the O'Conor, was slain by Hugh O'Rourke, at Moy Angaidhe.

Fergal O'Rourke, son of Ualgarg, was slain by the son of Cathal Cleireach Mac Donogh.

Bryan Mac Dermott, heir to the lordship of Moylurg, was slain at Roscommon, by Muintir Aneaspuig O'Feenaghty, with a chance cast of a javelin, and the person who was accused of casting it, namely, Roderick Antseomra O'Donaghoe, was instantly put to death, as a reparation for the deed.

Bryan, son of Donal, son of Bryan Roe O'Brien, was treacherously slain by the sons of Lorcan Mac Keogh; and for him the following was composed—

"Sorrowful was the fate of Donal's only son,
Mournful was the death of Brian Boromha,
Sorrowful was his unexpected end,
Pity that the Clan Keogh should exult in his fall."

Torlogh Oge O'Brien slew sixteen men of the Clan Keogh, in retaliation for their misdeeds; he also deprived them of their lands and property.

Roderick, son of Cathal, son of Donal O'Conor, was treacherously slain at Garrdha-na-fionguine on Breclsieve,¹ by the sons of Fergal Mac Donogh, at the instigation of Hugh, the son of Torlogh.

Hugh, the son of Torlogh (O'Conor), was deposed by Mac William Burke, and the people of the Tuatha of Connaught (in Roscommon), and they appointed, in opposition to him, Hugh, the son of Felim (O'Conor).

Cuchoigrihe (Peregrine) More Mac Geoghegan, lord of Kinel Fiacha (in Westmeath); Hugh, the son of Awlave Mac Guire (in Fermanagh); and Maurice Mac Donogh (in Sligo), died.

Aongus Roe O'Daly (of Westmeath), chief poet of Ireland; and Aongus O'Heoghusa, an eminent poet, died.

A. D. 1350.

1. Breclsliabh, or Bracklieve Mountains, in the northern extremity of Roscommon, near Lough Allen.

A. D. 1351.

The monastery of Rusoirbeallaigh,¹ in the diocese of Thuan, was erected for Franciscan friars.

Owen Nalaithighe Mac Sweeney (in Donegal), was slain by Manus O'Donnell.

Philip Mac Guire, chief of Muintir Peodachain (Pettigo in Fermanagh); and Enna O'Flanagan, chief of Tura (in Fermanagh), died.

Hugh, son of Torlogh (O'Conor), regained his power, and the hostages of Connaught were delivered up to him; and Hugh, the son of Felim, was expelled from the country.

Hugh O'Rourke was taken prisoner by Mac Philbin Mac William Burke, on his return from Croagh Patrick; and Mac Dermott rose in opposition to the Clan Philbin on that account, and great depredations were committed between them.

Mahon Mac Consnamha (in Leitrim), was slain by the family of Donogh Mac Consnamha.

A public invitation to a general entertainment, at Christmas, was issued by William, the son of Donogh Muinach O'Kelly (lord of Hy Maine, in Galway and Roscommon), to the colleges of Ireland, to all travellers, and to the poor and indigent; and all classes, noble and ignoble, rich and poor, were abundantly entertained, and were perfectly satisfied with himself and his son Malachy.

A. D. 1352.

Hugh, son of Torlogh O'Conor, re-assumed the government despite of all the English and Irish that were opposed to him.

Hugh O'Rourke, lord of Brefney, was slain by Cathal, son of Hugh Brefnach O'Conor, and by the Clan Murtogh (O'Conors), and a slaughter of the galloglasses of the Mac Sweeneys took place on that occasion.

Hugh O'Mulbrenan (in Roscommon), and his two sons, were slain by Hugh, the son of Felim O'Conor.

Aongus, son of Conor, son of Hugh, son of Donal Oge O'Donnell, lord of Tirconnell, a vigorous and resolute man, the most distinguished in Ulster in his time for hospitality and nobleness, was slain by Manus O'Donnell; Felim O'Donnell succeeded him, and John, the son of Conor O'Donnell, contended with him for the lordship.

Ballindoon was taken by Torlogh O'Conor.

Conor, son of Maurice Mac Donogh (in Sligo), a general patron of men of learning and arts; Davock Dillon, the son of Ulick of Hy Malia (in Mayo), the chief of the kerns (light troops), and of the Dillons of Connaught; Thomas Mac Rannall; and Teige, the son of Siacus O'Kelly, died.

A. D. 1353.

John O'Carbry, the coarb of Tighernach, of Cluan Eois,¹ died.

Gormley, daughter of O'Donnell, and wife of O'Neill, died, and no woman in her time was more distinguished for virtue and good fame.

Hugh, the son of Roderick O'Neill; and Mahon, the son of Giolla-na-neev O'Ferrall, lord of Annaly, died.

Teige Mac Rannall, chief of Muintir Eoluis, was slain by the Clan Geoffrey Mac Rannall.

Hugh, the son of Torlogh (O'Conor), was deposed, and Mac Brenan retained him in the country.

The monastery of Kilconnell, in the diocese of Clonfert, in Connaught, was founded for Franciscan friars, by William O'Kelly, lord of Hy Maine.

A. D. 1354.

O'Laghnan, bishop of Connaught, and John O'Feenaghty, bishop of Elphin, died.

Mac Murrough was put to death by the English, and a great war arose in consequence thereof, between the English and Irish.

Roderick O'Moore, lord of Leix (in the Queen's county), was slain by his own kinsmen and household.

Bryan O'Dowd, chief of his tribe in Tireragh (in Sligo), died, and was succeeded by his son Donal.

Bryan, the son of Hugh More O'Neill; Cathal, the son of Niall O'Rourke; Geoffrey Mac Ran-

A. D. 1351.

1. Rusoirbeallaigh, now Rosserelly, situated on the river Ross, in the barony of Clare, county of Galway, where some ruins of this extensive monastery still remain.

A. D. 1353.

1. Cluan Eois, now Clones in Monaghan, of which St. Tighearnach was founder in the sixth century, hence the coarb of Tighearnach signifies the abbot of Clones.

nall; Geoffrey O'Reilly; Sitrick Mac Gauran; and Fergal Mac Geoghegan, chief of Kinel Fiacha (in Westmeath), died.

Roderick, the son of John Mac Mahon (in Monaghan), was slain in the fortress of Mac Mahon.

The Clanaboy O'Neills and the English of Dundalk gave a great defeat to Hugh O'Neill, in which a great number were slain.

Derfogaill, the daughter of O'Conor; Felim, the son of Cathal O'Conor; and Hoberd Burke, died.

Flaherty Mac Gilefinen (in Fermanagh), and his brother, were slain by his own people.

Murrough, the son of Cathal O'Ferrall, and Teige Mac Seanlaich, died.

Saerbrethach, the son of Maolisa Dunn Mac Egan, chief professor of Conmaicne (in Leitrim), died on Inis Clothran (in Lough Ree, county of Longford).

Malachy Mac Rafferty, chief professor of poetry in Fermanagh, died.

A. D. 1355.

Conor Mac Consnamha, bishop of Brefney,¹ from Drumcliff to Kells; Mac Gallgaeil, prior of the Trinity; and Mac Cathail, abbot of Sruthra, died.

Donogh, son of Felim, son of Hugh, son of Donal Oge O'Donnell, was slain while forcibly attempting the abduction of Gormley, the daughter of Hugh Roe Mac Guire (lord of Fermanagh), and Donn, the son of Murrough, was the man who slew him in the fortress of Mac Guire.

Donal, the son of John O'Ferrall, lord of Annaly, died.

Dermod O'Mulvey, chief of Muintir Carolan (in Leitrim), was slain by Muintir Beirne (of Roscommon), and a great number of Muintir Eoluis were slain along with him.

Cathal O'Quinn, chief of Muintir Giollgain (in Longford), and also five of his kinsmen, were slain by the Clan Shane and the Clan Hugh.

Cormac Mac Rannall, chief of Muintir Eoluis, was slain by the sons of Ivar Mac Rannall.

Fergal, son of Fergal, son of Murtoigh More, the son of Congalach Mac Geoghegan, chief of Kinel Fiacha (in Westmeath), died.

Murrough, the son of Cathal O'Ferrall; Derfogaill, the daughter of O'Ferrall; and Teige Mac Egan, a man learned in the law (Brehonism), died.

The English of the west of Connaught defeated Mac William (Burke), and slew many of his people.

Edward Mac William Mac Rickard (Burke), was slain by the people of Siol Anmcha (in Galway).

Rickard Oge gave a great defeat to the people of Mac William (Burke), that is, Edward, and the people of Siol Anmcha, in which Stephen Mac Jordan, Henry Mac Philbin, and sixteen of the chiefs of Siol Anmcha, were slain.

Niall Mac Mahon (in Monaghan), was slain by the sons of John Mac Mahon.

Aduc Mac Quillan (of Antrim), was slain by the people of Orior (in Armagh).

Ten lambs were yeaned at once by one sheep.

A. D. 1356.

Fergal, son of Geoffrey Mac Rannall, primate of Armagh,¹ and successor of St. Patrick, died.

Nicholas Mac Cathasaigh, bishop of Orgiall,² died.

Solomon O'Meallan, keeper of an adjuration bell,³ died; he was the most illustrious of the clergy of Ireland.

A. D. 1355.

1. Bishop of Brefney, from Kells to Drumcliff; that is from Kells in Meath to Drumcliff in Sligo, which was the extent of the diocese of Kilmore. Mac Consnamla, a name anglicised to Ford, were chiefs of Muintir Kenny in Leitrim. The prior of the Trinity here mentioned, was that of Trinity Island on Lough Key, in the county of Roscommon. The abbot of Sruthra was abbot of Shrute, in the barony of Kilmaine, county of Mayo.

A. D. 1356.

1. Primate of Armagh. The archbishop of Armagh at this time, according to Ware and others, was the celebrated Richard Fitzralph. This Fergal, son of Geoffrey Mac Rannall, is not given in Ware's Archbishops of Armagh; he appears to have been of the ancient family of the Mac Rannalls, chiefs of Muintir Eoluis in Leitrim, and was probably the same person as the primate called Fitzralph by Ware and others.

2. Bishop of Orgiall, that is bishop of Clogher. There are two or three of the Mac Cathasaighs given as bishops of Clogher, and the name appears to be Mac Casey, but some suppose it to be Mac Cassidy.

3. Adjuration Bell. In ancient times the Irish held in great veneration some of the bells used by the saints in early times, and preserved them for many ages, some of them even to the present day; amongst other purposes for administering solemn oaths and adjurations, and to swear falsely on them was considered the greatest crime and profanation.

Hugh, son of Torlogh O'Conor, king of Connaught, was slain in Baile Loch Deacair,⁴ by Donogh Carrach O'Kelly, and by the Clan Mac Award, at the instigation of the Hymanians, for the crime of carrying off clandestinely the daughter of Seoinin Burke, the wife of O'Kelly.

Hugh, son of Felim O'Conor, then assumed the sovereignty of Connaught.

Conor, son of Teige O'Kelly, was slain by Teige, the son of Dermod O'Kelly.

Torlogh, son of Hugh Brefnach O'Conor, was slain by the Mac Donoghs.

Dermod, son of Dermod Mac Carthy (in the county of Cork), and his son Donogh, were slain by the son of O'Sullivan.

More, daughter of O'Conor, and wife of O'Ferrall, died.

Murtogh, son of John O'Neill (of Tyrone), was slain by Philip Mac Guire.

Dugall Mac Sweeney was slain by Donal O'Conor.

Roderick, son of Hugh O'Conor, and Donal, son of Hugh Brefnach O'Conor, died.

Donogh Mac Namara (of Clare), the best chief's son in Munster in his time, was slain by the O'Briens.

Donogh Praisteach was treacherously slain by two of his own people.

Garrett Tyrrell was put to death by the king of England's people on the plain of Dublin.

Murrough, son of Bryan O'Neill, died.

Felim, son of Hugh, son of Donal Oge, lord of Tireconnell, was slain by his brother's son, namely, John, the son of Conor O'Donnell, who assumed the lordship of Tireconnell without opposition.

A. D. 1357.

Clement O'Duigenan, vicar of Kilronan (in Roscommon), died; he was called the priest of the Sionachs.

Manus Mac Mahon, lord of Orgiall (Monaghan); Loghlin, son of Murtogh O'Conor; and Fergal Muinach O'Duigenan, chief professor of Conmaicne (in Leitrim), and of Clan Maolrooney (in Roscommon), north and south, died.

4. Baile Locha Deacair was probably in that part of Galway called Hy Maine, belonging to the O'Kellys; and the Mac Wards were a clan in the barony of Tiaquin, county of Galway.

John, son of Bryan O'Reilly (chief of Cavan), was slain by the English.

Bryan, son of Gilcreest O'Rourke, and Manus Buidhe Mac Gauran (in Cavan), were slain in the Routs (county of Antrim) of Mac Quillan, by Hugh O'Neill.

Donslevy Mac Carroll, the most accomplished master of music and harmony in his own time, died.

A general peace was concluded between the two Cathals, namely, Cathal, son of Hugh Brefnach (O'Conor), and Cathal Oge, son of Cathal, son of Donal (O'Conor).

A. D. 1358.

Bryan Mac Cathmoil, bishop of Orgiall (Clogher), died.

Manus Mac Guire was slain by the Clan Cathmail (of Tyrone).

Donal O'Hara, lord of Lieney (in Sligo), died on Easter Day.

Conor O'Hanley, chief of Kinel Dobtha, the son of Aongus (in Roscommon), died after he had gained the palm of victory over the world and the devil.

Hugh O'Neill gained a battle over the Orgallians (people of Monaghan and Armagh), and the people of Fermanagh, in which Hugh Mac Cabe and Malachy Mac Anaspuig O'Dowd, with many others, were slain.

O'Moore (of Leix, in the Queen's county), gained a great victory over the English of Dublin, and left two hundred and forty of them dead on the field of battle.

Torlogh, son of Hugh of the Wood O'Neill, and the son of Andrew Bermingham, died.

A great shower of hail fell in Crioich Cairpre (Carbury in Sligo), in the summer, and each stone was as large as a wild apple.

Senicin Mac Quillan, high constable of the province of Ulster, died.

The son of Giolla Iosa O'Flanagan was slain by Manus, son of Cathal, the son of Hugh Brefnach (O'Conor).

A. D. 1359.

Cormac Mac Carthy, lord of Desmond, and Donal, son of Teige O'Mahony, died.

Cathal Oge, the son of Cathal O'Conor, gave a great defeat at Ballyshannon, to John, the son of Conor O'Donnell, and the Connallians, and he took John O'Dogherty, chief of Ard Miodhair; Owen Conactach; and Torlogh Mac Sweeney, prisoners, and slew many others; Matthew Mac Gauran, heir to the chieftaincy of Tullaghaw (county of Cavan), received wounds on that day of which he died, after he had reached his own house.

Cathal Bodhar, the son of Cathal O'Rourke, and Malachy O'Gormley, fell by each other's hands in the course of this contest, after Cathal O'Conor had marched his forces a second time into Tirconnell, on which occasion a party from the territory of O'Gormley, came in contact with Cathal Bodhar O'Rourke.

Murtogh, son of Thomas O'Flynn of Line, heir to the lordship of Hy Tuirtre (in Antrim), was slain by Hugh, son of Bryan, son of Hugh Buidhe O'Neill.

Bryan Mac Donogh, heir to the lordship of Tirerrill (in Sligo), was slain by Mac Sencha, of the party of O'Gara.

Henry, son of Ulick, son of Rickard Burke (in Galway), died.

Murrough Oge Mac Mahon, heir to the lordship of Corco Baiscind (in the county of Clare), was slain by the O'Briens.

Manus O'Dowd, son of the lord of Tireragh (in Sligo), and Hugh, son of Conor Mac Egan, the chief Brehon (judge) in Ireland, died.

Donal, son of Teige O'Mahony, was slain.

Art, son of Awlave O'Rourke, was slain by Mac Gennis (of the county of Down).

A. D. 1360.

Maolrooney, son of Cammuinelach (the crooked necked), O'Boyle, chief of the three Tuatha (in Donegal), a man distinguished for dignity, hospitality, wisdom, heroism, and protection, died.

Awlave, son of Geoffrey Mac Rannall, was slain.

Sir Robert Savadge (of the county of Down), and Dermot O'Hanley (of Roscommon), died.

Roscommon, Ennis, Sligo, and the monasteries of Lisgoole (in Fermanagh), Fenagh (in Leitrim), and Drumlias (in Sligo), were burned.

John, son of Gilcreest O'Rourke, was slain by Hugh Mac Dorchy.

Dermot O'Brien was deposed by his brother's son.

Dermot, son of Donogh Riavach Mac Dermott, was slain by Cathal Oge, the son of Cathal O'Conor.

The daughter of Torlogh O'Conor, the wife of Fergal O'Reilly (of Cavan), was killed by a fall.

A bridge of stone and mortar was built by Cathal Oge O'Conor over the river of Ballysadare.

Fergal, son of Geoffrey Mac Rannall (of Leitrim), and Tuathal O'Feenaghty (of Galway), died.

Naovoge O'Duigenan (of Roscommon), died.

Cathal, son of the Caoch Mac Rannall, was slain.

Giolla-na-neev O'Conmaighe (O'Conway), chief professor of music in Thomond, died.

The king of England's son¹ came to Ireland.

Art, son of the Giolla Riavach Mac Gennis (county of Down), was treacherously slain by the family of the Savadges, and the son of Murtogh Riaganach Mac Gennis.

Cathal O'Conor marched with a force into Tyrawley (in Mayo), and destroyed many houses and churches.

A. D. 1360.

1. The King of England's son was Lionel, duke of Clarence, son to Edward III., who being appointed by his father, lord lieutenant of Ireland, landed at Dublin on the 15th of September, with a force of fifteen hundred men, consisting of archers and men at arms, together with Ralph, earl of Stafford, who was one of the commanders under the Black Prince, at the battle of Cressy; James Butler, earl of Ormond; sir John Carew; sir William Windsor, and other knights. A curious account of the pay received by these officers and soldiers is given at page 25 in the Tracts of sir John Davies. The Duke of Clarence was accompanied by his countess, Elizabeth, daughter of William de Burgo, earl of Ulster, whose death is recorded in these Annals, at A.D. 1333, and in right of his wife he became earl of Ulster and lord of Connaught, titles still held by the royal family of England. The Duke of Clarence held the office of lord lieutenant to A.D. 1367, and in his administration was held the celebrated parliament at Kilkenny, in which was passed the Act called the Statute of Kilkenny, which prohibited, under penalty of high treason, the families of Anglo-Norman or English descent, settled in Ireland, to form any alliances or intermarriages with the native Irish, thus endeavouring to prevent all intercourse between them; and prohibiting the Anglo-Irish from adopting Irish surnames, the Irish language, dress, manners, or customs; and also making it penal to appoint any of the native Irish to ecclesiastical livings, bishops' sees, abbotships over monasteries, or any other preferments.

A. D. 1361.

Benedict O'Moghan, crenach of Kill Athrachta,¹ died.

Art Mac Murrough, king of Leinster,² and Donal Riavaeh (Mac Murrough) heir presumptive to the crown of Leinster, were treacherously taken prisoners by the king of England's son, at his own residence, and they died in prison.

Cormac Ballach O'Melaghlin, king of Meath; Donogh O'Loughlin, lord of Corcamroe (in Clare); Cathal and Murtoth, the sons of Hugh, son of Owen; Dubhoge, daughter of Hugh Mac Guire, the wife of Cuchonacht, the son of Philip Mac Mahon (of Monaghan); Thomas Mac Tiarnan, chief of Tullyhunco (county of Cavan); Nicholas O'Feenaghty (of the county of Galway); and Tuathal O'Malley (of Mayo), died.

Sir Edmond Burke; Raymond, the son of Burke of Buine; Walter Stanton; and Gilbert Mac Myler, died.

Cluithe-an-Righ (some epidemic disease), prevailed throughout Ireland generally, of which Richard Savadge died. Magrath O'Finn, chief professor of Siol Murray (Rosecommon), in music and minstrelsy, died.

Great depredations were committed by Mac William Burke, Bermingham, and all the English of Connaught, on Cathal Oge, the son of Cathal O'Conor, and they plundered and devastated Lieney and Tireragh (in Sligo); Cathal after that marched with a force, to retaliate for all the devastations they had committed, and they plundered the people of Birmingham, and the territory of Edmond Mac Hoberd (Burke), and spoiled and laid waste the entire country.

A. D. 1362.

O'Beollan, the abbot of Drumeliff (in Sligo); Giolla Aneovde Mac Mughroin, crenach of Killaniomaire¹; Oirechtach Mac Brennan, arehdeacon of Elphin; Aongus Mac Anaglaigh, crenach of Killarry; O'Fergus, vicar of Iomtha; and Murragh Mac Teige, the monk, died.

Owen Fionn (the Fair) O'Conor, son of the king of Connaught; Maolrooney O'Dowd (in Sligo), and his wife, the daughter of Mac Donogh; Niall Mac Ganran, chief of Tullaghaw (county of Cavan); Dermot, son of John O'Ferrall, lord of Annaly; Carbry O'Quinn, chief of Muintir Giollgain (in Longford); Donal, son of Roderick O'Kelly (of Galway); Tomaltach O'Beirne (of Rosecommon); Murtoth Don Mac Oiraghty (of Rosecommon); Owen O'Malley, and Dermot, his son, both lords of Umalia (in Mayo), died.

Peregrine Mac Geoghegan, son of Dermot Mac Geoghegan, and Maurice, son of Murtoth Mac Geoghegan, died.

Cathal Oge, and the son of Felim O'Conor, took the castle of Ballintobber (in Rosecommon).

Hugh, son of Felim O'Conor, king of Connaught, and Cathal Oge O'Conor, marched with a great army into Meath, which they burned and laid waste; they also burned Kilkenny, with its fourteen churches, in which the English had taken up their quarters, and after inflicting great injuries on them in that expedition, they returned safe to their own homes.

Teige, son of Conor, son of Torlogh O'Brien, was slain by the Clan Coilein (of Clare).

Cathal Oge O'Conor, the most illustrious heir presumptive, for excellence, magnanimity, power, honour, hospitality, and generosity, of his time, died in Sligo, of the plague.

Murtoth, son of Thomas, son of Cathal Riavaeh O'Rourke (in Leitrim), died.

Donal, son of O'Kelly (of Galway), and Cuchonaht O'Duigenan, vicar of Kilronan (in Rosecommon), died.

Awlave Mac Firis, chief historian elect of Hy Fiachra (in Sligo); Fergal, son of Teige Mac Egan, a learned Brehon; John, son of Donogh Mac Firis, chief historian elect of Hy Fiachra; Dermot, son of Mac Carthy (of Cork); Conor, son of Malachy Carrach O'Dowd, and Murtoth his son, died.

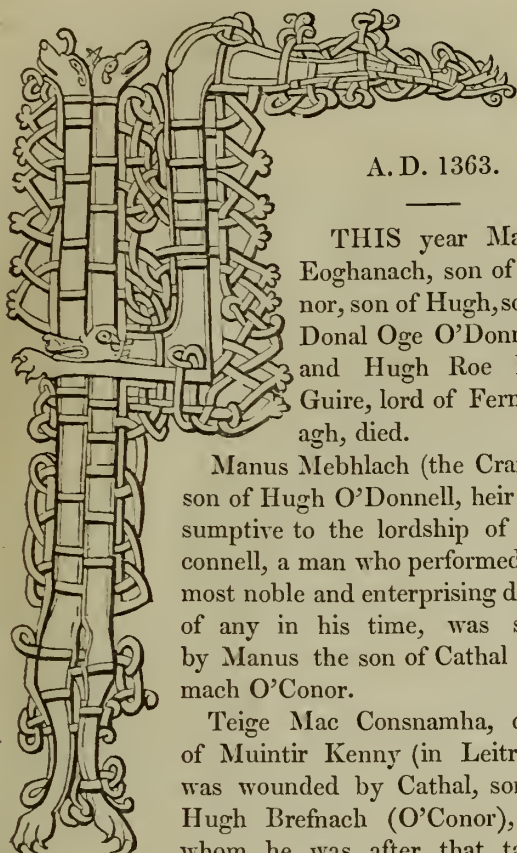

A. D. 1361.

1. Kill Athracht, now Killaraght, a parish in the barony of Coolavin, county of Sligo, so called from Athrachta, a female saint, who founded a nunnery there in the fifth century.

2. King of Leinster. It appears that these two chiefs of the Mac Murroughs were confined in Dublin Castle, where, according to some accounts, they were put to death by the English.

A. D. 1362.

1. Kill-an-Iomaire, now the parish of Killanummery, in the diocese of Ardagh, county of Leitrim. Kill-Arraidh, now the parish of Killery in Sligo. Iomtha, now Immagh, or Omey, an island off the coast of Galway, where there was an ancient abbey, founded by St. Feichin.

A. D. 1363.

THIS year Manus Eoghanach, son of Connor, son of Hugh, son of Donal Oge O'Donnell; and Hugh Roe Mac Guire, lord of Fermanagh, died.

Manus Mebhlach (the Crafty), son of Hugh O'Donnell, heir presumptive to the lordship of Tirconnell, a man who performed the most noble and enterprising deeds of any in his time, was slain by Manus the son of Cathal Sramach O'Conor.

Teige Mac Consnamha, chief of Muintir Kenny (in Leitrim), was wounded by Cathal, son of Hugh Brefnach (O'Conor), by whom he was after that taken prisoner; and he died in his imprisonment.

It is necessary to observe that the above figure represents the two ancient Irish letters I N. One of these ornamental letters has been given with each number of these Annals, and will be so continued in every succeeding number, the publisher having for that purpose, at a great cost, got all of them engraved by one of the ablest artists in Dublin, being anxious to preserve these curious and beautiful specimens of ancient Irish art, but few of which have been ever engraved in any printed works, and which are only to be found in the old Irish MSS., many of them illuminated, and of very elegant execution; and though many of them are as early at least as the fifth and sixth centuries, as for instance, in the Book of St. Columkille, or the Book of Kells, the original of which is in the library of Trinity College, Dublin, yet, in point of execution and colouring they could not be excelled, or probably equalled by any artists at the present day. As to the ancient Irish MSS. themselves, they furnish some of the most beautiful specimens of penmanship in any language, and are even considered in beauty superior to any specimens of typography.

ON THE ANCIENT DIVISIONS OF IRELAND.

According to our ancient annalists, the first colonies which came to Ireland were Scythians, namely, the Partholians and Nemedians, and afterwards, the colonies of Firbolgs, Tuath De Danans, and Milesians, who were also either Celts or Scythians. The Fomorians or African pirates also settled in the north of Ireland in early ages. Accounts of all these colonies have been already given in the notes on North and South Connaught, Dalriada, and Tir Conaill.

Lasairiona, or Catharina, daughter of O'Ferrall, and wife of O'Reilly (of Cavan), died.

Murtogh Roe, son of Donal, of Erris O'Conor, was slain by Teige Mac Manus.

Bebin, daughter of Mac Geoghegan, and wife of the Sionach (Fox of Westmeath), died.

Cathal Mac Donogh (of Sligo), was slain by the people of Moylurg.

An awful storm of wind in this year destroyed many churches and buildings, and many ships and vessels were sunk.

Conor O'Dowd was slain by Donogh O'Dowd and Murtogh O'Dowd.

A. D. 1364.

Hugh O'Neill, king of Tyrone, the best Irishman in his time, died, after gaining the palm of victory for justice, hospitality, and magnanimity.

Dermot O'Brien, lord of Thomond; Malachy, son of Murrough, son of Giolla-na-neev, son of Hugh, son of Awlave (O'Ferrall), lord of Annaly; Dervail, daughter of O'Donnell, and wife of Mac Guire (of Fermanagh); Donal Mac Guire, chief of Clan Fergaile (barony of Knockninny, county of Fermanagh); Giolla-na-neev O'Duibhda Boireann, chief Brehon of Corcomroe (in the county

The Firbolgs divided Ireland into five portions or provinces, over each of which they placed a king.

The Tuath De Danans, according to some accounts, divided the island into three parts, with a king over each, one of whom ruled alternately as supreme monarch over the entire country.

The Milesians under their princes, the three brothers, Heber, Heremon, and Ir, divided the island among them into three parts; Heremon and his posterity, called Heremonians, had Leinster and Connaught; Ir, and his descendants, called Irians, and Clanna Rory, or Rudricans, had Ulster; and Heber Fionn, or Heber the Fair and his posterity, called Heberians, had Munster. The kings of the race of Ir or Clanna Rory, it appears, were very powerful in early times, for, according to our annalists, about nine centuries before the Christian era, two brothers, princes of the posterity of Ir, divided the entire island between them. Sobairce had the portion from Drogheda northwards, and built his chief fortress at Dun Sobairce, now Dunseverick, near the Giant's Causeway, in the county of Antrim; and his brother Cearmna had his chief fortress at Dun Cearmna, near the place now called Kinsale, in the county of Cork.

Ugaine Mor, or Hugony the Great, who was monarch of Ireland, of the race of Heremon, nearly four centuries before the Christian era, divided the island into twenty-five portions among his twenty-five children, namely, twenty-two sons and three daughters.

Eochaidh Feidhlioch, who was monarch of Ireland, of the race of Heremon, a short time before the Christian era, divided the kingdom into five provinces, namely, Ulster, Connaught, Leinster, and the two provinces of Munster.

of Clare); and Aiffric, daughter of Bryan O'Reilly (of Cavan), the wife of Bryan Mac Tiarnan, died.

Tuathal Teachtmair, monarch of Ireland, of the race of Heremon, in the beginning of the second century, formed a new division of Ireland into five provinces, and having taken a portion from each of the provinces of Leinster, Munster, Ulster, and Connaught, as already explained in the note on Meath, formed the new province of Meath, which was to be appropriated as mensal lands for the use of the monarchs of Ireland. This division continued for many centuries, and even long after the Anglo-Norman invasion; a king ruling over each of the five provinces or kingdoms, namely, Meath, Ulster, Connaught, Leinster, and Munster, the Irish government being a Pentarchy, and a supreme monarch being elected to preside over all the provincial kings, and designated Ard righ, or the High King. The island being thus divided into five provinces, the name of a province in Irish was Coigeadh, which signifies a fifth part.

About the middle of the second century, Con Cead Cathaich, or Con of the hundred battles, monarch of Ireland, of the race of Heremon, and grandson of the monarch Tuathal Teachtmair, having long and fierce contests for the sovereignty of Ireland with Eogan Mor, called Mogha Nuadhat, king of Munster, of the race of Heber, they at length agreed to divide the kingdom between them into two parts, by a line drawn direct from Dublin to Galway; the northern half, consisting of the kingdoms of Meath, Ulster, and Connaught, being Con's share, and hence called Leath Cuinn, or Con's half; and the southern portions or kingdoms of Leinster and Munster, being allotted to Mogha Nuadhat, and hence called Leath Mogha, or Mogha's half; and this division was long recognised in after times, and is often mentioned in the course of these annals.

The Kingdom of Meath, as already described in the note on Meath, comprised the present counties of Meath and Westmeath, with parts of Longford, King's county, Kildare, and Dublin; and in the early ages, like other parts of Ireland, was ruled by the Firbolgs and Danans, and lastly by the Milesians of the race of Heremon. The ancient kingdom of Meath was in after times added to the province of Leinster.

The Kingdom of Ulster comprised the present counties of Armagh, Down, Antrim, Tyrone, Derry, Donegal, Fermanagh, and Monaghan, with a portion of the eastern part of Cavan, the greater part of Cavan, called East Bredney, belonging to Connaught. Ulster also contained the present county of Louth, which was part of Orgiall, as explained in the note on Orgiall, the boundaries between Ulster and Meath being the rivers Boyne and Blackwater, from Drogheda to Kells. The Firbolgs, Danans, and Fomorians ruled over Ulster in the early ages; and afterwards the Milesians, of the race of Ir or Clanna Rory; but in the fourth and fifth centuries, the race of Ir were conquered by the Heremonians of the race of Hy Niall and Clan Colla, who became rulers of Ulster, as already explained in the notes on Orgiall, Tir Eogain, and Tir Conaill.

The Kingdom of Connaught, as explained in the notes on North and South Connaught and Bredney, comprised the present counties of Sligo, Mayo, Galway, Roscommon, and Leitrim, with the greater part of Cavan, which was part of ancient Bredney. The territory of the present county of Clare also originally belonged to Connaught, but was in early times added to Munster. Connaught in the early ages was ruled by the Firbolgs, Danans, and Fomorians, and lastly by the Milesians of the race of Heremon.

The Kingdom of Leinster comprised the present counties of Wexford, Wicklow, Carlow, with the greater part of Kilkenny, the Queen's county, the greater part of the King's county, and of Kildare, and that part of Dublin south of the river Liffey; but in after times, the kingdom of Meath, and also the county of Louth in Ulster, were added to the province of Leinster. The Firbolgs and Danans were the first rulers of Leinster, and lastly the Milesians of the race of Heremon.

The Kingdom of Munster, in Irish, Mumha, Mumhan, and Mumhain, according to O'Flaherty's Ogygia, derived its name from Donal, son of Roderick O'Kelly, heir presumptive to the lordship of Hy Maine, died.

Giolla-na-neev Mac Gowan, of the records, a Eochaidh Mumho, who was king of Munster and monarch of Ireland of the race of Heber, about eight centuries before the Christian era; Munster is latinised Momonia. Ancient Munster comprised the present counties of Tipperary, Waterford, Cork, Kerry, Limerick, and part of Kilkenny, to which was added the territory now forming the county of Clare, by Lughaidh Meann, king of Munster, of the race of the Dalcassians in the latter end of the third century, who took it from Connaught and added it to Munster. Ancient Munster is mentioned under the following divisions, namely, Tuadh Mumhan or North Munster, anglicised Thomond; Deas Mumhan, or South Munster, rendered Desuond; Urmhumha or Oirmhumha, which signifies East Munster, and has been anglicised Ormond, and Iar Mumhan, or West Munster. These divisions will be followed in the course of these notes; and in the first place will be given the history and topography of the kingdom of Thomond, with its chiefs and clans.

1. Thomond, under its ancient kings, extended from the isles of Arran, off the coast of Galway, to the mountain of Eibline, near Cashel in Tipperary, thence to Carn Feradaigh, now Knock Aiue, in Limerick, and from Leim Chuehullain or Cuchullin's Leap, now Loophead, at the mouth of the Shannon in the county of Clare, to Sliabh Dala mountain in Ossory, on the borders of Tipperary, Kilkenny, and Queen's county, thus comprising the present counties of Clare and Limerick, with the greater part of Tipperary, but in after times Thomond was confined to the present county of Clare.

The Milesians of the race of Heber or the Heberians, as above explained, possessed Munster, but the descendants of Ith, son of Bregoin, and uncle of Milesius, also possessed in early times a great part of Munster. The race of Heber furnished most of the kings of Munster, and many of them were also monarchs of Ireland. The Heberians are called by the old annalists Deirgtheine, from one of their ancient kings named Deirgtheine. The race of Ith or Ithians also furnished many kings of Munster, and some of them were also monarchs of Ireland in the early ages. They were called Dairine, from one of their kings so named. The Deirgtinians and Dairinians had frequent contests before the period of the Christian era, for the sovereignty of Munster, which they at length agreed to hold alternately; thus while the head of one race reigned as king, the other held the office of chief Brehon or judge.

The Clanna Deaghaidh, another colony, also settled in Munster a short time before the Christian era. They were named Deagadhs or Degadians, from Deagadh or Deag their chief, and as stated in O'Flaherty's Ogygia, (vol. ii., p. 142), were also called Ernans, from Oilioll Aronn, a prince of Ulster, and grandfather of Deag. These Deagadians or Ernans were of the race of Heremon, and being expelled from Ulster by the race of Ir, or Clanna Rory, went to Munster, where they were favourably received, and had lands allotted to them by Duach, king of Munster, of the race of Heber, who was also monarch of Ireland. The Clanna Deagha make a remarkable figure in the ancient history of Munster; they had extensive possessions, became very powerful, and, as stated by Keating, O'Flaherty, O'Halloran, and other historians, were the chief military commanders of Munster, and masters nearly of the entire country. Some of them became kings of Munster, and three of them also monarchs of Ireland, namely, Eiderscol, and his son Conaire, about the beginning of the Christian era; and Conaire II., a descendant of Conaire I., was monarch of Ireland in the beginning of the third century. From Cairbre Riada, son of Conaire II., were descended the Dalriadians, princes of Ulster, who planted a colony in Albain, afterwards called Scotland, in the third century; and from them were descended the Scottish kings of Milesian race, and the royal house of Stuart. In the second century, the Deagas becoming so powerful as nearly to assume the entire sovereignty of Munster, to the exclusion of the race of Heber, they were attacked and conquered by the celebrated Eogan More, or Mogha Nuadhat, who expelled them from Munster, except such families of them as yielded him submission. Amongst the chiefs of the learned historian; Dermot O'Sgingin, chief historiographer of Tircconnell; and Margaret, daughter of Walter Burke, the wife of Hugh, son of Felim O'Connor, king of Connaught, died.

Clanna Deagadh, are mentioned Daire, and his son Conrigh Mac Daire, famous warriors in Munster about the beginning of the Christian era; and celebrated by the ancient bards, amongst the cotemporary heroes Cuchullain, and Conall Cearnach, chiefs of the Red Branch Knights of Ulster. This warrior, Conrigh Mac Daire, had his fortress, called Cathair Conraidh, on the top of a mountain still called Cabir Conrigh, situated between the bays of Castlemain and Tralee, in the county of Kerry; and of this fortress, composed of huge stones in a circular form, there are some remains to this day; and on the opposite shore, at the mouth of the Shannon, is a promontory called Loophead, anciently named Leim Chuchullain, or Cuchullan's Leap, from which place the ancient bards state that the famous hero Cuchullain set out, when on his expedition to attack Conraidh Mac Daire, whom he slew. On the hill of Knockfennell, near Lough Gur in Limerick, are the remains of an immense fortress of Cyclopean architecture, of a circular form, three hundred and sixty feet in circumference, with walls ten feet thick, composed of massive stones accurately laid together without cement; and on Calan mountain in the county Clare are some huge stones, said to be the tomb of Conan, one of the celebrated Fenian heroes of the third century.

About the beginning of the Christian era, Eochaidh Abrat Ruadh, or Eochy of the Red Brows, of the race of Heber, a man of gigantic stature, was king of South Munster; and Conrigh Mac Daire was prince of North Munster, and was succeeded by Cairbre Finn More, son of the monarch Conaire, also of the Clanna Deagadh, as king of Munster. In the second century, amongst the battles fought by the monarch Tuathal Teachtmair, are mentioned those of Magh Raighne, and of Clar or Clare, in which fell Felim and Conall, two princes of the Deagadhs of Munster, as mentioned in O'Flaherty's Ogygia, vol. ii. pp. 192, 195; and Eochaidh, the son of Daire, succeeded as king of both Munsters. In the latter end of the second century, Eogan More, or Mogha Nuadhat, called also Eogan Taidhleach, or Eogan the Splendid, of the race of Heber, and maternally descended from the Clanna Deagadhs, was a celebrated warrior; and having contended for the monarchy of Ireland with Con of the Hundred Battles, they at last divided the island between them as already stated; but Eogan being afterwards defeated, and forced to fly into Spain, where he lived many years in exile, and married Beara, a Spanish princess, daughter to Heber, king of Castile; and entering into a confederacy with Fraech, the son of Heber, they collected a powerful army, with which they landed in Ireland, to recover the sovereignty from Con of the Hundred Battles, and both armies, A.D. 192, fought a tremendous battle on the plain of Moylena, in which Con was victorious, and Eogan More was killed by Goll, the son of Morna, a celebrated champion of Connaught of the Firbolg race. The place where this battle was fought, as stated in O'Flaherty's Ogygia, (vol. ii. p. 212), is the ancient barony of Fircall in the King's county, and there are still to be seen there two hillocks or sepulchral mounds, in one of which was buried the body of Eogan, and in the other that of Fraech, the Spaniard, who was also slain in that battle.

Oilioll Olum, the son of Eogan More by the Spanish princess Beara, and son-in-law of the monarch Con of the Hundred Battles, being married to his daughter Saba, having contended with Lughaidh Mac Con, a prince of the race of Ith, for the sovereignty of Munster, defeated him and Nemeth, prince of the Ernans, in a great battle at Ceann Febradh, in which Eogan, the son of Oilioll, slew Dadar the Druid, and Nemeth was slain by Cairbre Riada; after this victory, Oilioll Olum became king of Munster.

Oilioll Olum had three sons, Eogan, Cormac Cas, and Cian, and by his will, he made a regulation that the kingdom of Munster should be ruled alternately by one of the posterity of Eogan and Cormac Cas. From Cormac Cas, king of Munster, or according to others, from his descendant Cais, who was king of Thomond in the fifth century, their posterity got the name Dal Cais or Dal Gais, anglicised Dalcassians, the various families of whom, were located chiefly in that part of Thomond which forms the present county of Clare, and the ruling family of them were the O'Briens, kings of Thomond. From Eogan, another of the sons of Oilioll Olum, were descended the Eoganachts or Eugenians, who were, alternately with the Dalcassians, kings of Munster, and sometimes styled kings of Cashel. The Eugenians possessed Desmond, or South Munster, the present counties of Cork and Kerry, and they also had a territory, part of the present county of Tipperary, about Cashel, called the Eoganacht of Cashel. The head family of the Eugenians were the Mac Carthys, princes of Desmond. From Cian, the third son of Oilioll Olum, were descended the Clan Kian, who were located chiefly in Ormond, and the chief of which families were the O'Carrolls, princes of Ely. An account of the various families of the Dalcassians, Eugenians, and Clan Kian, and of the other Milesian families of Munster, are given in the subsequent part of the present article on Thomond, and in the notes on Desmond and Ormond. In the latter end of the third century, Lughaidh Meann, king of Munster, of the race of the Dalcassians, took the territory afterwards called the county of Clare, from Connaught, and added it to Thomond. Conall Eachluath, or Conall of the Swift Steeds, son of Lughaidh Meann, became king of Munster. Criointhan, monarch of Ireland, who was also a descendant of Oilioll Olum, and is celebrated for his foreign expeditions into Gaul and Britain, during his absence appointed Conall Eachluath as regent of the kingdom, being distinguished for his great valour. Cais, the son of Couall, was prince of Thomond, and Carthen Dubh, the son of Cais, succeeded as prince of the Dalcassians. In the seventh century, A.D. 622, Guaire, king of Connaught, having collected a great army, marched into Thomond, for the purpose of recovering the territory of Clare, which had been taken from Connaught, and fought a great battle against the Munster forces commanded by Failhe Flann and Dioma, kings of Munster, but the Conacians were defeated, and, according to some accounts, four thousand of them were slain. The place where this battle was fought was called Carn Feradaigh, which, according to Steward's Topography, is now called Knock Aine in the county of Limerick. In the ninth and tenth centuries the Danes overran various parts of Ireland, and made settlements, particularly in the sea-ports of Dublin, Wexford, Waterford, Limerick, and Cork. In the middle of the tenth century, from A.D. 940 to 950, Ceallachan, king of Cashel, of the Eugénian race, a celebrated warrior, carried on long and fierce contests with the Danes, whom he defeated in many battles, in one of which, described by O'Halloran as fought at a place called Sainangeal, now Singland, near Limerick, the Danes were defeated with dreadful slaughter, their chief commander, Aulaf, having his skull cloven through his helmet by Ceallachan himself, with a single stroke of his battle-axe. The chiefs under Ceallachan acted with equal valour; O'Sullivan killed in single combat, and cut off the head of Moran, son of the king of Denmark; O'Keeffe ran his spear through the body of Magnus, the Danish standard bearer; and Lochlin, another Danish chief, was slain in single combat by O'Riordan. Ceallachan, king of Cashel, died A.D. 952. Lorecan, king of Munster, of the Dalcassian race, died A.D. 942. Cineidi, son of Lorecan, succeeded as king of Thomond, and dying A.D. 950, was succeeded by his son Mahon, who became king of Munster. Mahon was a celebrated warrior and fought many battles against the Danes, over whom he gained great victories, particularly at the battle of Sulcbaid, near Limerick, fought A.D. 959, in which more than 2,000 of the foreigners were slain; and Brian, brother of Mahon, then a young man, displayed great bravery in this battle. Mahon having been slain by one of the Irish chiefs of Thomond, named Donovan, was succeeded as king of Munster, A.D. 965, by his brother Brian, afterwards known as the celebrated Brian Boroinhe. According to O'Halloran, Mac Curtin, and others, he was called Brian Boroinhe, or Brian of the Tributes, from the word Boroinhe, which signifies a tribute of cattle, in consequence of his having exacted tribute from the people of Leinster, as a punishment for their having assisted the Danes in their wars with the Irish; or, according to O'Brien, in his Irish dictionary, at the word Borunha, he got his name from a town so called near Killaloe, in the county of Clare, adjoining which he had his palace of Ceann Coradli. Brian, while king of Munster, for a period of more than thirty years, carried on incessant war with the Danes, whom he defeated, according to some accounts, in forty battles, chiefly fought in Munster and Leinster, and having attained greater power than any of the Irish kings, he marched his victorious forces through all parts of Ireland, reducing to subjection the provincial kings and chiefs, and obtaining hostages from them; and finally, in A. D. 1002, deposed the monarch, Malachy II., and assumed the sovereignty of Ireland, thus setting aside the Ily Niall kings of the race of Heremon, who had exclusively ruled as monarchs of Ireland for a period of six hundred years. Brian, having ruled as monarch of Ireland for twelve years, fought the great battle of Clontarf, in which he totally defeated the Danes, on Good Friday, the 23rd of April, A. D. 1014, but after the victory was himself slain, unawares, in his tent, by Brodar, a Danish chief. Brian, at the time of his death, was in the 88th year of his age, and his body was conveyed to Armagh, and buried in St. Patrick's cathedral, with great honours and solemnity. Brian is represented by our old annalists as a man of fine figure, of large stature, of great strength of body, and undaunted valour, and has been always justly celebrated as one of the greatest of the Irish monarchs, equally conspicuous for his mental endowments and physical energies; a man of great intellectual powers, sagacity, and bravery; a warrior and legislator; and, at the same time, distinguished for his munificence, piety, and patronage of learned men; thus combining all the elements of a great character, equally eminent in the arts of war and peace; a hero and patriot whose memory will always remain famous as one of the foremost of the Irish kings in wisdom and valour. Murchertach Mac Liag, chief bard, historian, and secretary to Brian Boru, wrote his life, and an account of his wars with the Danes, together with many beautiful poems on his heroic actions. An account of Mac Liag's works is to be found, at the year 1015, in O'Reilly's Irish Writers, and from these curious and valuable MSS. an interesting life of Brian Boru could be compiled. In the chronological poem on the kings of Ireland, written in the twelfth century by Giolla Modhda O'Cassidy, abbot of Ardracean, and given in the first volume of O'Conor's Rerum Ilb. Scriptores, is the following verse on Brian Boru:—

A. D. 1365.

Patrick O'Congaile, parson and erenach of Ross Airthir (Rossory in Fermanagh), died.

“Fiach fairrgi, tuile tric
Brian breo os Banbha blaith bric,
Cen cianhuir, cen bed, cen brath,
Da bliadhain decc a degh rath,
Denmairec Atha cliath na eclann
Dibherga Laochda Lochlann.”

“A raven of the sea—a rapid torrent,
Was Brian the brave over Banba (Ireland) of varied fame,
Free from sadness, free from grief, and free from stain,
For twelve years of deserved prosperity,
To Dublin (Clontarf) of the clans of woeful deeds Against the warring chiefs of Loehlinn (Denmark).”

Brian lived at his palace of Ceann Coradh, or Kincora, which, according to O'Halloran, was called Ball Borumha, signifying the habitation of Boruma, in a style of regal splendour and magnificence unequalled by any of the Irish kings since the days of Cormac, the celebrated monarch of Ireland in the third century, the glories of whose palace at Tara were for many ages the theme of the Irish bards. The palace of Kincora was situated on the banks of the Shannon, near Killaloe, in the county of Clare, and some extensive earthen ramparts, shewing its site, remain to this day. An account of the revenues and tributes paid to Brian is given in Keating's Ireland, from the first volume of Valancey's Collectanea, translated from the ancient record called Leabhar na g-Ceart, or the Book of Rights, which gives an account of the tributes and revenues of the Irish kings and princes. A perfect copy of the Book of Rights is in the library of Sir William Betham, with a full translation of it into English by the translator of these Annals. The following tributes were paid to Brian Boru, at his palace of Kincora, annually, on the first day of November: From Connaught, 800 cows and 800 hogs. From Tirconnell or Donegal, 500 cows, and 500 cloaks or mantles. From Tir Eogain, or Tyrone, 60 hogs, and 60 loads of iron. From the Clanna Rory of Ulster, 150 cows and 150 hogs. From the people of Orgiall, now the counties of Louth, Monaghan, and Armagh, 160 cows. From the province of Leinster, 300 bullocks, 300 hogs, and 300 loads of iron. From the people of Ossory, 60 beeves, 60 hogs, and 60 loads of iron. Besides these tributes he had also large revenues from the two kingdoms of Munster, the Dalcassian clans of Thomond being the only people who had the privilege of exemption from all tributes. Together with the above contributions, Brian, when he conquered the Danes, gave them permission to reside in some of the chief cities of Leinster and Munster, for purposes of commerce, but for such permission compelled the Danes of Limerick to deliver him annually 365 pipes of red wine, and levied 150 pipes of wine on the Danes of Dublin.

Roderick, son of Donal O'Neill, was slain with the east of a javelin, by Malachy, son of Anghir Mac Cathmaoil (of Tyrone.)

The O'Briens took their name from Brian Boru, and the following account of his successors, the O'Briens, kings of Munster and Thomond, have been collected from the Four Masters; from the histories of O'Halloran, Mac Geoghegan, &c.; from Ware, and various other sources: Donogh O'Brien, the son of Brian Boru, succeeded his father as king of Munster, and was partly acknowledged as monarch of Ireland. He abdicated the throne of Munster A. D. 1063, and retired to Rome, where he died, in the monastery of St. Stephen, in the 88th year of his age. The second wife of Donogh was Driella, daughter of Godwin, earl of Kent, and sister to Harold, the last Saxon king of England; and after William the Conqueror had defeated and slain Harold, at the battle of Hastings, A. D. 1066, Edmond, Godwin, and Magnus, sons of Harold, retired to Ireland, and resided at the court of their relative, Torlogh O'Brien, king of Munster. Torlogh O'Brien, the nephew of Donogh, and grandson of Brian Boru, succeeded as king of Munster, and was also generally acknowledged as monarch of Ireland. He was a prince of great power and valour, and died at his palace of Kincora, A. D. 1086, in the 77th year of his age. His three sons, Teige, Murtoigh, and Dermot, contended for the throne of Munster, but Murtoigh O'Brien became at last king of Munster, and had many contests for the monarchy of Ireland with Donal Mac Loughlin, king of Ulster, who, having marched to Munster with a powerful force, took and burned to the ground the royal palace of Kincora, A. D. 1088; but in the year 1101 Murtoigh marched a powerful army into Ulster, and having proceeded to Easroe, or Ballyshannon, and to Inisowen, took the fortress of Aileach, the celebrated residence of the kings of Ulster, which he totally demolished, in retaliation for the destruction of Kincora. Murtoigh O'Brien was a powerful prince, and one of his daughters was married to Sigurd, king of the Hebrides and Isle of Mann, and son of Magnus the celebrated king of Norway; and it is said that one of his relatives, a prince of the O'Briens, was also king of the Isle of Mann. A. D. 1095, Murtoigh invaded Leinster, and having expelled Godfrey Merenagh, the Danish king of Dublin, became himself king of Dublin and Fingal, and ruled over the greater part of Leinster, and appointed his son Donal governor of Dublin. Murtoigh O'Brien being deposed, A. D. 1116, retired to the monastery of Lismore, where he died, A. D. 1119. Dermot O'Brien, his brother, succeeded as king of Munster. Conor O'Brien, son of Dermot, succeeded as king of Munster, A. D. 1120, and died at Killaloe, A. D. 1142. Torlogh O'Brien, brother of Conor, succeeded as king of Munster; but Teige, son of Dermot O'Brien, having contended with him for the sovereignty, was assisted by Torlogh O'Conor, king of Connaught, who, having collected a powerful force, marched to Munster, joined by the men of Meath and those of Leinster, under Dermot Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, and also aided by Dermot Mac Carthy, king of Desmond. A bloody hospitality and generosity; and Tomaltach, son of Murcha O'Ferrall, died.

Felim, the hospitable, son of Donal O'Conor, lord of Corcomroe (in Clare), a man of unbounded

battle was fought at a place called Moin More, or the Great Bog, between Cork and the River Blackwater, A.D. 1151, in which 9000 of the Dalcassians were totally defeated; and, according to the Four Masters, and the Book of Leacan, upwards of 7000 of them were slain, together with Murtoth, the son of Conor O'Brien, prince of Thomond, and heir presumptive to the throne of Munster; Lughad, the son of Donald O'Brien, and the following chiefs: Aueslis O'Grady, lord of Hy Caissin, and five others of the O'Gradys; Flaherty O'Dea, and eight other chiefs of the O'Deas; two of the O'Kennedys; nine chiefs of the O'Seanchans; upwards of twenty-four chiefs of the O'Hogans; five of the O'Neils, and many other chiefs. Torlogh O'Brien died A.D. 1167, and was succeeded by his son, Murtoth O'Brien, who was killed the following year by Conor O'Brien, or, according to other accounts, by the people of Desmond, who, on account of his death, had to pay an eraic, or fine, of 3000 cows, as stated by O'Halloran. Donal O'Brien, brother of Murtoth, succeeded, and was king of Thomond at the period of the Anglo-Norman invasion.

The O'Briens had long and fierce contests to maintain their independence against the Anglo-Norman and English settlers; but they held their rank as kings and princes of Thomond, and are also styled kings of Limerick down to the reign of Henry VIII., and many celebrated chiefs of them are mentioned in the course of these Annals. The O'Briens in the twelfth century are thus designated in the topographical poem of O'Heerin:

"Airdrigh air Eirinn uile
O'Briain bile na Boruimhe
O crich Caisil cead do chind Treabh os taisibh an tailginn."

"High king of all Erin,
Is O'Brien, the stately tree of Boruime,
Over the country of Cashel by permission ordained
A tribe of protecting chiefs are the pious warriors."

The place of inauguration of the O'Briens as kings and princes of Thomond, as stated in O'Brien's Dictionary, at the word Bile, was at Magh Adhair, a plain in the barony of Tullagh, county of Clare, at a large tree there, the word Bile, in Irish, signifying a tree, hence the place was called Bile Magh Adhair. The battle-cry of the O'Briens was Lamh laidir an uachdar, or the strong hand uppermost, and on their armorial ensigns were three lions rampant, which were also on the standards of Brian Boru, borne by the Dalcassians at the battle of Clontarf, as stated in O'Brien's Dictionary, under the word Concubar. The O'Briens had numerous castles in various parts of the counties of Clare and Limerick. There were, altogether, one hundred and seventy-two castles in the county of Clare, most of which were erected by the O'Briens; fifty of them, it is said, were built by the Mac Namaras, and twenty belonged to the O'Loghlins. There were about one hundred castles in the county of Limerick, many of them belonging to the O'Briens, but several of the castles in Limerick and Clare were also erected by the Fitzgeralds, de Clares, and other Anglo-Norman settlers. There are still to be seen ruins and remains of about one hundred and fifty castles in the counties of Clare and Limerick. In A.D. 1543, Murrough O'Brien, having dispossessed his nephew Donogh of the principality of Thomond, repaired to England, and made his submission to king Henry VIII., to whom he resigned his principality, and was created earl of Thomond, and baron of Inchiquin, the conditions being, as stated in Lodge's Peerage, that he should utterly forsake and give up the name of O'Brien, and all claims to which he might pretend by the same, and take such name as the king should please to give him; and he and his heirs, and the inhabitants of his lands, should use the English dress, manners, customs, and language; that he should give up the Irish dress, customs, and language, and keep no kerns or gallowglasses; and Conor O'Brien, earl of Thomond in the reign of Elizabeth, as stated by Lodge, did, in the year 1558, on Sunday the 10th of July, after divine service, publicly and solemnly swear for ever to renounce the name of O'Brien, and use only the name of earl of Thomond. Donogh O'Brien was, by King Henry VIII., created baron of Ibrackan, in the county of Clare; and other branches of the O'Briens were created viscounts of Clare by king Charles II., and earls of Clare by king James II. In the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries the O'Briens were lords and admirals of the Isles of Arran, in the county of Galway. In modern times the O'Briens are marquesses of Thomond, earls of Inchiquin, and barons of Burren, in the county of Clare; and a female branch of the O'Briens had the title of countesses of the Orkneys, in Scotland. Many of the O'Briens have been distinguished commanders in the Irish Brigades in the service of France, under the titles of earls of Clare and counts of Thomond. The O'Briens are still a very numerous name in various parts of Leinster and Munster, and there are many highly respectable families of them, particularly in the counties of Clare, Limerick, and Tipperary. The chief representatives of the O'Briens at the present day are the marquesses of Thomond, and the O'Briens of Dromoland, in the county of Clare, of which family are Sir Lucius O'Brien of Dromoland, and his brother, William Smith O'Brien, M. P. for the county of Limerick, who are lineal descendants of Brian Boru.

On Irish Surnames.—The meaning of the terms, O' and Mac, Kinel, Clan, &c., has been already explained. Surnames were partially adopted by various tribes as early as the ninth and tenth centuries, as may be seen in the Four Masters, and other annalists; but hereditary and permanent surnames were not established until the eleventh and twelfth centuries. Brian Boru made an ordinance that every family and clan should adopt a particular surname, in order to preserve correctly the history and genealogy of the different tribes, and his own descendants took from himself the name of O'Briain, or O'Brien. It appears that surnames were not arbitrarily assumed, but each family or clan were at liberty to adopt a surname from some particular ancestor, and generally took their names from some chief of their tribe, celebrated for his valour, wisdom, piety, or some other great qualities, some prefixing Mac, which means a son, and others Ua, or O, which signifies of, a grandson, or descendant.

The Munster Milesians.—The following are the chief families of Milesians in Munster, and first will be given the three branches of the race of Heber, namely, the Dalcassians, the Eugenians, and the Clan Kian: I. The Dalcassians. The descent of the Dalcassians has been explained in the preceding part of this article, and they were located chiefly in Thomond, in the present counties of Clare and Limerick, and partly in Tipperary. Of these were the O'Briens, Mac Namaras, Mac Malons, Mac Donnells, Mac Enirys, O'Gradys, O'Kennedys, O'Deas, O'Heas, O'Quinns, O'Hehirs, O'Heffernans, O'Hogans, O'Hurllys, O'Hartigans, O'Molony, O'Spillans, Mac Graths, O'Sheehans, O'Seanchans, or O'Seanachans, Mac Giollaioisacht, or Lysaghts, O'Loneragans, O'Mearas, Mac Arthurs, or Mac Arthurs, O'Kearneys, O'Caseys, O'Considines, O'Brodys, Mac Bruodins, Mac Clancys, Mac Curtins, O'Hickeys, O'Healys, O'Hanraghans, O'Cashins, O'Davonans, O'Liddys, O'Tuomys, O'Nunans, O'Duhiggs, O'Aberns, O'Slatterrys, O'Naghtans or O'Nortons, Mac Conroys, O'Heafes, and some other clans. The following were also of the Dalcassian race, namely, the Mac Coghlan, chiefs in the King's county; and the O'Finnellans and O'Scullys, chiefs in Teffia or Westmeath, of whom an account has been given in the note on Meath. II. The Eugenians, whose descent has been already described, were located chiefly in Desmond, or the present counties of Cork and Kerry, but partly in Limerick, Clare, and Tipperary. Of these were the Mac Carthys, princes of Desmond; the O'Sullivans, O'Mahonys, O'Callaghans, O'Donohoes, O'Keeffes, O'Fogartys, Mac Gillicuddy, Mac Elligotts, Mac Auliffes, Mac Donaghs, Mac Fineens, O'Moryartys, O'Kerwics, O'Cuilleans, O'Finegans, O'Tracys, O'Lechans, O'Flannerys, O'Meighans, and some other clans. III. The Clan-Kian, whose descent has been already given, were located chiefly in Ormond, or the present county of Tipperary, and the head of this tribe were the O'Carrolls, princes of Ely. The mac O'Hara, and six of the chiefs of his tribe were slain.

The Clan Costello (of Mayo), made an attack on the people of Lieney (in Sligo), in which Cor-

other families were the O'Meaghers or O'Mahers, the Mac Keoghs, O'Corcorans, O'Dulhunty, changed to Delahunty. The O'Haras and O'Garas, lords of Lieny and Coolavin in Sligo; and the O'Conors, chiefs of Kianaght in Derry, of whom accounts have been already given in the notes on North Connaught and Tir Eogain, were also branches of the Clan-Kian of Munster. IV. The Ithians, or Darinians, descended from Ith, son of Breogain and uncle of Milesius, had several respectable chiefs and clans settled in Munster, as the O'Driscolls, O'Learys, O'Baires, O'Hallinans, O'Finns, O'Cowheys, O'Crowleys, O'Cormacs, and some others in the county of Cork. The Mac Auleys, chiefs of Calry in Westmeath; the Mac Claney, chiefs of Dartry in Leitrim; and the O'Cuinnins of Leitrim, were also of the race of Ith. As stated in O'Flaherty's Ogygia, and the Dissertations of Charles O'Connor, the Campbells of Scotland, of whom were the dukes of Argyll, and several other noble families in that kingdom, were also of the race of Ith, descended from Lughaidh Mac Con, who was monarch of Ireland in the third century; and according to O'Flaherty and O'Halloran, the High Stewards or ancient earls of Lennox and Mar in Scotland, were descended from the Heberians of Munster, and hence they assisted Brian Boru at the battle of Clontarf. V. The Clanna Deaga or Degadians also called Ernans, of whom an account has been given in the preceding part of this article, were celebrated chiefs in Munster, but originally descended from the Heremonians of Ulster; and from the Clanna Deaga were descended, as already shewn, the Dalriedians or Dalriedinians of Ulster, who, in the third century, planted the Milesian colony in Albany or North Britain, afterwards called Scotland, and from whom were descended the Scottish kings and the House of Stuart. Of the Clanna Deaga there were several families of note settled in Munster, given by Keating, O'Flaherty, and O'Halloran, as the O'Falvies of Kerry, hereditary admirals of Desmond; the O'Connells of Kerry, Limerick, and Clare; the O'Flynn, O'Sheas, O'Cullenans, O'Fihellys, O'Donegans, O'Connings or Gunnings, O'Cuirens, and some other clans; also the O'Baiscins and O'Donnells of Clare, as may be seen in vol. iii. pp. 397, 407, and 409 of O'Halloran's Ireland. VI. The Irians or Clanna Rory of Ulster, also settled several families of note in Munster, as early as the first and second centuries, descended from Fergus Mac Roy, king of Ulster, of the race of Ir, and Meva the celebrated queen of Connaught, daughter of Eochy Feidhlioch, monarch of Ireland a short time before the Christian era, of whom were the following, namely, the O'Conors, lords of Kerry; the O'Conors, lords of Corcomroch in Clare; and the O'Loghlins, lords of Burren in Clare; and of the same race were also the O'Ferralls, lords of Annaly or Longford; and the Mac Rannalls, lords of Muintir Eoluis in Leitrim. From another branch of the Clanna Rory, descended from the celebrated warrior Conall Cearnach, chief of the Red Branch knights of Ulster a short time before the Christian era, were the Mac Gennises, lords of Iveagh in the county of Down; the O'Moores, princes of Leix in the Queen's county; the Mac Cartans, Mac Dunlevys, Mac Gowans or Smiths, O'Garveys, O'Carolans, and some other chiefs and clans in the county of Down and other parts of Ulster. Of the Leinster Milesians of the race of Heremon, were some chiefs and clans of note in Munster, as the O'Felans, princes of Desies in Waterford; and the O'Brics, chiefs in Waterford; the O'Dwyers and O'Ryans, chiefs in Tipperary; and the O'Gormans, chiefs in Clare.

In the notes of the preceding numbers has been given the entire of O'Dugan's Topography, comprising Leath Cuin, or the ancient kingdoms of Meath, Ulster, and Connaught, with their chiefs and clans, and the territories possessed by each in ancient and modern times; and in the following numbers will be given the topography of O'Heerin, of which an account has been given in the introduction to this publication, as comprising the topography of Leath Mogha, or the kingdoms of Leinster and Munster, together with their chiefs and clans. In the present article on Thomond, will be given the topography of the ancient territories comprised in the present counties of Clare and Limerick, together with their chiefs and clans, and the possessions of each in ancient and modern times.

It may be observed here, that the topographies of O'Dugan and O'Heerin were transcribed by Peregrine O'Clery, one of the Four Masters, and by Duaid Mac Firis, one of the learned historians of Leacan in Sligo, and from these two transcripts, the translator has made copies, and also had access to various other copies in the library of Sir William Betham, all of which he has accurately compared, to make the topography as perfect as possible, Sir William Betham having given free access to all his valuable MSS. on Irish history and antiquities, with his usual liberality, always anxious to patronize and promote the interests of Irish literature.

The following verses descriptive of Clare and the Dalcassian clans have been translated from O'Heerin:—

I.

"Let us treat of the race of Cormac Cas,
Let us proceed across the Shannon of clear streams,
From the tribe of Corc our course record,
To the tribe of Lurc of brilliant deeds. (Corc and Lurc, ancient kings of Thomond).

II.

"The Deis Beag of the purple mantles
Is an estate to the lawful tribes,
The heroes of Clare are proclaimed by us
From the fairest lands of Erin.

III.

"The Dalcassians of Clare's battalions,
Pure is their silver and abundant their property,
Their gold by the furnace is purified,
The hospitable hosts have great affluence.

IV.

"Rich is each chief in his own territory,
Of the Dalcassians renowned in victories,
Men of great prosperity whom we thus place, [Shannon."
They possessed the land eastward from Callan to the

I. O'Deadhaidh or O'Dea, chief of Triocha Uachtarach, called also Kinel Fearmaic and Diseart I Dhegha, or Dysart O'Dea, now the parish of Dysart, barony of Inchiquin, county of Clare. The O'Deas are thus mentioned by O'Heerin:—

"With due respect we give the lead
To the high lands of Triocha Oughter,
O'Dea is the inheritor of the country,
Of the brown nut producing plains."

The O'Deas had several castles in this territory, of which some ruins still remain, and some chiefs of the O'Deas are mentioned in the course of these Annals. II. O'Cuinn or O'Quinn, chief of Muintir Ifernain, a territory about Curofin in the county of Clare. The O'Heffernans were the tribe who possessed this territory over whom O'Cuinn was chief. They are thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"O Quinn of the honest heart,
Is chief of the bountiful O'Heffernans;
Their land is fruitful and purely fair,
About Curofin of the banquetts."

The O'Quinns had also possessions in Limerick, and are placed in the barony of Kenry on the map of Ortelius. At the present time the ancient family of the O'Quinns have the title of barons of Adare in the county of Limerick and earls of Dunraven.

Hugh Mac Dermott made an incursion into Muinir Eoluis (in Leitrim) and committed great depredations, which plunders, however, were not unavenged, for Cormac Mac Dermott Roe, the

III. O'Flaithri or O'Flaterry, and O'Cathail or O'Cahil, chiefs of Fionchoradh. They are thus designated by O'Heerin :—

"O'Flaithri who commands our praise,
Possesses the land of Fionchora,
The country of O'Cahil to the east and west
Is the smooth plain of the fields of yews."

IV. O'Maoilmeda, chief of Kinel m-Baithor Breintire, now Brentry, near Callan hill in the county of Clare. They are thus mentioned by O'Heerin :—

"Kinel Baith of the numerous tribe,
The noble chiefs of Breintire,
O'Mulmea of the bright fair plains,
Possessed the woods about delightful Einigh."

V. O'Haithchir or O'Hehirs, chiefs of Hy Flanchadha and Hy Cormac, districts in the barony of Islands, county of Clare, and, according to O'Halloran, of Callan, in the county of Clare. They are thus designated by O'Heerin :—

"Of the race of Eogan of Oirir Cliach
Are the Hy Cormac of the fine fair plain,
To O'Hehir belongs the fertile country,
The lord from whom great nobles sprung.

"Chiefs who were powerful in each house
Are of the noble clans of O'Hehir,
They rule over Hy Flancha of hospitable mansions,
They are noble and well armed Fenian warriors.

VI. O'Dnibhghinn or O'Duigin, chief of Muinir Conlochtaidh, a district in the parish of Tomgraney, in the barony of Tullagh, county of Clare, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin :—

"O'Duigan of the ruddy fair face
Rules over the mild Muinir Conlochta,
A chief who gained his possessions
By force of his spears in battle."

VII. O'Grada, or O'Grady, chief of Kinel Donghuile, a large territory comprising the present barony of Lower Tullagh, in the county of Clare, where they are placed on the Map of Ortelius. The O'Gradys also had large possessions in the county of Limerick, according to O'Halloran, at Carn Feradaigh, now the parish of Knockaney, or Aney, in the barony of Small County, in the county of Limerick, where the O'Gradys had their castle at Kilballyowen, which place is at present the residence of The O'Grady, the head of this ancient and respectable family. The O'Gradys are thus designated by O'Heerin, and several chiefs of them are mentioned in the course of these Annals :

"Do ghabh O'Grada uile
Ceul duasbog Donghuile
A cuilg bunbuidhe bleachta
Uird urlaidhe a oireachta."

"O'Grady took the entire lands
Of the profitable Kinel Dongally,
His swords were yellow-handled and keen,
Powerful are the blows of his forces in battle."

There are several highly respectable families of the O'Gradys at the present day in the counties of Clare and Limerick, and also in the county of Cork ; and in modern times they were created viscounts Guillamore, that title having been conferred, in the year 1831, on the Right Hon. Standish O'Grady, chief baron of the Exchequer in Ireland. VIII. Mac Connara, or Mac Namara. The Mac Namaras have taken their name, as stated in O'Brien's dictionary at the word Cumara, from one of their ancient chiefs in the tenth century named Cumara, a descendant of Conall Eachluath, or Connell of the Swift Steeds, who was king of Munster in the fourth century. The word Cumara makes, in the genitive, Connara, which signifies a warrior of the sea, this ancient chief probably having been a great naval commander. The Mac Namaras were chiefs of Triocha Cead Hy Caisin, which territory, according to O'Brien and O'Halloran, is now the barony of Tullagh, in the county of Clare ; and, according to Mac Geoghegan, (p. 234), contained also part of the barony of Burratty. The Mac Namaras are also sometimes styled chiefs of Clan Cuileain, which was the tribe name of his family, derived from Cuilean, one of their chiefs in the eighth century. The Mac Namaras are thus designated by O'Heerin, and many chiefs of them are mentioned in the course of these Annals :

"Riogh thaoiseach na ruathar n-glan
Mac Connara o Mhuigh Adhair,
Criocha na sed thall a thir,
Ar Triocha Cead Clann Caisin.

"The princely chief of well fought battles
Is Mac Namara from Moy Air,
The land of riches is his country,
It is the territory of Clan Caisin."

The Mac Namaras held the high and honourable office of hereditary marshals of Thomond, were very powerful, and had numerous castles ; and there are at the present day some highly respectable families of the name in the county of Clare ; the head of which is Major William Nugent Mac Namara, of Doolin Castle, M.P. for the County of Clare. Some of the Mac Namaras have been distinguished in the service of France, particularly John Mac Namara, who died A.D. 1747, and was, as stated by Mac Geoghegan, (p. 334), an admiral in the service of France, of the grand military order of St. Louis, and governor of the port of Rochefort. IX. O'Conchubhair or O'Conor, chief of Triocha Cead Fear n-Arda and of Corcomruadh, the ancient name of the barony of Corcomroe, in the county of Clare, also anciently called Crioch Cuirc or the territory of Corc, which got its name from Corc, prince of the race of Ir from Ulster, who settled there in the first century. The O'Conors were chiefs of this territory, and some of them are mentioned in the course of these Annals ; they are thus designated by O'Heerin :—

"The territory of Fear Arda of the gold,
Corcomroe of the hosts of flashing battalions,
O'Conor obtained the land,
The heights from delightful Conagh."

X. O'Lochlainn or O'Loghlin, chief of Boirinn, now the barony of Burren, county of Clare, which was sometimes called Eastern Corcomroe ; they are thus mentioned by O'Heerin :—

"O'Loghlin, a hero commanding battalions,
Over the fertile watered plains of Burren,
And the lands of Corc which he holds by right,
A country of cattle and abundant wealth.

Several chiefs of the O'Loghlin are mentioned in the course of these Annals ; they were very powerful, had many castles, and held their rank as lords of Burren down to the reign of Elizabeth. As already stated in the present article, the O'Conors and O'Loghlin were of the same descent, namely, a branch of the Clanna Rory descended from the ancient kings of Ulster of the race of Ir. There are at the present time some highly respectable families of the O'Loghlin in the county of Clare, and the head of this ancient and distinguished family is Sir Colman O'Loghlin, son of the late sir Michael O'Loghlin, a very eminent lawyer, and Master of the Rolls in Ireland.

general Biatach¹ of Connaught, was slain, and also the two sons of Tomaltach O'Beirne, namely,

XI. O'Conaill, or O'Connell, chief of Hy Cuilein, from Luachair Aille to Claenglais, according to O'Heerin. The commons of Claenglais are marked on the maps south-east of Abbeyfeale, in the barony of Upper Conello, on the verge of the county of Limerick, towards the river Feale, and the borders of Cork and Kerry. According to O'Brien, at the word Conal, and also O'Halloran, (vol. iii. p. 389,) the territory of the O'Connells was called Hy Conaill Gabhra, and comprised the present baronies of Upper and Lower Conello, in the county of Limerick, and got its name from Conall Gabhra, one of its ancient chiefs, the ancestor of the O'Connells. The O'Connells, chiefs of Hy Conall Gaura, had also, according to O'Halloran, a district called Aos Greine, extending from Knock Greine to near Limerick, and had their chief residence at Castle Connell. At an early period, namely, in the twelfth century, as stated in O'Brien's Irish Dictionary, at the word Ibh Conail Gabhra, the O'Connells settled in Kerry, where they had a large territory extending from Sliabh Luabra, and the river Feale, to Claenglais, on the borders of their ancient possessions. According to O'Halloran, (vol. iii. p. 407,) as already stated in this article, the O'Falvies, admirals of Desmond; the O'Connells of Kerry, O'Sheas, chiefs of Muskerry, in Cork, and several other chiefs, were descended from the Clanna Deaga, celebrated chiefs of Munster, originally a branch of the Heremonians of Ulster. Of the Clanna Deaga, was Conaire II., monarch of Ireland in the beginning of the third century, who was married to a daughter of his predecessor, Con of the Hundred Battles, monarch of Ireland; by whom he had a son, named Cairbre Riada, from whom were descended the Dalriadians of Ulster. This Cairbre Riada, about the middle of the third century, settled the colony of Dalriadians, in that part of North Britain called Albany, afterwards Scotland; and from this colony were descended the Scottish kings, and the House of Stuart. From Cairbre Muse, brother to Cairbre Riada, Muiscrith, or Muskerry, in Cork, got its name; and according to Keating's Genealogies, the O'Falvies and other chiefs were his descendants; or, as stated in a learned Essay on ancient Ireland, by John T. O'Flaherty, Esq., published in Cork in the year 1842, a son of Cairbre Riada got large possessions in South Munster, in parts of the present counties of Cork and Kerry; and from him were descended the O'Connells of Kerry; and according to some MS. communications, also the O'Falvies and O'Sheas. In the topographical poem of O'Heerin, the O'Connells of the twelfth century are thus designated:—

“O'Conaill catha Mumhan,
Toirteamhuil an tiomsughadh,
Fian cath-armach is dual dreim,
Sluagh eathadhnach O g-Cuilein.”

“O'Connell of the battalions of Munster,
Mighty are his mustering forces,
A Fenian armed warrior frequent in the fight, Commands the battling hosts of Hy Cuilein.”

The O'Connells had large possessions in Kerry, chiefly in the barony of Iveragh, and branches of them were also settled in the county of Clare. From an early period they were connected, by marriage alliances, with the O'Conors, the ancient lords of Kerry. Maurice O'Connell, of the county of Clare, who was a general of brigade, and colonel of the king's guards, under James II., was killed at the battle of Aughrim; and Charles O'Connell, his brother, of Braintree, in Clare, was a colonel in king James' service. Several of the O'Connells afterwards entered the Irish Brigade, in the service of France; and some of them were distinguished commanders, amongst whom may be mentioned Count Daniel O'Connell, a general in the French service; others of them were officers in the Austrian service. Lieutenant-general sir Maurice O'Connell, is at present commander of the British forces in New South Wales. After the Cromwellian wars, and the Revolution, a great

Malahy Dall and Gilcreest, with many others of the people of Muintir Eoluis, while in pursuit of part of the extensive possessions of the O'Connells were confiscated; but there are still many very respectable families of the O'Connells in the counties of Kerry and Clare; and of this ancient family, the head is the celebrated Daniel O'Connell, of Darrynane Abbey, in the county of Kerry, who retains in his possession ancestral estates which never were forfeited during a tenure of sixteen hundred years. XII. Mac Inderigh, Mac Aneiridhe, or Mac Eneiry, chief of Corca Muiceadha, also called Conaill Uachtarach, or the barony of Upper Conello, in the county of Limerick. The Mac Eneirys were descended from Mahon, king of Munster, brother of Brian Boru, and were a highly respectable family in former times, and their chief residence was at Castletown Mac Eneiry, where there are still some ruins of a large castle and monastery. Accounts of the Mac Eneirys are to be found in the third vol. of O'Halloran's Ireland, pp. 390, 398; and in O'Brien's Dictionary, at the words Coneuhar and Muiceadha, they are thus mentioned by O'Heerin:—

“Mac Eneiry the hero of precious gems,
Rules over Corca Muiceada of the mounds,
A noble Fenian who always flourished,
As doth the fair blossom on the apple tree.”

XIII. O'Billraidhe, a chief in Hy Conaill Gabhra, now the baronies of Upper and Lower Conello, in the county of Limerick, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:—

“O'Billry the bestower of cattle,
Was a chief of fertile Conall Gaura,
They were truly bountiful men of the fair plains,
The rich lands of productive crops.”

XIV. O'Cuilein, or O'Cullen, by some rendered Collins; O'Kenealys and O'Sheelans, are given by O'Halloran, vol. iii. p. 390; and in O'Brien's Dictionary, at the word Conal, as chiefs in the baronies of Conello, county of Limerick. Some chiefs of the O'Cuileins are mentioned in the course of these Annals. XV. O'Maolmacasa, or O'Mackessy, chief of Corca Oiehc; and O'Berga, chief of Tuath Rossa, districts in the county of Limerick, are thus mentioned by O'Heerin:—

“Corca Oiehc of the delightful woods,
The country of white mantles and clear streams,
A fair land of great fertility,
Is governed by O'Maolmackessy, O'Berga of the fair country took possession of,
The districts of Hy Rossa a rich portion.”

XVI. O'Maolchalloin, a chief in Caonraidhe, now the barony of Kenry, county of Limerick, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:—

“The Fenian chief of Kenry of delightful lands, Is O'Muleallen of the numerous tribe.”

XVII. O'Cleircinn and O'Flannabhra, or O'Flannery, chiefs of Dail Cairbre Aodhbha, a territory in the barony of Kenry, in the county of Limerick, thus mentioned by O'Heerin:—

“The portion of the delightful Dal Cairbre Eva,
Of the princes of Cashel of white standards,
Lasting is his prosperity to the country,
The brave and high chief O'Cleircinn.”

XVIII. O'Donnolhain, or O'Donovan, who is given by O'Brien at the word Cairbre, as chief of Cairbre Aodhbha, now the barony of Kenry, in the county of Limerick, which as stated by O'Halloran, (vol. iii. p. 387), was the ancient territory of O'Donovan, O'Cleircin, and O'Flannery; O'Donovan is thus designated by O'Heerin:—

“Hereditary to O'Donovan of Dun Cuirc,
Is this territory as his fortress land,
To him without tribute belongs Maghmoill,
And the level plains down to the Shannon.”

their property, and they also took prisoners Dermot Mac Dermott and Maolrooney Mac Donogh Riabhach, after defeating their people.

There are several respectable families of the O'Donovans at the present day, in the county of Cork, where, it appears, they have been chiefly located in modern times. The O'Donovans of Limerick had their chief castle at Bruree. XIX. O'Ciarnaic, anglicised O'Kirwick, chief of Eoganacht Aine, called by O'Halloran, Aine Cliach, now the parish of Knockaney, in the barony of Small County, county of Limerick. The O'Kirwicks are thus mentioned by O'Heerin :

"Eoganacht Aine of the wealthy lands,
O'Kirwick is the mainstay of the territory,
A country inhabited by the most noble tribes,
They are Hy Enda, Aine, and Auluin."

XX. O'Maolduin, or O'Muldoon, is also given as a chief of Eoganacht Aine, and thus mentioned by O'Heerin.

"The race of O'Maolduin from Dun Cais,
Over Eoganacht Aine in due order,
A numerous tribe who proceeded o'er the waves,
The armed Fenian heroes from Aughrim."

XXI. O'Cinnfaolaidh, probably O'Kinealy, chief of Eoganacht Grian Gahlra, a district comprising parts of the baronies of Coshma and Small County, in Limerick, and thus mentioned by O'Heerin :

"The Eoganacht of the fertile Grian Gaura,
A land producing most delicious apples,
A crown of female households in fame,
Belongs to O'Kinfaola of the red arms."

XXII. O'Conuing, a name anglicised to Gunning, was chief of Crioich Saingil and Aosgreine, which territories are now comprised in the barony of Small County, in Limerick, according to O'Brien, at the word Aos-Greine. Crioich Saingil, according to O'Halloran, (vol. iii., p. 394), is called Single Land, and situated near Limerick. The O'Cuings are thus mentioned by O'Heerin :

"Aos Greine of the fine fair plains,
Was possessed by O'Cuining of Crioich Saingil,
He cheerfully held the fair Grian,
From the noble race of Eogan."

XXIII. O'Caelaidh, or O'Cadhla, probably O'Keeley; and O'Maille, or O'Malley, are given as chiefs of Tuath Luimnidh, or the district about Limerick. XXIV. O'Ceadfadhla is given as chief of Triocha-Cead-an Chalaigh, called Cala Luimne, that is, the port or ferry of Limerick. XXV. O'Haodha, or O'Hea, chief of Musgraidhe Luachra, a territory lying between Kilmallock and Ardpatrick, in the barony of Coshlea, in the county of Limerick, is thus designated by O'Heerin :

"O'Hea, the bestower of cattle,
Obtained the extensive Musery Luachra,
The tribe of the fair land of melodious song,
Dwelt along the great salmon stream."

There are some respectable families of the O'Heas in the counties of Limerick and Cork. XXVI. Mac Domhnaill, or Muintir Domhnaill, and O'Baiscinn, chiefs of Triocha Cead Corca Baiscinn, which, according to O'Halloran, is now the barony of Moyarta, in the county of Clare. O'Maolcorera is given as chief of Hy Bracain, now the barony of Ibrackan; and another chief, O'Caolaidh, or O'Keeley. In the poem two Corca Baiscins are mentioned, one of which was the present barony of Clonderlaw. Mac Don-

Bryan, son of Matthew Mac Tiarnan, chief of Tullyhunco (in Cavan), the most distinguished for prosperity, nobleness, good fame, and power, of nell's district is mentioned by O'Halloran, under the name of Darach, whom he also calls O'Donnell. These chiefs are thus designated by O'Heerin :

"The two Triocha Ceads we remember,
The two delightful Corca Baiscins,
The Mac Donnells were its inheritors,
The host who have shared the country."

"Another chief of this land of music,
Noble is the origin of his descent,
O'Baiscinn, the stately tree from its root,
The tribe who marched with every force."

"The lord of Ibrackan of silken garments,
A chief who musters mighty forces,
O'Maolcorera of prevailing fame,
Whose land extends from both the bays."

"The two territories of the entire Fochla,
Are possessed by the valiant race of Conary,
Along the land of Braonmoy 'tis true,
Its lawful defender is O'Keely.
Let us leave the race of Conary of Battles,
The princes of Erna of the golden shields."

XXVII. Mac Mathghamhna, or Mac Mahon. The Mac Mahons, it appears, succeeded the above chiefs, as lords of Corca Baiscinn; and possessed the greater part of the baronies of Moyarta and Clonderlaw, in the county of Clare, in which they are placed on the map of Ortelius; and a further account of them may be found in O'Halloran, vol. iii. pp. 388, 390; and in O'Brien's Dictionary, at the words Baiscinnneach, Concubair, and Domhnaill, where the Mac Mahons and Mac Donnells are given as branches of the O'Briens, the posterity of Brian Boru, and therefore, of quite a different descent from the Mac Mahons, lords of Monaghan, and the Mac Donnells, earls of Antrim, who are of the race of Clan Colla, as explained in the note on Orgiall. Several chiefs of the Mac Mahons of Thomond are mentioned in the course of these Annals. There were of this family, a marquis Mac Mahon and some other military commanders of the name, in the service of France and Spain, in the last century, of whom accounts may be found in Ferrar's History of Limerick; and the late sir William Mac Mahon, Master of the Rolls in Ireland, and his brother, General Mac Mahon, of the British service, were of this family. There are still some respectable families of the Mac Mahons in the county of Clare, and some have changed the name to Mahon, and the chief representative of this ancient family is O'Gorman Mahon, formerly M.P. for Clare. XXVIII. O'Gorman, or O'Gorman, is given by O'Halloran, vol. iii. p. 402, as chief of Tullichrin, a territory comprising parts of the baronies of Moyarta and Ibrackan, in the county of Clare, in which they are placed on the map of Ortelius. There are several respectable families of the O'Gormans in the county of Clare, the head of which is, Nicholas Purcell O'Gorman, at present Assistant Barrister for the county of Kilkenny. XXIX. O'Diocholla and O'Maoleithigh, are given as chiefs in Corcomroe, in the county of Clare, and thus mentioned by O'Heerin :

"O'Diocholla's possessions by inheritance,
Are in Corcomroe of the intrepid battalions,
Also O'Maoleithigh the hospitable,
Who maintained his hereditary rights."

XXX. O'Droighnean, or O'Drennan, chief of Slieve Eise Finn and all the chiefs in Brefney, died. For him was composed the following—“Bryan Mac Tiarnan of the battles,

Whose hospitality was unbounded,
And his liberality as unlimited
As his achievements were extensive.”

of Kincl Seudna, a district on the borders of Clare and Galway, is thus mentioned by O’Heerin :

“The lands about the fair Slieve Eise,
Are possessed by the Clan Seudna of melodious bards,
A tribe who firmly support their clans,
Chief of their territory is O’Drennan.”

XXXI. O’Neill, chief of Clan Dealbuidhe and of Tradraidhe, a district in the barony of Inchiquin, county of Clare, is thus mentioned by O’Heerin :

“The land of Clan Dalvy of the poets
Was ruled by O’Neill chief of Fionnluaragh,
The forces of Tradree came to his fortress,
The descendant of the yellow-haired chiefs.”

It appears that these O’Neills of Thomond were originally some of the O’Neills of Ulster, some of whom, as stated in Ferrar’s History of Limerick, (pp. 258, 365), changed the name to Nihell, of which name there were many respectable families in the counties of Limerick and Clare; and of these was sir Balthazar Nihell, a Brigadier-general in the service of the king of Naples; and colonel Nihell, of the Irish brigade, in the French service. The Creaghs also, of whom there are still many highly respectable families in the counties of Clare, Cork, and Tipperary, were descended from the O’Neills of Ulster, according to Ferrar, some of them having come to Limerick, in the tenth century, to assist in the expulsion of the Danes. Many of them were valiant chiefs, and gained several victories over the Danes; and on one occasion, having worn green boughs in their helmets, they from this circumstance got the name O’Craoibh, which signifies, of the branches, which name was anglicised to Creagh. Of this family was Richard Creagh, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Armagh, who died A.D. 1585, an eminent writer on ecclesiastical history, and the lives of the Irish saints. The O’Creaghs are also given by O’Halloran, (vol. iii. p. 414), as a branch of the O’Neills of Ulster. XXXII. O’Dobharcion or O’Davoran, chief of Muintir Lidheagha, or the O’Liddys, the tribe name of this clan. The O’Davorans are placed on the map of Ortelius, in the barony of Coreomroe, county of Clare. They are thus mentioned by O’Heerin :

“The O’Davorans of the intelligent learned men,
Chiefs of the O’Liddys of whom I treat,
They belonged to the clans of Sinnill,
And are the supporters of nobility.”

The following chiefs and clans of Thomond, not given by O’Heerin, are collected from other sources. XXXIII. The O’Moloneys, according to O’Halloran, (vol. iii. p. 387), were chiefs of Cniltan, now the parish of Kiltonanlea, in the barony of Tulla, county of Clare, where they are also placed on the map of Ortelius. There are also, at present, many respectable families of the name, in the county, the head of which is James O’Molony of Kiltannon, Esq. XXXIV. The O’Kearneys, given by O’Halloran, (vol. iii. p. 400), as chiefs of Abhuin Ui Chearmaidh, or O’Kearney’s river, a district about Six-Mile-Bridge, in the baronies of Tulla and Bunratty, county of Clare. XXXV. The O’Caseys, given as chiefs of Rathconan, in the barony of Pubblebrien, county of Limerick, by O’Halloran, (p. 400), who states, that the viscounts Perry, afterwards earls of Limerick, possessed part of this estate, in right of his great grandmother, who was the heiress of O’Casey.

Bryan, son of Hugh Mac Mahon, having assumed the lordship of Orgiall (Monaghan), proposed a marriage connection to Sorley, son of Edin Duv Mac Donnell, heir presumptive to the lordship of the Hebrides, and high constable of the province of Ulster, and prevailed on him to XXXVI. O’Dinnabans or O’Dinans, given by O’Halloran, (p. 420), as chiefs of Uaithne, now the barony of Ownneybeg, in Limerick. XXXVII. The O’Hallinans and Mac Sheehys, are given by O’Halloran, as chiefs of Ballyhallinan, in the barony of Pubblebrien, county of Limerick. The O’Hallorans, given by O’Halloran, as chiefs of Faith-ui-Hallurain, a district between Tulla and Clare, in the county of Clare. The following families of note are given on the map of Ortelius, an ancient authority often quoted, which gave the localities and territories possessed by the Irish chiefs and clans, in the reign of James I., in the beginning of the seventeenth century, and was originally compiled by Abraham Ortelius, of Antwerp, the celebrated geographer to king Philip II. of Spain, and re-published with improvements by the learned Charles O’Conor, of Belenagar. XXXVIII. The Mac Giollaio-saghts, a name anglicised to Lysaghts, are placed on the map of Ortelius, about Ennistymon; the Mac Considines, in the barony of Ibrackan; the O’Dals, in the barony of Burren; the Mac Gillcreaghs, in the barony of Clonderlaw; the Mac Clancys, in the barony of Tulla; and the Mac Bruodins, in the barony of Inchiquin, all in the county of Clare. The following families are placed on the map, in the county of Limerick: the Mac Arthurs, in the barony of Pubblebrien; the O’Seanlans, in the barony of Pubblebrien; and the O’Morrys, in the barony of Lower Connello. Several of the Dalcassian chiefs and clans, not mentioned in this article, are given in the notes on Ormond and Desmond, on the territories which they possessed.

In the year 1180, king Henry II. granted the kingdom of Limerick to Herbert Fitzherbert, but he having resigned his claims, it was granted by king John to William and Philip de Braosa. In the latter end of the twelfth, and beginning of the thirteenth century, the Anglo-Normans penetrated into Thomond, and formed some settlements about Limerick, under William de Braosa and William de Burgo; and in the thirteenth century, king Henry III., gave a grant of the whole kingdom of Thomond, or O’Brien’s country, to Thomas de Clare, son of the earl of Gloucester; and the Fitzgeralds, Burkes, and other Anglo-Norman families, also got large possessions in Limerick and Clare. The O’Briens, and other chiefs, maintained for centuries fierce contests with the Anglo-Norman and English settlers, in defence of their national independence. The following were the chief families of Anglo-Normans, and early English settlers, in the counties of Limerick and Clare. The de Burgos or Burkes, Fitzgeralds, Fitzgibbons, a branch of the Fitzgeralds, the de Clares, de Lacies, Browns, Barretts, Roches, Russels, Sarsfields, Striches, Purcells, Husseys, Harolds, Tracys, Trants, Conyns, Whites, Walshes, Woulfes, Dongans, Rices, Aylmers, Nashes, Monsells, Massys, &c.

The Fitzgeralds, earls of Desmond, had vast possessions in Limerick, and of the estates of Gerald, the sixteenth earl of Desmond, in the reign of Elizabeth, about one hundred thousand acres were confiscated in the county of Limerick, and divided amongst the following English families: the Annesleys, Barkleys, Billingsleys, Bonchiers, Carters, Courtenays, Fittons, Mamerings, Stroudes, Trenchards, Thorntons, and Uthereds. In the reign of George I., according to Lodge’s Peerage, Thomas, baron Southwell, brought over and settled on his estates about Ratbkeale, in the county of Limerick, a colony of about three thousand Germans, from Suabia and the Palatinate of the Rhine hence they were called Palatines.

Limerick was formed into a county as early as the reign of king John, A.D. 1210. The Book of Dimm Seanchus, written in the sixth century by Amergin, chief bard to Dermot, monarch of Ireland, is a work which gives an account of the origin of the names of remarkable places, as fortresses, cities, mountains, lakes, rivers, &c. in Ireland. A copy made from the Books of Leacan and Bal-put away the daughter of O'Reilly (of Cavan), and to take his own daughter; but not long after

Mac Mahon gave him an invitation to his house, and having been drinking for some time, a dispute lymote, and an original Irish MS. of the eighth century on vellum, by the translator of these Annals, is in the library of Sir William Betham. The Dinn Seanchus gives the following account of the origin of the name of Limerick. In the early ages a battle was fought here between the kings of Munster and Connaught, and the forces of both sides engaged at the fords, when the tide was out; but during the contest, both parties became so hotly engaged that they were unmindful of the tide, which flowed in, and the flood coming so suddenly on them, they were forced to throw off their shields, when the beholders exclaimed, "The pool is covered with shields"—hence the place got the name of Luimneach, the word Luimne, in the ancient Irish, signifying shields. The city of Limerick is supposed by some to have been the ancient Regia of the Greek geographer Ptolemy, in his account of Ireland in the second century; and, according to O'Halloran, Limerick was a large city as early as the tenth century, and having commerce with Spain and other countries, and great shipping, got the name of Luimneach-na-luingeas, or Limerick of the Ships. The geographer Ptolemy mentions the inhabitants of the territory now forming the county of Clare, and the southern part of Galway, under the name of Gangani, whom Camden, and Dr. Charles O'Connor consider to have been a tribe of the Concanni of Spain. Clare was formed into a county in the reign of Elizabeth, A.D. 1565, by the Lord Deputy, Sir Henry Sidney, and got its name, not from the de Clares, who were lords of that country, as asserted by various writers; but, according to Mac Curtin, as quoted from one of his ancient MSS. given in the account of the parish of Kilnamaneen, in the county of Clare, in the first volume of Shaw Mason's Statistical Survey of Ireland, it derived its name from an ancient bridge of planks built over the river Fergus, and the word Clar in Irish signifying a plank, hence the adjoining town got the name of Clar, or Clare, and the town gave its name to the entire county. The county of Clare forms a large peninsula, bounded on one side by the Atlantic ocean, and on the other by the Shannon; and the counties of Clare and Limerick, along the coast of the Atlantic, and course of the Shannon, and the river Fergus, abound in grand and beautiful scenery. An extensive tract in the county of Limerick, called the Golden Vale, contains some of the richest lands in Ireland, famous for their unbounded fertility. The counties of Limerick and Clare are celebrated for orchards, and the production of cider.

Nobility.—The following have been the noble families in Limerick and Clare since the reign of Henry VIII. The O'Briens, earls and marquesses of Thomond, earls of Inchiquin, barons of Ibrackan, and barons of Burren, also viscounts of Clare, and barons of Moyarta; the Burkes, barons of Castleconnell; the Roches, barons of Tarbert; and the Fitzgeralds, knights of Glin, in the county of Limerick; the Sarsfields, viscounts of Kilmallock, in the county of Limerick; the Dongans, earls of Limerick; the Hamiltons, viscounts of Limerick; the Fanes, viscounts Fane, and barons of Loughguire, in Limerick; the Southwells, barons Southwell of Castlematross, in Limerick; the Fitzgibbons, earls of Clare; the Perrys, earls of Limerick; the Quinns, earls of Dunraven and barons of Adare, in Limerick; the O'Gradys, viscounts Guilmamore, in Limerick; the lords Fitzgerald and Vescei, in the county of Clare; and the Massys, barons of Clarina in Limerick.

Ecclesiastical Divisions.—The See of Kilfenora, according to Lanigan, (vol. ii. p. 197), was founded by St. Fachna, or St. Fachnan, and the bishops were also styled bishops of Fenabore, and sometimes bishops of Corcomroe, all of which names were applied to this see. A celebrated Cistercian monastery was founded and endowed at Corcomroe, in the twelfth century, by Donal O'Brien, king of Limerick, and his son Donogh Cairbreach O'Brien, prince of Thomond. The Diocese of Kilfenora comprises only the baronies of Burren and Corcomroe, in the county of Clare, being the smallest in Ireland.

The See of Killaloe, in Irish Cill-da-Lua, or the church of Lua, got its name from St. Lua, or Molua, who founded a church there in the sixth century. The name of Killaloe is latinised Laonia, and it became a bishop's see in the seventh century, the first bishop being St. Flannan, a disciple of St. Molua, who was consecrated at Rome by Pope John IV. A.D. 639. St. Flannan was the son of Torlogh, king of Munster, who endowed the see with extensive lands, and was interred in the cathedral. The abbey and see of Killaloe were amply endowed by the O'Briens, kings of Thomond, who erected the cathedral, in which many of them were interred. The ancient see of Roscrea, in the county of Tipperary, was in the twelfth century united to Killaloe, and the bishops of Killaloe were sometimes styled bishops of Thomond. The Diocese of Killaloe comprehends the greater part of the county of Clare, with a large portion of Tipperary, and parts of Limerick, King's and Queen's counties, and Galway.

The See of Limerick was founded in the sixth century by St. Munchin, who became the first bishop. In the tenth and eleventh centuries, several of the bishops of Limerick were Danes, a colony of that people possessing the city at that period. In the twelfth century a new cathedral was erected by the O'Briens, kings of Thomond, who amply endowed the see. The Diocese of Limerick comprises the greater part of the county of Limerick, with a portion of Clare. The See of Inis Cathay was founded in the fifth century by St. Patrick, and St. Senan, bishop and abbot of Inis-Cathay, is mentioned as his successor. Inis-Cathay is an island situated near the mouth of the Shannon, and its ancient monastery was a celebrated seat of religion in early times, and continued for many years a great place of pilgrimage. The ancient see comprised some adjoining districts in the counties of Limerick and Clare, and was annexed to the see of Limerick in the twelfth century.

Ancient Literature.—The Mac Clancys were hereditary Brehons; the Mac Bruodins hereditary historians; and the Mac Curtins hereditary bards of Thomond, of whom, and other learned men, accounts are given in the course of these Annals, and also in O'Reilly's Irish Writers. The Mac Craiths, or Magraths, of Thomond, are also mentioned as bards and historians. The Wars of Thomond, styled, Cathreim Thoirdhealbhaigh, or, a Catalogue of Torlogh's Battles, contains, as stated in O'Reilly's Irish Writers at A.D. 1450, an account of the battles of Torlogh O'Brien, and of the wars of Thomond, from the landing of Henry II. in Ireland, to the death of Robert de Clare, A.D. 1318. This work was written by Rory Mac Craith, in the fifteenth century, the original of which, on vellum, is in the library of Sir William Betham, and if translated and published, would form a valuable contribution to the history of that period. Mac Curtin's Irish Dictionary, written by Hugh Mac Curtin, a native of Clare, a celebrated poet and historian, and published at Paris A.D. 1732. It is an English-Irish Dictionary, and the only one extant. Mac Curtin also published an Irish Grammar at Louvain, in 1728, and also other learned works on Irish history and antiquities. Andrew Mac Curtin, a celebrated poet of the same family, is also mentioned by O'Reilly. Several Irish poems by the Mac Curtins are in the possession of Sir William Betham, and form the best collection of them extant. The chevalier Thomas O'Gorman, of the family of the O'Gormans of Clare, was an officer in the French service, and distinguished in Irish literature, and collected many works. He is often mentioned in O'Reilly's Irish Writers, and died in Clare about the year 1815, and some of his MSS. are in the possession of Sir William Betham. O'Brien's Irish Dictionary, written by John O'Brien, R.C. bishop of Cloyne, and first published at Paris, A.D. 1768; and a new edition of it was published in Dublin, in the year 1832, by the Rev. Robert Daly, at present bishop of Cashel. O'Brien's Dictionary is a very learned and valuable work, not only on the Irish language, but on the topography of Ireland, and the genealogies of the ancient chiefs and clans. O'Connell's Irish Dictionary, written by Peter O'Connell, a native of Clare, a learned and laborious scholar, who died about the year 1828, a large work in MS., the original of which is in the library of the British Museum, London, and a copy in the library of Trinity College, Dublin. Anthony Bruodin, a native of Clare, who died about A.D. 1680, was a Franciscan friar and learned lecturer in the Irish monastery at Prague, and wrote the arose between them ; Bryan folded his arms about Mac Donnell, and had him firmly bound, and cast into the adjacent lake, where he was immediately drowned. Donal, son of Hugh O'Neill, with his kinsmen ; Bryan, son of Henry O'Neill, with the chiefs of Clanaboy ; and Torlogh More Mac Donnell, with all those of his name in Ulster, having collected themselves together, marched with one accord into Orgiall, until they arrived at Rath Tulloch, the fortress of Mac Mahon ; information was sent before them to Bryan, who fled, leaving the town quite empty, but they pursued Mac Mahon, who, together with the chiefs of his country, were engaged in securing their property and cattle, in the fastnesses of the country ; the Orgiallians were then defeated, and their arms and cattle were taken from them. After that Mac Mahon was expelled from his own territory, and compelled to take refuge with Muintir Maolmordha (O'Reillys of Cavan), and his wife and his daughter were made prisoners.

Cuehonacht O'Reilly, lord of Brefney, having entered a monastery, left the lordship to his brother Philip.

Hugh, son of Niall O'Donnell, heir presumptive to the lordship of Tireconnell, was slain by Donal, son of Murtoogh O'Conor, but Teige, son of Manus O'Conor, overtook Donal on the same day, defeated him, and slew a number of his people, together with Hugh, son of Conon, the son of Teige.

Robert, son of Watin Barrett (in Mayo), died.
The king of England's son left Ireland.

A. D. 1366.

The bishop of Raphoe, that is, Mac Maengail (Patrick Mac Moengail, or Magonail), died.

celebrated work entitled Passio Martyrum Hiberniæ, and many learned works on theology. Richard Creagh, Roman Catholic archbishop of Armagh, was a native of Limerick, and wrote Lives of the Irish Saints, and other learned works on Ecclesiastical History ; he died A. D. 1585. O'Halloran's History of Ireland, written by Sylvester O'Halloran, a native of Limerick, who was an eminent surgeon there, and a man of great learning on Irish history and antiquities. His History of Ireland, from the earliest period to the English invasion, is a learned and valuable work. It was first published in the year 1778, in two volumes quarto, and afterwards republished by Fitzpatrick of Dublin, in three volumes octavo, A. D. 1803. Ferrar's History of Limerick, written by John Ferrar, and published at Limerick, A. D. 1787. In the notes on Desmond and Ormond, will be given a full account of the ancient literature of Munster, and of many natives of Munster, distinguished in the military service of foreign states.

Cathal, son of Hugh Brefnach (O'Conor), the son of Cathal Roe ; Manus Oge, his son ; Murtoogh, the son of Dailredacair ; Maurice O'Maoltuille ; Dermod Mac Simon ; and Dermod Mac Giollabearaigh, were treacherously slain by the men of Fermanagh, at the river of Firluirg (barony of Lurg), and they also committed great depredations on the Clan Murtoogh (O'Conors), and made peace with the O'Rourkes, and forgave them their trespasses, through spite for the Clan Murtoogh, and the O'Rourkes made terms with them. The son of Roderick O'Conor took Cathal's place after that, and the O'Rourkes fled with their property, under the protection of the people of Fermanagh, and, having surrounded the Clan Murtoogh ; took them by surprise, and slew Cathal Mac Claney, chief of Dartry.

Murtoogh Mac Rannall, son of Rannall More Mac Rannall, the undisputed heir presumptive, was treacherously slain by Malachy Mac Rannall, chief of Muintir Eoluis (in Leitrim), and Malachy himself died in two months afterwards.

Cormac Don Mac Carthy, lord of Hy Cairpre and of Hy Eachach of Munster (both in the county of Cork), was treacherously slain by his own brother's son, the son of Donal of the Donals.

Conor O'Conor, lord of Ciarraidhe Luachra (in the county of Kerry), was slain by the Branaechs.¹

Roderick, son of Murtoogh O'Conor, was drowned in the Shannon.

Teige, son of Manus O'Conor, defeated John O'Donnell and his galloglasses² in a battle, in which a great many were slain, and Mac Sweeney, and several of the chiefs of Tireconnell, were taken prisoners and kept as hostages.

Donal O'Neill and the Clan Donnell, namely, Torlogh Mac Donnell and Alexander his son, col-

A. D. 1365.

1. Biatach, derived from Biadh, food, and teach, a house, was the term applied to the keepers of the houses of hospitality, an order of persons, as already explained, very numerous in Ireland in ancient times, having grants of lands and other public endowments, for the purpose of keeping open houses of hospitality, for the entertainment of the poor and indigent, and all travellers and strangers, &c. ; therefore this Cormac Mac Dermott Roe appears to have been the chief inspector and regulator of these establishments in Connaught.

A. D. 1366.

1. Branachs. Branaechs was a name applied to the descendants of Bran, one of the kings of Leinster in the sixth century, of which tribe were the O'Byrnes, O'Tooles, and other clans in Wexford and Wicklow.

2. Galloglasses, in Irish Galloglacha, were the heavy-armed lected their forces to attack Niall O'Neill; they expelled Mac Cathmail from the country, who went and joined O'Neill with his forces and cattle; but they overtook the rear of Mac Cathmail's party with their flocks, attacked them, and captured all their property; Randal, the son of Alexander, heir of the clan of Alexander, arrived at the same time from the Hebrides, to join Niall O'Neill. The kerns from either side of the Clan Donnells having approached each other, Randal sent messengers to Torlogh, and his son Alexander, entreating them to let him pass in respect of his seniority and of their friendship with each other; but they, however, treated that application with indifference, for they advanced to the ford over which they saw him preparing to pass, and a determined and fierce engagement ensued, in which many were slain and wounded on both sides; a son of Randal was slain by Torlogh in the thick of the fight, and Alexander, the son of Torlogh, was taken prisoner by Randal's party, whom they resolved instantly to put to death; but Randal, however, would not consent to their proposal, for he said that he should not be deprived both of his son and of his kinsman on the same day.

A great war broke out among the English of Connaught; Mac Maurice was expelled from the country by Mac William, and sought refuge with the Clan Rickard; Mac William, with Hugh O'Connor, king of Connaught, and William O'Kelly, lord of Hy Maine, collected a force in South Connaught, with which they marched into Clan Rickard, where they remained nearly three months opposing each other, until at length Mac William obtained the superiority, took the hostages of Clanrickard into his possession, and then victoriously returned to his own country.

John Mac Costello, lord of Slieve Lughá (in Mayo), died.

Hugh Tirrell, lord of Fertullach, (in Westmeath), was slain by the Berminghams.

A. D. 1367.

The bishop Malachy O'Ferrall, that is, bishop of Ardagh, a prelate eminent for his piety, almsgiving, humanity and wisdom; and Malachias Mac Guire, archdeacon of Orgiall, (diocese of Clogher), died.

Cuchonacht O'Reilly, lord of Brefney, until he resigned it to God, and took holy orders, was succeeded by Philip (O'Reilly).

The Clan Murtogh (O'Conors), made an incursion with their forces into Moy Nisse (in Leitrim), and they attacked Moylurg (in Roscommon); the chiefs on that expedition were, Teige, the son of Roderick O'Connor; Fergal Mac Tiarnan, lord of Tullyhunco, and Dermot Mac Rannall, lord of Muintir Eoluis, with many galloglasses, and they burned the fortress of Hugh Mac Dermott; Fergal Mac Dermott, lord of Moylurg, accompanied by Hugh Mac Dermott, overtook them, and a conflict ensued, in which many were slain on both sides, after which Teige O'Connor and Mac Rannall returned, without prisoners or booty.

Donal, son of Murtogh O'Connor, the O'Rourkes, and the Mac Donoghs, with their retained kerns, defeated Teige, the son of Manus O'Connor, on the strand of Eothuile the carpenter (near Sligo), in which (battle) the galloglasses of Manus's son were slain, eighty of the bravest of them being killed, along with Donal, the son of Sorley (Mac Donnell), Donal Oge his son, the two Mac Sweenys, Mac Aneaspuig O'Dowd, and William Mac Sithidh.

Dervail, daughter of Mulroony More Mac Dermott, and wife of Ualgarg O'Rourke, was slain by the Clan Murtogh.

Malachy, the son of Geoffrey Mac Gilpatrick (of Ossory), and a great many of his people, were treacherously slain by the English.

Teige Mac Gauran, and Aongus Mac Andeaganaigh Mac Gauran, died.

Teige and Loughlin, the two sons of Aongus Roe O'Daly, and Maolmaire Oge Magrath, died.

Mac Maurice Nambrigh; Owen, son of Roderick O'Kelly (of Galway); Murtogh, son of Murtogh O'Connor; and Bebinn, the daughter of Ualgarg O'Rourke, the wife of Tomaltagh Mac Donogh, died.

foot soldiers of the Irish; they wore iron helmets, and coats of mail, studded with iron nails and rings; had long swords by their sides, and bore in their right hands broad battle-axes with very keen edges, by a single blow of which they often clove the skull of a warrior through his helmet. It appears that the Scots also had troops called galloglasses and kerns, as in Shakspear's Macbeth mention is made of "the merciless Mac Donnell, from the Western Isles, with his kerns and galloglasses."

Kerns, in Irish, Cethern, derived, according to Cormac's Glossary of the tenth century, from Ceth, that is, Cath, a battle, and arn, plundering, was the term applied to the light troops of the Irish, armed with spears, javelins, darts, slings and arrows, &c.

The Clan Murtogh (O'Conors of Sligo), made an attack on the people of Fermanagh, at Inis More, Lough Berraid, and Seanadh Mac Manus, and having carried away much booty, they returned home safe.

A. D. 1368.

The coarb of St. Maog¹, and archdeacon of Brefney, a man full of the gifts of the Holy Ghost, died, after gaining the victory over the world and the devil.

Hugh, son of Felim O'Conor, king of Connaught, the most heroic and valiant of the Irish, the Lughaidh Lamhfada² of Leath Cuinn against the English and other enemies, died at Roscommon, after gaining the victory of repentance; and Roderick, the son of Torlogh, assumed the sovereignty of Connaught.

Crioch Cairpre (Carbury, in Sligo), was divided between the son of Manus (O'Conor), and Donal, the son of Murtogh (O'Conor).

Fergal Mac Dermott, lord of Moylurg, the lion of nobleness and of feats of arms of his tribe; Tomaltach, son of Fergal Mac Dermott, tanist of Moylurg; and Conor Mac Dermott, died.

Hugh, son of Conor Mac Dermott, assumed the lordship of Moylurg.

Roderick, son of Seonnig Mac Geoghegan, the hawk of heroism and of feats of arms of his tribe, the most hospitable man from Dublin to Athlone; and Tiarnan, son of Cathal O'Rourke, died.

Dermot, son of Cormac Dun Mac Carthy, was taken prisoner by Mac Carthy of Carbery, (county of Cork), by whom he was delivered up to the English, who put him to death.

David O'Tuathail (O'Toole, in Wicklow), was slain by the English of Dublin.

William Sasanach, the son of Sir Edmond Burke, heir to the Mac Williams, died of the small-pox at Inis Cua³.

Fiachra O'Flynn, heir to the chieftaincy of Siol Maolruain (in Roscommon), the best man of his tribe in his time, and also his wife, died.

Niall O'Neill, king of Tyrone, marched with a great force into Orgiall, and all the chiefs of the province (of Ulster), joined him to attack Bryan Mac Mahon, and they encamped at Meodhan Tire (the middle country); Mac Mahon offered them great terms, viz., that he would give the half of Orgiall (Monaghan), to Niall, the son of Murtogh, son of Bryan (Mac Mahon) Nagoileach Naiffrin (of the chalices), namely, the lord who was previously over the country, and other large gifts to O'Neill himself, as a reparation for the death of Mac Donnell; O'Neill consented to make peace with him on those conditions, but the son of Murtogh Mac Mahon, and Alexander Oge Mac Donnell, lord of the galloglasses (or Scots), with one accord proceeded with three troops of kerns to attack Mac Mahon, without O'Neill's permission, and they made a sally upon his fortress; Mac Mahon and all his household were on their guard, armed and accoutred in their fortress, and the other party having instantly attacked them, a fierce and desperate conflict ensued, in which Mac Mahon defeated them, and slew the son of Murtogh Mac Mahon, tanist of Orgiall, together with Alexander, the son of Torlogh Mac Donnell, the constable of the galloglasses; Owen, son of Torlogh, son of Malachy O'Donnell, and many others, on that occasion.

Thomas O'Flynn, lord of Tuirtre (in Antrim), a man full of hospitality and honour, died.

Teige, son of Manus, son of Cathal, son of Donal O'Conor, was treacherously taken prisoner by Roderick, the son of Torlogh (O'Conor), in his own fortress, at Ard Anchoillin, (in Roscommon), after he had been brought to the house of O'Conor, by Cormac Mac Donogh; and was, after that, delivered into the hands of Donal, son of Murtogh O'Conor, who finally slew him in the castle of Sligo. All bad deeds afterwards committed were compared to those perpetrated on Manus O'Conor's son, so that it followed as an old saying of abhorrence, "that the taking and slaying of the son of Manus was not worse than whatsoever treacherous deed they might hear of being committed."

A. D. 1368.

1. Coarb of St. Maoge, that is, abbot of Drumlane, in the county of Cavan, the monastery of which was founded by St. Maoge, in the sixth century. Archdeacon of Brefney, that is archdeacon of the diocese of Kilmore.

2. Lughaidh Lamhfhada, to whom Hugh O'Conor is here compared, was a celebrated warrior king of the Tuath De Danans. Leath Cuin was a term applied to the northern half of Ireland.

3. Inis Cua, now Iniscoe, situated near Lough Con, in the parish of Crossmolina, barony of Tyrrawley, county of Mayo.

A great war arose in Connaught, between O'Conor, Mac William, and Mac Dermott, on account of that taking and slaying (of O'Conor).

Cuuladh Mac-an-Gir Mac Cathmail, the chief of his own tribe, and his son, an experienced and learned master in the arts and sciences, died in England.

William, son of Donogh Muinach O'Kelly, lord of Hy Maine, was taken prisoner by O'Madden, and by the Clan Mac Eogain; and Donal, son of Conor O'Kelly, and Ardgall Oge O'Concanon, were slain on the same day, by O'Madden.

Donal Mac Namara, (of Clare), died.

Slevin Mac Quillan, constable of the province of Ulster, died.

Muiredhach O'Fairchellaidh (O'Farrelly), the abbot of Drumlane, and archdeacon of Brefney, (diocese of Kilmore), died.

Dermod Lamh-dearg, (the red-handed), Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, was taken prisoner by the English, and he was the most valiant provincial king in his time.

A. D. 1369.

Hugh O'Neill, bishop of Clogher, a pious and charitable prelate; and Richard O'Reilly, bishop of Kilmore,¹ died.

The Dean O'Bardain, and Cuchonacht O'Reilly, lord of Brefney, died.

Philip O'Reilly was taken prisoner by his own kinsmen, and was sent to be imprisoned in the castle of Lough Uachtar, closely bound and fettered.

Manus O'Reilly assumed the lordship then, and a war and commotion arose in Brefney, on account of that imprisonment; Annadh, the son of Richard O'Reilly, collected a great force, and Mac Mahon and the chiefs of Orgiall, (Monaghan), came to assist him to compel Manus to release Philip O'Reilly; Manus, and his kinsmen, with all their forces, united together to defend their own country, and a battle ensued, in which however, Manus was defeated at Blen Chupa;² and the three sons of Cormac O'Ferrall, namely, Seoinin, Malachy, and Fergus; Felim, son of Hugh Anchleitigh (of the plume), O'Conor; the two sons of Flaherty More Mac Conruba, namely, Donogh, and Brien; Sitrick-na-srona Masterson, and many others, were slain in that engagement.

Gerald Cavenagh, heir presumptive to the crown of Leinster, was slain by the Black Knight.

Tiarnan O'Rourke went on a predatory excursion, to Lurg, (in Fermanagh), and carried away great booty; but Hugh Oge, the son of Hugh O'Rourke, was slain by O'Maolduin, of Lurg, while in pursuit of the plunder.

Dermod, the red-handed, Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, was put to death by the English of Dublin, (in the castle of Dublin), after he had been a long time imprisoned by them.

Mahon, of Maonmoy, O'Brien, lord of Thomond, the best and most noble of the Irish of the south of Ireland, died in his own fortress, after gaining the victory of repentance.

Bryan O'Brien assumed the lordship of Thomond, after Mahon.

O'Maolduin, that is, Donal, chief of Tuath Luirg (in Fermanagh), was slain by the sons of Niall O'Donnell, who carried with them a booty on one of the islands of Lough Erne called Badhbha (Boa Island); Philip Mac Guire, lord of the seven

A. D. 1369.

1. Bishop of Kilmore. Many of the O'Reillys of Cavan have been bishops of Brefney or Kilmore, and of several other sees, of whom the following have been collected from Ware, Archdall, Stewart's Armagh, Brennan's Ecclesiastical History, and various other sources. Richard O'Reilly, bishop of Brefney, died A.D. 1369; he was the son of Malachy O'Reilly, chief of Brefney. John O'Reilly, bishop of Brefney, died A.D. 1393; he was the son of Geoffrey, son of Giolla Iosa Roe O'Reilly, prince of Brefney, who is called by Ware, Gelasius Rufus O'Reilly, and was founder of the abbey of Cavan. John O'Reilly, abbot of Kells, and afterwards bishop of Brefney, from about A.D. 1464 to A.D. 1474. Dermitius O'Reilly, abbot of Kells, afterwards bishop of Kilmore, from A.D. 1511 to 1522. Hugh O'Reilly, Roman Catholic bishop of Kilmore, from about A.D. 1610 to 1626, and afterwards translated to Armagh. Michael O'Reilly, vicar-general and administrator of the diocese of Kilmore, from A.D. 1715 to 1727, afterwards Roman Catholic bishop of Derry, and lastly translated to Armagh.

Charles O'Reilly, Roman Catholic bishop of Kilmore, died in 1800. Fergal O'Reilly, Roman Catholic bishop of Kilmore twenty-two years, died A.D. 1820. Philip O'Reilly, Roman Catholic bishop of Raphoe twenty-one years, died about A.D. 1780. Daniel O'Reilly, Roman Catholic bishop of Clogher thirty years, died A.D. 1778. Hugh O'Reilly, Roman Catholic bishop of Clogher twenty-three years, died A.D. 1801. The following O'Reillys have been in the see of Armagh:—Hugh O'Reilly, Roman Catholic archbishop of Armagh twenty-eight years, died A.D. 1655; Edmond O'Reilly, vicar-general of the diocese of Dublin, afterwards Roman Catholic archbishop of Armagh fourteen years, died A.D. 1669; Michael O'Reilly, Roman Catholic bishop of Derry, afterwards archbishop of Armagh ten years, died A.D. 1758; Richard O'Reilly, coadjutor bishop of Kildare, afterwards Roman Catholic archbishop of Armagh thirty-six years, died A.D. 1818.

2. Blen Chupa, a place now called Blencup, in the parish of Kilmore, county of Cavan.

districts, sailed with a large fleet, to avenge the death of his young friend on the sons of O'Donnell; and Niall Oge, son of Niall Garv, son of Hugh, son of Donal Oge (O'Donnell), was slain by him in a naval engagement on Fionn Lough, at the side of the island.

Bryan, son of Hugh Buidhe O'Neill, a worthy heir to the crown of Ireland, in nobility, hospitality, and feats of arms, died.

Bryan O'Brien, lord of Thomond, gave a very great overthrow to the English of Munster, and took Gerald, earl of Desmond, and many of the English nobles, prisoners, and slaughtered an immense number of their people besides. The people of Thomond, and the Clan Cuilein, (Mae Namaras), burned Limerick on that occasion; the people of the town submitted to O'Brien, and Sioda Cam, (Mae Namara), son of O'Dwyre's daughter, assumed the wardenship of the town; but the English who were in the town, acted treacherously towards him and slew him, which was a great calamity, as regarded the son of a chief.

Philip Mac Guire, lord of Fermanagh, sailed with a fleet, on Lough Oughter, (county of Cavan), and having taken the castle of Cloeh Oughter, liberated Philip O'Reilly, lord of Brefney, who re-assumed his lordship.

Malachy Mae Mahon, heir presumptive to the lordship of Orgiall, (Monaghan); Bryan, son of Murtagh O'Connor; John, son of Edmond Mae Hoberd; Donogh O'Beirne, chief of Tir Briune, (Rosecommon); Rannall O'Hanley, (of Rosecommon); Cormac O'Hanley; also John Mac Egan, and Gilbert O'Barden, the two most famous harpers of Conmaiene, (Leitrim), died.

William O'Farrelly, abbot of Drumlane, and archdeacon of Brefney, (Kilmore), died.

A. D. 1370.

A firm and friendly peace was concluded between the Tyronians, amongst themselves, on the following conditions: that Donal should give hostages to Niall, as security, in not opposing him about the lordship, and that Niall should give Donal a portion of lands and possessions.

Gilpatrick Mae Cathmail, chief of Kinel Feradaidh, (in Tyrone), Cuuladh his son, and his wife, and the daughter of Manus Mac Mahon, were treacherously slain by the Clan Hugh Mac Cathmail, and Murtogh, his brother, succeeded him in the chieftainship.

Caheer O'Connor, heir presumptive to the lordship of Offaley, (King's county), and Murtogh O'Moore, were killed in a predatory excursion by the English of Leinster.

Dueola, the daughter of O'Reilly, and wife of Philip Mac Guire, died.

Manus O'Reilly, (chief of Cavan), was taken prisoner by the sons of Thomas, the son of Mahon O'Reilly, and was imprisoned in the castle of Lough Oughter.

Cathal, son of Dabug O'Concanon, lord of Hy Dermada, (in Rosecommon); Siobhan (Judith) Cham, daughter of Mac Carthy, and wife of Mae Namara, (in Clare); Sioda of Kilkenny, the son of John Mac Namara; John O'Hara, heir to the lordship of Lieney; and Dermod, the son of Cathal Oge O'Connor, died.

Niall O'Neill, lord of Tyrone, defeated Bryan Mae Mahon, lord of Orgiall, (Monaghan), and great numbers of Mae Mahon's people were slain and drowned.

Donal, son of Malachy; and Teige, son of Loughlin O'Kelly, (of Galway), with his two sons, died.

Malachy Conaetach O'Ferrall, and Cathal Oge O'Ferrall, died.

Teige O'Rourke assumed the lordship of Brefney, but he was expelled therefrom, and driven into the country of Mae William, (Burke), by the Clan Murtogh, (O'Conors); and by Mae Tiaran, aided by Conor Roe, son of Cathal, the son of Hugh Brefniagh, (O'Connor).

William Don, the son of Ulick, (Burke), died.

A. D. 1371.

John O'Grady, archbishop of Tuam, the most distinguished man in his time for wisdom and hospitality, died.

Fergal Mae Coghlan, (of the King's county), died while imprisoned by O'Kennedy.

Fergal Mac Geoghegan, (of Westmeath), died.

Murrough, son of Owen O'Madden, the most distinguished man in Ireland for his contributions to the clergy, the poor, and the destitute, was slain by the cast of a javelin, in the rear of a preying party, in Ormond.

Bryan O'Kennedy, lord of Ormond, was treacherously slain by the English.

Edmond O'Kennedy, heir to the lordship of Ormond, died.

Teige Oge, son of Manus O'Conor, was treacherously slain by Donal, son of Murtogh O'Conor, in the castle of Sligo, after he had been sent to him by the king of Connaught, Roderick, the son of Torlogh, as before stated.

Eachmarcach, son of Manus, son of Roderick, son of Manus, son of Don More Maguire, a great landed proprietor who lived at Lough Erne, died.

O'Dowd, (Donal) committed great depredations in Tireragh of the Moy (in Sligo), plundered the country, took the castles, namely, those of Ardnaree and Castle Conor, and expelled all the English who possessed them, and then divided the country among his kinsmen and people.

A. D. 1372.

Bryan More Mac Mahon, lord of Orgiall, (Monaghan), marched with his forces against the English, to give them battle, but was treacherously slain in ambush by one of the galloglasses of his own party, who then made his escape by flight.

John More O'Dugan¹, chief bard and historiographer of Hy Maine, died after the victory of extreme unction and repentance at Rinn Duin, among the monks of St. John the Baptist.

Murtogh Muinach, son of Murtogh More Mac Geoghegan, chief of Kinel Fiacha, died, after gaining the victory of repentance.

Bermingham (of Galway), was taken prisoner by O'Kelly and his sons, and Richard Bermingham, his heir, was slain.

Myler Mac Hoberd (Burke) was slain by O'Conor.

William Mac Ulick (Burke), the most humorous and affable of the Burkes, and William Oge O'Kelly, heir to the lordship of Hy Maine, died.

A. D. 1373.

William Mac Cormaic, bishop of Ardagh, a man distinguished for his wisdom and piety, died.

A. D. 1372.

2. John More O'Dugan, chief bard and historian to the O'Kellys, princes of Hy Maine, in Galway and Roscommon, of whom an account has been given in the introduction to the present publication, was the celebrated author of the Topography of ancient Ireland, which is embodied in the course of these notes, together

Adam O'Keenan, a canon and learned historian, died at Lisgoole (in Fermanagh).

The English of Meath attacked Annaly, and slew Roderick, the son of Cathal O'Ferrall, and his son, with many of his people, on that occasion. Donogh O'Ferrall, with all his forces, pursued and slew a great many of them; the commander of the English was slain by the cast of a javelin, in consequence of which his forces were defeated.

William D'Alton, and the sheriff of Meath were slain by the Kinel Fiacha (Mac Geoghegans of Westmeath), and by O'Melaghlín.

Mac Anphearsuin Bermingham was slain by Torlogh Roe O'Conor with a single stroke of a sword, in Conmaicne of Dunmore (in the county of Galway), after they (the Berminghams), had acted treacherously towards him, while on his way from Conmaicne Cuile (in Mayo), after which he made his escape from his enemies by the strength of his arm, although he had been wounded; Andrew Mac Kenny was slain afterwards by them (the Berminghams), he having been left as a hostage with them by Torlogh, for the purpose that they should obtain their choice ransom in lieu of him, at the time they had deceived him on a former occasion.

Barduv, daughter of O'Rourke, and wife of Donal Mac Tiarnan (of the county of Cavan), died.

John Mac Namara, head chief of Clan Cuilein (in Clare), and Teige Oge O'Durnin, died.

Sabina, daughter of Cathal O'Conor, and wife of Flaherty O'Rourke (of Leitrim), died.

Rannall, son of Cormac Mac Rannall, was treacherously slain by the son of Mac Naiscin.

Malachy Conachtach O'Neil died.

Master Niocol Mac Tchedain, official of Cloyne, died.

Bryan Oge, son of Bryan O'Dowd (of Sligo), was slain by the Barretts.

A. D. 1374.

Senicin Savadge was slain by Mac Gennis (of the county of Down).

Donal Oge, son of John O'Dogherty (of Donegal), died.

with numerous extracts literally translated from his beautiful topographical poem on the Irish chiefs and clans. At Rinndune or Randown, now called St. John's, was situated an ancient abbey and castle, on a peninsula extending into the Shannon in Roscommon.

Peregrine Oge Mac Geoghegan, chief of Kinel Fiacha, having gone to Athlone in company with the bishop of Meath, was treacherously slain there with one thrust of a spear by the Sionach (Fox), who was one of William D'Alton's party; but he himself was immediately after torn asunder, and small fragments were made of his body, as a retribution for his misdeeds.

Theobald Burke, heir to Mae William, was slain by the people of Hy Maine.

Niall O'Neill defeated the English in an engagement, in which the Knight Roche, with Bocksa of the Rock (Carrickfergus), Sandal Burke, William of Ballydolet, the most hospitable man in Ireland, and many others, not recorded, were slain.

Teige, son of Roderick, son of Cathal Roe O'Connor, the worthy heir of O'Connor, died.

Malachy, son of Dermot O'Ferrall, having marched from Annaly with his forces to join Muintir Maolmordha (the O'Reillys of Cavan), against the English, a fierce and desperate battle was fought between them and the English, in which, however, he (O'Ferrall) and many others were slain.

Teige Oge Mac Rannall was wounded by the cast of a javelin, of which he died, but it was not ascertained who had thrown it; the Muintir Beirne (of Roscommon), accused the Clan Murtogh (O'Conors) of the deed, and the Clan Murtogh in turn accused the O'Beirnes, for a strife existed between them at that time; but a contest, however, arose in consequence of it between the Mac Rannalls and O'Beirnes.

Cormac, son of Tomaltach O'Ferrall, was slain.

Fergal, son of Flaherty O'Rourke, was slain by Philip.

Tiarnan, son of Bryan Mae Tiarnan, died.

Malachy Roe O'Duigenan, a learned historian, and Mahon Anchinn, son of Donal, son of Murtogh O'Rourke, fell by each other's hands.

A. D. 1375.

Donogh Cavanagh Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, was treacherously slain by the English, he having often, before that, spread destruction among them.

Mahon, son of Manus O'Connor, died, after having gained the palm of hospitality and generosity.

The castle of Roscommon was given to Roderick O'Connor by Torlogh Roe, in exchange for Ballintobber, and other property.

Mac Arten, chief of Kinel Fogarty (county of Down), was treacherously slain by his own kinsman, the son of Gille Trenoinn Mac Arten.

Niall O'Neill gave the English of Down a signal overthrow, in which Sir James of Bally Atha Thid, or Alahid, the king of England's viceroy,¹ Burke of Camlinn, and many others who are not recorded, were slain.

Cu-uladh Mac Mahon, Tanist of Orgiall (Monaghan), died from the bleeding of a vein.

Art, son of Maguire (of Fermanagh), a man full of hospitality and generosity, died.

Dermot Mac Rannall went on an expedition to attack Cormac O'Beirne; and Donogh, son of Connor of the Cup, was slain on that occasion, together with many others, and they also took much booty.

Malachy O'Donnellan, the chosen professor of poetry in Siol Murray (Roscommon), and also chief professor of Arts in Ireland, died of an ulcer.

Cairbre and Owen, the sons of Mae Tiarnan (of Cavan), marched with all their forces to attack the English; but one of their own men, having acted treacherously, betrayed them for a bribe to the English, who surrounded them, and took twenty-five of the Mac Tiarnans, and of the chiefs of their people, whom they beheaded in one place.

Geoffrey, son of Giolla-na-neev O'Ferrall, a worthy heir to the lordship of Annaly, for hospitality, feats of arms, personal figure, and affable manners, died after the victory of extreme unction and repentance.

Sir Edmond Albanach, the son of William Burke, died, after the victory of repentance, and Thomas, his son, succeeded him in the lordship.

Osgar, son of Art Mac Guire (of Fermanagh), was slain by the sons of Donogh Mac Guire.

Donogh, son of Teige, son of Connor of the Cup (Mac Rannall), was slain by Muintir Beirne.

Thomas Bermingham, lord of Athenry, and John Mac Loughlin, head chief of his own tribe, died.

A. D. 1375.

1. Sir James here mentioned, of Bally-Atha-Thid, or Alahid, was probably one of the Talbotts of Malahide, and as he is design-nated the King of England's viceroy, he might have been a deputy under Sir William de Windsor, who was at that time lord lieutenant of Ireland.

Cathal Oge, son of Cathal Oge, son of Cathal More, son of Donal O'Connor, was slain by the people of Clan Rickard, and Loghlin, son of Donogh O'Dowd, was taken prisoner on the same occasion.

Brian O'Brien, lord of Thomond, was expelled from his country by Torlogh, son of Murtoth O'Brien, and by the Clan Rickard.

A war broke out between Roderick O'Connor, king of Connaught, and Malachy O'Kelly, lord of Hy Maine, but at length O'Connor gained power over Hy Maine.

Cathal, son of Manus Mac Dermott, died.

A. D. 1376.

Teige O'Rourke, lord of Brefney, a man full of hospitality, generosity, excellence, and renown, the bear of the Brefnians, and the lion of the north of Ireland, died, and Tiarnan, his son, then assumed the lordship of Brefney.

Hugh O'Tuathail, lord of Imaile (county of Wicklow), was slain by the English.

Dalvach, son of Malachy O'Byrne, the most distinguished man in Leinster for hospitality and generosity, was wounded by his own spur, of which wound he died.

Hugh, son of John O'Ferrall, died, a man who, from boyhood to that time, was an inexhaustible fountain in hospitality and liberality to the clergy of Ireland in general.

Bebinn, daughter of Donal O'Dunn, and wife of O'Dempsey (of the Queen's county), died.

Robert O'Ferrall died, after gaining the victory of repentance.

Cuaifne O'Connor Faily, a most worthy heir to the lordship of Offaley (King's county), died.

Conor O'Beehan, a learned historian; Ceallach Mac Curtin, chief historian of Thomond; John O'Rooney, chief poet to Magennis (county of Down); Malachy O'Maolmhena, chief professor to O'Kane, (of Derry); Donogh Mac Firis (of Sligo), a good historian; and Ruarcán O'Hamill, chief poet to O'Hanlon (of Armagh), a man who kept a house of general hospitality, and refused none, died.

Cumoihe O'Kane, lord of Oireacht O'Kane (of Derry), was taken prisoner by the English at the port of Colerain, and sent prisoner in fetters to Carrickfergus.

The English of Meath, Ulster, and Leinster, marched with their combined forces to Annaly, and treacherously committed depredations in the country; O'Ferrall then collected all his forces, attacked by turns the English of Ulster, Leinster, &c. burned their farm-houses and towns, plundered their territories, and returned home victoriously, with great booty.

A. D. 1377.

O'Kelly, bishop of Clonfert Brenain; John O'Rodachain, the coarb of St. Caillin (abbot of Fenagh) an eminent scholar; and the great dean Mac Maurice, died; the dean died at Rome.

The monastery of Easroe (Ballyshannon) was burned.

Walter, son of Sir David Burke; Donal, son of Fergal Mac Anmanaigh O'Gallagher (of Donegal), Geoffrey O'Flanagan, chief of Clan Cathail, (in Roscommon); Donogh, son of William Alain O'Carroll, lord of Ely; Dermot Bacach Mac Brennan, chief of Corcachlan, (in Roscommon); Fachtna, son of David O'Moore (of the Queen's county); and Bryan O'Flaherty (of Galway), died.

Rickard Burke marched with a force into Clan Cuilein (in Clare), and the people of Clan Cuilein, having collected their forces, headed by Mac Namara, the son of O'Daly's daughter, attacked and defeated the Clan Rickard in an engagement, in which Theobald, son of Ulick (Burke), the leader of the kerns, with the three sons of O'Nedin, and many of the chiefs of Clan Rickard, were slain.

Roderick O'Connor defeated at Roscommon Mac William Burke, and Malachy O'Kelly, lord of Hy Maine, in an engagement in which Richard Burke, brother of Mac William; Donal, son of Cathal Oge O'Connor; Teige Oge, son of Teige O'Kelly; O'Mannin, chief of Sodain; and Mac Dugal of the galloglasses, with many others who are not recorded, were slain.

The castle of Lios-Aird-Abla (Lisard, in Longford), was erected by John O'Ferrall, lord of Annaly.

A contention arose between Mac Dermott and Roderick O'Connor, from which resulted the spoliation of Moylurg, and the burning of its crops and dwellings; a great many were slain on both sides; but they at length made peace, and Mac Dermott received presents for making that peace, and compensation for the injuries he had sustained from Roderick O'Connor.

Mahon, son of John Mac Namara (of Clare), died.

Richard II.¹ assumed the sovereignty of England on the 21st of June.

Geoffrey, son of Annadh O'Reilly (of Cavan) was slain by the sons of Caoch O'Reilly.

A. D. 1378.

Carbre O'Ferrall, bishop of Ardagh, the retentive bond of piety, the protecting link of wisdom, a vessel of divine love and humanity, died at Rome, after gaining the victory over the world and the devil.

More, daughter of O'Ferrall, and wife of Dermot Mac Rannall, died, and was buried with great solemnity at Cluan Conmaiene¹.

Walter Mac William Burke was slain by the O'Malleys (of Mayo).

Fergal Mac Rannall was slain by Con, son of Murtoigh Mac Rannall, Gilcreest O'Rourke, son of the lord of Brefney, died.

Torlogh Mac Sweeny, high constable of Connaught, died.

Teige, son of Loughlin Mac Namara, chief of Clan Cuilein, was slain by the son of O'Daly's daughter.

Donal Mac Brady, chief of Cuile Brighdin, and of Teallach Carroll (in the county of Cavan), a man of general knowledge; John O'Felan (of Waterford), an eminent poet; and Duvcola, daughter of Mac Rannall, and wife of O'Mulvey, died.

Mac Rannall, with his kinsmen and party, the two clans of Hugh and Fergal O'Rourke, made an attack on Cathal Roe Mac Rannall; but Cathal having collected his kinsmen and connexions, together with Dermot Mac Dermott, to oppose them, they defeated Mac Rannall; and Fergal Mac Rannall, a worthy, prosperous, and wealthy man; Mac Shanly, Mac Gilduff, and many others not recorded, were slain in that conflict.

Gilereest O'Sgingin, chief historian of Tirconnell, died of an ulcer.

Bryan Mac Guire, heir to the lordship of Fermanagh, was slain by the sons of Art Mac Guire.

Fergal O'Mulvey, chief of Muintir Carolan (in Leitrim), died.

Teige Mac Egan, chief Brehon (judge) of North Connaught, a man of learning, free from pride and arrogance, who kept a house of general hospitality, died.

A. D. 1379.

Faltach, bishop of Meath,¹ died in England.

James O'Conolly, prior of Devenish (in Fermanagh), died.

Flaherty O'Mongan, erenach of Rossorry (in Fermanagh), died.

Philip, son of Niocol, that is, The D'Alton, lord of Westmeath, died.

Ferbisigh Mac Firbis (of Sligo), a learned historian, died.

David O'Dunn, chief of Hy Riagain (in Queen's county), was slain by the son of Carroll O'Dunn.

Richard Mac Cathmaill (of Tyrone), was slain by Philip Mac Guire, lord of Fermanagh, and Donal O'Neill.

O'Neill, that is Niall More, defeated Mac Guire at the battle of Dreche², in which Teige Mac Gnire, with the two sons of Mac Manus; Torlogh, son of Donogh Maguire; Bryan, the son of Magrath, and Murtoigh Mac Miolchon, were slain.

Mac Anchaoich O'Reilly (of Cavan) was slain by the son of Annadh O'Reilly.

Cnmara Gearr Mac Namara was treacherously slain by his own kinsmen.

A. D. 1377.

1. Richard II. King Edward III. died on the 21st of June, A. D. 1377, and was succeeded by his grandson, Richard II., son of Edward the Black Prince, then only in the eleventh year of his age, his uncles, John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, Edmond, duke of York, and Thomas, duke of Gloucester, being appointed regents of the kingdom during his minority.

A. D. 1378.

1. Cluan Conmaiene, now Cloon, in the parish of Cloon, barony of Mohill, county of Leitrim, in Muintir Eoluis, or Mac Rannall's Country, where there was a celebrated abbey founded by St. Fraceh in the sixth century.

A. D. 1379.

1. The bishop of Meath here mentioned under the name of Faltach, was Stephen de Vale, Wale, or Wall.

2. The battle of Dreche, now probably Ddrah, near Newtown-butler, county of Fermanagh.

Cuchonnacht, son of Philip Mac Guire, a worthy heir to the lordship of Fermanagh, for hospitality and nobleness, was slain by the Clan Donnell of Clankelly.

Maolmora Oge, son of Maolmora Roe O'Conor, of Offaley, was slain by the English.

Fionguala, daughter of O'Kelly, and wife of Mac William Burke (of Galway), died.

Richard O'Dugan, a worthy successor to the professorship of Hy Maine, died.

William, son of the Giolla Caoch Mac Carroll, the most delightful minstrel of the Irish, died.

A. D. 1380.

The abbot, Mac Dermott Roe, of Trinity Island, on Lough Key (in Roscommon), and Donal O'Leanan, prior of Lisgoole (in Fermanagh), died.

John, son of Conor, son of Hugh, son of Donal Oge (O'Donnell), lord of Tirconnell, and of the adjoining districts, and heir presumptive to the crown of all Ulster, and his son, Malachy Duv, were slain at the monastery of Easroe (Ballyshannon), by Torlogh, son of Niall O'Donnell, aided by the sons of Cathal Oge O'Conor, and by the Muintir Duirnin, in a nocturnal attack on his camp.

Mac William Burke gave Mac William Oughter (Richard Oge) a great overthrow in the town of Ath Leathan (in Mayo), in which Mac Jordan Dexeter, lord of Ath Leathan, and John Dexeter, were slain.

Teige, the son of Murtoth O'Brien (of Thomond), was slain by Bryan Sramach O'Brien.

Roderick, son of Cathal, son of Hugh Breenach O'Conor, made an attack on the O'Rourkes, but was slain by Manus O'Rourke.

Art Mac Gennis (of the county of Down), gave the English and the people of Oirior (in Armagh), a signal and awful overthrow, in which O'Hanlon, lord of Oirior, and a great many of the English were slain.

The Mortimer¹ came to Ireland with sovereign power, as lord chief justice, and the Irish nobility, with the heirs presumptive to the throne of Ireland, waited on him, namely, Niall O'Neill (of Tyrone), O'Hanlon (of Armagh), O'Ferrall (of Longford), O'Reilly (of Cavan), O'Mulloy (of the King's county), Mac Geoghegan and the Sionach (Fox of Westmeath), with other chiefs.

Art Mac Gennis, lord of Iveagh, in Ulidia (county of Down), was treacherously taken prisoner, at the residence of Mortimer, in consequence of which the Irish, and many of the English themselves, became afraid to place any confidence in him, or trust themselves to his power.

Art, son of Gerald Cavenagh (of Leinster), was slain by the English.

Torlogh O'Donnell gained a great victory over Conor Oge, son of John, son of Conor, son of Hugh, son of Donal Oge (O'Donnell), and over O'Dogherty and the Mac Sweeneys, in which engagement many of their chiefs were slain; two brothers of the Mac Sweeneys were taken prisoners, namely, John and Murrogh, and he took much property from them in horses, arms and armour.

Art, son of Gerald, son of Thomas Fionn (the fair), of the Mac Murroghs, was slain by Mac Murrogh, king of Leinster.

The Clan Murtoth (O'Conors of Sligo), and Philip O'Reilly (of Cavan), marched with a force into Brefney O'Rourke, and slew Thomas Mac Dorchy, but O'Rourke overtook them and drove them forcibly out of the country, after they had lost some of their men and horses.

Cian, son of Roderick O'Carroll, an illustrious heir to the lordship of Ely (in Ormond), was slain by Hugh, son of Murtoth O'Mulloy, with the cast of a javelin.

Mortimer marched with an army into Ulster, where he destroyed many fortresses and towns on his expedition, together with the churches and country, including Urney,² Donaghmore, Aragail, Clogher, &c.

Cormac Oge Mac Carthy (of Cork); Henry, son of Donal O'Ferrall; Hugh, son of Murtoth Muinach Mac Geoghegan (in Westmeath), and Donal, son of David Mac Geoghegan, died.

A. D. 1380.

1. The Mortimer here mentioned was Edmond Mortimer, earl of March and Ulster, who was married to Philipa, daughter of Lionel, duke of Clarence, one of the sons of king Edward III.; hence his son, Roger Mortimer, earl of March and Ulster, became heir presumptive to the throne of England. Edmond Mortimer died at Cork, A. D. 1381.

2. Urney, in the parish of Urney, near Strabane; Donaghmore, a church in the parish of Donaghmore, near Dungannon; Airegal, now Errigal Kerougue, in the barony of Clogher; and Clogher church, all in the county of Tyrone.

Donal, son of Bryan O'Dowd, lord of Tireragh and Tyrawley (in Sligo and Mayo), a man who defended his territory against the English and Irish who opposed him, died in his own town on the 3rd of May, and was succeeded by his son Roderick.

A. D. 1381.

William, son of Donogh Muinach O'Kelly, lord of Hy Maine, the most distinguished man of his race for high character, excellence and renown, a man who gave a general invitation of hospitable entertainment to the clergy and learned of Ireland, and made presents to them all according to their wants, died at a venerable old age, after gaining the victory of repentance, and was succeeded by his son Malachy.

Teige Roe Mac Dermott Gall, who had the chief power over Airtheach, was slain by the Clan Costello.

Dermod Mac Carthy, heir to the lordship of Desmond, was slain by O'Mahony.

Kennedy Mac-I-Brien of Coonagh (in Ormond), was slain by the English.

The sons of Felim O'Conor were expelled by Roderick O'Conor, and dispossessed of Ballintober (in Roscommon). Cathal, son of Roderick O'Conor, was valiantly and victoriously taken prisoner soon after by Bryan Ballach (O'Conor), at Beol-an-Tachair (in Roscommon), as were also some other chiefs, together with Bryan O'Beirne and Loughlin O'Hanley, who were returning from Conmaiene of Dunmore (in Galway); Bryan kept them in confinement until he obtained his own terms from O'Conor, and they then concluded a peace.

The castle of Athlone was taken by the earl Mortimer, and the son of Ricard Fox was slain there.

The castle of Athlcathan (in Mayo), was demolished by the Mac Donoghs, who carried away its portal-gates to Ballymote.

O'Duinn was slain by the people of Fercall (in the King's county), while plundering them.

Niall O'Neill marched with his forces into Orgiall (Monaghan), where they committed great depredations, but the Orgiallians pursued them, attacked the rear of O'Neill's party, and recovered a part of their prey; Donogh, son of Manus Mac Mahon, was slain in that engagement.

Sir Edmond Mortimer, lord of the English of Ireland, died.

Duvcola, daughter of Hugh Mac Dermott, and wife of Cathal Roe Mac Rannall; Lasarina, daughter of Torlogh O'Conor, and wife of Mac Rannall; Fionguala, daughter of Conmaighe O'Kane, and wife of Torlogh Mac Sweeney; Sabina, daughter of Ulick Burke, and wife of O'Conor; Duvcola, daughter of O'Conor Failey, and wife of Donal, son of Theobald O'Mulloy; and Lasarina, daughter of Fergal O'Duigenan, and wife of O'Mithigen of Bealach, died.

Owen Fox, Tanist of Muintir Tadhgain (in Westmeath), was slain by the D'Altons.

Hugh, son of Murtoth Muinaeh Mac Geoghegan (in Westmeath), was slain by Myler, the son of Theobald O'Mulloy, by the thrust of a spear.

Dungallaeh O'Madden (of Galway), was slain in a conflict with the Clan Rickard.

Ragnailt, daughter of Mac Brady, and wife of Mac Dorehy (of Leitrim), died.

Owen O'Quinn, chief of Munitir Giollgain (in Longford), died.

Donal O'Murchadha (O'Murphy), lord of Hy Felimidh, was slain by the people of Hy Kinselagh (in Wexford).

Philip, the grandson of Philip O'Kennedy, lord of Ormond, and Ainc, the daughter of Mac Namara, his wife, died.

A. D. 1382.

Thomas O'Carmaeain, bishop of Thomond (Kilaloe), and Matthew Mac Murray, prior of Kilmore (in Roscommon), died.

Dermod O'Donnell, son of Owen, son of Hugh, son of Donal Oge, heir to the lordship of Tirconnell, died.

Laurenee Tuite (of Longford) was slain by the sons of John O'Ferrall, namely, Murrogh, Cormac and Donal.

Fergal Roe, son of Donagh, son of Murtoth More Mac Geoghegan, chief of Kinel Fiacha, was treacherously slain by the people of Fercall, at Kilmona, eastward of Rath Hugh Mac Bric (Rath Hugh, in Westmeath). Fergal O'Mulloy and the son of Theobald were the persons who attacked him, and Myler Maintin was he who struck him.

Some of the chiefs of Connaught were taken prisoners by Roderick O'Conor in his own territory, namely, O'Hanley, O'Beirne, and Mac Kearney, in consequence of his having received intelligence that they were about joining the sons of Felim (O'Connor) against him.

Roderick, the son of John O'Ferrall, died.

The Clan Maurice (of Mayo) having made an attack on Corcomogha,¹ and plundered the inhabitants, O'Concanan went in pursuit of the prey and was slain; Conor Oge Mac Dermott, with his kinsmen, after that attacked the Clan Maurice, and on his march for that purpose, the Clan Maurice with their forces prepared themselves to meet him; but in spite of them he proceeded onwards, burned both dwellings and corn, and slew many people about the place, and then Conor and his party returned victorious by their valour, without any of them having sustained an injury.

Murrough O'Brien marched with a force into Desmond, which he completely plundered.

Donal, son of Mahon Donn O'Kennedy (of Ormond), and Edmond Oge, son of Edmond Butler, died.

Murtogh, son of Mahon Maonmoy O'Brien, died in imprisonment at Trim (in Meath).

Donal O'Brien; Torlogh, son of Dermot O'Brien, and Bryan, son of Dermot O'Brien, of the Clan of Bryan Roe, died.

Gillabride O'Sgingin, the intended chief professor of Tirconnell, died.

Murtogh Oge, son of Mac Manus of Tir Tuathail (in Roscommon), died.

A. D. 1383.

The abbot, Mac David of Boyle, a man distinguished for charity and humanity, died.

Teige Mac Donogh, son of Tomaltach, son of Maurice, son of Donogh, from whom the Clan Donogh (or Mac Donoghs of Sligo) derived their name, lord of Tirerrill, a man full of hospitality and generosity, died on Good Friday.

Niall O'Neill, with his sons and the chiefs of Tyrone, marched with a great force into Trian Congail to attack the English, and they completely plundered and burned many of their towns; the English of the district collected together to oppose them, and Hugh O'Neill, and Raibilin Savadge having encountered each other in a charge of their cavalry, they pierced each other's bodies with two violent thrusts of their spears; Raibilin returned to his house desperately wounded, where he was again attacked, and killed, by the son of John Bisett, and Hugh O'Neill died on the third day from the effects of his wounds, and the son of John Bisett was slain by Raibilin's people three days after Raibilin himself was killed.

Murtogh O'Flanagan, chief of Tura (in Fermanagh), and Cormac, son of Art Mac Guire, died.

John Mac Gaffrey and Manus Mac David were slain on the same day.

Art, son of Thomas Fion, of the family of the Mac Murroughs, heir presumptive to the crown of Leinster, was slain by the English of the county of Lough Garman (Wexford).

An awful and very fatal plague raged throughout Ireland.

Art Mac Gennis, lord of Iveagh, in Ulidia (county of Down), the most distinguished prop of hospitality in Ireland in his time, died of the plague in the town of Ath Truim (Trim, county of Meath), where he was confined by the English.

Murrough-na-Raithnigh O'Brien; More, daughter of Murrough O'Madden, the wife of Rickard Mac William (Burke) of Clan Rickard; and Judith, daughter of the earl of Ormond, the wife of Teige O'Carroll, lord of Ely, died of the plague.

Murrough, son of Bryan O'Kennedy (of Ormond); Donogh-an-Chuil Mac Mahon, lord of Corcobaiscind (in the county of Clare); Owen, son of Donogh, son of Roderick O'Kelly; and Londres, of the town of Athboy, died.

Fonntach of Tigh Muna,¹ and the daughter of O'Brien, the wife of O'Kennedy, died.

Honora, daughter of William Burke, the wife of O'Magher; Mac Gillpatrick, lord of Ossory, and Mac Kelly Mac Gillpatrick, tanist of Ossory, all died of the same plague.

Dermot O'Dempsey, lord of Clan Malire (in Queen's county), was slain by the English.

Donogh O'Connor, lord of Kerry Luachra (in

A. D. 1382.

1. Corcomodha, a district in the barony of Killian, county of Galway, comprising the parish of Kilkerrin, on the borders of Mayo.

A. D. 1383.

1. Tigh Muna, now Timoney, near Roscrea, in the county of Tipperary.

county of Kerry), and Malachy Mac Gauran, tanist of Tullaghaw (in Cavan), died.

John, son of Donal O'Ferrall, lord of Annaly, died at Lisard, and was buried in the monastery of Leath-Ratha.²

Cathan, son of Roderick O'Kane (of Derry); John Gallda, son of the earl; William Barrett; and Roderick, son of Hugh Oge O'Mulloy, lord of Fercall (in King's county), died.

Roderick, son of Art Mac Guire, was slain by Donogh Mac Guire.

Dermod Mac Dermott, tanist of Moylurg (in Roscommon), died.

Fergal, son of Thomas Mac Tiernan, chief of Tullyhunco (in Cavan), died.

Murrough, son of Cahir O'Conor Faily (King's county), died.

Milig Mac Costello was slain by the Clan of Fiachra O'Flynn (of Roscommon).

Iomar O'Hanley, heir to the chieftaincy of Kinel Dovha (in Roscommon), was slain by his own kindred.

Cathal, son of Geoffrey O'Ferrall, died.

Dermod Mac Rannall, chief of Muintir Eoluis (in Leitrim), committed a depredation on O'Rourke.

A. D. 1384.

John Mac Gilloisgle, master, erenach, and parson of Airigh Brosga,¹ died.

Roderick, son of Torlogh O'Conor, king of Connaught, died of the same plague on the eve of St. Catherine's festival, having reigned king of Connaught sixteen years and three months, as the poet Maoilin O'Maolconry has recorded in his poem of Reim Riograidhe (or Catalogue of Kings):

"For three months and sixteen years,
The royal Roderick held the rule,
At Croghan, in honour, free from contest,
The son of Torlogh fierce in conflicts."

After that two lords were elected in Connaught, viz.: Torlogh Oge, son of Hugh, son of Torlogh, was appointed to the government by O'Kelly, Clan Rickard, Donal, son of Murtoth O'Conor, and also by the Mac Donoghs; and Torlogh Roe, son of Hugh, son of Felim, son of Hugh, son of Owen, was appointed to the government in like manner, by Mac Dermott, the Clan of Murtoth Muinach (O'Conors), and by the chiefs of Siol Murray (Roscommon) besides; in consequence of which a war broke out all over Connaught, by which the people were much disturbed.

Dermod Mac Rannall Duv, son of Malachy, the worthy, hospitable, and generous chief of Muintir Eoluis, was treacherously slain by the clan of Rannall Mac Rannall, in the hall of the house of Richard Mac Rannall.

Murtoth O'Conor, lord of Offaley, died at an advanced age.

Tomaltach Mac Dorchy, chief of Kinel Duachain (in Leitrim), was killed accidentally with a wound by his own knife.

A meeting was held between the parties of O'Flaherty and O'Malley, at which a dispute arose, and Owen O'Malley, Cormac Cruin O'Malley, and many others, were slain on the occasion.

Carrickfergus was burned by Niall O'Neill, who gained great power over the English.

Cuchonacht O'Ferrall, son of Hugh, lord of Moy Treagha (in Longford), and Geoffrey O'Ferrall, died.

William, son of sir Edmond Burke, and Rickard, son of Maduc, son of Tomin Barrett, a general benefactor to the clergy, died.

Uigh O'Duigenan, chief historian of Conmaicne (Leitrim), died.

Ualgarg O'Rourke, a worthy heir to the lordship of Brefney, was drowned in Lough Gawnagh (in Longford).

Philip O'Reilly, lord of Muintir Maolmora (in Cavan), died.

Myler, son of sir William Burke, was killed by a fall; John and David, the two other sons of sir William Burke, died of the plague.

Manus, son of Malachy O'Ferrall, Tomaltach, son of Cairbre O'Ferrall, and Fergal, son of Cathal O'Ferrall, died.

Donal Mac Murtoth (O'Conor), with his chief,

2. Leath Ratha, now Lerha, or Laragli, in the parish of Abbeylaragh, in the barony of Granard, county of Longford, where there was an ancient abbey.

A. D. 1384.

1. Airigh Brosga, now Derrybrusk, a parish in the barony of Tyrkennedy, county of Fermanagh, near Lough Erne, where a Dominican monastery was founded by Mac Manus, lord of the territory, of which there are still some remains, near the village of Golla.

clans marched a force into Moylurg, and burned the fortress of Mac Dermott.

Donogh O'Dowd died, and was succeeded by his son Murtogh.

Donal, son of Flaherty O'Rourke, died.

A. D. 1385.

David, son of Edmond Mac Hoberd (Burke), was taken prisoner by O'Conor, and died in his confinement at Ballintober.

O'Rourke (of Leitrim) and Mac Donogh (of Sligo), with their respective chiefs, marched their forces into Moylurg, where they burned the fortress of Mac Dermott, and the country in general; the son of John O'Hara was slain in pursuit of them, and his brother was taken prisoner.

Felim Cleireach O'Conor and Conor Oge Mac Dermott, led their forces into Tirerrill (in Sligo), but notice of their approach was sent before them, and an ambush was laid for them; they, however, proceeded through the country, slew many people, and carried off cattle, but the guards of the country overtook them afterwards, and a battle ensued, in which Cathal Cairbreach Mac Donogh was slain, Conor Mac Dermott was taken prisoner, and Felim O'Conor was wounded.

Murtogh, son of Cathal (O'Conor), Cormac, son of Roderick (O'Conor), Teige Mac Dermott, and Cathal Mac Dermott, made an attack upon Mac Rannall Roe, and on Hugh O'Conor, whom they took prisoners and conveyed to the Rock of Lough Key (in Roscommon), where they were imprisoned.

Cathal O'Ferrall, a worthy heir to the lordship of Annaly, and Cumuighe O'Kane, lord of O'Kane's country (in Derry), died much honoured and respected.

O'Conor Roe, with Mac Dermott, the Clan Murtogh (O'Conors), and the chiefs of Connaught, marched with a very great force into Hy Maine, and burned the town of Edmond O'Kelly; and William Buidhe O'Naghtan was slain on that occasion.

The men of Brefney and the people of Tirerrill having joined O'Conor Don, made an incursion into Corcoachlan (in Roscommon), where they burned many of their towns and cut down much of their crops.

Tireragh was burned by Mac William Burke, after which he proceeded to Sligo, which he also burned, together with the south of Carbury, where he was opposed, and a battle fought, in which Maideog Maol, one of the chiefs of his people, was slain, and hostages were taken from him afterwards.

Tyrawley (in Mayo) was burned by Donal, son of Murtogh O'Conor, who slew many people, seized much booty there, and afterwards took some of their chiefs as hostages.

Murrough O'Conor, lord of Ophaley, and the people of Kinel Fiacha (Mac Geoghegans of Westmeath), defeated the English of Meath at Tochar Cruachan Bri Eile,¹ in which Nugent of Meath, Chambers and his son, with many others of the English nobility, and an immense number of their common soldiers, were slain.

Tanaidhe O'Maolconry, chief historiographer and bard of Connaught, died at Lamas, in his own house, after having gained the victory of extreme unction and repentance, and was interred at Cluan Coirpthe² with due honours.

The Conacians having made peace with each other, Siol Murray (Roscommon), was divided into two portions between the two O'Conors.³

Art, son of Art More O'Melaghlin; Dervorgail, daughter of Cathal Oge, the wife of O'Conor Roe; and Bean Midhe, daughter of Mac Mahon, the wife of O'Neill, died.

Gillcreest Mac Gilfinen, chief of Pettigo, (in Fermanagh), died.

The Mac Donoghs committed great depredations in Cara (in Mayo), but they were, however, overtaken by the clan of Cathal Oge O'Conor, aided by the Stantons and many others besides; the Mac Donoghs were defeated, many of their people slain, and they themselves were afterwards driven into Kilconduff (in Mayo).

A. D. 1385.

1. Tochar Cruachan Brieile, that is, the bog-pass of Croghan of Brieile, where this battle was fought, near Croghan Hill, in the parish of Croghan, barony of Philipstown, king's county, on the borders of Westmeath.

2. Cluan Cairpthe, now Cloonaff, or Clooncraft, a parish in the barony and county of Roscommon, where a monastery was founded by St. Barach, in the sixth century. This district was the possession of the O'Maolconrys, hereditary bards and historiographers of Connaught.

3. The two O'Conors here mentioned were the two great branches of that family named The O'Conor Don and The O'Conor Roe, who divided the county of Roscommon between them, as explained in the note on South Connaught.

A. D. 1386.

Aine, daughter of Teige Mac Donogh, the wife of Tiarnan O'Rourke, lord of Brefney, one of the most worthy women of Leath Cuinn (north of Ireland), died at Tuam Seanchadha at Lough Fionnmaighe, and was buried in Sligo.

Carbre, son of Bryan, son of Murrough O'Ferrall, lord of the Port of Annaly, a hospitable, beneficent, valiant and protecting man, died after having gained the victory of good fame, veneration, extreme unction and repentance.

Niall, son of Peregrine Oge Mac Geoghegan, the intended lord of his sept, was slain by William D'Alton and his son, and Manus, son of Hugh Mac Dermott, was also slain by the D'Altons.

Donal, son of Murtogh O'Connor, with the Mac Donoghs, O'Dowd and the O'Haras, marched with a great force into the country of Mac Waittin (Barrett of Mayo), which they devastated and plundered on that expedition, and slew many people, together with Robert of Dun Domnain,¹ Mac Myler of Corran (in Sligo), and Maigoge Gallda; and they took Castle Lynod, and cut down the orchards of Caorthanain and of Inis Cua.

Heremon O'Melaghlín (of Meath), was slain by Mac Awley and the D'Altons.

O'Connor Roe, with all the Conacians he could collect to join him, went to aid Mac William Burke against Donal, son of Murtogh (O'Connor), and the Mac Donoghs; they carried off great preys from Tireragh of the Moy (in Sligo), after which they proceeded on a predatory expedition into Clanrickard; O'Brien, at the head of a great force, and Mac William of Clanrickard overtook them; O'Connor Roe turned on them and defeated them, and Conor, son of Teige, son of Conor O'Brien, was slain by them in that engagement.

A. D. 1386.

1. Dun Domnainn, an ancient fortress, situated on a hill in the valley of Glencastle, parish of Kilcommon, barony of Erris, county of Mayo. Castle Lynod was situated in the barony of Tyrawley, county of Mayo, and the chief residence of the English family of the Lynotts. Inis Cua, now Iniscoe, situate near Lough Con, in the parish of Crosmolina, and barony of Tyrawley. Caerthanain, now called Castle-hill, a townland on the west side of Lough Con, in the barony of Tyrawley.

A. D. 1387.

1. Cill Naile, now Kinawley, a parish partly in the barony of Knoekniny, county Fermanagh, and partly in Tullaghaw, county of Cavan, so called from St. Nall, or Natalis, who founded a monastery there in the sixth century.

Many of the English of Ossory fell by Mac Murrough, king of Leinster.

Donal Mac Coghlan, lord of Delvin (in King's county), died.

Fingin, son of Roderick Mac Geoghegan, was slain.

The Conacians made peace with each other after their war, and Mac William Burke made his submission to Mac William of Clanrickard; Birmingham was appointed to a lordship on submission to him in like manner.

Donogh Mac Cabe (county of Cavan), was slain by the clan of Manus O'Reilly.

Cathal O'Naghtan (of Roscommon) was slain by O'Connor Roe.

A. D. 1387.

A house of general entertainment and support was founded for the learned men of Ireland at Eamhain Macha (Armagh), by Niall O'Neill, king of Ulster.

Sabina, daughter of Hugh O'Neill, one of the most illustrious women of the race of Niall of the Nine Hostages, in her time, the wife of John Bissett's son, died after the victory of repentance.

Richard Oge Mac William of Clanrickard died.

Geoffrey Fionn O'Daly (of Munster), chief poet of Ireland, and Roderick O'Cianain, a learned historian, and chief poet of Oriel, died.

Donal, son of Donogh Docair Mac Guire, and Matthew Mac Conleagh, were slain at Kil Naile¹.

Conor, son of Bryan Carach O'Neill, was slain by the English of Dundalk.

William, son of Dermod Mac Rannall, the intended chief of Muintir Eoluis, was slain by Muintir Beirne.

John, son of Aongus Mac Donnell, lord of the Hebrides, died.

Dermod Roe O'Duinn died.

1. Desmond. The territory called Desmond, in Irish Deas Mumhan, signifying South Munster, comprised, according to Smith, in his histories of Cork and Kerry, and other authorities, the whole of the present county of Cork, and the greater part of Kerry, together with a portion of Waterford, and also a small part of the south of Tipperary, bordering on Cork, called the Eoganaclit Cashel, thus extending from Brandon Mountain, in the barony of Corcaguiney, county of Kerry, to the river Blackwater, near Lismore, in the county of Waterford; but in after times, under the Fitzgeralds, earls of Desmond, this territory was confined to the baronies of Bear and Bantry, and some other portions of the south west of Cork, together with that part of Kerry south of the river Mang. The north-western part of Kerry, with a large portion of Limerick, extending to the Shannon, and comprising the present baronies of Upper and Lower Conello, was called Iar Mumhan, or

A. D. 1388.

ORMAC Mac Donogh, the valiant warrior and tanist of Tirerrill (in Sligo), went by night to plunder Moylurg, where he committed great depredations; O'Connor Roe, with the sons of Felim; the sons of Cathal Oge O'Connor; and the sons of Hugh Mac Dermott, namely, Cathal and Conor, with their forces, followed them in pursuit of their property; Cormac Mac Donogh took the rear of his own force, and was soon engaged by some of O'Connor's party, who actively attacked him; at this time O'Connor himself came up, and gave orders to his men not to kill him, if they could take him prisoner, but in this they did not succeed; and at length he (Mac Donogh) was slain; and during his life time none of his tribe had excelled him in hospitality and feats of arms; Conor Mac Donogh, Murrough, son of Cormac Mac Donogh, and Mac Dermott Roe were taken prisoners after that and were kept as hostages, and O'Connor Roe pursued the force across the mountain (the Curlews) northward, but the Mac Donoghs fled before him to Collooney, and the lower part of Tirerrill.

Murtogh, son of Donal, son of Murtogh O'Co-

West Munster. In the present article will be given the history and topography of the territories comprised in the present counties of Cork and Kerry, together with their chiefs and clans, and the possessions of each, in ancient and modern times, compiled from the Annals of the Four Masters, the Books of Leacan and Ballymote, O'Heerin's Topography, O'Connor's Rerum Hib. Scrip., the Dissertations of Charles O'Connor, O'Flaherty's Ogygia, O'Halloran's Ireland, O'Brien's Topographical Dictionary, Ware's works, Lodge's Peerage, the histories of Cork and Kerry by Smith, Windele's History of Cork, county surveys, and various other sources, together with the MSS. in the library of Sir William Betham.

This territory is connected with some of the earliest events in Irish history. Partholan the Scythian, who planted the first colony in Ireland, according to our ancient annalists, sailed from Greece through Muir Toirían (the ancient name of the Mediterranean), and landed on the coast of Ireland at Inver Sceine, now the bay of Kenmare in Kerry. After the colony of Partholians had become extinct by a plague, Neimedh, or Nemedius, another Scythian, sailed from the Euxine sea, and, arriving in Ireland, settled a colony there called Nemedians, who fought many battles with the Fomorians or African pirates, who had settled in Ulster, as mentioned in the notes on Dalriada and Tir Connell. Neimedius, together with three thousand of his people, died of the plague on an island called from him Oilean-Ard-Neimedh, now the island of Barrymore, or Great Island, near the city of Cork. When the colony of Firbolgs subsequently took possession of Ireland, they divided the island into parts or provinces among the five brothers, who were their five principal commanders. Slainge possessed the territory from the place afterwards called Drogheda to Cumar-na-dtri-n Uisce, or the Meeting of the Three Waters, that is, the confluence of the rivers Suir, Nore, and Barrow at Waterford; to Gann belonged the country from the Meeting of the Three Waters to Bealach Conglais, near the bay of Cork; Seangann possessed the country from Bealach Conglais to Luimneach or Limerick; Geannan had the territory afterwards called Connaught, from Luimneach to Drogheda; that is from Limerick to Bundrowes, in the county of Leitrim, on the coast of the Atlantic; and Rughríde possessed the country afterwards called Ulster, from Drogheda to the Boyne at Drogheda. The colony called the Tuath De Danans, as already explained in the notes on North and South Connaught, having conquered the Firbolgs, possessed Ireland for two hundred years. The Milesian colony from Spain, originally Celts or Scythians, of whom an account has been given in the note on South Connaught, with a large fleet and powerful force, commanded by the sons of Milesius, sailed for Ireland, and while attempting to land, a violent storm occurred, and two of the sons were drowned off the coast of Kerry, namely, Heber Donn, at a place called from him Teach Doinn, and Ir, at the rocks of Skellig; another of the sons called Colpa-an-Chloidhimh, or Colpa the Swordsman, was driven eastward, and attempting to land was drowned at a place, named from him Inver Colpa, or the bay of Colpa, now the mouth of the Boyne, near Drogheda. The surviving sons of Milesius, Heber, Heremon, and Amergin, effected a landing at Inver Sceine, now the bay of Kenmare, and soon after were attacked by the Tuath De Danans, and a great battle was fought between them at Slieve Mis Mountain in Kerry, where the Danans were defeated. In this battle Scota, the relict of Milesius, who commanded along with her sons, was slain and buried in a valley adjoining the sea, near Tralee, called after her Gleann Scota, or the valley of Scota. The Milesians afterwards totally vanquished the Danans in a great battle at Tailten, in Meath, and thus became masters of Ireland. The Milesians, called Clanna Mileadh, or race of Milesius, and Clanna Gaodhal, that is Gadelians or Gaels, and Cineadh Scuit, or race of the Scythians, divided the island amongst them. Heremon and his posterity, called Heremonians, possessed the kingdoms of Meath, Leinster, and Connaught; the posterity of Heber Fionn, or Heber the Fair, named Heberians, had Munster; and the descendants of another Heber, who was son of Ir, had Ulster, and were called Irians or Clanna Rory, and sometimes Rudricians. The arrival of the colonies of Partholians, Nemedians, Fomorians, Firbolgs, and Danans, in Ireland, is placed by our old chronologers from twelve to fifteen centuries before the Christian era; and the arrival of the Milesians about a thousand years before the Christian era. The Fomorians are mentioned by our ancient annalists amongst the first inhabitants of Ireland, and stated to have been African pirates, descendants of Ham, and represented as a race of giants, being men of great strength and stature, which exactly corresponds with the accounts of ancient writers, who frequently mention the giant race of Ham. (See article Amalekites in London Penny Cyclopaedia). These Fomorians are considered to have been some of the Phenicians and Canaanites who were expelled from Palestine and the land of Canaan, by Joshua, about fifteen hundred years before the Christian era, and who made settlements on the northern coasts of Lybia or Africa, and, being expert navigators, sailed to Iberia or Spain, and other northern nations. A remarkable record of the expulsion of the Phenicians from the land of Canaan, and of their settlement in Africa, is given by the historian Procopius, who was himself a native of Palestine, and wrote in the sixth century. He was secretary to the Roman general Belisarius, and in his account of the wars of the Vandals in Africa, states that in his own time there were near the fountain of the Magi, at Tangier, two marble columns, with inscriptions in the Phenician language, to the following effect:—"We fly from the face of Joshua the robber, the son of Nun." These Fomorians were of the same stock as the Phenicians, and Tyrians, who in after times settled colonies in Africa, and founded Carthage, and also Gades, or Cadiz, in Iberia or Spain, and were celebrated for their commercial intercourse with various ancient nations, as Greece, Italy, Spain, Gaul, nor made an attack on O'Donnell's camp, in the neighbourhood of Eas Roe (Ballyshannon), and slew many persons, among whom were the sons of O'Boyle and O'Gallagher, with their kinsmen; he and Britain, and no doubt some of them sailed to Ireland, and most probably settled colonies there in early ages. On the Berbers, who were the most ancient inhabitants of northern Africa, and descendants of the Canaanites, Philistines, and Amalekites, who were expelled from Canaan by Joshua, some curious and interesting information may be found in the articles on the Berbers and Amalekites, in the London Penny Cyclopaedia, and various circumstances seem to coincide with the statements of our old annalists, about the settlement of the colony called Fomorians in Ireland in the early ages, of whom some accounts have been already given in the notes on Dalriada, Tir Connell, and South Connaught. That some people of Phenician origin traded to Ireland, and probably settled colonies there, has been a general opinion amongst our ablest antiquarians. The ancient territory called Fear Muighe Feine, which now forms the barony of Fermoy, with the half barony of Coudons, in the county of Cork, got its name, as stated in O'Brien's Dictionary at the word Fearmuighe, from its being peopled in the early ages by Phenicians; hence the word Fir Muighe Feine signifies the Men of the Plain of the Phenicians, which O'Brien translates into Latin, Viri campi Pheniorum, and he considers them to have been a colony of the Gaditanian Phenicians from Gades, now Cadiz in Spain; and Dr. Charles O'Connor, in his edition of the Annals of Inisfallen, was also of opinion that a colony of Phenicians or Celtiberians from Spain settled in those parts; and the learned Spaniard, Dr. Joachim Villaneuva, in his Ilibernia Phenicea, maintains the same opinion. At Glanworth, in the barony of Fermoy, and in the parishes of Templebrian and Templemalus, are the remains of Cromleacs and Druidical Temples, consisting of stones of enormous size, supposed to be monuments erected by the Phenicians; or according to others, by Mogruth, a celebrated Druid, who got possession of the territory of Fermoy from Fiach, king of Munster in the third century, as a reward for his bravery in assisting Fiach in several battles, and also for his extraordinary skill in music. Large stones, with Ogham inscriptions, have been discovered, at various times, in the counties of Cork, Kerry, Limerick and Clare, accounts of which, by the learned antiquaries of Cork, Messrs. Abel, Horgan, Windele, O'Flanagan, &c. may be found in Windele's Notices of Cork, &c.

Cyclopean Architecture.—Of that massive rude architecture composed of large stones without cement, and forming walls and fortresses of immense strength, there are many remains in Ireland, resembling the Cyclopean architecture of ancient Greece and Etruria, such as the fortresses of Aileach in Donegal, and of Dun Aonguis, on one of the Arran Isles, off the coast of Galway, already described in the notes on Tirconnell and South Connaught. The Cyclopean fortress of Knockfennell in Limerick, and that of Cahir Conree in Kerry, have been described in the note on Thomond. At Calirdonnell, in the parish of Kilcrohane, county of Kerry, are the remains of a large Cyclopean fortress, but the most remarkable specimen of Cyclopean architecture in Ireland is that called Staigue Fort, situated also in the parish of Kilcrohane, on a hill near the bay of Kenmare. It is built of stones, without cement, but of admirable architecture, of a circular form, and the internal area about ninety feet in diameter, the walls eighteen feet high and thirteen feet thick, a doorway opening to the interior; on the outside a broad and deep fosse surrounds the entire building. A full account of Staigue Fort, given by Mr. Bland in the year 1821, may be seen in the 14th volume of the Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy; and there is a model of the fort in the Royal Dublin Society House. That Ireland has been peopled from the most remote ages there exists abundant evidence over the entire country. In every county, and almost in every parish, are found some memorials, such as remains of Cromleacs, Druidical temples, round towers, cairns, sepulchral mounds, Cyclopean fortresses, raths, and other antiquities, the histories of which, and even their traditions, are long lost in the night of time.

The Heberians were the chief Munster Milesians, as already explained in the note on Thomond, and were divided into three great branches, namely, the Daleassians, Eugenians, and Clan Kian. Eogan More, the celebrated king of Munster in the second century, had by his wife Bera, the Spanish princess, a son named Oilioll Olum, who became king of Munster; and Oilioll had three sons, Eogan, Cormac Cas, and Cian. From Eogan were descended the Eoganachts or Eugenians; from Cormac Cas the Dal Cais, or Daleassians; and from Cian the Clan Kian. The chief families of the Daleassians, Eugenians, and Clan Kian, have been mentioned in the note on Thomond, which may be referred to in order to save a repetition of their names in this place. Cormac Cas or Cais, signifying Cormac the Beloved, the progenitor of the Daleassians, was king of Munster, and a celebrated warrior. O'Halloran, quoting the Psalter of Cashel, and the Book of Munster, says that his first queen was Samhair, daughter to Fionn Mac Cumhail, the celebrated hero, who was general of the Fenian forces, and his second queen Oriund, daughter of the king of Lochlin, or Denmark, by whom he had a son called Mogha Corb, who became king of Munster in the third century, and was a celebrated warrior. He invaded Denmark with a powerful force to support his maternal uncles in a contest for the crown of that country, and after gaining some victories, succeeded in placing his uncles, Osna and Airid, on the throne of Denmark, as stated in the Psalter of Cashel and other ancient annalists. The intercourse between the Irish and the Scandinavians, or northern nations, as the Danes, Norwegians, Swedes, &c. in these early ages, is remarkable; but, according to our ancient annalists, an intercourse and marriage alliances, in more remote times, were formed between the Irish kings, and those of Spain, Gaul, and Scandinavia. Eogan More, king of Munster in the second century, father of Cormac Cas, was married to the Spanish princess Bera, daughter of Heber, king of Castile. Eochaid, king of the Firbolgs many centuries before the Christian era, was married to Tailte, daughter of Magh Mor, king of the Celtiberians in Spain. Ugaire Mor, monarch of Ireland nearly four centuries before the Christian era, was married to Ceasair, daughter of the king of Gaul. Lughaidh Riabhdearg, monarch of Ireland in the first century, was married to Dervorgal, daughter of the king of Lochlin, or Denmark. Tuathal Teachtnuar, monarch of Ireland in the second century, was married to Bania, daughter of the king of Denmark and Finland. Feilimuidh Reachtmar, monarch of Ireland, son of Tuathal, was married to Ughna, daughter of the king of Denmark, by whom he had a son, Con Cead Catbach, or Con of the Hundred Battles, the celebrated monarch of Ireland in the second century. Eochaidh Muighmeadhain, monarch of Ireland in the fourth century, was married to Carinna, either a British or a Saxon princess, by whom he had a son, the celebrated Niall of the Nine Hostages, monarch of Ireland. This Carinna is called by the Irish writers Carthan Cais Dulh, or Carthan the Beloved, of the Dark Hair. Eogan, son of Niall of the Hostages, and progenitor of the O'Neills, princes of Tyrone, was married to Indorba the Fair, a Saxon princess; and Murtoigh O'Brien, king of Munster in the eleventh century, had for his second wife Driella, daughter of Godwin, earl of Kent, and sister of Harold, the last Saxon king of England.

The race of Heber, or Heberians, and the race of Ith, or Ithians, as stated in the note on Thomond, alternately ruled as kings of Munster in the early ages, before the Christian era. The Ithians were so called as descendants of Ith, son of Breogain, and uncle of Milesias, and were also called Clanna Breogain, as descended from Breogain. The Clanna Breogain are mentioned by various Latin writers, under the name Brigantes. The race of Ith are placed on the Map of Ancient Ireland by Charles O'Connor, in the south of Cork, and called by him Lughadii, as descended from Lughaidh, the son of Ith. A list of the chief families of Ithians, or Lugadians, has been given in the note on Thomond. They were chiefly located in that part of Cork called Corca Luighe, which got its name from the above-mentioned Lughaidh, and, according to O'Brien, as explained at the words Cairbre and Cobtach, comprised a large territory in the south west of Cork, extending from Bandon to Crookhaven, and to the bay of Kenmare, including the present baronies of Carbery, Bear and Bantry.

The Clanna Deagha or Degadians, a branch of the Heremonians took Mac Sweeney and his son prisoners, whom he took with him, together with some property, horses, arms, and armour; and the Clan Mur-togh (O'Conors) turned against O'Donnell on that occasion.

John Roe O'Tuathail, lord of Hy Murray (in of Ulster, settled in Munster a short time before the Christian era, and the chief families descended from them have been mentioned in the note on Thomond. They possessed that part of Kerry and Limerick called West Munster, which also had the name of the province of Conrigh Mac Daire, being possessed by that celebrated warrior and his posterity, of whom an account has been given in the note on Thomond. The Degadians, under the name of Degadii, are placed in Charles O'Connor's map in the west of Kerry, and considered by him to be the same as the Udæi who are placed on Ptolemy's map about the same territory, the word Udæi being formed from the Ua Deagaidh of the Irish writers.

The Irians, Clanna Rory, or Rudricians of Ulster, settled in Munster in the first century, and the chief families of them have been mentioned in the note on Thomond. On Charles O'Connor's map they are placed in the southern and central parts of Cork and Kerry, and called Iberi australes or southern Iberians, to distinguish them from the Irians of Ulster, whom he designates northern Iberians. The Irians or Iberians of Munster are considered to be the same as the Velabri, Iberi, Juvernii, and Uterni, given on the maps of Ptolemy and other geographers. According to Dr. O'Connor they are the same as the Siol Eibhir, that is the race of Heber or Heberians of the Irish writers, and according to others are supposed to be a colony of Iberians from Spain. The Lucenii are placed on Ptolemy's map in these parts of Kerry and Limerick towards the Shannon. These Lucenians are supposed to be a colony of the Luceni of Spain, who, according to Smith, are placed by Strabo in Galicia and Cantabria, and said to be of Scythian origin, which corresponds with the accounts of our ancient annalists, who make the Milesians originally a colony from Scythia. According to Smith the barony of Lixnaw is considered to have derived its name from the Lucenians. The Ganganii or Concani of Spain, also stated by Strabo to have been Scythians, are given by Ptolemy as the ancient inhabitants of the territories now forming the counties of Clare and Galway, a colony of them having come from Spain in remote ages. From the Concanians of Galway some antiquaries suppose that Connaught derived its name. The Cori-ondoi are placed on Ptolemy's map in the central parts of Cork, and considered by Smith and others to have been a colony of the Coritani of Britain, who inhabited in early times the present counties of Lincoln, Leicester, and Northampton, and, according to Camden, these Coritani fled to Ireland about the first century, in consequence of the conquest of Britain by the Romans. From the great intercourse between Spain and the south of Ireland in the early ages, there is much of the Spanish blood in Munster, particularly in the counties of Kerry, Limerick, and Cork; and as in the tenth and eleventh centuries colonies of the Danes settled in the cities of Waterford, Limerick, and Cork, and continued there down to the English invasion, there is much of the Danish race in those cities mixed by intermarriages with the old Irish.

Cork, in Latin Coregia, and also Coracium, got its name, according to O'Brien, at the word Corca, and also according to other authorities, from Corca or Corcach, which signifies a marsh, as the city of Cork was originally founded on marshy ground, but according to others the name was derived from Corc, a prince of the Eugénian race, who was king of Munster in the fourth century.

Kerry, in Latin Kerrigia, got its name from Ciar, son of Fergus Mac Roy, by Meava, the celebrated queen of Connaught, a short time before the Christian era. This Fergus, king of Ulster, was of the race of Ir, and hence his descendants were Irians or Clanna Rory. His son Ciar, in the first century, got possession of a large territory in Munster, called from him Ciar Rioghacht, signifying Ciar's kingdom; hence came the word Ciaraidhe, or as it is written in the Book of Armagh, Ciarriichi, anglicised Kerry. By the old ecclesiastical writers Kerry was called St. Brendan's country, from Brendan, a celebrated saint of the sixth century, who founded many monasteries there, and several places in Kerry still bear his name, amongst others Brendan or Brandon mountain; and Camden calls that part of the Atlantic off the coast of Kerry, at the mouth of the Shannon, Mare Brendanicum, or the sea of Brendan. Cork and Kerry are frequently mentioned by various writers under the names of the kingdoms of Cork and Kerry.

Kings of the race of the Dalcassians and Eugenians alternately ruled over Munster, from the third to the eleventh century; but while a king of each race governed by turns the whole of Munster, a king of the Dalcassian race ruled over Thomond, and a king of the Eugénian race over Desmond. A few of the remarkable events in Desmond, from the fourth to the twelfth century, may be here mentioned.

The Battle of Ventry. In Hanmer's Chronicle, collected chiefly from the ancient record called the Book of Howth, is given an account of the battle of Fentra in Munster, that is of Ventry, fought in the beginning of the fourth century, about A. D. 320. The Scandinavians, Gauls, Saxons, and other foreigners, with powerful forces, invaded Ireland, and fought many great battles with the natives in Ulster and Meath, which Hanmer describes; and another powerful force of these foreigners, attempting to land at Ventry in Kerry, were opposed by the Irish, and both sides having fought desperately for the space of seven days, the slaughter was so great that the sea shore was dyed red with the blood of the slain. After the foreigners effected a landing, many terrific battles were fought almost incessantly during a whole year, but finally the invaders were vanquished, and an enormous number of them slain in the various conflicts. This battle has been celebrated by the Irish writers under the name of Cath Fion Tragha, and some ancient MSS. on the subject still remain. In the ninth and tenth centuries the Danes and Norwegians overran Munster, as they did various other parts of Ireland, and settled colonies in the cities of Waterford, Limerick, and Cork. An account of various victories gained over the Danes by Brian Boru and Ceallachan, king of Cashel, has been given in the note on Thomond. Ceallachan, a celebrated warrior of the Eugénian race, was king of Cashel in the tenth century, and having defeated the Danes in several battles, Sitric, king of the Danes of Dublin, with his brothers Tor and Magnus, having proposed a peace with the people of Munster, with an offer to give in marriage to Ceallachan their sister Beibhion, an accomplished princess, the proposals of alliance being accepted by Ceallachan, he prepared to go to Dublin to meet his intended bride, but on his arrival there his party were treacherously attacked and defeated by the Danes, who took Ceallachan prisoner, together with Dunchuan, son of Cineide, king of Thomond, the entire proceedings on the part of the Danes being a conspiracy to get Ceallachan, their formidable enemy, into their power. The Munster chiefs, in order to redeem their king from captivity, collected a powerful force, amongst whom were two thousand Dalcassians, and three thousand Eugenians, commanded by Donogh O'Keeffe, prince of Fermoy; O'Sullivan, prince of Beara; the O'Conors of Kerry; O'Driscolls; O'Moriartys; O'Flynn; O'Fellans, and other chiefs of Munster, aided by one thousand of the Connaught forces, under the O'Haras, O'Garas, Mac Coghlan, and others; the entire, it is stated, amounting to twelve thousand men, the chief commander of the Eugenians being O'Keeffe; and Cineidi, king of Thomond, with his brothers Congalach, Cosgrach, and Lonargan, commanded the Dalcassians. They also had a large naval force under O'Falvey, hereditary admiral of Desmond, who equipped thirty ships; O'Conor Kerry, twenty ships; O'Driscoll, O'Cohtaich, and O'Flynn, armed and manned ten ships each; the Mac Namaras, O'Conors, and O'Loghlins of Clare, sent twenty ships; and from Corca Baisein, in Clare, came twenty more, making in all one hundred and twenty sail. The army, which proceeded by land, marched through Connaught and Ulster to Arinagh, which city was then in possession of the Danes, and whither they brought Ceallachan prisoner, in order to put him on board their fleet at Dundalk, and send him to Denmark; the Irish attacked Armagh by the projection of large stones from machines, together with arrows, darts, slings, and other missiles, and applying scaling ladders to the walls; the Danes, under Sitric, were at length defeated with great slaughter, and having evacuated the city by night, they marched off towards Duudalk and embarked their forces in their fleet, which lay in that bay. The Irish pursued them, and O'Keeffe, sending a flag of truce, demanded of Sitric the princes Ceallachan and Dunchuan, who were his prisoners, but the Danes returned for answer that the prisoners would not be restored until an eric was first paid for the Danes who fell in fifteen different battles with Ceallachan and his forces; and Sitric ordered Ceallachan to be bound to the mast of his own ship, and Dunchuan in like manner on the king of Norway's ship, in view of the whole Munster army. The Irish were enraged at this sight, but their land forces had no means of attacking the enemy; shortly after, however, O'Falvey, the Irish admiral, appeared in sight, and drawing up his ships in an extended line, prepared for action. A desperate engagement ensued, and the Irish commanders grappled with, and boarded the Danish vessels; both sides fought with great fury, but O'Falvey at length succeeded in releasing Ceallachan, and, giving him one of his own swords, bade him take the command. The Irish, animated by seeing their prince at liberty, fought with renewed vigour; but the valiant O'Falvey at length fell pierced by many wounds, and his head was immediately displayed on the mast of Sitric's ship. Fingal, a chief who was second in command to O'Falvey, animating the Irish, the fight was continued with great fury on both sides, but at length Fingal, encompassed by the Danes, and seeing his own death certain, seized on Sitric by a sudden grasp, and having jumped with him in his arms overboard, both were instantly drowned. Conal and Sioda, chiefs of the Clarefores, who were engaged with the ships commanded by Tor and Magnus, brothers of Sitric, following the example of Fingal, grasped the Danish chiefs in their arms, and leaped with them in like manner into the deep. O'Conor Kerry slew one of the Danish commanders in single combat, and cut off his head, but while holding it up in triumph, he was himself killed by another Dane. The Danish forces were at length totally defeated, and their fleet destroyed, but almost the whole of the Irish chiefs and men engaged in that fierce contest, were also slain. This great sea fight in the bay of Duudalk took place A. D. 944, according to O'Halloran and other authorities. Copies of the ancient Irish MSS. giving accounts of the battles of Ventry and Duudalk, are to be found in the library of Sir William Betham. That respecting the battles of the Munster forces with the Danes, is entitled Toruigheacht Cheallachain Chaisil, signifying The Pursuit for the recovery of Ceallachan Cashel, which would be well worth having translated and published.

Wicklow), the most distinguished of his tribe for hospitality and feats of arms, was slain by a peasant of his own clan, within the precincts of his

The great battle of Moin Mor in Cork, fought in the twelfth century, A. D. 1151, between the Connaught, Leinster, and Desmond forces on one side, and the Daleassians on the other, has been described in the note on Thomond.

The Eugenians ruled as kings over Desmond, and the Daleassian kings over Thomond, and from each race, as already explained in the note on Thomond, was alternately elected a king of all Munster, which mode of government in Munster continued from the third to the eleventh century, when Brian Boru, of the Daleassian race, became king of Munster and monarch of Ireland, and his descendants the O'Briens were kings of Munster and kings of Thomond, and the Mac Carthys, who were the head of the Eugenic race, were kings and princes of Desmond.

The Mac Carthys, in Irish Mac Carthaidh or Mac Cairthy, and pronounced like Mae Carha or Mae Cawra, took their name from Carthach or Cairthe one of their ancestors, a prince of Desmond in the eleventh century, son of Justin, king of Munster, who was grandson to Ceallachan, king of Cashel. Of the Mac Carthys in early times some accounts may be found in the Annals of Inisfallen. The Mac Carthys of the twelfth century are thus designated in the topographical poem of O'Heerin:—

“Flaithe Mumhan mair Sionna
Siol Eogain mie Oilioila,
Mac Carthaidh euing a eana,
Mar thuind anfaidh etragha.”

own fortress, and the bodach (clown) who slew him, was immediately put to death.

The sons of O'Cuirnin,¹ Siodhraidh, Carbre,

“Heroes of Munster of the fortress of the Shannon,
Are the race of Eogan, the son of Oilioil,
Mac Carthy the mainstay of its tributes,
Is like an unceasing stormy wave.”

On the English invasion, when king Henry II. landed at Waterford, in October A. D. 1171, Dermot Mac Carthy, king of Desmond, waited on him the day after his arrival, delivered to him the keys of the city of Cork, and did him homage. According to Mae Geoghagan, this Dermot Mac Carthy, in the year 1185, was, together with all his retinue, treacherously slain at a conference held with Theobald Fitzwalter, and the English of Cork. At the time of the English invasion, the Danes were in possession of the city of Cork and the adjoining districts, being permitted by the Mac Carthys, kings of Desmond, to reside there for commercial purposes. In A. D. 1174, the forces of Strongbow and Raymond le Gros having plundered various parts of Waterford and Cork, dispatched the booty to Waterford by sea, under the command of Adam de Hereford; the Danes of Cork equipped thirty-five vessels, and attacked the English fleet at Dungarvan, but after a severe engagement they lost the victory, chiefly through the valour of Philip Walsh, who boarded the admiral's ship, and killed Gilbert, the son of Turgesius, the Danish commander. A. D. 1177, King Henry II. granted to Robert Fitzstephen and Milo de Cogan, for the service of sixty knights, to himself and his son John and their heirs, the whole kingdom of Cork or Desmond, with the exception of the city of Cork, and the adjoining cantreds, which belonged to the Ostmen or Danes of that city, which the king reserved to hold in his own hands. The Mac Carthys maintained long contests for their independence with the Fitzgeralds, earls of Desmond, the Butlers, earls of Ormond, and other Anglo-Norman and English settlers, and held their titles, as princes of Desmond, with considerable possessions, down to the reign of Elizabeth. They were divided into two great branches, the head of which was Mae Carthy More, of whom Donal Mac Carthy was created earl of Glencare or Clancare, A. D. 1565, by Queen Elizabeth; the other branch, called Mae Carthy Reagh, were styled princes of Carbery. Besides the earls of Clancare, the Mac Carthys were also created at various periods barons of Valentia, earls of Clancarly, earls of Muskerry, and earls of Mountcashel, and had several strong castles in various parts of Cork and Kerry. According to Windele, the Mae Carthy More was inaugurated at Lisban-na-uchir in Kerry, at which ceremony presided O'Sullivan Mor and O'Donoghue Mor; his captains of war were the O'Rourkes, probably a branch of the O'Rourkes, princes of Brefney; the Mac Egan were his hereditary Brehons, and the O'Dalys and O'Duinis were his hereditary poets and antiquaries. There are still in the counties of Cork and Kerry many highly respectable families of the Mac Carthys, and several of the name have been distinguished commanders in the Irish Brigades, in the service of France and Spain. The following accounts of chiefs and clans in Desmond, or the counties of Cork and Kerry, and the territories possessed by each in ancient and modern times, have been collected from O'Heerin's Topography, O'Brien, O'Halloran, Smith's histories of Cork and Kerry, and various other sources.

1. O'Suilleabhain or O'Sullivan. The O'Sullivans had the ancient territory of Beara, now the baronies of Beara and Bantry, in the county of Cork, and were called O'Sullivan Beara, and styled princes of Beara. Another branch of the family called O'Sullivan Mor were lords of Dunkerron, and possessed the barony of Dunkerron, in the county of Kerry, and their chief seat was the castle of Dunkerron, near the river Kenmare. A third branch of the O'Sullivans were chiefs of Knockruffan, in Tipperary, of whom an account is given in the note on Ormond. The O'Sullivans are of the Eugenic race of the same descent as the Mac Carthys, princes of Desmond, and took their name from Suilleabhain, one of their chiefs in the tenth century. As princes of Beara they held a high rank in ancient times in the county of Cork, and Gillpatrick, were slain by the English of Leinster.

and had several strong castles, the chief of which were those of Dunboy, Ardea, and Carrizanas. In the reign of James I. their extensive possessions were confiscated, in consequence of their adherence to the earls of Desmond and Tyrone in the Elizabethian wars, and the heads of the family retired to Spain, where many of them were distinguished officers in the Spanish service, and had the title of Counts of Bearhaven. II. O'Heidirseeoil or O'Driscoll, head of the Ithian race, was chief or prince of Corcaluighe, otherwise called Cairbreacha, comprising ancient Carbery, an extensive territory in the south-west of Cork. Another branch of the O'Driscolls were lords of Beara, now the baronies of Beare and Bantry, in the county of Cork, of which they were the original possessors, but the O'Sullivan in after times became the possessors of this territory as above stated. The O'Driscolls of the twelfth century are designated in O'Heerin's topographical poem, in terms which may be thus translated :—

“ To the race of Luighee along the shore,
I now proceed beyond the bounds,
To pass the tribe is not meet for me,
But to record the warriors' fame.

“ O'Driscoll, head chief of the land
Of Corcaluighee, I treat of now,
He took possession of the coasts of Cleire,
The fittest headland for the princely lord.

“ O'Driscoll of the wealthy Beara,
Rules over the land of the salmon coast,
A blue water shore abounding in harbours,
Exhibiting to view large fleets of wine.”

The O'Driscolls had the island of Capeclear, alluded to in the poem, and the territory about the bay of Baltimore, and, according to Smith, had a part of Iveragh in Kerry. They had castles at Dunashad and Dunalong near Baltimore, the castle of Dunamore on Capeclear island, and others. There are still several respectable families of the O'Driscolls in the county of Cork. III. O'Caolmh or O'Keeffe, is given by O'Heerin as chief of Glan Amhain and of Urluachra. Gleanamhain, according to O'Brien, is now Glanworth, in the barony of Fermoy, county of Cork; they had also afterwards a large territory in the barony of Duhallow, known by the name of Pahal O'Keeffe. In ancient times the O'Keeffes had the territory of Fearnmighle Feine, now the barony of Fermoy, in the county of Cork, which afterwards was possessed by the Anglo-Norman family of Roche, viscounts of Fermoy, and called Roche's country. The O'Dugans and O'Coscraighs were also ancient chiefs in Fermoy. They are thus designated by O'Heerin :—

“ Chief of Fermoy of enclosed fortresses,
Is O'Dugan of Dunmanann,
A tribe of the Gaels of precious jewels;
O'Keeffe is chief of Glen Avon.

“ O'Keeffe of the handsome brown brows,
Chief of Urluachra of the fertile lands,
The inheritor of the hospitable country,
Which resembled in beauty the fair plains of Meath.”

The O'Keeffes were in ancient times marshals and chief military leaders of Desmond, and were styled princes of Fermoy. They had several castles, the chief of which were those of Dromagh and Duaragil. There are still several respectable families of the O'Keeffes in the county of Cork. IV. Mac Donnacha or Mac Donogh, of whom an account is given in O'Brien's Dictionary at the word Donnoch, was chief of Duhalla, now the barony of Duhallow, in the county of Cork. The Mac Donaghs were a branch of the Mac Carthys, and powerful chiefs; they were styled princes of Duhallow, and their chief residence

Great depredations were committed by O'Conor Roe and Mac Dermott on O'Conor Don, in conwas the magnificent castle of Kanturk. V. O'Mathghamlina or O'Mahony. The O'Mahonys are given by O'Heerin as chiefs of Hy Eachach, and also of Kinel m-Beice; the latter is now the barony of Kinalmeaky, in the county of Cork, and Hy Eachach is in modern times called Ivaugh, which, according to Smith, comprises the whole peninsula in the harony of West Carbery, extending from Ballydehob to the bay of Dunmanus. O'Brien and O'Halloran give the territory Kinel Aodha as possessed by the O'Mahonys, which is now the barony of Kinnalea, in the county of Cork; and O'Brien in his Dictionary, at the word Mathghabbain, states that the O'Mahonys, who were a branch of the Eugenic race, had a large territory in Muskerry, south of the river Lee, in the county of Cork, and also another territory called Tiobrad, in the county of Kerry; and the O'Mahonys are placed on the map of Ortelius, in the west of Kerry, opposite the island of Valentia. The O'Mahonys were powerful chiefs, and were sometimes styled princes. They are thus designated by O'Heerin :—

“ Ivaugh, the most western part of Banba (Ireland),
Is the great estate of O'Mahony,
The well watered lands of fair fortresses,
Extensive are the brown-nut-producing plains.

“ Kinnalmeaky of the pleasant fields
About Bandon, of the fair woods,
The most warlike chief, in victory supreme,
Is O'Mahony of the white foaming coast.”

The O'Mahonys had several castles, as those of Rosbrin, Ardintenant, Blackcastle, Ballydesmond, Dunbeacan, Dunmanus, Ringmahon, &c., all along the sea coast. There are several respectable families of the O'Mahonys in the counties of Cork and Kerry, and many of the name, styled counts O'Mahony have been highly distinguished commanders in the Irish brigades in the service of France and Spain. VI. O'Ceallachain or O'Callaghans, given by O'Heerin as chiefs of Clair Beire, and of Kinel Aodha. According to O'Brien and O'Halloran, the territory of the O'Callaghans was called Pahal O'Callaghan, signifying O'Callaghan's people, and extended from Mallow westward, on both sides of the Blackwater, in the barony of Duhallow, county of Cork, and comprised, according to Smith, the present parishes of Clonmeen and Kilsannick, an extensive territory containing about fifty thousand acres. The O'Callaghans mentioned by O'Heerin were chiefs in Kinel Aodha, now the barony of Kinnalea, and of Clair Beire, which signifies the plain of Beara, a district situated in the harony of Beare, both in the county of Cork. They are thus mentioned in the poem of O'Heerin :—

“ Ar Chenel Aedha an fuinn te,
O'Ceallachain Clair Beire,
Fonn glaisliunde co grian geal,
Fiadh is fairsinge inbhear.”

“ Over Kinnalea of the fertile lands,
Rules O'Callaghan of the plain of Beara,
A land of blue waters and bright sunshine,
The country of the most expanded bay.”

The O'Callaghans are of the Eugenic race, and took their name from their ancestor Ceallachan Cashel, the celebrated king of Munster in the tenth century, and accounts of them may be found in the Annals of Inisfallen and the Four Masters. The O'Callaghans, lords of Clonmeen, were in former times very powerful chiefs, and had their chief residence at the castle of Clonmeen, the ruins of which still remain on a rock near the river Blackwater. According to O'Brien, at the word Pahal, the chief of the O'Callaghans was transplanted into the county of Clare, by Cromwell where he gave him a considerable property at Kilcooney, in lieu of his ancient estates. O'Brien mentions baron Louis Dennis O'Callaghan, grand Venerer to his Serene Highness the Prince Margrave of sequence of which great commotion ensued in Connaught; and Mac Donogh burned Moylurg on account of these depredations.

Baden-Baden, and some of them were also distinguished officers in the French service. There are several highly respectable families of the O'Callaghans in the county of Cork, and a branch of them in Tipperary are viscounts of Lisimore. VII. O'Liathain or O'Lehan, by some rendered to Lyne and Lyons, is given by O'Heerin chief of Hy Liathain, and of Hy Nannchadha. According to O'Brien, at the words Cuislean and Ibh Nanncha, and also according to Smith, the O'Lehans had the territory in the county of Cork, afterwards called the barony of Barrymore, from the Anglo-Norman family of the Barrys, who became its possessors. According to O'Brien, the O'Lehans took their name from one of their chiefs in the beginning of the eleventh century, named Cuilean O'Liathan, who, in A. D. 1010, built Castle Lehan, now Castle Lyons, which was the chief seat of that family. The O'Lehans are thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"Lord of Hy Lehan, a warrior of fame,
The hardy leader of the battalions of Munster,
Of Hy Nanncha he is lineal chief,
The host of keen arms, of high nobility."

VIII. O'Flainn or O'Flynn, chief of Arda and Hy Bagamhna, according to O'Heerin, and given by O'Brien, at the words Ardach and Donnchu; and by O'Halloran as chiefs of Arda, a territory in the barony of Carbery, and also of Muiscirith Miotaine, or Muiscirigh ui-Fhloinn, a district in the barony of Muskerry, both in the county of Cork. The district in Musery possessed by the O'Flynn, according to O'Heerin, extended from the river Dribseach, or Dripsey, to Ballynoorney. O'Maolfabhail is another chief given by O'Heerin, in the same territory. The O'Flynn are thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"O'Flynn Arda of the blooming woods,
A tribe of the purest pedigree,
Heir to the lordship is each man,
They are the clan of Ibane."
"Of the race of Conary of the great forces.
Let us speak of the chiefs of Musery,
A host whom the bright sun salutes
On the land of the Martineans of Munster."

Hy Baghamna is now the barony of Ibane and Barryroe, adjoining Carbery. According to Windele, the O'Flynn built the castle of Macroom, which was called O'Flynn's castle. The O'Flynn were of the Clanna Deaga, descended from the Ernans of Ulster, and Eochy O'Flynn, a celebrated bard and historian is stated to be of this sept, and is mentioned in O'Reilly's Irish Writers amongst the chief bards of the tenth century, whose compositions are contained in the Books of Leacan and Ballymote. IX. Mac Amhlaidhibh or Mac Auliffe, given by O'Heerin as chief of the country from Amhain Ella westward beyond Gleann Saleain. This territory was in the barony of Duhallow, in the county of Cork, extending westward from the river Alla to the borders of Limerick. According to O'Brien, at the words Curmac, Glean Omra, and the end of the letter M, the Mac Auliffes were a branch of the Mac Carthys, and possessed the territory called Glean Omra, in the barony of Duhallow, and that the last chief of the family was colonel of a regiment in Spain, and died about the year 1720. Their chief seat was castle Mac Auliffe, near Newmarket. The Mac Auliffes are thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"Far beyond the bountiful river Ella,
To the westward of Glen Saleain of stately trees,
A fair land of affluence undenied;
The territory belongs to the noble Mac Auliffe."

Another chief in this territory is mentioned by O'Heerin, as follows:

"An estate of the plain of Core belongs,
It is Aes Ella of the fine level land;
To the stately seion of Banha of the ringletted hair,
He is O'Tedganna of Dun Durlais."

Peregrine O'Mulloy, lord of Fercall (in the King's county), died.

O'Conor marched into the plain of Connaught

X. O'Donnagair or Donnégans, chiefs of Muiscirith-na-dtri-Magh, or Muscry of the Three Plains, now the half barony of Orrery, in the county of Cork, according to O'Brien at the word Muiscirith. They are thus mentioned by O'Dugan:

"The country of O'Donnegan is certified,
The great Muscry of the three plains,
Which belongs to the host of polished steel,
The district of charming sunny lands."

O'Cullenan is given by O'Brien as a chief on the same territory. The O'Cullenans were celebrated as hereditary physicians of Munster. XI. O'Hionmhuicinn, chief of Tuath Saxon, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"Tuath Saxon of the fair pleasant plain,
To O'Hinnmanc I proclaim,
A country of harbours in affluence abounding,
Belong to the hardy sept of Clan Conary."

XII. O'Maolbhleoghaidh, of the race of Core, chief of Muiscirith Treithirne, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"Muscry Trehirne of the mighty men,
Rightfully belongs to the race of Core,
O'Mulbleaghain is powerful over the land,
He possesses the country of smooth plains."

XIII. O'Breaghain or O'Bregan, O'Glaisin, also O'Mietire and O'Coelidh, or Keeley; likewise O'Ciarran, are given by O'Heerin, O'Brien, and O'Halloran, as chiefs of Hy Mac Caille, or I Mac-enile, now the barony of Imokilly, county of Cork. O'Bregan and O'Glaisin are thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"A valiant elan, warlike in pursuit,
Ruled Imokilly of the hospitable banquets,
Two tribes possessed the smooth plains,
O'Bregan and the fair O'Glaisin."

XIV. O'Cuire or O'Curry, of Clan Torna, chief of Ciarraidhe Cuire, now the barony of Kerriurehy, in the county of Cork, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"Kerriurehy of the fair coast,
That country belongs to Clan Torna;
O'Curry obtained the fertile land,
Its green aspect is like the plains of Meath."

XV. O'Cobhthaidh, anglicised O'Cowhiggs or O'Cowhys, of Fuinn Cliodhna, chiefs of Triocha Meadhona, now the barony of West Barryroe, in the county of Cork. The O'Cowhiggs were in ancient times powerful chiefs, and, according to Smith, had seven castles along the coast in the barony of Ibane and Barryroe. They are thus mentioned by O'Heerin:—

"Lord of the county of Triocha Meona,
Is O'Cowhy of the white-stoned shore,
The land of Cleona is the plain of O'Cowhy,
In the sea fights they are valiant foes."

XVI. O'Fichiolla or O'Fihellys, a name anglicised to Field, are also given by O'Brien as chiefs in West Barryroe. XVII. O'Baire, given by O'Heerin as chief of Muintir Baire, and by O'Halloran as chief of Aron. In O'Brien's Dictionary at the word Rinn, the O'Baires are stated to possess a territory and foreland called Muintir Baire, part of ancient Carbery, in the county of Cork. This name has been anglicised to Baery; they were of the Ithian or Lugadian race, and descended from Fathaidh Airgtheach, a king of Munster in the third century, according to O'Heerin, by whom they are thus designated:

(in Roscommon), burned Ard-an-Choilein, and the island of Lough Cairgin, and slew Donal Oge Mac Donnell, a constable of 'galloglasses, on that occasion.

"Muintir Baire of the fair fortress,
They are of the race of Fathaidh Airghtheach;
O'Baire rules over the land of waves,
Which is not surpassed by the smooth plains of Manainn."

This name has been anglicised to Barry, not Baery, as left uncorrected by the printer in the foregoing part of this article. XVIII. O'Laoghaire or O'Learys, chiefs of Hy Laoghaire or Iveleary, were, according to O'Brien at the word Ibh, of the Lugadian or Ithian race, and possessed in ancient times the city of Roscarbery and its environs; and, according to Smith and Windele, Iveleary, or O'Leary's country, lay in Muskerry, in the county of Cork, between Macroom and Inchageela, where they had several castles, as those of Carrigafooky, Carrignaneelagh, Carrignacurra, Dundarierk and Drumcurragh. XIX. The O'Heas and O'Deas, of whom accounts have been already given in the note on Thomond, are mentioned by O'Brien at the word Cairbre, amongst the chiefs of Carbery, county of Cork, and Smith states that the O'Heas were chiefs of Pobble O'Hea in Carbery. XX. The O'Donovans, of whom also an account has been given in the note on Thomond, likewise settled in Cork, and according to Smith, were chiefs of Clan Cathail, an extensive district in West Carbery, and had their chief residence at Castle Donovan. XXI. O'Beice is given by O'Heerin as a chief of Beantraidhe, now the barony of Bantry, county of Cork, and is thus designated:—

"O'Beice, chief of the fair land,
Rules over Bantry of delightful bloom,
Heroes whose noble actions I certify,
They are of the race of Fergus of Ulster."

XXII. The O'Caseys are given by O'Brien at the word Coillte, as chiefs of Coillte Maibineacha, a territory near Mitchelstown, in the county of Cork. XXIII. The O'Healys or O'Helys are given by O'Brien at the word Doimnach, as chiefs of Doimnach Mor O'Healy, or Pobble O'Healy, a large parish in the barony of Muskerry, county of Cork, and he states that the lord chief baron, Hely Hutchinson, was descended from this family. XXIV. The O'Herlihs or O'Hurleys are given by O'Brien, at the end of the letter I, as chiefs of a district in the barony of Muskerry, and he states they were hereditary wardens of the church of St. Gohnait of Ballyvoorny, and were possessors for many ages of the large parish of that name. Smith states that they were chiefs near Macroom. For a further account of the O'Hurleys, see note on Ormond. XXV. The O'Nunans are given by O'Brien at the letter U, as chiefs of Tullaleis and Castlelissen, now the parish of Tullilease, in the barony of Duhallow, county of Cork, of which they were hereditary wardens of St. Brendan's church. XXVI. The O'Dalys, according to Smith, had the parish of Kilerohane, in the barony of West Carbery, county of Cork, and were bards to the Mac Carthys, O'Mahonys, Carews, and other great families. An account of several of the O'Dalys, eminent poets in Munster, is to be found in O'Reilly's Irish writers. XXVII. The Mac Egans are mentioned by O'Brien at the word Eagan, as Brehons, in the counties of Cork and Kerry, under the Mac Carthys, kings of Desmond. The Mac Egans were also hereditary Brehons or judges of Ormond. XXVIII. The Mac Sweeneys are mentioned by O'Brien at the end of the letter M, as military commanders under the Mac Carthys, princes of Desmond, who, in the thirteenth century, brought a body of them from Tireconnell or Donegal, where they were celebrated as military chiefs under the O'Donnells, and hence the head of the clan was styled Mac Suibhne-na-dTuadh, or Mac Sweeney of the Battle-axes. According to Smith and Seward, the Mac Sweeneys had the parish of Kilmurry, in the barony of Muskerry, county of Cork, and their chief castle at Clodagh, near Macroom, and had also Castlemore, in the parish of Movidy. They were famous for their hospitality, and one of them erected a large stone near the castle of Clodagh,

O'Donnell, that is, Torlogh of the Wine, marched his forces against the Clan Murtogh (O'Conors) to Sligo, preyed and devastated the entire of Carbury of Drumcliff, and after he had slain many, with an inscription in Irish, inviting all passengers to repair to the house of Edmond Mac Sweeney for free entertainment. XXIX. The Mac Sheehys, according to Smith, were a warlike clan, brought from Connaught in the fifteenth century by the Fitzgeralds, earls of Desmond, who appointed them their body guards. They were afterwards numerous in the counties of Cork and Limerick; some of them changed the name to Joy, and of this family was the late judge, Baron Joy; they are supposed by some to be originally the same as the Joyces of Connemara. XXX. The O'Kearneys were a clan near Kinsale, in the county of Cork, where they are placed on the Map of Ortelius, and are mentioned by O'Heerin as chiefs of Hy Floinn. XXXI. The O'Riordans were a clan of note in Muskerry, in the county of Cork, and distinguished military chiefs in ancient times. Of this family was the late Dr. O'Riordan of Limerick, a distinguished Irish scholar, and patron of the late Peter O'Connell, the compiler of an Irish Dictionary, which has been described in the note on Thomond. XXXII. The O'Crowleys are mentioned by Smith as chiefs of Kilshallow, west of Bandon, in the county of Cork, and originally a clan from Connaught. XXXIII. The O'Murphys, originally from Wexford, are mentioned by Smith as a numerous clan in Muskerry, and there are many respectable families of the name in the city of Cork. XXXIV. The O'Aherns, O'Ronaynes, and O'Heynes, were also old and respectable families in the county of Cork. Of the O'Creaghs and O'Gradys, of whom an account has been given in the note on Thomond, there are several respectable families in the county of Cork.

The following have been the chiefs and clans in Kerry, in ancient and modern times. I. O'Concobaigh or O'Conors, styled by O'Heerin kings or princes of Kerry, who thus mentions them in his topographical poem:—

"Fagbham siol Conaire cliach,
Riagraidhe Erna na nor sciath,
Taile ar nucht ar fein Fearguis,
As ceim a hucht fheicheamhuais.

"Ri Ciarraighe os clannaibh Ceir,
O'Concobaigh coir doisein,
Cele clair an miodhfuinn mir,
On traigh co Sionaid sruthghil.

"Let us leave the race of Conary of battles,
The princes of Erna of the golden shields,
We come to our friends the race of Fergus,
They are entitled to command our attention.

"The king of Kerry over the clans of Ciar, O'Conor rules that land by right,
Chief of the plain of fertile fields,
From the strand to the Shannon of clear streams."

The Ciar above-mentioned was son of Fergus Mac Roy, king of Ulster, by Meava, the celebrated queen of Connaught, and having settled in Munster, in the first century, as already explained in the preceding part of this article, he became possessed of the greater part of the territory, afterwards called Kerry, which derived its name from him, being named Ciarrioghacht, signifying Ciar's kingdom, also written in Irish as above, Ciarraighe, and sometimes Ciaraidh. This Ciar and his posterity of the Irian race possessed the territory called Iar Mumhan, or West Munster, which comprised the north-western half of the present county of Kerry, with a part of Limerick, as already explained. Of the race of Ciar were some eminent persons in early times, as St. Brendan of Kerry, in the sixth century, the founder of the see of Ardfer, and many monasteries; and St. Carthach or Mochuda, who in the seventh century founded the college of Lismore, in Waterford, which was long celebrated as a seat of literature, and attended by students and plundered the district on that occasion, Donal, son of Murtoigh (O'Connor) waited on O'Donnell, made peace with him, paid him his tribute, and restored the hostages previously taken from Tirconnell.

A contest arose between O'Rourke (of Leitrim) from all parts of Europe. Torna Eigeas, the celebrated bard to the monarch Niall of the Hostages in the fifth century, was also of the same race. Mac Beataeh, king of Ciaraidhe Luachra, the ancient name of West Kerry, fought under Brian Boru, at the battle of Clontarf. According to a printed pedigree of the O'Conors Kerry, they took their name from Con, one of their chiefs in the eleventh century, and from Ciar their great ancestor, thus making the word Conciar or Coniar, anglicised O'Connor; or according to others they took their name from Conchobhar or Conor, one of their ancient chiefs. Of the O'Conors Kerry, several distinguished chiefs are mentioned in the Four Masters, and Annals of Inisfallen, from the twelfth to the sixteenth century; they were very powerful, and in ancient times styled kings and princes of Kerry. In the thirteenth century, the Fitzmaurices, earls of Kerry, got much of the possessions of the O'Conors, whose ancient principality was diminished to the territory called Oireachtui-Chonchobhair, signifying the inheritance of O'Connor, now forming the barony of Trillick. The O'Conors Kerry had several strong castles, the chief of which was that of Carrigafoile, at the small island of Carrig, near the mouth of the Shannon, but after the Elizabethian and Cromwellian wars, most of their estates were confiscated. According to Lodge's Peerage, several of the O'Conors, lords of Kerry, were connected by marriage alliances with the Fitzmaurices, earls of Kerry, and they were also connected by intermarriages with the O'Connells of Kerry. There are several respectable families of the O'Conors in Cork and Kerry, and some of them have been distinguished officers in the service of France and Naples. The chief representative of the ancient family of the O'Conors Kerry, and maternally descended from the O'Connells of Kerry, is Captain Daniel O'Connell O'Connor, at present an officer in the Austrian service. II. O'Donoghoe or O'Donoghoe, given by O'Heerin as chiefs of Lough Lein, and also of Clan Sealluidhe, and thus designated in his topography, together with the O'Carrolls:

"O'Donoghoe of Lough Leine,
And of the Fleisg who are full powerful,
Rule over the Clan Shalvey,
They are men of happiness in Munster."

"O'Donoghoe of Lough Lein,
He is prince of that Eoganaelht,
O'Carroll is there our friend,
Of pure and noble origin."

O'Brien, at the word Donchu, states, that the Donoghues were of the Eugenic race, and originally settled in that part of Desmond, now the county of Cork, where they possessed a large territory, extending from Iniskeen to the borders of Bantry, and from thence northward to Ballyvurny and Macroom, comprising the district called Iveleary (which is part of Carbery), and also a great portion of Muskerry; but in the twelfth century, the O'Donoghues were expelled from Cork by the Mac Carthys and O'Mahonys, and settled in Kerry, where they became proprietors of all the country about Lough Lein and Killarney. From the tenth to the thirteenth century, several distinguished chiefs of the O'Donoghues are mentioned in the Annals of Inisfallen, and they are styled kings and princes of the Eoganaelht of Lough Lein. The O'Donoghues continued powerful chiefs down to the reign of Elizabeth, when, in consequence of having joined the earls of Tyrone and Desmond, most of their estates were confiscated. The O'Donoghues were divided into two great branches, namely, those of Lough Lein and those of Glenflesk, the latter called O'Donoghoe More. The O'Donoghues, lords of Lough Lein, had their chief castle at Ross Island, on one of the lakes of Killarney, the romantic ruins of which still remain. The O'Donoghues of Lough Lein or Ross, according to Windele, are now extinct; but the O'Donoghoe of the Glens still holds a great deal of the extensive possessions of his ancestors. Some interesting accounts of the O'Donoghues will be found in Windele's Notices of Cork and Killarney. III. O'Donmhaill or O'Donnell, of the same race as the O'Donoghues, is given by O'Heerin as a chief of Clan Shalvey, and mentioned as follows:—

"Clan Shalvey of the limpid streams,
Recorded as a well known land,
Belongs to O'Donnell of the powerful hand,
Who took possession of the brown nut plain."

IV. The O'Carrolls, princes of Lough Lein, are mentioned by O'Heerin, and also in the Annals of Inisfallen, in the eleventh and twelfth centuries. V. O'Faillbhe or O'Falvey, given by O'Heerin as chief of Corca Duibhne, and of the territory from the Mang, westward to Fiontraigh or Ventry. Corca Duibhne, is now the barony of Corcaquiney, in the county of Kerry. The O'Falveys are mentioned by O'Brien, at the words Corca Duibhne and Faillbhe, also as lords of Ibheratha, now the barony of Iveragh in Kerry. The O'Falveys were powerful chiefs, and in ancient times held the rank of hereditary admirals of Desmond. VI. O'Seatha or O'Shea, is also given as a chief of Ibh Rath or Iveragh. VII. O'Conghail or O'Connell, is given by O'Heerin, as chief of Magh O g-Coinchinn, now the barony of Magonihy, in Kerry. These O'Connells it appears were a branch of the O'Connells, the ancient lords of Hy Conaill Gawra, now the baronies of Upper and Lower Conello, in the county of Limerick, which, as already stated, formed a part of West Munster. An account of the O'Connells of Clare, Limerick, and Kerry, has been given in the note on Thomond, and in Burke's History of the Commoners, will be found accounts of several chiefs of the O'Connells of Kerry, who were formerly styled lords of Bally Carberry, in the barony of Iveragh. The best authorities on the ancient chiefs of Kerry, are the topographical accounts in O'Brien's Irish Dictionary, O'Halloran, Smith's Kerry, Windele, &c., but particularly O'Heerin's Topography of Munster, a work of undoubted authority, written in the fourteenth century, and now for the first time translated from the Irish MS., and embodied in those notes. The three last-mentioned chiefs are stated by O'Heerin, in his topography, to be of the race of Clan Conaire, that is the descendants of Conary II., monarch of Ireland, in the beginning of the third century, who was of the race of the Clanna Deaga of Munster, of whom an account has been given in the preceding part of this article, and also in the note on Thomond, where it has been shewn that Cairbre Riada, son of the monarch Conary, in the third century, settled the Irish colony in North Britain or Alban, afterwards called Scotland, from whom were descended the ancient Scottish kings and the House of Stuart. The above chiefs are thus designated by O'Heerin:

"After the battalions of Clar Broine,
Let us treat of the clans of Conary, Fine Fenian heroes from Tulaich-an-Trir (an ancient name of Tara), Rulers in Munster of the smooth flowing streams."

"Three chiefs who possessed the lands,
Of Corca Duivney of the fine forces,
O'Falvey the warrior, and O'Shea,
The strengthening bond of the eastern parts."

"O'Connell of the sharp swords
Rules over the shaded fortresses of Magonihy,
Like a stately tree in the hazel woods,
Is the Munster leader of the eavalry forces.
From Mang, westward, is the estate,
Possessed by O'Falvey as far as Ventry,
Without dispute an extensive land,
Was obtained by O'Shea, chief of Iveragh."

VIII. O'Laoghain, probably O'Leine, chief of Hy Fearba; and O'Duibhduin, chief of Hy Flannain, districts in the county of Kerry, are thus mentioned by O'Heerin:—

and the Mac Donoghs (of Sligo); and Donal, son of Murtogh (O'Conor), joined the Mac Donoghs against O'Rourke.

"O'Laoghain, a warrior of fame,
We found him over Hy Fearba,
O'Caithneandaigh obtained the land,
Firmly settled under the high hills of Cualan.

"Hy Flannain an extensive land,
A verdant country of delightful streams,
O'Duivdin over the fertile soil,
Rules as its chief and protecting lord."

IX. The O'Neides and Clan Canary are given as chiefs of Alltraighe, or of Clar Ciarraidhe, that is, the Plain of Kerry, and thus mentioned by O'Heerin:—

"The men of Alltraighe maintain,
Two chiefs of the plain of Kerry,
A clan the most active in pitch of battle,
Their chiefs are O'Neide and Clan Canary."

X. O'Dunodaidh or O'Dunady, chief of Slieve Luachra, that is, the district about the mountain of Slievlogher, on the borders of Limerick and Kerry, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:—

"The plain of Luachra, a productive country,
Belongs to the liberal O'Dunady,
A tribe of hard-fighting battles,
A district of fair well-watered lands."

XI. O'Muircheartaigh or O'Moriarty, and O'Hionnasbhain, chiefs of Aos Aisde of Orlar Eltaigh, are thus mentioned by O'Heerin:—

"Aos Aisde of the plain of flocks,
Which the chief O'Moriarty obtained,
A fair country of blooming aspect,
Which was possessed by O'Hinnesvan."

The O'Moriarty's had the parish of Templehoe, and some adjoining districts in the barony of Dunkerron. XII. The Mac Gillicuddy's, a branch of the O'Sullivan's, were chiefs of a territory in the barony of Dunkerron, and from them the mountains called Mac Gillicuddy's Reeks got their name. There are several respectable families of them in Kerry, some of whom have anglicised the name to Archdeacon. The head of the family is styled Mac Gillicuddy of the Reeks. XIII. The Mac Elligotts, an ancient family in Kerry, from whom the parish of Ballymacelligott, in the barony of Trughenackmy, got its name. In Lodge's Peerage, in his account of the earls of Kerry, it is stated that in the latter end of the thirteenth century, one of the Fitzmaurices, earl of Kerry, was married to the daughter of sir John Mac Leod of Galway, and that others of those Mac Leods of the same family settled in Kerry, and the name was changed to Mac Elligott; thus it would appear that the Mac Elligotts are descended from the Scottish clan of the Mac Leods. Some of the Mac Elligotts were distinguished officers in the service of foreign states, amongst others Baron Mac Elligott, a major-general in the Austrian service, under the empress Maria Theresa. Some of the Mac Elligotts who resided in Limerick about twenty years ago, were eminent Irish scholars. XIV. The Mac Finneens, according to some, a branch of the Mac Carthys, or according to others, of the O'Sullivan's; the Mac Crehans; the O'Scanlans; and O'Harneys, were also clans of note in Kerry.

Anglo-Norman and English families in Desmond. As already stated, king Henry II. gave a grant of the kingdom of Cork or Desmond to Robert Fitzstephen, and to Milo de Cogan. The Fitzgeralds, descended from the Anglo-Norman chief, Maurice Fitzgerald, of whom an account has been given in a note in these Annals, at the year 1224, got large possessions in Cork and Kerry, Manus, son of Malachy Mac Manus, was slain by the sons of Mac Donogh and Mulroony Mac Donogh.

and were created earls of Desmond in the reign of Edward III. Another branch of the Fitzgeralds, also descended from Maurice Fitzgerald, became earls of Kildare. The earls of Desmond became one of the most powerful families in Munster, and several of them were lords deputies of Ireland in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Gerald Fitzgerald, sixteenth earl of Desmond, was one of the greatest subjects in Europe, held the rank of a Prince Palatine, with all the authority of a provincial king; had many strong castles, and his vast possessions extended 150 miles over the counties of Cork, Kerry, Limerick, and Waterford, comprising nearly six hundred thousand acres of profitable land, independent of immense tracts of waste lands, not surveyed, so that his entire property amounted to nearly one million of acres. He had an immense number of vassals, and could raise at a call a force of two thousand foot and six hundred horse, and had besides, in his retinue of his own kindred, five hundred gentlemen of the Fitzgeralds. The earl of Desmond having resisted the Reformation in the reign of Elizabeth, and waged war against the English government, his forces after long contests were defeated, and he himself was slain by one Kelly, an Irish soldier, in a glen near Castle Island, in the county of Kerry, on the 11th of November, 1583; his head was cut off and sent to England by Thomas Butler, earl of Ormond, as a present to the queen, who caused it to be fixed on London bridge. His son, James, succeeded to the title, but died soon after. James Fitzgerald, nephew of Gerald, earl of Desmond, attempting to recover the estates and honours of his ancestors, took up arms, and joined the standard of Hugh O'Neill, earl of Tyrone. He was styled earl of Desmond, but his title not being recognised, he was designated the sugan earl, signifying the earl of straw. His forces being at length defeated, and himself taken prisoner, he was sent to England along with Florence Mac Carthy, and imprisoned in the Tower of London, where he died, A. D. 1608, and thus terminated the illustrious house of Desmond. After his death the Fitzgeralds, who were the chief representatives of this great family, went to Spain, became commanders in the Spanish and Austrian service, and were styled Counts of Desmond. Accounts of the Fitzgeralds, earls of Desmond, will be found in Smith's Histories of Cork and Kerry, Mac Geoghegan's Ireland, and Lodge's Peerage. The vast estates of Gerald, earl of Desmond, were confiscated in the reign of Elizabeth, and granted to various English settlers, called planters or undertakers, on conditions that no planter should convey any part of the lands to any of the mere Irish, and the English settlers were also prohibited to intermarry with the Irish, and none of the Irish were to be maintained in any family. Of the Desmond estates in Cork and Waterford Sir Walter Raleigh got grants from Elizabeth of about forty thousand acres. Sir Walter Raleigh resided some time near Youghal, and after his return from a voyage to America, brought with him from Virginia the potato-root, together with tobacco, being the first who had introduced these articles into Ireland, and he planted the first potatoes in a field near Youghal, about A. D. 1610. The other English settlers who got grants of the Desmond estates in the county of Cork, were Arthur Robins, 18,000 acres; Fane Beecher, 12,000 acres; Hugh Worth, 12,000 acres; Arthur Hyde, 12,000 acres; Sir Warham St. Leger, 6,000 acres; Hugh Cuffe, 6,000 acres; Sir Thomas Norris, 6,000 acres; Sir Arthur Hyde, 6,000 acres; Thomas Say, 6,000 acres; Sir Richard Beacon, 6,000 acres; Edmond Spencer, the poet, 3,000 acres. In the county of Kerry the following persons got grants of the Desmond estates:—Sir William Herbert about 13,000 acres; Charles Herbert, about 4,000 acres; Sir Valentine Brown, ancestor of the earls of Kenmare, about 6,000 acres; Sir Edward Denny, 6,000 acres; and some grants to the families of Conway, Holley and others. Of the families who got the Desmond estates in Limerick, an account has been given in the note on Thomond. The other principal Norman and English families of the county of Cork, were the Cogans, Carews, Condons, or Cantons, de Courcys, Barrys, Barnwalls, Barretts, Roches,

A. D. 1389.

The vicar of Iniscain (in Louth) died.

Niall Oge O'Neill was taken prisoner by the English.

Mac Gibbons, and Fitzgibbons, branches of the Fitzgeralds; the Flemmings, Sarsfields, Nagles, Martells, Percivals, Russells, Pigotts, Prendergasts, Lombards, Lavallans, Morgans, Cottors, Meaghs, Murroughs, Supples, Stackpoles, Whites, Warrens, Hodnetts, Hardings, Fields, Beechers, Hydes, Jephsons, Garretts, Kents, Delahides, de Spencers, Deanes, Daunts, Vincents, Gardiners, Beamishes, Courtneys, Cuffes, Cores, Hores, Newenhams, &c. The Coppingers, Goulds, Gallways, Skiddys, and Terrys, considered by O'Brien, Windele, and others, to be of Danish descent, were in former times very numerous and powerful families in Cork, and a vast number of them were lord mayors of that city, from the fourteenth to the seventeenth century, as may be seen in Smith's History of Cork. The de Courcys were barons of Kinsale, and some of the family took the Irish name of Mac Patrick, being descendants of one of the earls named Patrick. The de Barrys, Anglo-Normans, became earls of Barrymore, and gave name to the baronies of Barrymore and Barryroe; some of them took the name of Mac David. The Anglo-Norman family of de la Rupe or Roche became viscounts of Fernoy, and their territory was called Roche's country; several of them were distinguished officers in the Irish Brigade in the service of France, and others in the Spanish and Sardinian service. The Sarsfields, Anglo-Normans, settled in Cork, and also in Limerick, and in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, several of them were lord mayors of Cork, and also of Dublin; the Sarsfields of Limerick were created viscounts of Kilmallock, the first who got the title being sir Dominick Sarsfield, chief justice of the common pleas, in the reign of James I. Patrick Sarsfield of the same family was created earl of Lucan by James II., under whom he was celebrated as a commander of the Irish forces. Many of the Sarsfields were distinguished generals in the service of France and Spain; and it may be here mentioned, that some of the de Lacys and Browns of Limerick were amongst the most celebrated military commanders in Europe, in the eighteenth century, as marshals and generals in the Russian and Austrian service. The Barretts gave name to the barony of Barretts; and the Condons to the barony of Condons. The de Barnwalls, Anglo-Normans, were styled lords of Bearhaven, and had large possessions in that district, but were expelled by the O'Sullivans, and having settled in Dublin and Meath, founded several great families, as the Barnwalls, barons of Trimblestown and Turvey, and viscounts Kingsland. Some of the family of Hodnett took the Irish name of Mac Sherry, and their chief residence was at Court Mac Sherry; from the Magners, Castle Magner got its name; and from the Hydes, Castlehyde. The Nagels had extensive possessions, and from them the Nagles mountains derive their name; of this family was sir Richard Nagle, attorney-general to James II. The Daunts, descended from the ancient family of Daunt, in Gloucestershire, held the lands of Tracton Abbey, which were leased to Thomas Daunt by sir Warham St. Leger, in the reign of Elizabeth. William Daunt, his brother, had also part of those lands, and from these brothers are descended the Daunts of Newboro', Slieve-roe, Fahalea, Kilcaskan, and Tracton Abbey.

The following have been the chief Anglo-Norman and English families in Kerry. The Fitzmaurices, earls of Kerry, descended from Raymond le Gros, a celebrated warrior who came over with Strongbow. Raymond having formed an alliance with Dermot MacCarthy, king of Desmond, got large grants of lands in Kerry, in the territory called Lixnaw, which, from being possessed by his son Maurice, got the name of Clanmaurice. From Maurice were descended the Fitzmaurices, earls of Kerry. The other principal English families were the Herberts, Browns, Stacks, Blennerhassetts, Crosbies, Dennys, Gunns, Godfreys, Morrisises, Rices, Springs, &c.

Nobility. The following have been the noble families in the county of Cork, from the reign of king John to the present time.

Maurice Maol O'Connor Fairly was slain by the cast of a javelin, at the church of Cluan Dathore,¹ by a man of the O'Kellys of Legi (Leix, Queen's county).

The de Courcys, barons of Kinsale and Ringrone; the Fitzgeralds, earls of Desmond, barons of Decies, and seneschals of Imokilly. One of the family of Preston was created earl of Desmond, and in modern times the Fieldings, earls of Denbigh in England, have the title of earls of Desmond. It may be remarked that the O'Briens, earls of Thomond, have their chief residence in the county of Cork. In the reign of Richard II., Edward Plantagenet, son of king Edward III., was created earl of Cork, and Richard Plantagenet, duke of York, viceroy of Ireland in 1449, was also earl of Cork; and it may be here remarked, that of the royal family, the dukes of Clarence are earls of Munster. The Carews were created marquesses of Cork. The Mac Carthys were earls of Clancare, earls of Clancarthy, earls of Muskerry, and earls of Mountcashel. The Barrys, barons of Oletan, viscounts of Buttevant, and earls of Barrymore. The Roches, barons of Castletlough, and viscounts of Fernoy. The Boyles, barons of Youghal, Bandon, Broghill, and Castlemartyr, viscounts of Dungarvan and Kinnalmeaky, earls of Cork, Orrery, and Shannon, and earls of Burlington in England. The Percivals, barons of Duhallow, Kanturk, and Arden, and earls of Eguont. The St. Leger, viscounts of Doneraile; the Touchets, earls of Castlehaven; the Bernards, earls of Bandon; the Whites, viscounts of Bearhaven, and earls of Bantry; the Berkleys and Chetwynds, viscounts of Bearhaven; the Brodericks, viscounts Middleton; the Moores, earls of Charleville; and the Moores, earls of Mountcashel; the Kings, earls of Kingston; the O'Callaghans, viscounts of Lisnora in Waterford, are originally from Cork; the Evanses, barons of Carbery; the Deanes, barons of Muskerry; the Tonsons, barons of Riversdale; and the family of Cavendish, barons of Waterpark.

In Kerry the following have been the noble families since the reign of king John. The Fitzmaurices, barons of Lixnaw and O'Dorney, viscounts of Clanmaurice, and earls of Kerry; the Pettys or Fitzmaurice Pettys, barons of Dunkerron, viscounts of Clanmaurice, earls of Kerry, earls of Shelburne, and marquesses of Lansdown in England; the Fitzgeralds, knights of Kerry; the Browns, earls of Kenmare, and viscounts of Castleross; the Herberts, barons of Castleisland; the Gages, viscounts of Castleisland; the Childs, viscounts of Castlemaine, and earls of Tyne in England; the Mousons and Palmers, viscounts of Castlemaine; the Powers, viscounts of Valentia; the Annesleys, viscounts of Valentia; the Crosbies, viscounts of Brandon, and earls of Glandore; the Wynnes, barons Headley; the de Moleynes, barons of Ventry; the Hares, barons of Ennismore, and earls of Listowel; and Thomas Spring Rice, baron Monteagle of Brandon.

Desmond was formed into the counties of Cork and Kerry, in the reign of king John, A. D. 1210, but of the immense territory comprised in those two counties, no description can be given in the limits of this article, beyond the remark, that the inland and ocean scenery of those counties is grand and beautiful, and that their extensive bays and noble harbours are amongst the finest in any country. Down to as late as a century ago, the mountains of Cork and Kerry were covered with ancient forests of oak, ash, pine, alder, birch, hazel, and yews of immense size, and afforded retreats to wolves, and numerous herds of red deer. Of the majestic mountains and magnificent lakes of Kerry it is needless to speak, celebrated as they are for sublime scenery and surpassing beauty.

Ecclesiastical divisions.—The following are the bishops' sees in Cork and Kerry:

The see of Cork was founded by St. Barr, called Fin-Barr, in the beginning of the seventh century. The diocese comprises, together with the city, a large portion of the county of Cork.

The see of Cloyne was founded in the latter end of the sixth, or beginning of the seventh century, by St. Colman, a disciple of St. Fin-Barr of Cork. Cloyne is called in Irish Cluan Uama, signifying the Retreat of the Cave, and is latinised Cluanvania. The diocese of Cloyne comprises about a third part of the county of Cork.

Malachy Cam O'Loughlin, lord of Corcomroe (in Clare), was treacherously slain by his own brother.

The see of Ross was founded in the beginning of the sixth century by St. Fachnan; it was anciently called in Irish Ross Ailithri, signifying the Plain of Pilgrimage, and in modern times Rosscarberry. Ross had in ancient times a college and Benedictine monastery, and was long celebrated as a seat of learning, attended by students from all parts of Ireland, and even from Britain. The diocese of Ross is very small, comprising only a few parishes in the county of Cork, and has been generally united to the see of Cloyne, and sometimes to that of Cork.

The see of Ardferf was founded, according to some accounts, as in Ware, Harris, and others, by St. Ert or Erc, in the latter end of the fifth century, but Lanigan considers this account doubtful, and is of opinion that St. Brendan of Kerry was its chief founder in the sixth century, to whom its cathedral is dedicated, as patron saint of the diocese, which is also sometimes mentioned as the see of Ardferf Brendan. The see of Ardferf was also sometimes styled the archbishopric of Iar Mumhan or West Munster, and is also called the see of Kerry. Aghadoe, an ancient bishop's see, situated near the abbey of Inisfallen and Lakes of Killarney, was in very early times annexed to Ardferf. The united diocese of Ardferf and Aghadoe is very large, comprehending the entire county of Kerry, with a small portion of Cork.

Ancient literature. The following account of some ancient Irish MSS. and other works, has been collected from Ware, Nicholson's Historical Library, O'Reilly's Irish Writers, O'Connor's Rer. Hib. Scrip., de Burgo's Hibernia Dominicana, Brennan's Ecclesiastical History, Smith's Cork and Kerry, and various other sources.

The Annals of Inisfallen. This work was written by the learned monks of the abbey of Inisfallen, which was founded by St. Finian, in the sixth century, on an island in the Lakes of Killarney, and was long celebrated as a seat of learning and religion, and the importance of this venerable sanctuary is shewn by some interesting ruins, which still remain. These annals give some sketches of ancient history, but commence principally at A. D. 252, and terminate at A. D. 1320, thus giving a history of Ireland from the third to the fourteenth century, but more particularly relate to the history of Munster. Amongst the authors of these annals are mentioned in O'Reilly's Irish Writers at A. D. 1009, Mal Suthain O'Carroll, lord of Lough Lein, and one of the monks of Inisfallen, who died in this year, and is styled by the Four Masters one of the most learned men of the western world; and at A. D. 1197, Giolla Patruic O'Huidhir, monk of Inisfallen, a famous poet and historian. The original of these annals is in the Bodleian Library at Oxford, and copies of them are in the Duke of Buckingham's Library at Stowe, in the library of Trinity College, Dublin, in that of the Royal Irish Academy, and an excellent copy in the library of Sir William Betham. These annals are also called the Annals of Munster, as relating chiefly to the history of Munster, and have been translated into Latin, and published in O'Connor's Rer. Hib. Scrip. down to A. D. 1088. These annals, if properly translated from the Irish, and published with the necessary annotations, would form a valuable contribution to ancient Irish history.

The Book of Munster, a large work in MS., principally compiled from the ancient record called the Psalter of Cashel, containing notices of the History of Ireland, from the earliest period to the end of the fourteenth century, but particularly relating to the history of Munster, giving accounts of its kings, chiefs, clans, and principal families, with various and interesting information on the ancient laws, arts, agriculture, commerce, manners and customs of the country. Copies of the Book of Munster are inserted in the Books of Leacan and Ballymote, of which accounts have been given in the note on North Connaught. The Book of Munster would be found very valuable if properly translated and published with sufficient annotations. It may be here remarked that

Owen O'Rourke, and the sons of Cathal Oge O'Connor, having gone to Caislean-an-uabhair, there met with the cavalry of Muintir Hely, which the translator of these Annals has, together with transcribing copies of the Books of Leacan and Ballymote, for the Royal Library at Windsor, as Irish Historiographer to their late Majesties George IV., and William IV., also translated the greater part of those books, having personally received instructions for that purpose from his Royal Highness the late Duke of Sussex, to the effect, that translations of these great records, with annotations, should accompany his copies in the royal library.

The Book of the Mac Bruodins, compiled by the Mac Bruodins, hereditary historians of Thomond, and particularly relating to the affairs of Munster, is an ancient MS. often mentioned, and is quoted as one of the records used in the compilation of the Annals of the Four Masters.

The Book of Fermoy, an ancient and valuable large Irish MS. on vellum, relating to the general history of Ireland, but particularly to Munster, and originally compiled by the monks of Fermoy, was a few years ago in the possession of William Monck Mason, of Dublin, Esq., a learned collector of Irish MSS.

O'Heerin's Topography, described in the introduction to the present publication, and in the note on Thomond, is a valuable Irish MS. containing the topography of Leinster and Munster, with an account of their chiefs and clans, and the territories possessed by each, in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. This topography is perfectly authentic, and now translated for the first time from the best copies extant, and the entire of it published and embodied in the notes given in the course of these Annals, together with literal translations of numerous passages from the topographical poem of O'Heerin, which accompanies the prose part of his topography, and contains descriptions of the territories, with designations of the various chiefs and clans. This topography was compiled from personal inspection of the various places, by Giollo-na-Neev O'Heerin, a learned poet and historian, whose death is mentioned at the year 1420, in O'Reilly's Irish Writers, and the Annals of the Four Masters. O'Brien, in his Irish Dictionary, mentions O'Heerin as an authority on his topography, under the name of Mac Fergail, under which name he is also mentioned by various Munster writers.

Florence Mac Carthy, a native of Cork, is mentioned in Keating's Ireland, under the reign of Malachy II., as an eminent Irish annalist in the fifteenth century, who wrote a general history of Ireland, which work is stated by Ware to be in the library of Trinity College, Dublin.

Donal O'Fihelly, a native of Cork in the fifteenth century, studied at Oxford, and is mentioned by Ware as having written the Annals of Ireland in the Irish language.

Maurice O'Fihelly, a native of Cork, was born at Baltimore (the ancient seat of the O'Fihellys); hence he was called Maurice de Portu. He became a Franciscan friar, and was a long time a lecturer of the university at Padua, and celebrated not only over Italy, but throughout Europe, as one of the most learned men of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, eminent for his piety, and extraordinary knowledge of theology, logic, philosophy, and metaphysics, and for his great endowments was designated Flos Mundi, or the Flower of the World. He was held in particular esteem by Pope Julius II., who, in the year 1506, advanced him to the archiepiscopal see of Tuam. He attended the council of Lateran in 1515, but, on his return to Ireland, died in 1516, about the 50th year of his age, and was buried in the Franciscan monastery at Galway. An account of his life and various works will be found in Ware's Bishops, and Brennan's Ecclesiastical History.

Historia Catholicae Hiberniae Compendium, a large Latin work in 4to., published at Lisbon, A. D. 1621, written by Philip O'Sullivan Beara, a descendant of the O'Sullivans, ancient princes of Beara, in the county of Cork, who was a sea captain in the Spanish service under king Philip IV. This work gives an account of the history and antiquities of Ireland from the earliest times, but particularly of the wars in the reign of Elizabeth, from A. D. 1588 to they put to flight, and slew Manus O'Hely and others at that place, after which they plundered Muintir Hely and slew Murtoogh O'Hely. O'Rourke,

Donal, the son of Murtoogh (O'Connor), and the Mac Donoghs made peace with each other; Mac Dermott and the Mac Donoghs also made peace;

1603, and also of events in the reign of James I. to A. D. 1618. This work is very rare, but, if translated and published, would form a valuable contribution to Irish history. O'Sullivan wrote several other learned works on the Lives of the Irish Saints and on Ecclesiastical History.

Pacata Hibernia, or Ireland Pacified, giving an account of the wars in the latter end of the reign of Elizabeth, from A. D. 1599 to 1602, particularly with reference to the events in Munster, in the counties of Cork and Kerry, and the battles fought with the Irish forces under Hugh O'Neill, earl of Tyrone, and with the Spaniards at Kinsale, compiled by sir George Carew, lord president of Munster, afterwards earl of Totness, first published in London, A. D. 1633, but since re-published.

Hibernia Anglicana, containing a history of Ireland from the English invasion to the reign of Charles II., written by sir Richard Cox, a native of Bandon, in the county of Cork, who was a judge of the Common Pleas, and afterwards lord chancellor of Ireland, published in two volumes 4to., in London, 1689.

Edmond Spencer, the celebrated poet, was secretary to the lord deputy Arthur Grey, in the reign of Elizabeth, got large grants of the Desmond estates, in the county of Cork, and resided at the castle of Kileoleman, near Doneraile, where he composed his great work The Faery Queen, which abounds in many beautiful descriptions of scenery in Munster. Spencer also wrote a work called A View of Ireland, which contains much curious information on the history and antiquities of the country.

Daniel O'Daly, styled Dominicus de Rosario, a native of Kerry, studied in Spain, was a lecturer at Louvain, and was a man of great learning and piety; he was patronised by Philip IV., king of Spain, and by John, duke of Braganza, and founded the Irish Dominican college at Lisbon, A. D. 1650; he was elected bishop of Coimbra, and died A. D. 1662, in the 67th year of his age. He published at Lisbon, in 1655, a Latin work giving a history of the Geraldines, earls of Desmond, and lords Palatine of Kerry.

Francis Matheus and John Ponce, were learned Franciscans, natives of the city of Cork, in the seventeenth century, and an account of their works is given in Brennan's Ecclesiastical History.

John O'Connell, Roman Catholic bishop of Ardfer, is mentioned in O'Reilly's Writers at the year 1650, as the author of a metrical work in Irish, on the history of Ireland.

Maurice O'Connell, M. D., of Cork, a learned physician, called the Irish Sydenham, published in 1746, in Latin, a valuable medical work, particularly on epidemic diseases. There have been several of the O'Connors of Cork and Kerry learned writers.

Bernard O'Connor, a native of Kerry, studied medicine at Montpellier and Paris; went to Poland, where he was well received at the court of king John Sobieski, who appointed him his chief physician. He afterwards read lectures in Oxford and London, and became a fellow of the Royal Society; he published some works on medicine, and also a History of Poland; he died A. D. 1698. Dermot O'Connor, a native of Kerry, an Irish scholar, translated and published, A. D. 1723, Kenting's History of Ireland.

Brian O'Connor, of Kerry, is stated in the Dissertations of Charles O'Connor to have compiled a History of the county of Kerry, about the year 1770, which work, it is said, still remains in MS., in the collections of the Marquess of Lansdowne. Daniel Roderick O'Connor, of Cork, published about the year 1798 a work on Irish history and antiquities, in two volumes octavo.

Roger O'Connor, of Cork, brother of the celebrated Arthur O'Connor, published in London in 1822, in two volumes octavo, the Chronicles of Eri, a work containing much curious matter on Irish history and antiquities, but mixed with romance.

O'Brien's Round Towers, written by Henry O'Brien, said to be a native of Cork or Clare, who died in London a few years ago. He was a young man of great abilities and acquirements, particularly in oriental literature, and published in London, in 1832, a curious and learned work on the round towers of Ireland, in which he ascribes their erection to the Tuath de Danans, and intended for that form of pagan worship, denominated Buddhism, and for astronomical observations.

George Berkeley, bishop of Cloyne, died in 1753, an eminent philosopher, whose works are well known.

The Boyles, earls of Cork, Orrery, and Burlington, were many of them distinguished in the literary world, in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and of this family was Robert Boyle, the great philosopher.

Arthur O'Leary, a native of the county of Cork, a Franciscan or Capuchin friar, was a man of great learning and wit, and one of the most celebrated political writers of the last century; he died in London in 1802, in the 73rd year of his age, and was buried in the church-yard of St. Pancras, in that city, where a monument was erected to his memory by the earl of Moira.

Richard Parr, a native of Fermoy, a learned clergyman, who died A. D. 1670, wrote a life of Archbishop Usher.

Smith's History of Cork, two volumes 8vo, written by Charles Smith, M.D., a native of Cork, published A. D. 1750, republished in Dublin, A. D. 1774. History of Kerry, also written by Dr. Smith, one volume 8vo, and published about the same time; Dr. Smith likewise wrote a history of Waterford.

Statistical Survey of Cork, by the Rev. Horatio Townsend, published in Dublin in 1810.

Notices of Cork and Kerry, by J. Windele, published at Cork, in 1839.

Campbell's Survey of the South of Ireland, in letters addressed to John Watkinson, M.D., published in 1778, contains much interesting information on Irish history and antiquities, particularly on the counties of Cork, Limerick and Tipperary.

O'Driscoll's Views of Ireland, a work on political and religious matters, published in London in 1823, was written by John O'Driscoll, a native of Cork, and judge in the Island of Dominica, who also published in 1827 a History of Ireland in two volumes.

James Cavanagh Murphy, a native of Cork, travelled in Spain and Portugal, and died in London in 1814, was an eminent architect, and wrote a celebrated work on the remains of Arabian architecture and antiquities in Spain.

Amongst the learned men of Cork may be mentioned the Right Rev. John Murphy, R. C. bishop of Cork, who has collected one of the finest libraries in Ireland, particularly rich in Irish literature.

Cork has produced various other persons eminent for their genius, and distinguished in arts and literature; amongst the artists may be mentioned James Barry, a native of Cork, who died in London in 1806, an eminent painter, whose productions rival those of the great masters of Italy; and John O'Keefe, Samuel Forde, Daniel Mac Clisc, highly distinguished painters, and John Hogan, one of the first sculptors of the present age. Amongst the dramatists, novelists, and poets, may be mentioned O'Keefe, the dramatist, in the last century; and Sheridan Knowles, a distinguished dramatist of the present day; Dr. William Maginn, well known as a writer in Frazer's and Blackwood's Magazines; the Rev. Francis Mahony, the celebrated Father Prout of Frazer; Thomas Crofton Croker, author of Fairy Legends; Gerald Griffin, a great poet and dramatist; Richard Milikin, a poet and novelist, and Miss Milikin, a novelist; Jeremiah Joseph Callanan, a poet; John Augustine Shea, a poet; P. Meagher, a poet.

Owen O'Keefe, mentioned in O'Reilly's Irish Writers at the year 1720, as president of the great bardic assemblies of Munster, held at Charleville, in the county of Cork, wrote many interesting Irish poems, amongst others one on the Battle of Aughrim.

John Charach Mac Donnell, a native of Charleville, died A. D. 1754, was a learned historian and poet, and president of the bardic assemblies of Munster. He wrote many excellent poems in Irish, particularly Jacobite songs, which are now in course of publication, translated by John Daly of Kilkenny, with elegant metrical versions by Edward Walsh, Esq.; and many of these poems have been also translated with great taste, and published by Conor Mac Sweeney, Esq., a learned Irish scholar.

and the hostages which were previously taken from the Mac Donoghs were restored, and Cathal Mac Dermott, who was in confinement with the Mac Donoghs, was liberated after they had concluded the peace.

Donal, son of Murtoth (O'Conor), plundered Tircconnell.

Rannall Mac Rourke, chief of Teallach Conmara, died.

Bryan, son of Donal Oge O'Reilly, was slain by the Clan Murtoth (O'Conors).

Manus O'Rourke was treacherously taken prisoner by Cormac O'Ferrall.

Aifric, daughter of Hugh O'Neill, the wife of Henry Aimreidh O'Neill, died.

A. D. 1390.

Niall O'Tully, a canon of the chapter of Clogher, and abbot of Devenish, (in Fermanagh), died.

Petrus O'Heoghain, dean of Lough Erne, (diocese of Clogher), and Bartholomew O'Conolly, canon and sacristy of Lisgoole (in Fermanagh), died.

A great contention arose among O'Rourke, O'Reilly, the people of Annaly (O'Ferralls of Longford), and the Muintir Eoluis (Mac Rannalls of Leitrim); and the Clan Murtoth (O'Conors, Sligo), were induced to join in the contest at the instigation of Donal Mac Murtoth and Tomaltach Mac Donogh.

Manus O'Rourke, who was in confinement with O'Reilly in the castle of Lough Oughter, made his escape therefrom and fled to the castle of Lough Scur (in Leitrim), but was, however, betrayed to the Clan Murtoth, who slew him while in the act of coming out of a boat.

A peace was concluded between O'Rourke and O'Reilly, and O'Reilly received great presents for having expelled and banished from him O'Rourke's enemies; and Owen O'Rourke, and the son of Cathal Riavach, were given him as securities for these presents.

The Clan Murtoth (O'Conors, Sligo), and the people of Tullyhunco (the Mac Tiernans of Cavan) having proceeded to take by force from the O'Rourkes the districts of Fiodh-na-Fionnoige, Sluagh Corrain, and Kinel Luachain (districts in Leitrim); O'Rourke on receiving intelligence of this, he being then at Gleann Gaibhle (Glangevlin), marched his light forces to the upper part of Kinel Luachain, where he attacked and defeated them, and continued pursuing and slaying them and their people from Beal-Atha-Derry-Dubhain, as far as the Hills of Brefney.

O'Reilly, that is, Thomas, the son of Mahon, died; and John, son of Philip O'Reilly, assumed the lordship.

The castle of Kilbarron¹ was demolished by Donal Mac Mortogh (O'Conor Sligo).

Bryan Mac Egan, chief Brehon of Brefney, died; and John Mac Egan, the official, successor of Bryan, was killed three nights after Christmas.

Duignan O'Duigenan,² chief historian of Conmaicne, died.

Fergal O'Hara, lord of Lieney (in Sligo), died.

county, on the borders of the Queen's county, near Portarlington.

A. D. 1390.

1. Cill Barrainne, now Killbarron, near Ballyshannon, in the county of Donegal, which castle belonged to the O'Clerys, the bards and historians of the O'Donnells, princes of Tircconnell, and the celebrated authors of the Annals of the Four Masters. This castle was situated on a wild rock, overhanging the Atlantic, and some of its ruins still remain.

2. O'Duibhgiomnaid or O'Duigenan. The O'Duigenan here mentioned as the historian of Conmaicne, was historiographer of Leitrim. Several of the O'Duigenans, learned men and historians, are mentioned in the course of these annals; many of them were abbots of Fenagh, in Leitrim, and they are also often mentioned as erenachs and superiors of the church of Kilronan, in the county of Roscommon, which was so called from being dedicated to St. Ronan. The O'Duigenans compiled a learned work on Irish history, still extant in MS., and called the Book of the O'Duigenans, or Book of Kilronan, and they also assisted in compiling the celebrated work on Irish history called the Book of Ballymote, of which an account has been given in the note on North Connaught. It appears that the O'Duigenans were chiefs in the parish of Kil-

Amongst the eminent men of Cork, are to be mentioned Edmond Burke, the Irish Cicero, one of the most illustrious orators and statesmen that have appeared in any age; he was maternally descended from the Nagles of Cork, and his father was also a native of that county. John Philpot Curran, a native of Newmarket, in the county of Cork, master of the Rolls in Ireland, an unrivalled wit, orator, and advocate, and Barry Yelverton, an eminent judge, orator, and statesman, was also a native of Cork. As the most eminent native of Kerry, and one of the greatest orators Ireland has produced, may be mentioned Daniel O'Connell, the Irish Demosthenes, a man whose fame requires no eulogium.

Accounts of numerous eminent bards and historians of Munster, and of other parts of Ireland, from the earliest ages to the eighteenth century, will be given in the course of the notes to these Annals.

A. D. 1388.

1. O'Cuirnin. The O'Cuirnins were a respectable clan in the parish of Killargy, county of Leitrim, and several of them were eminent poets and historiographers of Brefney.

A. D. 1389.

1. Cluan-da-thorc, now Clonehorke, a parish in the King's

A. D. 1391.

O'Rourke (that is, Tiarnan), proceeded with a small body of his forces to Drumlane (in Cavan), to hold a conference with John O'Reilly, but when the Clan Murtogh O'Conors received intelligence of it, they marched with a force before him to Bealach-an-Crionn; O'Rourke with his small party attacked and defeated them, and he slew with his own hand John, son of Mahon O'Conor, and Donogh, son of Hugh of the Plume, besides all those that fell by his party.

Donal Oge Mac Carthy, lord of Desmond, died, and was succeeded in the lordship by his son Teige.

O'Hanlon, chief of Oirior (in Armagh), was treacherously slain by his own kinsman.

Cu-uladh Mac Gillmore of Mourne, chief of Nereaein and Leeale (in county of Down), was slain by his own kinsman.

Teige, son of Gillcoluim O'Higgin, and Bebin, daughter of O'Maolconry (of Roscommon), a learned professor of poetry and humanity, died after repentance.

Cormac Maol O'Ferrall was treacherously slain by the English.

A. D. 1392.

Gregory O'Moghan, archbishop of Tuam, a man distinguished for his piety and charity, died.

Henry Aimreidh, son of Niall More O'Neill, the heir presumptive of Tyrone, and also a worthy heir to the throne of Ireland, by right, nobility, and hospitality, died about the festival of St. Brendan, after having gained the victory of extreme unction and repentance.

Donal, son of Henry O'Neill, was taken prisoner by Torlogh of the Wine O'Donnell, lord of Tirconnell, who committed great depredations and injuries on the son of Henry and his people, the same day.

Niall O'Neill, king of Tyrone, accompanied by the chiefs of the province, marched with a great force against the English of Traghbally and Dundalk, whom he brought under subjection on that oceasion, and Seffin White fell by him in the conflict.

O'Conor Don, accompanied by the greater portion of the chiefs of Connaught, marched with a great force into Hy Maine, and they burned and completely plundered the country; O'Conor Roe followed them, and Cathal, son of Hugh O'Rourke, having been in the rear of O'Conor Don's party, was taken prisoner by O'Conor Roe, and many of his people were slain.

The countess of Desmond, daughter of the earl of Ormond, a benevolent and hospitable woman, died after having gained the victory of repentance.

Torlogh Mac Brien of Cuanaeh (in Tipperary); Roderick, son of Donogh O'Carroll, tanist of Ely; and Fionnguala, daughter of Manus, the son of Cathal O'Conor, died.

Dermod Mac Geoghegan, chief of Kinel Fiacha, died.

Niall O'Neill, with the sons of Henry O'Neill, and all the Ultonians, marched with a great force into Tirconnell, against Torlogh O'Donnell; Donal Mac Murtogh (O'Conor) and his kinsmen, marched with another force against O'Donnell also; the people of the country fled with their cattle into the fastnesses and inaccessible parts, while O'Donnell with his army remained behind to defend the country; the Conacian forces did not halt until they reached Ceann Maghair (near Ballyshannon), and seized on the property of that place; O'Donnell came up to them with his forces at this place, defeated them, and slew many of them, amongst others the son of Donogh Mac Cabe; as to O'Neill and the sons of Henry, with their forces, they plundered the territory of O'Dogherty, both churches and country, and did not halt until they came to Fearsad More, to give battle to O'Donnell; the two armies remained there for some time confronted, but at length they concluded a peace with each other.

O'Donnell committed great depredations on the sons of John O'Donnell, because they were the persons who invited the Clan Murtogh (O'Conors of Sligo), and directed the movements of the before-mentioned forces.

ronan, barony of Boyle, county of Rosecommon, which was part of the territory of the Mac Dermotts, princes of Moylurg, and in which parish are situated near Lough Allen, the celebrated Arigna Iron and coal mines. In the cemetery of the ancient church of Kilronan, now in ruins, were interred the remains of Torlogh O'Carolan, the last and most celebrated of the Irish bards, who, in the year 1738, died at the residence of his great patron Mac Dermott Roe. The O'Duigenans were a branch of the southern Hy Nialls, of whom an account has been given in the note on Meath.

A.D. 1393.

OHN, son of Geoffrey O'Reilly, bishop of Brefney (Kilmore), died.

Matthew O'Heoghain chaplain of Iniskeen, and the priest O'Clery, died.

Hugh, son of Conor, son of Tomaltach Mac Dermott, lord of Moylurg, a man distinguished for his hospitality, died after the victory of repentance, and his son Cathal was afterwards drowned.

Mulroona, son of Fergal Mac Dermott, assumed the lordship of Moylurg by the influence and assistance of Tomaltach Mac Donogh.

The sons of Hugh Mac Dermott marched to Cluain O'Coinnen, at the port of Lough Techet (Lough O'Gara in Sligo), to make an attack upon Mac Dermott; both parties engaged in a conflict, in which the sons of Hugh were defeated, and Conor and Roderick, the sons of Hugh Mac Dermott, were taken prisoners, and Fergal, the son of Donogh Riavach, was also taken, but afterwards made his escape; Donal Duv Mac Dermott and many others were slain on that occasion.

Bryan, son of Malachy O'Kelly, tanist of Hy Maine; Fergal Mac Gauran, chief of Tullaghaw (county of Cavan), a man of unbounded hospitality to the clergy; and Manus O'Hara, tanist of Lieney, died.

A peace was concluded between the chiefs of Moylurg, concerning the division of the patrimony, and the releasing of their respective prisoners from confinement.

Raghnaill, daughter of Hugh, son of Felim O'Conor, a woman distinguished for her personal figure and humanity; Maurice Cam, son of Roderick Mac Geoghegan; and Bryan, son of William Oge Mac Geoghegan, died.

Edina, daughter of Cathal Oge O'Conor, the wife of Bryan, the son of Malachy O'Kelly; and Donal and Edmond, the sons of Malachy O'Kelly; and Dermod O'Flanagan, heir to the chieftaincy of Tura, died.

The monastery of Kil Achaidh,¹ in the diocese of Kildare, was erected by O'Conor Faily for Franciscan friars.

A.D. 1394.

Richard, king of England,¹ arrived in Ireland at Michaelmas; he landed at Waterford from whence he proceeded to Dublin.

Giolla Downaigh O'Heoghain, the official of Lough Erne, and parson and erenach of InisCaoim;² Matthew Mac Giollacoisely, vicar of Claoininis; and Luke Mac Scully, vicar of Achaidh Urchair, died.

The earl of March (Mortimer) arrived in Ireland.

Teige Mac Giolla Iosa O'Flanagan, chief of Tura (in Fermanagh), was slain by the sons of David O'Flanagan and the sons of Murtoigh O'Flanagan.

Hugh O'Dempsey was slain by the English while in pursuit of a prey.

Thomas O'Dempsey, heir to the lordship of Glenmalire (in Queen's county), was slain by the English.

John Mac Jordan, the son of Myler, lord of the town of Athleathan (in Mayo), was treacherously slain by his own kinsmen, namely, the sons of John Dexeter.

Art Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, marched with a force against the English, and burned Ros Mac Treoin³ with its houses and castles, and carried away with him gold, silver, and hostages.

The earl of Ormond marched with a force into Leinster, and burned and laid waste Gailine, the territory of O'Kelly, of Moy Druchtain, in Leix (in Queen's county), after which he returned home.

Roderick, son of Roderick O'Neill, was slain by the sons of Henry O'Neill.

Mac Murrough, that is, Art, son of Art, waged war against the king of England and his people, and many of them were slain by him; he

A.D. 1393.

1. Cill Achaidh, now Killeigh, a town in the barony of Geashill, King's county, where there are still some ruins of this abbey and churches.

A.D. 1394.

1. The King of England here mentioned was Richard II., of whose proceedings in Ireland an account will be found in a note at the year 1399.

2. Inis Caoim, now Inniskeen, in the barony of Farney, county of Monaghan, where there are some ruins of an ancient church and a round tower. The official of Lough Erne signified the vicar-general of the diocese of Clogher. Cluan Inis, now the parish of Cleenish, near Lough Erne, in the county of Fermanagh. Achaidh Urchair, now the parish of Aghalurcher, partly in Fermanagh and partly in Tyrone, where there are still some ruins of the ancient church dedicated to St. Ronan.

3. Ros-mic-Trivuin, also called Ross Glass, now Old Ross, in the county of Wexford, where there was a castle erected by Strongbow.

finally came to the king's residence (Dublin castle), at the request of the English and Irish of Leinster, where he was made prisoner, on a charge made against him by the earl of Ormond, the lord justice; he was soon after set at liberty, but O'Byrne, O'Moore, and John O'Mallain, were kept in prison after him.

Thomas Mac William Burke, having waited on the king at his residence, received great honors, and was appointed lord and governor over the English of Connaught.

Torlogh, son of Murtogh-na-Raithnighe O'Brien, of the clan of Brian Roe, waged war against the king's people in Munster and Leinster, and burned and plundered the county of Limerick.

Cameluana O'Dugan was slain by the king of England's people at Dublin.

Bryan, son of Mulroona, son of Fergal Mac Dermott, the intended lord of Moylurg, was killed by Malachy Cleireach Mac Dermott, his uncle.

Teige O'Hagan (of Tyrone), a truly learned poet, was killed by the sons of Cuchonacht O'Daly, concerning the chief professorship to O'Neill.

A. D. 1395.

The young bishop O'Moghan (probably of Tuam) died on his way to Rome.

O'Flannelly, vicar of Screen of St. Adamnan (in Sligo), died.

The official O'Tuathail, vicar of Iomdha Feichin (Immagh or Omey in Galway), a noble minded man, who kept a house of hospitality, died.

O'Neill Buidhe died and was interred at Arinagh.

Philip, son of Hugh Mac Guire, lord of Fermanagh, the supporter and defender of his territory, a man whose good fame and noble character extended over Ireland, died after the victory of repentance, and Thomas Gilladuff Mac Guire, the son of Philip, assumed the government of Fermanagh.

Donal O'Muldoon of Lurg (in Fermanagh), was treacherously taken prisoner by the sons of Art Mac Guire, at Termon Dabcog (at Lough Dearg); he was sent prisoner to O'Donnell, and died in confinement.

Conor, son of Hugh Roe Mac Guire, was taken prisoner by the Giolla Dux, that is, Thomas, and by his brother Hugh Mac Guire, but he afterwards effected his escape by the assistance of his son.

A party of the king of England's people having gone to plunder Offaley, O'Conor followed them to Tochar Cruachan (Croaghan, King's county), where he slew a great many of them, and took sixty of their horses. Another party of the English, commanded by the earl marshal, went to plunder Ely O'Carroll, and his people overtook them, slew great numbers of them, and took many of their horses.

Niall Oge, son of Niall, son of Hugh O'Neill; and Bryan O'Brien, the son of Mahon, made their submission to the king of England.

Covlaigh More, daughter of Cathal, the son of Donal O'Conor, who was the daughter of the king of Connaught, a very wealthy and affluent woman, of great hospitality, died after the victory of repentance, and was buried in the monastery of Boyle; she was called the protectress of the three enemies, having been the wife of Niall O'Donnell, lord of Tirconnell; of Hugh O'Rourke, lord of Brefney; and of Cathal, the son of Hugh Brefnach O'Conor, presumptive heir to the crown of Connaught.

Una, daughter of Teige, son of Manus O'Conor, the wife of Mac Guire, died.

John, son of Art Mac Guire, was taken prisoner by Mac Guire, who delivered him into the hands of the people of Hy Maoile of Dunlurg (in Fermanagh), who put him to death on Fionutracht of Troma Bair, as his previous acts had merited from them.

The king of England departed from Ireland in May, after a great number of the English and Irish had submitted to him; and he left Mortimer as his viceroy in Ireland; but although Mac Murrough had submitted to the king, he did not afterwards continue friendly to him.

Ardsratha and Clochar Mac Daivin¹ were burned, with all their immense riches.

Roderick O'Kelly, heir to the lordship of Hy Maine, died.

A. D. 1395.

1. Ardsratha and Clochar Mac Daimhin, that is, Ardsrath, or Ardstraw, and Clogher, both in the county of Tyrone, which were bishops' sees, and had large churches, and other ecclesiastical establishments.

Mac Jordan Dexeter (of Mayo), was taken prisoner by the sons of Mac Jordan, and was delivered into the hands of Mac William Burke. Donal Mac Murtogh (O'Connor), and the Irish of North Connaught, marched their forces into the territory of Mac William, in consequence of the taking of Mac Jordan, whom they set at liberty, and peace was made between the English and Irish of the province on that occasion.

Torlogh O'Donnell marched with a force into Tyrone against the Clan Henry O'Neill, and committed great depredations and plunders in the territory; the Clan Henry pursued them, and a battle ensued between them, in which, at length, the Tyronians were defeated with slaughter; Bryan, the son of Henry O'Neill, and thirteen of the chiefs of his party, were taken prisoners. O'Donnell marched with another force to Sligo, through Carbury of Drumcliffe, and they plundered and laid waste every part of the country through which they passed, and they carried off to their own country much booty and property; but a few of the rear of his force were wounded.

Donal, son of Henry O'Neill, made an attack upon Bryan, the son of O'Neill, whom he took prisoner, and plundered his property; Donal, the son of Henry, made another attack on the town of O'Neill, and took O'Neill and others prisoners, whom he delivered up to the English.

The English of Leinster treacherously planned to take Art Mac Murrough prisoner, but were not successful, for he made his escape despite of them, by the strength of his hand and bravery, and they were not able to subdue him.

Donal Mac Murtogh O'Connor, lord of Carbury and of Sligo, and also the entire country, north of the mountain (the Curlews), died in the castle of Sligo a week after Christmas.

Hugh, son of Cathal Oge O'Connor, son of Torlogh O'Connor's daughter, and Maurice, son of Paul Ultach (Mac Donlevey), chief physician of Tyrconnell, died.

—
A. D. 1396.

The bishop O'Hara (probably of Achonry) died.

Matthew O'Luinin, archdeacon of Ardagh, a man versed in various arts and sciences, in history, poetry, music, and general literature, died.

O'Connor Kerry was treacherously slain by his own people.

O'Kennedy, lord of Ormond, died.

Irial O'Loughlin, lord of Corcomroe (in Clare), was slain by Mac-Girr-an-adhistir, one of his own people, in revenge of his foster brother, namely, Malachy O'Loughlin, whom he had previously slain.

Conor, son of Owen O'Malley (of Mayo), went with a ship's crew to plunder in the west of Connaught, and loaded the ship with goods and valuable property in that adventure, but they were all drowned except one, between Arran Island and the coast.

O'Connor Roe and his kinsmen defeated O'Connor Don, Hugh O'Connor, Con Mac Branan, and Hugh O'Hanley, chief of Kinel Dovha, at the battle of Creaga (in Roscommon), in which Con Mac Branan, chief of Corcachlan, John O'Teige, with the son of John O'Hanley, and many others, were slain.

O'Donnell marched into Carbury, and with a portion of his forces encountered the sons of Malachy Caoch Mac Murtogh (O'Connor), who, with a great body of cavalry, were guarding and protecting the Conacians, but they were, however, defeated by O'Donnell, leaving behind them the greater portion of their horse; many men were wounded, and others effected their escape by flight; Carbury was then plundered by O'Donnell's forces, who returned home with the prey.

Malachy Caoch, son of Murtoch, the son of Donal O'Connor, died.

The English of Leinster and the Saxons were defeated by O'Toole (of Wicklow) with great slaughter, and six score heads were brought to O'Toole, and a great number of prisoners, with much property, arms, armour, and horses.

Cu-uladh Mac Gennis, heir to the lordship of Iveagh (in county of Down), was slain by the English; and O'Hanlon, lord of Orior, was treacherously slain by a party of his own people.

Mary, daughter of O'Kane, the wife of O'Dogherty, died.

Bryan, son of Henry O'Neill, was liberated from O'Donnell by O'Neill, who gave much horses, cattle, and property, for his ransom; O'Neill then delivered him to Donal, the other son of Henry, together with other presents, as a ransom for his own son.

Torlogh O'Donnell, son of Nial Garv, and Teige, son of Cathal O'Connor, marched with a force to Sligo, which they burned, both the wooden and stone buildings, and slew the son of Conor of Maonmoy, with many others, on that occasion; and it was lamentable to burn that town, for its buildings both of wood and stone were very handsome.

—
A. D. 1397.

Nial O'Neill, king of Tyrone, mustered a great force to attack Torlogh O'Donnell, and the sons of Henry O'Neill; O'Donnell and the Clan Henry O'Neill collected another force to oppose them, and both parties having approached each other, remained stationary for some time, without giving battle; at last O'Neill and his force, after resting themselves, decamped home, unperceived by the others, who as soon as they discovered it, dispatched skirmishing parties after them, who slew some of O'Neill's people, who left behind them many horses and much property, which were taken by the Tirconnellians and the sons of Henry on that occasion.

Torlogh O'Donnell, lord of Tirconnell, marched with a force into Fermanagh, and proceeded with many boats and men to the islands of Lough Erne, which he preyed and plundered, except alone the churches and sanctuaries, and having carried away an immense property, returned unopposed; O'Donnell marched with another force into Carbury (in Sligo), to expel the clan of Donal Mac Murtoigh (O'Conors), and burned the country as far as Cuan Dergratha.

Hugh Mac Mahon recovered his eye-sight through fasting, which he performed in honour of the Holy Cross of Raphoe, and of the image of the Virgin Mary at Athtruim (Trim, in Meath).

Niall More, son of Hugh O'Neill, king of Tyrone, the defender of Ireland, the champion of dignity and pre-eminence of the principality, the unyielding tower against tyranny, the scatterer of the English, the uniter of the Irish, the patron of the church and learned men of Ireland, died, after gaining the victory of extreme unction and repentance, and his son Niall Oge succeeded him in the government.

Mac Donogh of Tirerrill proceeded to the Plain of Connaught (in Rosecommon) with his whole force, property, and cattle, in order to aid O'Connor, and encamped at Currach-Chin-Eitigh where O'Connor was; but O'Connor Roe having received intelligence of this, he collected together all his friends and forces, amongst whom were Mac William Burke, Thomas, the son of Sir Edmond Albanach (Burke), the sons of Cathal Oge O'Connor, the sons of Hugh Mac Dermott, the Hy Manians, and the grandsons of Felim (O'Connor), himself, with their respective troops and galloglasses; they then proceeded to the Plain, at which period O'Connor Don was absent from Mac Donogh, who did not perceive the forces until O'Connor Roe came up and surrounded him with a great body of cavalry; a fierce and determined battle ensued, in which, however, Mac Donogh's party were defeated, and the cavalry who put them to flight, followed them up with slaughter; Mac Donogh himself was slain, and also Hugh Caoch, son of Hugh, the son of Torlogh O'Connor, with Mac Sweeney, high constable of Connaught from the mountain (the Curlews) northward; his two brothers, Donogh and Dunslevey; Cuaifne, son of Conaifne O'Connor, and Dermod Mac Donogh, tannist of Tirerrill, besides many other chiefs and nobles of their party and people. The quantity of property and riches which fell into the hands of O'Connor Roe on that occasion was incalculable, independent of horses, arms and armour, and it was on the eve of the festival of first Lady day in harvest, that battle of Cinneitigh was fought. O'Connor Don having received intelligence of this, on the third day after the battle, he proceeded to seize on the cattle of O'Connor Roe and of the sons of Felim, and their stalls, which were situated about Leitrim, and having given them a defeat, which was called the Gealmaidhm, he carried off with him an immense booty and property on that occasion.

Felim, son of Cathal Oge (O'Connor), and Dugald Mac Donnell, a galloglass, having gone to O'Donnell to ask his assistance against their enemies, O'Donnell, with the chiefs of Tirconnell, marched into Carbury to aid the sons of Cathal Oge; the people of Carbury and of Tirerrill fled into the fastnesses and retreats of the country, and O'Donnell having proceeded to the Donagh of Tirerrill, where his army burned many houses and much corn, and plundered the son of Cormac, son of Roderick ; Mulroona Mac Donogh, lord of Tirerrill, O'Dowd and O'Hara gave sureties and hostages to O'Donnell and the sons of Cathal Oge after that, on conditions that they would never oppose them ; O'Donnell concluded a peace with them on those terms, and immediately returned to Tirconnell. The sons of Cathal Oge, Muintir Duirnin, and Mac Donnell the galloglass, with their clans, then proceeded into Carbury, and halted at Lisadill, for the purpose of dividing the prey among them, about which they disputed ; O'Donnell, with a few horse, came on the following day to them to settle their disputes ; at this time Murtoch Bacach, son of Donal, the son of Murtoch O'Connor, and the Mac Sweeneys happened to be at Fassa Coilleadh, and O'Hara of the West, and the clan of Flaherty O'Rourke were with them ; they proceeded early in the morning to attack the sons of Cathal Oge and O'Donnell at Bun Brenoige, near Lisadill, and a body of horse belonging to the sons of Cathal Oge having passed towards Sligo, and having the river Bun Brenoige on one side, and the sea having flowed on the other, a circumstance very fortunate for themselves, as they could not therefore be encompassed, a battle ensued between both parties, in which O'Donnell and the sons of Cathal Oge were defeated, and Marcus Mac Donnell, his son Donald, with John Mac Sheehy, and a great number of galloglasses were slain ; the sons of Cathal were then plundered and expelled beyond the Erne (river) in sorrow and sadness, on the festival of Great Lady Day.

Dermod, son of Ivar O'Beirne (of Roscommon) being in a fever, was taken from his own house to have him conveyed to the house of Murtoch, son of Thomas, in a boat on the lake, out of which he leaped unperceived, and was drowned.

A. D. 1398.

Thomas, the son of Maurice Mac Donogh, bishop of Achonry, died.

A great conflict arose between Niall Oge O'Neill, and Torlogh O'Donnell, who, being forsaken by his chiefs and people, was put to great straits by the sons of Henry O'Neill, and the sons of John O'Donnell, with O'Dogherty and the Mac Sweeneys ; the son of O'Donnell, (Niall Garv), and the sons of Donal, son of Niall O'Donnell, went on an expedition into Fanait ; they took Mulmurry Mac Sweeney prisoner, and plundered the place ; the English and Irish of the province of Ulster submitted to O'Neill and gave him hostages, O'Donnell excepted.

Niall Oge O'Neill, king of Tyrone, and the sons of Henry O'Neill, marched a great force to Eas Roe (Ballyshannon) to attack O'Donnell, and they plundered the monastery of all its treasure, and the entire of Tir Hugh ; a party of O'Donnell's people gave them battle, and Hugh, son of Fergal O'Rourke, was taken prisoner on that expedition, and O'Neill returned to Tyrone.

Thomas Burke, lord of the English of Connaught, and O'Connor Roe, with the sons of Cathal Oge, and the sons of Mac Dermott, marched with a force into Tirerrill, which they completely plundered ; Conor Oge, son of Hugh Mac Dermott, and his kinsmen, returned from the party to ransack Moylurg ; Fergal Mac Dermott, lord of Moylurg, having gone that night to the monastery of Boyle, removed all the provisions and treasure he found there to the town called the Rock ; the sons of Mac Dermott having discovered the direction of those who were conveying the property, they pursued them ; when the other party found they were pursued, they hastened through the country until they arrived at Eachdruim Mac Naodha,¹ in Tir Briune of the Shannon ; the sons of Mac Dermott burned the church of Eachdruim, slew Conor Mac Dermott, the son of Fergal, and many of his people ; they made Mulroona Mac Dermott prisoner, and took, as booty, their horses, arms, and armour.

Murrough Bane, son of John, the son of Donal O'Ferrall, a worthy heir to the lordship of Anally, the most distinguished person of his age for hospitality, nobleness, valour, and achievements, of the race of Fergus, died after he had gained the

A. D. 1398.

1. Eachdruim Mac Naodha, now the parish of Aughrim, situated near the Shannon, between Carrick-on-Shannon and Elphin, in the county of Roscommon.

2. Leath Ratha, now Abbeylaragh, a parish in the barony of Granard, county of Longford, where a monastery was founded by St. Patrick, over which he appointed St. Guasacht, its first abbot ; it was refounded in A. D. 1205, by lord Richard Tuite, for monks of the Cistercian order, and dedicated to the Blessed Virgin.

victory of repentance, a month after Christmas, and was buried at the monastery of Leathratha,² in the tomb of his father and ancestors.

Maurice, son of Pierce D'Alton, was slain by Murtogh Oge Mac Geoghegan, and by Bryan, son of O'Conor Faily.

Glendalough³ was burned by the English.

Murtogh O'Conor having gone to Tir Hugh (in Donegal), returned to Eas Roe without obtaining much booty on that excursion; he was overtaken by Hugh O'Duinnin, who attacked and put him to flight at Ballyshannon; Hugh's horse was wounded, and he himself was dismounted, and afterwards slain.

Gerald, earl of Desmond, a man of gaiety and affability, the most distinguished of the English of Ireland, and also of many of the Irish, for his attainments, and knowledge of the Irish language, of poetry, history, and of other branches of literature which he had acquired, died after he had gained the victory of repentance.

The earl of Kildare was taken prisoner by the Calvach O'Conor, and the cavalry of the territory of Offaley, and was delivered into the hands of Murrough O'Conor.

Sir John, earl of Desmond,⁴ was drowned in the Suir, shortly after his accession to the earldom.

O'Byrne and O'Toolc fought a battle against the English, in which the earl of March, (Mortimer, earl of March), and a vast number of the English were slain.

Fionnguala, daughter of Ualgarg More O'Rourke, and wife of John More O'Hara, died.

David O'Duigenan, chief professor in history of Clan Mulroona (the Mac Dermotts, princes of Moylurg, in Roscommon), a Biatach of unbounded hospitality, and learned in the arts and sciences, died.

O'Conor Roe and Mac Dermott marched a great force to Moytuire (near Lough Arrow in Sligo), to attack the Mac Donoghs of Tirerrill, where they committed great depredations; the Mac Donoghs, and Murtogh, son of Donal O'Conor, with all their forces, overtook them, and a fierce battle ensued, in which O'Conor was defeated, and Sorley Buidhe Mac Donnell and his people were slain.

Thomas, son of Cathal, son of Murrough O'Ferrall, lord of Annaly, the chief bond of hospitality and nobleness of the Clan Rosa, was slain by the English of Meath, and the baron of Delvin (Nugent), in his own town at Coillin Crubach (in Longford), after he had been elected to the lordship over his elder kinsman, John O'Ferrall, who, however, was eventually appointed to the lordship of Annaly.

Mac Carthy of Carbery (in Cork), gave O'Sullivan a complete overthrow, and the two sons of O'Sullivan, Owen and Conor, were slain in that battle, together with many others.

O'Brien Maol died of the epidemic, while with the English.

The son of Maurice Buidhe O'Moore, lord of Slieve Mairge, (barony of Slieve Mairgue, Queen's county), an entertainer of the learned men, and of the travellers of Ireland, died.

Mac William Burke burned Sligo.

Cathal, son of Roderick Maguire, was slain by Owen, son of Niall Oge O'Neill; and Art Cuile, the son of Philip Maguire, was slain by the people of Tullaghaw (county of Cavan).

The sons of Henry O'Neill, with the sons of John O'Donnell, and the men of Fermanagh, mustered a force against O'Donnell, who collected his party to oppose them, and both parties remained encamped in view of each other, but at length separated without performing any action of note.

A. D. 1399.

O'Neill (Niall Oge) marched with a force against the English; and he plundered and expelled the greater portion of them.

Conor Mac Cormac, bishop of Raphoe, of the Hy Donnells of Corca Baiseind (in Clare), died.

Cu-uladh Roe, son of Niall More, the son of Hugh O'Neill, died of the epidemic.

Brian O'Brien, the son of Mahon, lord of Thomond, died.

3. Gleann-da-Locha, or Glendalough, in the county of Wicklow, one of the most celebrated places in Ireland for its ruins and remains of numerous churches, round towers, and other antiquities. The name of Glendalough signifies the glen or valley of the two lakes, there being two beautiful lakes situated in the valley, surrounded by majestic mountains, and abounding in sublime and beautiful scenery.

4. Earl of Desmond.—The earl of Desmond here mentioned was John, the son of Gerald Fitzgerald, who was drowned at the ford of Ardfinnan, on the river Suir.

Torlogh, son of Murrogh Na Raithnighe O'Brien, died.

Felim, son of Caheer O'Connor, tanist of Offaley, died of the epidemic in the house of O'Reilly (of Cavan).

The sons of Henry O'Neill having gone to attack the English of Traghally (Dundalk), the English collected their forces to oppose them, and defeated them, and Donal the son of Henry was taken prisoner, and a great many of his people were slain; Donal was sent to England the year following, after his release had been refused.

John O'Ferrall, lord of Annaly, a man distinguished for his virtue, ingenuity, learning, wisdom, great hospitality, and generosity, died.

Hugh O'Donoghoe, lord of the Eoganacht of Lough Lein (in Kerry); Gerald O'Byrne, the son of Teige, (of Wicklow); Torlogh, son of Mulmurry Mac Sweeny of Fanait (in Donegal); and Awlave, son of Philip, son of Awlave, the son of Duinn-charry Mac Guire, chief of Muintir Feodachain (in Fermanagh), died.

Hugh Mac Mahon died, after having lost his eyes'-sight.

Donal, son of Giolla Iosa Roe O'Reilly (of Cavan), died.

Murtogh Oge Mac Gennis, the son of Murtogh More, lord of Iveagh (in county of Down), was slain by his own people.

Henry IV. was proclaimed king of England on the 29th of September.¹

Baathghalach (Boetius) Mac Egan (of Ormond),

A. D. 1399.

1. Richard II., and Art Mac Murrogh. As explained in the course of this note, king Richard II. was deposed on the 29th of September, 1399, and succeeded by Henry, duke of Lancaster, as Henry IV. In A. D. 1394 Richard II., having resolved on the conquest of Ireland, collected an immense army, and landed at Waterford, on the second of October, with a fleet of two hundred sail; his forces consisted of four thousand cavalry, or men-at-arms, and thirty thousand archers; he was attended by the earls of Gloucester, Nottingham, Rutland, Percy, and many other distinguished noblemen. The men at arms, in the English army, were cavalry completely cased in armour; their bodies and limbs, covered with mail, formed of plates of steel; their heads defended with iron or brazen helmets; they wore on their left arms large shields of a circular or oval form, made of wood, and covered with thick leather, a rim of iron surrounding their edges, and sometimes embossed with knobs of brass, and other metals; they had long lances or spears; large, double-edged, and pointed swords; together with daggers, &c.; and their horses were also partly covered with defensive armour. The archers were mostly foot forces, but there were also troops of mounted archers, who acted as light cavalry; these archers wore thick quilted jackets, or light leathern coats of mail; and were also armed with swords and spears. The archers sometimes used the arbalest or cross-bow, but mostly the long-bow, and shot their arrows with such force as to pierce the strongest armour. The English soldiers had a great advantage over the Irish, whose arms, armour, and equipments, were very incomplete, while an English knight was so armed as to be almost invulnerable, except by the strong cast of a dart, or thrust of a spear, or the powerful blow of a battle-axe, the latter being the chief weapon of the heavy infantry forces of the Irish, who were called galloglasses; and their light troops, called herns, were armed with darts, javelins, spears, swords, slings, and sometimes arrows. The Irish chiefs, unprepared to cope with the formidable forces of king Richard, appeared inclined to make their submission, and enter into terms of peace; and for that purpose the king deputed Mowbray, earl of Nottingham, earl marshal of England, to receive their submission; and Art Mac Murrogh, king of Leinster; Murrogh O'Connor, lord of Offaley; Malachy O'Morrogh, or Murphy of Wexford; Gerald O'Byrne, of Wicklow; Daniel O'Nolan of Carlow; and Rory Oge O'Moore, of Leix, attended at the English camp, held a conference, and entered into a treaty of peace, on the plain of Ballygorry, near Carlow. King Richard proceeded to Dublin, where he remained some months, and went from thence to Drogheda; where on the 16th of March, 1395, he received, in the Dominican monastery of St. Mary Magdalen, the submission of O'Neill, king of Tyrone, of O'Donnell, O'Reilly, O'Hanlon,

Mac Mahon, and other northern chiefs. King Richard, on his return to Dublin, entertained the provincial kings, O'Neill, O'Connor, O'Brien, and Mac Murrogh, together with many of the Irish princes and chiefs, in a style of great splendour; and it is stated that he had all the crown jewels brought to Ireland, for the purpose of making as magnificent a display as possible. After many entertainments attended with great pomp and pageantry, king Richard conferred the honour of knighthood on several of the Irish kings and chiefs with great ceremony, in the cathedral of Christ church, on the 25th of March. The celebrated French chronicler, Froissart, attended in king Richard's train, and gives an account of these affairs, and states, that Henry Castide, a gentleman of the court, who had lived long amongst the Irish, and learned their language, acted as interpreter. During the visit of king Henry II. to Ireland, A. D. 1171, he, in a like manner, spent the winter in that city, and entertained the Irish princes and chiefs with great magnificence, in a temporary royal pavilion, constructed of wood and wicker work, and erected near St. Andrew's church, on Hoggin-green, now College-green. Treating of these affairs, and the dainty dishes with which king Henry regaled the Irish princes, Campion, in his chronicle says, that all the Irish kings and chiefs yielded submission to king Henry, except those of Ulster, "finally, there was no man of name in the land, except them of Ulster, but they to him bowed, and did obeysance, all of which he feasted royally, with a dinner of crane's flesh, a fowl till then, utterly abhorred by the Irish." King Richard, after remaining nine months in Ireland, most of which time he resided in Dublin, returned to England in the summer of 1395, and left his cousin, Roger Mortimer, earl of March, as viceroy of Ireland. Mortimer, after several contests with the Irish of Leinster, was defeated in a great battle fought with the O'Byrnes, O'Tooles, and other chiefs, at Kenlis, in Ossory, now Kells, in the county of Kilkenny, on the 20th of July, 1398, a great number of the English forces, together with Mortimer himself, being slain. Roger Grey was then appointed lord justice; and the same year, Thomas Holland, duke of Surrey, and earl of Kent, who was half brother of king Richard, was appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland; and arrived in Dublin on the 7th of October, A. D. 1399. King Richard, enraged at the death of his cousin Mortimer, earl of March, who was heir presumptive to the crown of England, collected an immense army, and embarked at Bristol, with a fleet of two hundred sail, to invade Ireland, and avenge his death, and landed at Waterford, on the 1st of June, according to Borlase and Marleburgh, attended by the dukes of Exeter and Gloucester, the earl of Salisbury, Henry, lord of Lancaster, afterwards king Henry V., and many other nobles and knights. His army amounted to about forty thousand men, composed of archers and cavalry, or men at arms. Having spent a week at Waterford, he proceeded a man learned in the laws and in music, and eminent for hospitality; and Giolla-na-neeve, son of Conor Mac Egan, chief professor of laws, died.

A. D. 1400.

Hugh O'Mulloy, lord of Fereall (in King's county); Laighneach, son of Fergal Roe, son of Donogh Mac Geoghegan; Donogh Fox, lord of Muintir Taagain and chief of Teffia; and Dermot and Bryan, the sons of Catharnach, the son of Fox, died.

The castle of Dun Iomdhain (Dunamon, on the river Suck, county of Roscommon), was taken by Mac Anabaidh O'Conor, and Hoberd, son of Edmond, son of Hoberd Burke, was slain in it; and to Kilkenny, where he remained fourteen days; and thence marched against the Irish, towards Wexford and Wicklow, advancing the standard of St. Edward, which, says sir John Davies, the Irish held in great veneration. Art Mac Murrough was posted at the head of the Leinster clans, with a force of three thousand men; but avoided coming to an open engagement on the plains, and entrenching his forces in the dense woods, they made frequent and sudden attacks on the English, of whom they slew great numbers, and then rapidly retreated to their woody recesses and mountain fortresses. Together with the army under king Richard himself, his cousin, the duke of Albemarle, landed at Dublin soon after, with a fleet of one hundred sail, and a powerful additional force, which joined king Richard, but they could not reduce the Irish chiefs to subjection; and in Froissart's Chronicles, it is stated, that it was almost impossible to carry on war in Ireland, in consequence of the impenetrable and extensive forests, bogs, and lakes; and the Irish soldiers, he says, were remarkably strong, and so active, that on foot they could overtake an English horseman at full speed, leap up behind the rider, and pull him off his horse. King Richard having appointed the duke of Gloucester to treat with Mac Murrough, the duke for that purpose, marched with a guard of two hundred lancers and one thousand archers, and held an interview with Mac Murrough, as hereafter described, which apparently took place on the borders of Wexford and Carlow. A Gascon knight, who accompanied king Richard's army, and was an eye witness of their engagements with the Irish, wrote an account of this expedition in French, which was translated into English by sir George Carew, earl of Totness, lord president of Munster in the reign of Elizabeth. This very curious and interesting narrative is given in Harris's Hibernica, from which are extracted the following passages: "After six days stay at Waterford, the king departed from thence, and marched to Kilkenny, where he remained fourteen days; and, upon St. John the Baptist's eve, the king departed from Kilkenny, and marched towards Mac Murrough, who styled himself king of Ireland, by right; and who professed to maintain the war, and to defend the land unto his death, saying, that the conquest thereof was wrongful. He remained in his house, the woods, guarded with three thousand stout men, such as it seemed to me, the Englishmen marvelled to behold. At the entry of the wood, the king's army was ranged into order, expecting to have been fought withall; but the Irishmen did not then appear, whereupon the king commanded the houses in the woods to be burned, which was immediately done, and many villages fired. The king's standard, wherein he had three leopards, was advanced, under which, he knighted the duke of Lancaster's son, who was a fair and puny bachelor: and to honour him the more, he made at the same time eight or ten other knights, but what their names were, I know not, neither was I very curious to understand. The king, with his army, being lodged at the entrance into the woods, as aforesaid, commanded two thousand five hundred of the country people to cut down the wood, that his way might be made passable, which was then overgrown with trees, and guarded with the enemy; and besides, so boggy, that in divers places, as the soldiers marched, they sunk up to the reins in mire, where they could not overtake the Irish in their retreat. An open pass being made, the Irish, in our passage through it, made such cries and clamours as might have been heard a good league off, but still avoiding us, for fear of our archers; yet, they assailed us often both in the van and rear, casting their darts with such might, as no habergeon, or coat of mail, were of sufficient proof to resist their force, their darts piercing them through both sides. Our foragers that strayed from their fellows, were often murdered by the Irish, for they were so nimble, and swift of foot, that, like unto stags, they run over mountains and valleys, whereby we received great annoyance and damage. Nevertheless the king's army, that was courageous and hearty, became so fearful unto them, as Mac Murrough's uncle, accompanied with divers others, bare-legged and unshod, with halters about their necks, humbly submitted themselves to the king, falling prostrate at his feet, craving mercy, whom the king freely pardoned, conditionally, that he and his companions should receive an oath, from that time forward to continue his true and loyal subjects. This being done, the king sent to Mac Murrough to submit, with a halter about his neck, as his uncle had done; and he would not only grant him the like mercy, but in these places he would bestow upon him castles, towns, and ample territories. Unto the king's messengers, Mac Murrough made no other answer, but this: 'that for all the gold in the world, he would not submit himself, but he would continue to war and endamage the king in all that he might,' which bold answer proceeded from the knowledge he had, that the king's army wanted victuals, and that for money there it could not be supplied, the present necessity whereof was such, that for the space of eleven days the soldiers had lived only upon what they could find in the country, formerly wasted, which was very little; their horses also were faint and almost starved, as well for want of food, as by standing uncovered in the rain and wind, and of this famine many of the king's army perished. A biscuit in one day between five men was thought good allowance, and some in five days together had not a bit of bread; knights, esquires, and gentlemen likewise, felt this misery, and for mine own part I wished myself without one penny in my purse at Paris. In this time three ships laden with victuals came from Dublin, and the hungry soldiers, greedy of food, waded into the sea above their reins, to come to the ships, where in disorder, not abiding by the order for disposing of the victuals, they rifled the same and spoiled them, and in the confusion many a blow was given and received amongst themselves. Hereupon the next day the king dislodged and marched towards Duhlin; the enemy attended us with fierce and fearful outcries, and skirmished often with us." At this time, Mac Murrough proposed a parley with king Richard, and the narrative thus proceeds: "This news brought much joy into the English camp, and the king, by advice of his council, sent the earl of Gloucester, attended with a guard of two hundred lances, and a thousand good archers. Among other gentlemen, I was one that went with them to see Mac Murrough, his behaviour, estate, and forces, and to what issue the treaty would grow unto. Between two woods, not far from the sea, Mac Murrough, attended by multitudes of the Irish, descended from a mountain, mounted upon a horse without a saddle, which cost him, as it was reported, four hundred cows; for in that country they bartered by exchange horses for beasts, and one commodity for another, and not for ready money. His horse was fair, and in his descent from the hill to us he ran as swift as any stag, hare, or the swiftest beast that I have seen. In his right hand he bore a great long dart, which he cast from him with much dexterity. At a wood side his men staid behind him, and he met the earl at a little ford. He was tall of stature, well composed, strong and active, and his countenance fierce and severe. Much speech passed between the earl and him, but the parley produced little effect. Mac Murrough departed to his men, and the earl of Gloucester to king Richard, to whom he recounted all the passages between them. The king at this report was much the son of Edmond O'Kelly, confined there, was liberated.

Gregory, son of Tanaidhe O'Maolconry, a man experienced in his professional calling, the worthy intended chief professor of Siol Murray (Roscommon), was accidentally killed by the cast of a dart from the hand of William Garv, at the Tochar (or pass) of Dunamon, in a mistake, and one hundred and twenty-six cows were given as an eraic (or fine) for his death.

Roderick, son of Art Mac Gennis, lord of Iveagh in Ulidia, was slain by the sons of Cu-uladh O'Neill, and by Cahwar Mac Gennis, his own brother.

Niall Oge O'Neill marched with a great force into Tirconnell, where he destroyed much of the crops and corn; the Tirconnellians came to oppose him, and a battle ensued, in which the Tyronians were defeated, and many of them slain; and many horses were taken from them on that occasion.

Giollapatrack, the son of Manus Mac Guire, who was called the Giolla Buidhe, died in his own house from the effects of blood-letting.

John, son of Philip, son of Giollaisa Roe O'Reilly, lord of Brefney, the most hospitable and noble man of his name, died of a sudden fit in his bed at Tully Mongan.

The king of England's son¹ arrived in Ireland.

enraged, swearing by St. Edward that he would never depart out of Ireland until he had Mac Murrough in his hands, living or dead. Immediately upon the earl's return of the answer aforesaid, the king dislodged, and marched the next way to the city of Dublin, which is a good town, the best in that realm, seated upon the sea and rich in merchandise, where we found such plenty of victuals to relieve our army, horse and foot, consisting of thirty thousand or thereabouts, that the prices of the same did not much increase. The king could not forget Mac Murrough, to prosecute him, and divided his army into three parts, commanding them to hunt him in his woods, and promised to give him that could take him, alive or dead, an hundred marks in gold; but in my opinion it was impossible to be effected while the leaves were upon the trees; but after that time, when the trees were bare, then to burn the woods would be the best means to do service upon him, and not otherwise. At this time the earl of Rutland, duke of Aumarle and high constable of England, with an hundred sails of ships of war, arrived at Dublin, who was more beloved of the king than any of his blood, and by his advice he was most directed. Of his coming the king was exceeding glad, and joy appeared in his face when he saw him, accusing him of his long absence, which the duke humbly excused to the king's contentment. During the space of six weeks we remained in Dublin, where we lived in joy and delight; but in all that time, by reason of foul weather and contrary winds, we never heard out of England, which undoubtedly, in my opinion, was a presage that God was displeased with the king."

As stated in the above passages, king Richard, after remaining six weeks in Dublin, having heard of the duke of Lancaster's rebellion, proceeded to Waterford, and set sail for England to oppose his enemies; but Lancaster's party having succeeded, Richard was forced to resign the crown, and after his deposition was imprisoned in Pomfret castle, where he soon after died, being, it is said, starved to death.

Art Mac Murrough, so celebrated in these transactions, was also called O'Cavanagh, as the Mac Murroughs took that name; he was descended from the ancient kings of Leinster, and was himself elected king of that province by the chiefs and clans, and chosen as their leader, while only in the sixteenth year of his age. He was a man of fine person, tall stature, great strength and activity, and most undaunted valour; for a period of more than thirty years he waged incessant war on the English, and defeated their forces with great slaughter in more than fifty battles, in various parts of Leinster, and compelled them to pay him tribute for permitting them to reside in that province. In personal combats he killed many of their stoutest knights, often cleaving the skull of a mailed warrior, through his iron helmet, by a single blow of his battle-axe. During his time as leader of the Leinster clans, the O'Cavanaghs, the O'Nolans, O'Ryan's, and O'Murphy's of Wexford and Carlow, the O'Byrnes and O'Tooles of Wicklow, the Fitzpatricks of Ossory, the O'Conors of Offaley, the O'Moores and O'Dempseys of Leix and Kildare, he gained many victories, as already mentioned, over the English forces. It is stated in Marleburgh's Chronicle that, in the reign of king Henry V., in May, 1419, while John Talbot, lord Furnival, was lord deputy, Mac Murrough, chief captain of his nation, and of all the Irish of Leinster, was taken prisoner; and in Moore's Ireland it is mentioned that he was sent to the tower of London; but these writers have mistaken Donogh Mac Murrough, the son of Art, for Art himself, as in the Four Masters, at the year 1419, it is stated that Donogh Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, the son of Art Cavanagh, was taken prisoner by lord Furnival, "which was a lamentable loss to the Irish." The English attempted to assassinate Art Mac Murrough, as mentioned in these Annals at the year 1395; and in Taaffe's Ireland the following account is given of that affair: "He was invited to a banquet by the English lords, all of whom came secretly armed; and Mac Murrough arrived, accompanied only by his bard and one attendant. After the feast the minstrel, placed at a window, delighted the company with his music, but suddenly changed his notes to the Rosg Catha, or war song, for which he was reprimanded by Mac Murrough, and ordered to play only festive airs; but the bard again resumed his war ode, which surprised Mac Murrough, who becoming indignant at the disobedience of his harper, arose from the table to remonstrate with him, but perceived that the house was surrounded with armed forces; brandishing his sword he struck terror into the company, none of whom dared to attack a warrior of such gigantic vigour. Mac Murrough cut his way through the armed forces, mounted his steed, and, in spite of all their efforts, escaped with safety." Taaffe quotes from one of the ancient annalists the following account of the death of Mac Murrough: "In this year died Art Mac Murrough O'Cavanagh, one of the greatest heroes the world ever saw; had I the tongues of men and angels I would never be able to relate his merits, the mighty defender of his injured kindred—the valiant avenger of tyranny and oppression—the sure refuge of the weak and distressed—the patron of literature and of science—the glory of chivalry is gone—poor Erin weep; when alas! shall his equal return?" In these Annals the death of Mac Murrough is placed in the year 1417, in the sixtieth year of his age, and the forty-second of his government over Leinster, and an elegant eulogium passed on his memory.

A. D. 1400.

1. The king of England's son was Thomas, duke of Lancaster, son of king Henry IV., who, then in the 20th year of his age, was appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland for ten years; he landed at Dalkey with a strong force on the 13th of November, 1401, but returned to England A. D. 1403, leaving sir Stephen Scroope as his deputy in Ireland. In 1404, James Butler, earl of Ormond, was appointed lord justice; and in 1405, Gerald Fitzgerald, earl of Kildare, succeeded as lord deputy; in 1406, sir Stephen Scroope was a second time appointed lord deputy; and in 1407, James Manus, son of Cuchonacht O'Reilly, the intended lord of Muintir Maolmordha (Cavan), died.

Conor, son of Donal, son of Niall Garv, son of Hugh, son of Donal Oge O'Donnell, went on a predatory excursion across the mountain eastward in Tirconnell, and he and Owen Roe Mac Sweeney fell by each other's hands.

The sons of Flaherty O'Rourke being expelled from Brefney, went into Tirconnell, from whence they brought with them a party of the Tireconnellians into Brefney, where they committed great plunder on O'Rourke, which they carried off into Tirconnell.

A. D. 1401.

Malachy O'Kelly, lord of Hy Maine, a man of great hospitality and humanity, and Thomas, son of sir Edmond Burke, that is Edmond Albanach, the son of William, lord of the English of Connaught, died, after having gained the victory of repentance; two Mac Williams¹ were appointed after Butler the younger, earl of Ormond, was lord justice. In 1408, on the second of August, Thomas, Duke of Lancaster, came again to Ireland as lord lieutenant, and landed with a large force at Carlingford. In the same year, according to Taaffe and others, a great battle was fought on the plains of Kilmainham, near Dublin, by the Irish under Art Mac Murrough O'Cavenach, against the English forces commanded by the duke of Lancaster, in which the English were defeated with great slaughter, particularly at a ford on the Liffey, which was so heaped with dead bodies, that the river was reddened with the blood of the slain, and hence designated Ath-cro, or the bloody ford; and the bridge erected there afterwards was known by the name of Bloody Bridge, in modern times Barrack Bridge. In this battle the duke of Lancaster was severely wounded, and narrowly escaped with his life; he soon after retired to England, leaving Thomas Butler, prior of Kilmainham, son of the duke of Ormond, as lord deputy.

A. D. 1401.

1. The two Mac Williams here mentioned were styled Mac William Eighter and Mac William Oughter, two great branches of the Burkes of Connaught, the one ancestors of the Burkes, earls of Clanrickard, the other of the Burkes, earls of Mayo, of whom accounts have been given in the notes on North and South Connaught.

Ormond and Desies. In this article will be given the history and topography of the territories comprised in the present counties of Tipperary and Waterford, together with their chiefs and clans, and the possessions of each in ancient and modern times, collected from the topographies of O'Heerin, O'Brien, and O'Halloran, O'Flaherty's Ogygia, Keating, Ware, Giraldus Cambrensis, Camden, O'Connor's Rerum Hih. Scrip., Lanigan's Ecclesiastical History, the Annals of the Four Masters and of Inisfallen, Lodge's and other Peerages, Mac Geoghagan's Ireland, Smith's History of Waterford, the Map of Ortelius, Surveys, and various other works.

Ormond, in Irish Oir Mumhan, Oir Mumha, or Urmhumha, signifying East Munster, was one of the large divisions of ancient Munster, as explained in the note on Thomond, and the Kingdom of Munster, at A. D. 1364. Ancient Ormond extended from Gahhran, now Gowran, in the county of Kilkenny, and westward to Cnamhchoill, or Cleathechoill, near the town of Tipperary, and from Bearman Eile, now Barnanally, a parish in the county of Tipperary, in which is situated the Devil's Bit Mountain, and from thence southward to Oiléan-úí-Bhríe, or O'Brie's Island, near Bonmahon, on the coast of Waterford, thus comprising the greater part of Tipperary, with parts of the counties of Kilkenny and Waterford. The name of Ormond is still retained in the two baronies of Ormond, in Tipperary.

Desies, in Irish Deise, was an ancient territory comprising the greater part of Waterford, with a part of Tipperary, and got its name from the tribe of the Deisigh, called also Desii. These Desii, or Desians, were descended from Fiacha Suidhe, a son of Feilimídh Reachtnar, who was monarch of Ireland in the second century. This Fiacha Suidhe was brother of the celebrated Con of the Hundred Battles, monarch of Ireland; hence the Desians, his descendants, were a branch of the Heremonians; they possessed in Meath a large territory, called from them Deise, or Deise Teamracl, that is, Deise of Tara, being situated near Tara, and the name of this ancient territory is still retained in the two baronies of Deese, in the county of Meath. In the reign of Cormac, monarch of Ireland in the third century, Aongus, prince of Deise in Meath, grandson of Fiacha Suidhe, resenting the exclusion of his own branch from the monarchy, waged a rebellion against king Cormac, and with a body of forces broke into the palace of Tara, wounded Cormac, and killed his son Ceallaigh, A. D. 278; but Cormac, having quelled the rebellion in seven successive battles, drove Aongus and his accomplices into Munster, where they got settlements from Oilíoll Olum, king of Munster, who granted them the lands extending from the river Suir southward to the sea, and from Lismore to Cean Criadain, or Creadan Head, thus comprising almost the whole of the territory afterwards called Waterford, and they gave to that country the name of Deise, or Nandesi, which was called Deisi in Munster, to distinguish it from Deise in Meath. The Desians becoming numerous and powerful in Munster, Aongus, king of Munster in the fifth century, conferred on them additional lands, and annexed to their territory Magh Feimin, which extended north of the river Suir, as far as Corea Eathracl, comprising the country called Machaire Caisil, or the Plain of Cashel, and districts about Clonmel, forming the present barony of Middlethird, with part of Offa, in Tipperary. The territory comprised in this grant of king Aongus was distinguished by the name of Deise Tuaisceart, or North Desie, and the old territory, in Waterford, was called Deise Deisceart, or South Desie. The name of Desie is still retained in the two baronies of Deesies, in the county of Waterford. The two principal families of the Desians were the O'Felans, styled princes of Desies, and the O'Bries, chiefs in Desies.

The Menapians. According to the Greek geographer Ptolemy, in his Map of Ancient Ireland, in the second century, as given by Ware, the Menapii were the inhabitants of the territories now forming the counties of Waterford and Wexford, chiefly located along the sea coasts. These Menapians were a colony from Belgic Gaul, or Northern Germany, according to Camden, which coincides with the accounts of our ancient annalists; for these Menapians from Belgium were the same as the Firbolg, i.e. Viri Belgici, or Belgian men of our old writers, who state that Inver Slaine, or the Bay of Slaney, from which the river Slaney in Wexford derives its name, was the chief landing place of the first Firbolgs who arrived in Ireland. Caesar, in his commentaries, speaks of the Menapians of Belgic Gaul as a very valiant people, whose manner of making war on the Romans was, by retiring with their valuable property, cattle, &c. into woods, morasses, and inaccessible places, and thence making sudden assaults upon the Romans, a mode of warfare precisely similar to that adopted by the Irish clans against the English. Caesar, in order to subdue them, employed his army in cutting down the woods, and wasting their villages; and the same plans were put into practice by king Richard II. in Ireland, as detailed in a note in these Annals at the year 1399. On Ptolemy's Map the city Menapia is considered to be that afterwards called Wexford, but others suppose it to have been Waterford.

The Coriondi, of whom an account has been given in the note on Desmond, as some of the ancient inhabitants of Cork, are placed on Ptolemy's Map also in the territory afterwards called Tipperary; and according to Ptolemy's Map, by Ware, the Udai, or Ouodiai, also inhabited part of Tipperary, and appear to be the same as the Clanna Deagha, or Ua Deghaidh of the Irish writers, called Degadii by Charles O'Connor; and these Degadians were celebrated ancient tribes in Munster, who originally emigrated from Ulster, and of whom an account has been given in the notes on Thomond and Desmond.

Thomas Burke, namely, Ulic, son of Ricard Oge, was made Mac William, and Walter, son of Thomas Burke was made another Mac William, but yielded submission to Mac William of Clanricard, in seniority.

In the early ages, as already explained in the notes on Thomond and Desmond, the Heberians and Ithians alternately ruled as kings of Munster. In the third century the Heberians, or race of Heber, were divided into three great branches, namely, the Eugenians, Dalcassians, and Clan Kian, and kings of the Eugénian and Dalcassian race alternately ruled over Munster, from the third to the eleventh century. The Dalcassians were kings of Thomond, or the counties of Clare, Limerick, and part of Tipperary, and the head family of them were the O'Briens, kings of Desmond. The Eugenians were kings of Desmond, or the counties of Cork and Kerry, with parts of Tipperary and Waterford, and the head family of them were the Mac Carthys, kings of Desmond. The other branch of the Heberians, called Clan Kian, were chiefly located in Ormond, and an account of them will be given in the subsequent part of the present article. In the third century Fiachá Muillethan, a celebrated king of Munster, had his residence at Rath Naoi, near Cashel, now called Knock-Raffan, and this Fiachá granted to Cairbre Musc, son of the king of Meath, a famous bard, as a reward for his poems, an extensive territory, called from him Muscirth Tíre, comprising the two present baronies of Ormond, in the county of Tipperary. The kings of Desmond, of the Eugénian race, were also styled kings of Cashel, as they chiefly resided there. The name of Cashel, in Irish, Caisiol, or Caiscal, signifies a stone fortress or castle; or, according to others, a rock; or, as stated in Cormac's Glossary, is derived from Cios rent, and ail, a rock, signifying the rock of tribute, as the people paid tribute there to the kings. The fortress of the kings was situated on the great rock of Cashel, and Core, king of Munster, of the Eugénian race, in the fourth century, was the first who made Cashel a royal residence; and the surrounding country was called Corea Eathrach, a territory which was first possessed by the descendants of Amergin, one of the sons of Milesius, and extended from Tipraid-Farann, near the abbey of Holy Cross, to Dunandreas, and northward to Knockraffan; it was also called Machaire Chaisil or the plain of Cashel, and also Eoganacht Cashel. This Core, before he became king of Munster, resided some time in Albany or North Britain, where he married Mongfinna, daughter of Feredach, king of the Piets, and the princes descended from this marriage were, as stated in O'Flaherty's Ogygia (vol. II. p. 304), progenitors of the great Stewarts or earls of Lennox and Marr in Scotland. Nathfrach, son of Core, by Abinda, daughter of Aongus, prince of Corea Luighe, became king of Munster, and his son, Aongus, was the first Christian king of Munster.

St. Patrick, according to Lanigan and other authorities, proceeded on his mission to Munster, A.D. 445, and spent seven years in his conversion of the people of that province to the Christian faith. He converted Aongus, king of Munster, at Cashel, and a remarkable circumstance is mentioned as having occurred at the baptismal ceremony, the king's foot having been accidentally pierced by the iron point of St. Patrick's staff or crozier, on which he inadvertently leant, but the king patiently bore the pain, considering it a part of the ceremony. According to Usher, O'Flaherty, and others, the Christian faith was propagated to some extent in Munster by SS. Ailbe, Declan, and Ibar, as precursors of St. Patrick, but Lanigan doubts these accounts, and states that those saints, though contemporary with Saint Patrick, had not probably preached the Gospel there before his time. St. Ailbe, of Emly, is celebrated as the patron saint of Munster; Declan of Ardmore, and Ibar of Wexford, were also celebrated saints at the same time, in the fifth century, and these, together with Carthach of Lismore, Finbarr of Cork, and Brendan of Kerry, are the celebrated patron saints of Munster.

Donal O'Malley, lord of Umalia (in Mayo), died at an advanced age.

Cathal Roe Mac Rannall, chief of Muintir Eoiluis, was slain at Druim Chubra, by Geoffrey, son of Malachy Mac Rannall.

Danish Wars.—In the beginning of the ninth century, the Scandinavians or Danes, Swedes and Norwegians, invaded Ireland, and during the whole of the ninth and tenth centuries, made several expeditions hither, with powerful fleets and forces, and ravaged and laid waste the entire country, repeatedly plundering and burning abbeys, churches, colleges, cities, and towns, with all the violence of Pagan fury. The celebrated Danish king and warrior Regnar Lodbrog, who had overrun a great part of England, also invaded Ireland with a powerful force, in the beginning of the ninth century, and fought many great battles with the Irish kings, as narrated in the Danish chronicles of Snorro Sturleson, Saxo Grammaticus, and Torfeus, in Johnstone's Celto-Scandinavian and Celto-Norman Antiquities, and in Turner's Anglo-Saxons. It is said that Regnar remained a year at Dublin, and amongst the Irish kings he had conquered, are mentioned Melbriac and Marstein, and three kings of Leinster. Amongst the battles fought by Regnar with the Irish kings, is mentioned one at Vedra Fiord or Waterford, and in the Epicidium, or Death-song of Regnar Lodbrog, translated by Johnstone from the Danish, occurs the following passage respecting this great battle:—

“In heaps promiscuous were piled the enemy,
Glad was the kindred of the Falcon,
From the clamorous shouts they boded an approaching feast,
Marstein, Erin's king, whelmed by the iron sleet,
Allayed the hunger of the Wolf and Eagle,
And the slain at Vedra's Ford
Became the raven's booty.”

Among the Scandinavians the wolf and raven were sacred to their great Deity Odin; hence they are here mentioned by the Danish poet, and the figure of a raven was also the chief ensign borne on the Danish standards in battle.

A.D. 812, the Danes landed a powerful force in West Munster, but were defeated by Art, son of Cathal, king of Munster, near Lough Lein, or the Lakes of Killarney. Felim, son of Crimthann, of the Eugénian race, a celebrated warrior, was about this period king of Cashel, and defeated the Danish forces in a great battle, and pursued them to their ships with great slaughter. Felim, having resigned the crown, became a monk and died, A.D. 846. Olchobhar, bishop of Emly, of the Eugénian race, succeeded Felim as king of Cashel, and assisted by Loran, king of Leinster, they collected their forces, and A.D. 848, fought a great battle with the Danes, according to the Annals of Inisfallen, at Sgiath Neachtain, in Desies, in which the foreigners were defeated, and twelve hundred of them slain, together with the princes Tomar and Eric, their chief commanders; and in two other battles, the same year, seventeen hundred of the Danish forces were slain by the Irish, under Olchobar. It has been stated by some writers that Olchobar himself was killed in one of those battles, but that account is erroneous, for he did not die till A.D. 850, as mentioned by Lanigan, and in Ware's Bishops of Emly. A.D. 831, the Danes and Norwegians landed a powerful force at Waterford, and proceeding to Lismore, plundered and burned its celebrated college, together with the churches and city. A.D. 833, Cork and Lismore were plundered and burned by the Danes. A.D. 842, Cork, Ferns, and Clonfert were plundered and burned, and their bishops slain by the Danes; and the abbey of Mulruana, son of Cathal Roe Mac Rannall, was slain by the sons of the same Malachy, while they were in pursuit of prey.

Tir-da-glas, in Tipperary, was also destroyed by the Danes. A.D. 845, the Danes, under Targesius, ravaged and plundered Euly, Lorrha, and Tir-da-glas, in Tipperary. A.D. 848, the Eingedans of Cashel defeated the Danes in a battle at Dun Maoltuille, in which five hundred of the foreigners were slain.

A.D. 853, Aulaf, a Norwegian prince, together with his brothers, Sitric and Ivar, landed in Ireland with a great force; Aulaf took possession of Dublin, Ivar of Limerick, and Sitric of Waterford, and having enlarged and fortified those cities, they settled in them colonies of Danes and Norwegians; and it appears the Irish kings partly gave them permission to do so on paying them some tribute, and for the purpose of carrying on commerce. The Danes afterwards also got possession of Cork, and those Danish colonies continued under their own kings, as the chief rulers of the cities of Dublin, Waterford, Wexford, Limerick, and Cork, for a period of more than two hundred years, and even down to the Anglo-Norman invasion in the twelfth century. A.D. 859, Maolguuala, son of Dougaile, king of Desmond, was killed with stones by the Danes. During the ninth and tenth centuries, according to the Annals of Inisfallen and others, the Danes are mentioned as having frequently landed their forces with powerful fleets at Loch-da-chaach in Desies, now the bay of Waterford. A.D. 872, Ceanfaoladh, bishop of Emly, of the Eugeniai race, who had succeeded Olchobar as king of Cashel, died. Cormac, son of Cuillionain, generally called Cormac Mac Cuillionain, became bishop of Cashel, and king of Munster; he was of the Eugeniai race, and, according to the Annals of Inisfallen, was born A.D. 837, and became king of Munster, A.D. 901. A.D. 906, Flann Sionna, monarch of Ireland, and Carroll, king of Leinster, having marched an army into Munster, laid waste the country as far as Limerick; but in A.D. 907, Cormac Mac Cuillionain, having collected the Munster forces, and joined by Lorean, king of Thomond, marched into Leinster and defeated the army of the monarch Flann Sionna, in a great battle on the heath of Moylena (a place in the barony of Fercall, King's county), and forced Flann to give him hostages. A.D. 908, the monarch Flann, aided by the kings of Meath, Ulster, Connaught, and Leinster, collected a powerful army for the invasion of Munster, marched into Leinster, but Cormac Mac Cuillionain, having collected the forces of Munster and Ossory, both armies met and fought a tremendous battle at Beallach Mughna, in which the Munster army was defeated; and according to the Annals of Inisfallen, six thousand of them, together with Cormac Mac Cuillionain himself, and many princes and chiefs, were slain. The battle of Beallach Mughna was fought on Tuesday, the 16th of August, A.D. 908, and the place is now known as Ballymoon, near Old Leighlin, in the county of Carlow; it was also called the battle of Magh Ailbe or Moyalbe, signifying the White Plain. King Cormac's body being found amongst the slain, was, according to some accounts, buried at Cashel, but Keating says, at the abbey of Castledermott, in Kildare. Cormac Mac Cuillionain was one of the most eminent of the Irish ecclesiastics, and is highly extolled by all our old annalists for his learning, wisdom, piety, munificence, and other virtues; and famous as the author of the celebrated Psalter of Cashel, of which an account is given in the present article. King Cormac by his will bequeathed forty ounces of gold, and the same of silver to various churches, with a great number of gold and silver chalices, silken vestments, ornamented mass-books, and many other valuable articles, and directed his Psalter to be preserved at Cashel, for the information of future ages. A few years after the death of Cormac, Flaherty, bishop of Inis Catha in Limerick, became king of Cashel; and it is a remarkable circumstance that, as mentioned above, Olchobar and Ceanfaoladh were at the same time bishops of Emly and kings of Cashel, or Munster; and Cormac Mac Cuillionain was also both bishop of Cashel and king of Munster; but similar instances are found in the history of other nations, as amongst the Jews their temporal princes were often Conor Anabaidh O'Kelly assumed the lordship of Hy Maine, after his father.

The Rock of Lough Key (in Rosecommon), was also high priests, as in the great family of the Maccabees, Judas Maccabeus and his brothers were at the same time high priests and military leaders of the Jewish people. A.D. 914 the Danes landed a large force at Waterford, but were defeated with great slaughter by the prince of Idrone; and in the years 913 and 915 it is mentioned that the Danes plundered and burned Lismore. A.D. 916, the Danes of Waterford marched into Meath, and plundered the entire country; and in the same year, according to the Annals of Ulster, Reginald, son of Ivar, came with his ships to Waterford. A.D. 941, according to the Annals of Inisfallen, the Danes were defeated in Desies and at Ferns, by Ceallachan, king of Cashel, and the men of Munster, and two thousand of the foreigners were slain. In the same year the celebrated Murchheartach Mac Neill, prince of Oileach, in Ulster, having some contests with Ceallachan, king of Cashel, marched his forces to Munster, and took Ceallachan prisoner, whom he delivered into the hands of Donogh Mac Floinn, king of Tara. Accounts of various great victories gained over the Danes by Ceallachan, king of Cashel, Brian Born, and his brother Mahon, in the latter end of the tenth century, have been given in the notes on Thomond and Desmond. The Battle of Roscrea.—A great annual fair was in ancient times held in Roscrea, in Tipperary, which commenced on the festival of St. Peter and Paul, and continued fourteen days, attended by merchants from all parts of Ireland, and even from foreign countries. The Danes of Limerick, whose chief at that time was Tomar, together with those of Waterford, and also the Danes of Connaught, formed the project of attacking and plundering the people at this fair, and of seizing the immense quantities of merchandise and treasure collected there. Olfu, chief of the Danes of Connaught, was their principal leader, and marched his men as secretly as possible in detached parties through Galway towards the Shannon, and embarking in their boats, crossed the river in great numbers. On their landing in Ormond, an alarm was communicated throughout the entire country by lighting fires; and the Irish having collected their forces, and joined by great numbers of the people at the fair, armed themselves expeditiously, and assailing the enemy on every side, with determined bravery, the Danes were totally defeated, and four thousand of them, together with their general, Olfu, were slain.

In the Irish Annals are mentioned many Danish kings of Waterford. A.D. 893, Patrick, son of Ivar, king of the Danes of Waterford, was slain. A.D. 1000, Ivar, king of the Danes of Waterford, died; and A.D. 1003, Reginald, son of Ivar, succeeded as king, and built the fortress called Reginald's Tower, still standing under the name of Ring Tower. A.D. 1023, Sitric, king of the Danes of Waterford, was killed by the people of Ossory. A.D. 1036, Reginald, son of Ivar, king of the Danes of Waterford, was killed at Dublin, by Sitric, king of the Danes of Dublin; and A.D. 1038, Commanus, son of Raban, king of the Danes in Waterford, was killed, and the city of Waterford was burned by Dermot Mac Maol-na-imbo, king of Leinster. A.D. 1038, the Danes of Dublin marched to Waterford, which they plundered and burned; and A.D. 1089, the Danes of Dublin, Waterford, and Wicklow, with their combined forces, marched to attack Cork, but were defeated by the Irish with great slaughter. The Danes, having been converted to Christianity, Waterford was erected into a bishop's see, A.D. 1096, and Malchus, a Dane, who was a Benedictine monk, was appointed its first bishop. A.D. 1136 Melisa O'Hannaire, the Danish bishop of Waterford, died; and Tostius, another Dane, succeeded him.

The Anglo-Norman Invasion.—Waterford is celebrated as the chief landing place of the Anglo-Norman invaders, under Strongbow and his followers, invited over as allies by Dermot Mac Murrough, king of Leinster; and this city is also remarkable as the chief place where several kings of England landed on their expeditions to Ireland. A.D. 1169, in the month of May, Robert Fitzstephen, Maurice Fitzgerald, David Barry, Hervey de Monte Marisco, Myler Fitzhenry, Maurice Prendergast, and other chiefs from Wales, being the first of the Anglo-Normans who invaded taken by the sons of Fergal Mac Dermott, and many persons were slain and drowned about it,

Ireland, landed at the bay of Bannow, or Bag-an-bun, in the county of Wexford, near the bay of Waterford, with a force of about five hundred men, knights and archers, according to Hammer, and were joined by five hundred of the picked troops of their Irish ally, Dermot Mac Murrough. Their combined forces marched towards Wexford, but the Danish and Irish inhabitants of that town bravely resisted them in various conflicts for the space of three days, but being overcome they surrendered the town to Mac Murrough, who soon afterwards collecting a powerful army of three thousand men, marched, together with his English allies, into Ossory and other parts of Leinster, and ravaged the country, of which expedition an account may be found in Hammer's Chronicle, and in Harris's Hibernica, written by Maurice Regan, who was secretary to Mac Murrough. A. D. 1170, on the 1st of May, Raymond le Gros, and other Anglo-Norman chiefs, landed near the rock of Dundonell, or Dundonalf, or according to others, Dundoragh or Dundrone, in the county of Wexford, about four miles from Waterford, near the river Suir, with a force of about one hundred and thirty knights and archers; and being joined by other Anglo-Normans from Wexford, under Hervey de Monte Marisco, they proceeded to attack Waterford. The Dances of that city, joined by the Irish, sallied out to attack them, but were defeated chiefly by a stratagem of the English, who collected together a great number of cows, and having driven them onward with great shouts, and piercing them with their weapons, the affrighted and wounded cattle ran furiously against the approaching troops from Waterford, who were defeated with great loss, and amongst the slain was O'Ryan, prince of Idroine. Seventy of the principal citizens of Waterford having been made prisoners in the pursuit, their limbs were first broken by the English, and they were then cast headlong from the rocks into the sea. In this year, on the eve of St. Bartholomew, the 23rd of August, Richard de Clare, earl of Pembroke, commonly called Strongbow, landed near Waterford, with a force of about fifteen hundred men, knights, archers, and men-at-arms, and being joined by the troops of Raymond le Gros, they on the next day attacked Waterford, then governed by two Danish princes, Reginald and Smorth, who defended the city with their Danish forces, aided by the Irish, under Malachy O'Felan, prince of Desies; the English were twice repulsed, but at length took the city on the 25th of August. Amongst the prisoners were Reginald and Malachy O'Felan, whom they condemned to death, but O'Felan's life was saved through the interference of Dermot Mac Murrough, who on that day had come from Ferns with his daughter Eva, whom, according to his previous agreement, he gave in marriage to Strongbow, and in a day or two after the ceremony was performed at Waterford, and king Dermot conferred on his son-in-law the title of heir presumptive to the kingdom of Leinster.

A. D. 1171, king Henry II., embarking at Milford Haven, landed at Crook, now Crook, near Waterford, on St. Luke's day, the 18th of October, with a fleet, according to Littleton and others, of four hundred sail, but other accounts say two hundred and forty ships; he had a force consisting of four thousand cavalry or men-at-arms, and five hundred knights, and was attended by Strongbow, William Fitz Adelm, Hugh de Lacy, Humphrey de Bolun, and other lords and barons. The day after king Henry's arrival, Dermot Mac Carthy, king of Desmond, waited on him at Waterford, delivered him the keys of the city of Cork and did him homage. Henry, at the head of his army, marched to Lismore, where he remained two days and thence proceeded to Cashel, near which, on the banks, of the Suir, Donal O'Brien, king of Thomond, came to meet him, and delivering to him the keys of the city of Limerick, did him homage, as Dermot Mac Carthy had done. Mac Gillpatrick, prince of Ossory, O'Felan, prince of Desies, and other chiefs, submitted soon after. From Cashel, Henry returned through Tipperary to Waterford, and shortly after proceeded to Dublin, where he remained during the winter, and entertained the Irish kings and princes who had submitted to him in a style of great magnificence. In February, 1172, Henry returned to Waterford, and held, it is said, a council or parliament at Lismore, and also convened a synod of bishops and clergy at Cashel, of which an account may be found in Lanigan's Ecclesiastical History. King Henry, after remaining in Ireland about six months, embarked at Wexford on Easter Monday, the 17th of April, 1172, set sail for England, and arrived the same day at Port Fynnain in Wales. A. D. 1174, Raymond le Gros landed at Waterford, with a large force from Wales, to relieve Strongbow, then besieged by the Irish in that city, and succeeded in rescuing him.

and the guards who were in care of it surrendered on receiving a bribe.

The Battle of Thurles.—A. D. 1174, the English forces, joined by some Danish allies from Dublin, and commanded by earl Strongbow, Henry de Monte Marisco, and others, marched into Tipperary and laid waste the country; but according to the Four Masters, and other authorities, Donal O'Brien, king of Thomond, at the head of the Dalcassians, aided by battalions of Connaught, under king Roderick O'Connor, marched to oppose them, and in a great battle fought at Thurles, totally defeated the English forces, of whom seventeen hundred were slain, and the few who survived fled in dismay with the earl to Waterford. After intelligence of the victory at Thurles reached the Irish at Waterford, they attacked the English garrison in that city and slew two hundred of them, according to the Annals of Inisfallen. A. D. 1175, the English forces, commanded by Raymond le Gros, joined by some Irish allies, under Mac Gillpatrick, prince of Ossory, fought a great battle in a defile near Cashel, with the troops of Donal O'Brien, king of Thomond, in which, after great slaughter on both sides, the Irish were at length defeated. In the same year, according to Lanigan, king Henry sent Nicholas, abbot of Malmshury, and William Fitz Adelm to Ireland, with the Bull of Pope Adrian IV., and the Brief of Pope Alexander III., and a meeting of bishops was convened at Waterford, where these documents were publicly read, being the first time they were published in Ireland, and conferring on king Henry the kingdom of Ireland.

A. D. 1183, on the 1st of April, prince John, earl of Morton, son of king Henry II., landed at Waterford with a fleet of sixty ships, and a large force of archers and cavalry, of whom four hundred were knights; he was accompanied by Ralph Glanville, chief justice of England, and by Giraldus Cambrensis, his secretary and tutor. Several Irish chiefs waited on him at Waterford to do him homage, but the Norman nobles treated them with great insolence and derision, pulling their bushy beards and long hair or glibs. These insults and indignities were highly resented by the chiefs, who indignantly departed and roused their countrymen to make war on the English, of whom great numbers were slain in various engagements. Prince John had castles erected at Lismore, Ardinnan, Tibrad, and other places in Tipperary and Waterford; and as stated in the Four Masters, having proceeded to plunder Munster, his forces were defeated with great slaughter by the Irish, under Donal O'Brien, and according to other accounts, almost his entire army was cut off in various conflicts, in consequence of which he was recalled from Ireland by his father. A. D. 1190, the English forces, under William Marshall, earl of Pembroke, were defeated with great loss near Thurles, by the Dalcassians, under Donal O'Brien, king of Thomond; and again in 1192, the English having marched into Tipperary, and into Thomond as far as Killaloe, were defeated with great slaughter by the Irish, under Donal O'Brien. A. D. 1210, on the 8th of June, king John landed at Waterford, with a large fleet and powerful force, and soon after proceeded to Dublin, and from thence through various parts of Meath and Ulster. An account of his progress in Ireland has been given in a note in these Annals, at the year 1209. After remaining nearly three months, he embarked for England in the latter end of August.

Waterford is also celebrated as the place of landing and embarkation of other kings of England, and an account of the two expeditions of king Richard II. to Ireland, in the years 1394 and 1399, is given in a note to the present number at the year 1399. In A. D. 1689, on the second of September, king William III. embarked at Waterford for England, and being again in Ireland, A. D. 1690, at the siege of Limerick, he came to Waterford, Felim, son of Cathal Oge O'Connor, was taken prisoner by the son of O'Connor Don.

A conference was held between Niall Oge O'Neill and Torlogh O'Donnell, at Caoluisge (near Ballyshannon), on which occasion they made peace with each other.

and embarked for England on the 5th of September. In 1690, king James II., after the battle of the Boyne, on the 2nd of July, arrived at Waterford, from whence he set sail to France.

Amongst the ancient notices of Waterford, it may be mentioned, that A. D. 1497, in consequence of the loyalty of the citizens of Waterford, against the mock princes and pretenders to the crown of England, namely, Lambert Simnel, and Perkin Warbeck, king Henry VII., granted, with other honours to the city, the motto Intacta manet Waterfordia, hence it is designated Urbs intacta; and in 1536, king Henry VIII., sent by sir William Wyse to the citizens of Waterford a gilt sword, to be always borne before the mayors, in remembrance of their renowned fidelity.

Irish Chiefs and Clans of Ormond and Desies.—The following accounts of the chiefs and clans of Ormond and Desies, and the territories possessed by each in ancient and modern times, have been collected from the various works quoted at the commencement of this article. In Desies the following were the chiefs and clans: I. O'Folain, or O'Felan. The O'Felans were styled princes of Desies, and their descent from the Desians of Meath, a branch of the Heremonians, has been already given in the preceding part of this article. Many of the O'Felans, princes of Desies, are mentioned in the Four Masters and Annals of Innisfallen, from the eleventh to the thirteenth century. Malachy O'Felan was prince of Desies at the period of the Anglo-Norman invasion, and soon after they lost their possessions and rank in the county of Waterford, and their territory was transferred to the Le Poers, and other Anglo-Norman settlers, but there are still several very respectable families of the O'Felans, or Phelans, some of whom have changed the name to Whelan, in the counties of Waterford, Tipperary, Kilkeeny and Queen's county. The O'Felans, as princes of Desies, held an extensive territory, comprising the greater part of the present county of Waterford, with part of Tipperary, as explained in the account of Desies at the beginning of this article. II. O'Bric was the other head chief of Desies, and of the same descent as O'Felan. The O'Brics were styled chiefs or lords of South Desies, an extensive territory in the southern part of Waterford, but in early times were expelled from that county by the Eugonians of Desmond. The territory of the O'Brics was also called Iath O'Neachach, as mentioned by O'Brien at the word Iath. The O'Felans and O'Brics are thus designated by O'Heerin:

"Two mild chiefs whom I do not conceal,
Rule over the Desies, which I affirm,
O'Bric who enforced all tributes,
And also the wise and fair O'Felan

"In Moylacha of the fertile slopes
Rules O'Felan for the benefit of the tribe,
Great is the territory allotted for them,
Of which O'Felan took possession.

"Hly Neachach which is delightful,
In the south of woody Inis Fail,
O'Bric's selection along the waves,
From Leac Logha to Liathdram."

III. The O'Briens, a branch of the O'Briens of Thomond, had extensive possessions along the Cummerragh mountains, comprising the valleys between Dungarvan and the river Suir, as stated in O'Brien's Dictionary at the word Cumaraic, and are also placed on the Map of Ortelius. IV. The O'Crotty's, a branch of the O'Briens, princes of Thomond, as stated in O'Brien's Dictionary at the word Crotach, possessed the country about Lismore, and there are still many respectable families of the name in the county of Waterford. V. The Magraths were old and respectable families in the county of Waterford. There are several respectable ancient Irish families of the O'Sheas, O'Ronaynes, O'Helys, O'Callaghans, O'Coghlan's, O'Mearas, &c. in the county of Waterford.

In Ormond, or the county of Tipperary, the following have been the chiefs and clans of note. O'Heerin thus describes Cashel in commencing his topography of that territory:

"Our visit to Cashel of the kings,
And the race of Core who practised no evil deeds,
The history of their tribes we shall unfold,
Together with their sages and people.

"Let us henceforth record each hero,
About Cashel's plain of protecting ramparts;
A country of fruitful woods, the chief fortress;
We are well acquainted with their history.

"Let us give the lead to the chief territory,
To Cashel of the smooth level plain,
Corca Athrach it was known by name,
And boldly over districts marched its batallions.

"There the lord of the land resides,
At Cashel of the brown-nut plains,
In comfort and joy he holds his swyn,
A protector to the country of Cashel."

I. O'Donchadha, or O'Donoghoe, chief of Eoganaeht of Cashel, and some of them styled kings of Cashel, one of whom is mentioned in the annals of the Four Masters at the year 1038, as king presumptive of Cashel. These O'Donoghoes were of the Eugonians race, and of the same descent as the Mac Carthys, kings of Desmond, and are thus designated by O'Heerin:

"Eoganaeht of Cashel, it is the plain of Kian, O'Donoghoe is its lineal inheritor,
Its name in other times was Feimin,
Extending to the border of the brown-nut plain."

The ancient kings of Cashel or Munster, of the Eugonians race, were inaugurated on the Rock of Cashel, and those of the Dalcassian race, or O'Briens, kings of Thomond, had their place of inauguration at Magh Adhair, situated in the townland of Toonagh, parish of Cloney, barony of Upper Tulla, in the county of Clare. II. O'Cearhail, or O'Carroll, prince of Ely, who was the head of the Clan Kian race, as the Mac Carthys were of the Eugonians, and the O'Briens of the Dalcassians. The territory of Ely, in Irish Eile, got its name from Eile, one of its kings in the fifth century, and from being possessed by the O'Carrolls, was called Ely O'Carroll. It comprised the present barony of Lower Ormond, in the county of Tipperary, with the barony of Clenlisk and part of Ballybrit, in the King's county, extending to Slieve Bloom Mountains, on the borders of the Queen's county. The part of Ely in the King's county belonged to the ancient province of Munster. The O'Carrolls are thus designated by O'Heerin, who states that they ruled over eight subordinate chiefs:

"Lords to whom great men submit
Are the O'Carrolls of the plain of Birr;
Princes of Ely as far as the lofty Slieve Bloom,
The most hospitable land in Erin.

"Eight districts and eight chiefs are ruled
By the prince of Ely of the land of herds;
Valiant in enforcing their tributes
Are the troops of the yellow-ringed hair."

The O'Carrolls had their chief castle at Birr, now Parsonstown, in the King's county, and many valiant chiefs of them are mentioned in the course of these Annals. As princes and lords of Ely, they were very powerful from the twelfth to the sixteenth century, and many of them are mentioned in Lodge's Peerage, as connected by marriage alliances with the greatest families in Munster, as the O'Briens, earls of Thomond, the Fitzgeralds, earls of Desmond, and the Batlers, earls of Ormond. Some of these O'Carrolls were

Shortly after a contest arose between O'Donnell and Bryan, son of Henry O'Neill, for Bryan led a distinguished officers in the service of Spain, and in modern times there are many very respectable families of the name in Tipperary and the King's county. III. O'Ceinneide, O'Cineide, or O'Kennedy. The O'Kennedys are given by O'Heerin as chiefs of Gleann Omra, and several of them are mentioned in the Four Masters as lords of Ormond. They were of the Daleassian race, and possessed the barony of Upper Ormond, in the county of Tipperary, and, as lords of Ormond, were very powerful chiefs, and held their rank from the twelfth to the sixteenth century. The O'Kennedys are thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"O'Kennedy, who reddens his spears,
Rules over the smooth, extensive Glen Omra,
By his tribe is possessed the brown plains gained by valour;
He obtained the land without opposition."

IV. O'Toirdhealbhaidh, or, as it is written in the Books of Leacan and Ballymote, O'Urthaille, anglicised to O'Hurley. The O'Hurleys are of the Daleassian race, and are stated in O'Flaherty's Ogygia to be of the tribe of Hy Bloid, who possessed the territory called Triocha Hy Bloid, which comprised a great part of the baronies of Lower Ormond and Owny, in Tipperary; this tribe was also designated Clan Tail, a term which was applied to the Daleassians. The O'Hurleys are thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"The territory of Hy Bloid of the silken standards,
The chiefs of conflicts, the leaders of the battle hosts,
The tribe of Clan Tail as far as the limpid streams,
Along the extensive plain of the yews."

"O'Hurley of the tribe of Tail,
Near to Killaloe of St. Flannan;
Delightful are its woods and productive its plains,
From thence westward to the Shannon."

A branch of the O'Hurleys also settled in Limerick, in the barony of Ownybeg, where they are placed on the Map of Ortelius, and they also had the parish of Knocklong, in the barony of Coshlea, county of Limerick, where the ruins of their chief castle still remain. Other branches of the O'Hurleys were settled in Galway, and had large possessions in the baronies of Kilconnell, Killian, and Ballymore, of which family were sir William and sir John Hurley, baronets. Of the O'Hurleys of Limerick was Dermot O'Hurley, a celebrated archbishop of Cashel, in the reign of Elizabeth. There are several respectable families of the name in the counties of Tipperary, Limerick, and Kerry. V. O'Eichtigearn, chief of Hy Cearnaidh, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:—

"Over Hy Cearny of the valiant forces
Rules O'Eichtigearn of the land of tribes,
A joyful country is that of the upright man,
As far as the hospitable port of the Shannon."

VI. O'Seanchain or O'Shanahan, by some rendered to Shannon, by others erroneously anglicised Fox, from Sionach, which in Irish signifies a fox, thus confounding them with the Sionach or Fox, lord of Teffia, in Westmeath. The O'Shanahans of Munster were descended from Lorcan, king of Munster, and grandfather of Brian Boru; hence they are a branch of the Daleassians. They were in ancient times powerful chiefs, and in the great battle of Moin Mor, in Desmond, fought A. D. 1151, and of which an account has been given in the note on Thomond, it is stated in the Four Masters, that amongst others, seven chiefs of the O'Shanahans were slain in that battle. The O'Shanahans were chiefs of a territory called Feadha Hy Rongaille, or the Woods of Hy Rongaille, comprising the country about Eibhline, and as Slieve Eibhline is stated in the old writers to be near Cashel, this territory appears to have been situated either in the barony of Middlethird, or of Eliogarty. The O'Shanahans are thus mentioned by O'Heerin:—

force into Tirconnell, and attacked the fortress of O'Donnell, and slew the son of Niall Oge, son of "The forest of Hy Rongally of the level plain

Is possessed by the hospitable O'Shanahan,
The entire country about Evlinne
Is like the smooth plain of Maonmoy."

The O'Shanahans, in modern times, possessed the lands of Rathmoyne, between Cashel and Templemore, and there are still several respectable families of the name in the counties of Tipperary, Limerick, and Waterford. One of the chief representatives of this ancient family is E. N. Shannon, Esq., a literary gentleman, residing near Dublin. VII. O'Duibhraic, chief of Tuath Congaile or Dun Braine, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:—

"The Clan Duibhraic of Dun Braine,
Chiefs of the country of Hy Congaile,
Their fortresses are about the beauteous Boruma,
A tribe remarkable for their golden tresses."

VIII. O'Duibhibhir, O'Duibhir, or O'Dwyer, is given by O'Heerin as chief of Hy Aimbrith, or Aimrit, and thus designated:—

"Hy Aimrit, the land of hospitality,
Is inherited by the tribe of O'Dwyer;
Above all others they obtained the country,
They are the chiefs support at each battle ford."

The O'Dwyers were a branch of the Heremonians of Leinster, and chiefs of note in ancient times; they possessed an extensive territory in the present baronies of Kilnamanagh, county of Tipperary, and there are still several respectable families of the name in that county. Some of the O'Dwyers were commanders in the Irish brigade in the service of France. General O'Dwyer is mentioned by Mac Geoghegan as governor of Belgrade, and there was an admiral O'Dwyer in the Russian service. IX. O'Deagla or O'Dea, and O'Hoillolla, are given by O'Heerin as chiefs of Sliabh Ardach, now the barony of Slieveardagh, in Tipperary, and thus mentioned in the topographical poem:—

"Slieve Ardagh of the fair lands
O'Dea inherits as his estate,
A host of the tribe from the head of the plain,
And also O'Hoilloll from Binn Bracain."

X. O'Carthaidh or O'Carthy, chief of Muiscriadh Iarthar Feinnii, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:—

"The portion of O'Carthy by right
Is Musery-Iarthar-Feinnii,
Rath-na-mBrandubh is now its name,
A designation generally known."

This territory, according to O'Halloran, was situated near Emly, in Tipperary. XI. O'Mearaidhe, or O'Meara, chief of Hy Fathaidh, Hy Niall, and Hy Eochaidh Finn. According to O'Brien, at the word Fiarach, the O'Mearas were chiefs of Hy Fiarach, called also Tuaim-UI-Mheara, in Tipperary. The O'Mearas had an extensive territory in the barony of Upper Ormond, county of Tipperary, and the name of their chief residence Tuaim-UI-Meara, is still retained in the town of Toomavara, in that district. They are thus designated by O'Heerin:—

"O'Meara, who is a goodly prince,
The chief of Hy Fahy, obtained extensive lands,
And the Hy Nialls of the race of Eogan the Fair,
All the lions whom I enumerate."

There are still several respectable families of the O'Mearas in Tipperary and Queen's county. XII. O'Meachair or O'Meagher, by some rendered Maher, chief of Crioch-UI-Cairin, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:—

"Powerfully they have peopled the country,
The O'Meaghers of the land of Hy Kerrin,
A tribe who inhabited Bearnan Eile,
It is not improper to extol their fame."

Niall Garv, son of Hugh, son of Donal Oge, and Malachy, the son of Flaherty O'Rourke, with many others. O'Donnell with his sons, and the Muintir Duirnin, pursued Bryan on the same day, and

The O'Meaghers were in ancient times powerful chiefs, and had the territory now forming the barony of Ikerrin, in the county of Tipperary, and the place mentioned in the above verses as Bearnan Eile is now called the Devil's Bit Mountain, in the parish of Barnanely. There are very respectable families of the O'Meaghers in the counties of Tipperary, Kilkenny, and Carlow. XIII. O'Flanagan or O'Flanagans, chiefs of Uachtar Tire, and of Kinel Arga, are thus mentioned by O'Heerin :—

"O'Flanagan obtained the country
Of Uachtar Tire, a rich and fertile land,
Which always yields the choicest produce,
The plain is clad with a matchless verdant mantle.

"O'Flanagan of the mighty hand
Is chief of the entire of Kinel Arga,
He is of the race of Teige, the son of Kian the Sage,
Of the noble hospitable stock of Oilioll."

It appears from O'Brien, at the word Flanagan, that there were two chiefs of these O'Flanagans, one of Kinel Arga, a district in Ely O'Carroll, in the King's county, and the other of Uachtar Tire, or the upper country, in the barony of Iffa and Offa, on the borders of Tipperary and Waterford. XIV. O'Breislein or O'Breslen, chief of Ily Athaidh Eile, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin :—

"Hy Athy of Ely, as far as the shore,
It was obtained by the force of battle,
A fierce chief and brave in conflict
Is O'Breslen of the well-proportioned limbs."

This territory appears to have been a part of Ely O'Carroll, situated near the Shannon, and these O'Breslens were probably a branch of the O'Breslens of Donegal, who were Brehons to the O'Donnells, princes of Tirconnell, and to the Mac Guires, princes of Fermanagh. XV. O'Cein, probably O'Kean, chief of Ily Fodhladh, a district supposed to be on the borders of Tipperary and Waterford, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin :—

"Hy Fodhladh it is our duty to record,
We treat of its blooming forest,
O'Kean from Machuin Meadhaidh,
His fame shall spread over tribes."

XVI. O'Donnagain, or O'Donnegan, is given by O'Heerin as high prince of Aradh, and thus designated :—

"The high prince of Ara, who rules over the tribes,
Is O'Donnegan of the hospitable countenance,
The country has yielded plenty of produce,
To the prince of Ara in great abundance."

The O'Donnegans were of the race of the Clanna Deaga or Eannans of Ulster, and according to the Annals of Inisfallen, and O'Brien at the word Muiserith, were princes of Muiserith Tire, now Lower Ormond, in Tipperary; and, according to O'Halloran, had Aradh Cliach, in Tipperary, now the barony of Owney and Arra, as mentioned in the foregoing verse. XVII. O'Donnagaidh, probably O'Donnelly or O'Dongally; and O'Fuirig, probably O'Furrey, are also given by O'Heerin as chiefs of Muiserith Tire, and thus designated :—

"Over Musery Tire of hospitality,
Rule two of the most noble chiefs,
O'Dongally and also O'Fuirig,
They are of Ormond of the smooth fertile plain."

XVIII. O'Sulleabhain, or O'Sullivan, is given by O'Heerin as chief of Eoganacht Mor of Cnoc Raffan, and thus designated :—

"O'Sullivan, who delighted not in violence,
Ruled over the great Eoganacht of Munster;
About Knockraffan he obtained his lands,
After the victory of conflicts and battles."

These O'Sullivans were a branch of the O'Sullivans, princes of Beara, in the county of Cork, of whom an account has been given in the note on Desmond, and the territory they possessed in Tipperary, called the Eoganacht of Knock Graffan, was situated in the barony of Middlethird, between Cashel and Cahir, and its name is still retained in the parish of Knockgraffan, where the O'Sullivans had their principal seat, and in which is an ancient mound or moat, near the river Suir, which was in early times a residence of the kings of Munster; and Fiacha Muilleathan, a celebrated king of Munster in the third century, had his chief fortress at that place. XIX. O'Fogarta, or O'Fogarty, is given by O'Heerin as chief of Ele Deisceart or south Ely, and thus designated :—

"South Ely of established tributes,
Its clans are of the race of Eochy Baldearg,
A country of affluence abounding in hazel woods,
It is the land which O'Fogarty obtained."

The O'Fogartys were chiefs of Eile-ui-Fhogartaigh, now the barony of Eliogarty, in Tipperary, and had their chief seats about Thurles; it was called South Ely, to distinguish it from North Ely, or Ely O'Carroll. There are several respectable families of the O'Fogartys in the county of Tipperary. XX. O'Cuillein, O'Cullen, or Collins, chief of Eoganacht Aradh; O'Caillidhe or O'Keely, chief of Aolmuighe, are thus mentioned by O'Heerin :

"O'Cullen who maintained good fame
Over the hospitable Eoganacht of Ara;
Over the land of the fair Aolmoey,
Rules the powerful and hospitable O'Keely."

The districts of these chiefs appear to have been in the barony of Owney and Arra, in Tipperary. XXI. O'Duinechair, a name anglicised to O'Dinnahane and O'Dinan, is given by O'Heerin as chief of Eoganacht Uaithne Ageamar, and thus designated :—

"Owney Agamar, green are its hills,
The Eoganacht of the land of Cathbaidh;
Delightful are the borders of the extensive plain,
The hereditary right of the clan of Dinnahane."

This territory, according to O'Brien at the word Uaithne, comprised part of the counties of Tipperary and Limerick, now the baronies of Owney and Owneybeg. XXII. The O'Ryan, or O'Mulrians of Tipperary, according to O'Brien and O'Halloran, afterwards possessed Owney in Tipperary, and Owneybeg in Limerick, and are placed there on the Map of Ortelius. These O'Ryan were a clan of note, a branch of the O'Ryan, princes of Ily Drone, in Carlow, and there are several very respectable families of the name in the counties of Tipperary, Carlow, and Kilkenny. XXIII. O'Meargha or O'Meargain, chief of Eoganacht Rus Airgid, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin :

"To O'Meargain belongs the land as a portion,
The fair Eoganacht of Ross Argid,
A lord in peace and a vulture in war,
Resides near the great Carn Mughaine."

XXIV. Mac Ceoch or Mac Keogh, chief of Uaithne Tire, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin :

"Over Owney Tire of rich produce,
Rules Mac Keogh as his chosen place,
The O'Loingsys, men of lands,
Dwell in that wood opposite the foreigners."

This territory was situated in ancient Owney, which comprised the present baronies of Owney and Arra in Tipperary, and Owneybeg in Limerick. The O'Loingsys, or O'Lynches, a tribe mentioned in the foregoing verse, as dwelling here opposite the foreigners, which means that they were in the neighbourhood of the Danes, who posovertook him while carrying away the property of Henry O'Gormley, whom he had slain; a fierce sessed Limerick. XXV. O'Ifnern, or O'Heffernain, and O'Cathlain, probably O'Callan, were chiefs of Uaithne Cliach, and are thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"Owney Cliach of the fair bright sun
Is an estate to the O'Heffernans,
A clear plain by the side of each hill,
Mildly O'Callan enjoyed the land."

This territory was situated in the barony of Owney and Arra, county of Tipperary, and these O'Heffernans were a branch of the O'Heffernans of Clare, of whom an account has been given in the note on Thomond. XXVI. Mac Longachain, probably Loug, or Longan, chief of Crota Cliach, and of Hy Cuanach, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"A territory was obtained about Crota Cliach,
By Mac Longahan the grey-haired chief;
He is lord there of the hosting plain,
Hy Coonagh of the fair fertile lands."

This territory was situated partly in the barony of Owney and Arra, in Tipperary, and partly in the barony of Coonagh, county of Limerick. The O'Dwyers, of whom an account has been given in this article as chiefs of Kilnahanagh, in Tipperary, were also located on the same territory as O'Longachan, and are mentioned in the poem as follows:—

"Of the same tribe who possessed this land
Are the O'Dwyers of the fair teeth,
The plain of the seventh division and fine fortress
Is justly possessed by the free tribe."

XXVII. The O'Lonargans are given by O'Brien at the word Lonargan, as the ancient chiefs and proprietors of Cahir, and the adjoining districts in Tipperary, till the fourteenth century, when they were dispossessed by the Butlers, earls of Ormond. The O'Lonargans were in ancient times a powerful clan, and three of them are mentioned in Ware, in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, as archbishops of Cashel. XXVIII. The Mac-I-Briens, a branch of the O'Briens of Thomond, descended from Brian Roe O'Brien, king of Thomond, had large possessions in the barony of Owney and Arra, in Tipperary, and in the barony of Coonagh, county of Limerick. They were styled Mac-I-Briens, lords of Ara and Coonagh, and several of them are mentioned in the course of these Annals. XXIX. Mac Corcraín, or Mac Corcoran, chief of Clan Ruainne, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"Clan Rooney of the flowery avenues,
A delightful fair land of small streams;
Mac Corcoran from the populous country,
From the borders inhabited by fair-haired heroes."

XXX. O'Haodhagain or O'Hogan, chief of Crioich Cein, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"O'Hogan of Crioich Kian rules over
Clan Ionmaine of the fair country,
A district which fertilized each land
With honey-dew on all its blossoms."

The O'Hogans are placed on the Map of Ortelius about Lower Ormond, in Tipperary. XXXI. Mac Giollaphoil, or Mac Gillfoyle, chief of Clan Condlegain, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"A chief for whom the nut-trees produce fair fruit
Rules over Clan Quinlevan of immense wealth;
The scion of Biorra of the warlike tribe
Is Mac Gilfoyle of the fair fortress."

The Mac Gillfoyles appear to have been located on the borders of Tipperary and King's county, and the O'Quinlevans, some of whom have changed the name to Quinlan, are numerous in Tippeengagement ensued between O'Donnell and Bryan O'Neill, in which Bryan and many others were rary and Limerick. XXXII. O'Banain or O'Bannan, chief of Hy Dechi, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"Hy Dechi, the fine district of hills,
The extensive land of fair fortresses,
A fruitful country which they inherit,
Is the estate of the tribe of O'Bannan."

Hy Dechi, the territory of the O'Bannans, appears to have been situated in the north of Tipperary, and there are still many respectable families of the name. XXXIII. O'Ailche, chief of Tuatha Faralt, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"Tuatha Faralt of the clear woods,
That is the territory of O'Ailche;
A plain of fair fortresses and a numerous tribe,
Like the lands of the shallow rivers of Tailtean."

XXXIV. O'Cathail or O'Calil, chief of Corca Tine, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"Corca Tiny the blooming is profitable,
About Drumsaleach of blue streams,
O'Calil above all others obtained
An inheritance at Achaidh Iubhair."

The district of the O'Calils appears to have been situated on the borders of Tipperary and Kilkenny, and the name is still numerous in Kilkenny and Carlow. XXXV. The O'Dineartaighs and O'Aimriths are mentioned as clans by O'Heerin, and appear to have been located on the borders of Tipperary and Kilkenny. XXXVI. O'Spealain, or O'Spillan, chief of Hy Luighdeach, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"The chief of Hy Luighdeach of ancient swords
Is O'Spillan of the bright spurs;
Mighty is the march of the warrior's battalions,
Increasing as they proceed along the plains of Macha."

The territory of the O'Spillans appears to have been situated on the borders of Tipperary and Kilkenny. XXXVII. The Mac Egans, in the barony of Arra, were hereditary Brehons of Ormond; and the O'Cullenans, or Mac Cullenans, were hereditary physicians, and many of them very learned men in Ormond. XXXVIII. The O'Scullys, O'Hanraghans, O'Lanigans, and Magraths, were also clans of note in Tipperary; and the O'Honeens, who anglicised the name to Green, were numerous in Tipperary and Clare.

Ormond and Desies were formed into the counties of Tipperary and Waterford, A. D. 1210, in the reign of king John. Waterford was called by the ancient Irish Cuan-na-Grioth, signifying the harbour of the sun, and afterwards Gleann-na-nGleodh, or the valley of lamentation, from a great battle fought there between the Irish and Danes, in the tenth century; it was also called Port Lairge, signifying the Port of the Thigh, from the river Suir and harbour resembling that part of the human body. By the Danes it was called Vader-Fiord, or Vedra-Fiord, as mentioned in the preceding part of this article, in the poem quoted on the death of the Danish king, Regnar Lodbrog. In this poem, which will be found in full in Blair's Dissertation, prefixed to Ossian's poems by Macpherson, and translated into Latin by the Danish historian, Olaus Wormius, Waterford is called Vedra Sinus; the word Fiord, in the Danish, signifies a ford or haven, and Vader, as given in Wolff's Danish Dictionary, means to ford or wade a river, therefore Vader Fiord may signify the fordable part of the haven; or perhaps according to Ryland, in his History of Waterford, it got its name from Vader, a Scandinavian deity, to whom the ford or haven was made sacred; or according to others, the haven was dedicated to Odin, the chief deity of the Scandinavians, whom they called Vader, signifying Father. Tipperary is, in Irish, Tiobradarainn, signifying, according to O'Brien, the well of Arain, and so called from the adjoining territory of Arainn. Tipperary is one of the largest and finest counties in Ireland, with extensive plains, and valleys of unbounded slain, and his party defeated, leaving behind them the plundered property of Kinel Maoin; O'Donnell returned home with immense booty, after a triumphant victory.

fertility. The Galtees, Slievenaman, the Keeper, Devil's Bit, and other magnificent mountains, and the expansion of the mighty Shannon, called Lough Dearg, extending on one side for a distance of more than twenty miles, like a great inland sea, in some places five or six miles broad, present varied scenery of great grandeur and beauty; and the scenery along the river Suir is also extremely beautiful. In Tipperary are valuable coal and iron mines, and extensive slate quarries. In Waterford the Cummeraghs and other mountains, and the course of the rivers Suir, Bride, and Blackwater, with the junction of the Suir, Nore, and Barrow, present much interesting and beautiful scenery; and this county contains, at Bonmahon and other places, very valuable mines of copper, iron, lead, and also of silver ore. Affane, in Waterford, is famous for cherries, first planted there by Sir Walter Raleigh, who brought them from the Canary Islands. In both counties are extensive ruins and remains of castles, abbeys, and other interesting antiquities too numerous to be here mentioned.

Anglo-Norman and English families in Tipperary and Waterford.—A. D. 1177, king Henry II. gave a grant of Desies, or the entire county of Waterford, together with the city, to Robert le Poer, who was his marshal. The le Poers were, at various periods from the thirteenth to the seventeenth century, created barons of Donisile and of Curraghmore, viscounts of Decies, and earls of Tyrone. The le Poers became very numerous in the county of Waterford, and many of them changed the name to Power, and they possessed the greater part of the baronies of Decies and Uppertthird, and their territory was called Power's country, and there are many highly respectable families of the name in the counties of Waterford and Kilkenny. The Fitzgeralds, earls of Desmond, of whom an account has been given in the note on Desmond, had extensive possessions and numerous castles in the county of Waterford, in the baronies of Coshmore and Coshbride, and had also the title of barons of Decies. In the reign of Henry VI., A. D. 1447, the celebrated warrior, sir John Talbot, earl of Shrewsbury, lord lieutenant of Ireland, got grants in Waterford, together with the castle and land, of Dungarvan, and the title of earl of Waterford, and viscount of Dungarvan. The family of Villiers, earls of Jersey, in England, got, in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, large possessions in Waterford, by intermarriage with the Fitzgeralds of Dromana, a branch of the earls of Desmond, and were created earls of Grandison. The chief families of English descent settled in Waterford were the following:—The Aylwards, Anthonyons, Allans, Aleocks, Butlers, Browns, Barkers, Boltions, Birds, Barrons, Burkes, Baggs, Boats, Boyds, Creaghs, Carrs, Corrs, Comerfords, Crokers, Cooks, Christmases, D'Altons, Dobbys, Disneys, Drews, Ducketts, Everards, Fitzgeralds, Greens, Gambles, Goughs, Grants, Hales, Jacksons, Kings, Keys, Lomhards, Leas, Leonards, Mandevilles, Morgans, Morrisies, (Madans, and Mulgans, probably the Irish names of O'Madden and O'Mulligan), Newports, Nugents, Oshornes, Odells, Powers, Prendergasts, Rocheforts, Roehes, Rices, Sherlocks, Strongs, Tobins, Ushers, Walls, Walshes, Waddings, Wysses, Woodlocks, Whites, &c. The early English families principally possessed the territory called from them Gal-tir, signifying the country of the foreigners, now the barony of Gaultiere. The Walshes, called by the Irish Brannaghs, or Breathnaels, signifying Britons or Welshmen, as they originally came from Wales, are still very numerous, and many respectable families of them in the counties of Waterford and Kilkenny.

King Henry II., or according to others, Henry III., gave a grant of Ormond to Otho de Grandison, an Anglo-Norman lord, but the family of Butler became the chief possessors of Tipperary. The ancestor of the Butlers came from Normandy to England, with William the Conqueror, and got extensive possessions in Norfolk, Suffolk, and Lancaster. Their original name was Fitz-Walter, from Walter, one of their ancestors, and Theobald Fitz-Walter came to Ireland with king Henry II., and got large grants of lands, and had the office of chief Butler of Ireland conferred on him, the duty attached to which was, to attend at the coronation of the kings of England, and present them with the first cup of wine; from the office of the Butlership of Ireland they took the name of Butler. The Butlers became very numerous and powerful in Ireland, and acquired very extensive possessions in Tipperary, Kilkenny, Waterford, Wicklow, Carlow, Queen's county, Dublin, Kildare, Meath, Linerick, and Galway. In the reign of Edward III. Tipperary was formed into the County Palatine of Ormond, under the Butlers. The Butlers thus becoming so powerful, different branches of them furnished many of the most distinguished families in Ireland, and a great number of them, from the thirteenth to the eighteenth century, held the offices of lords justices, lords deputies, and lords lieutenant of Ireland, and different branches of them furnished numerous noble families, being created at various periods earls, marquesses, and dukes of Ormond, earls of Ossory, earls of Carriek, earls of Kilkenny, earls of Gowran, earls of Glengall, and earls of Arran; viscounts of Clonmore, of Ikerrin, of Thurles, of Mountgarrett, and of Galmoy; and barons of Cahir, of Cloughgrennan, of Tullyophelim, of Arklow, of Aughrim, of Kells, and of Dunboyne.

Nobility.—The following have been the noble families in Tipperary and Waterford from the reign of King John to the present time: In Waterford, the Le Poers, barons of Donisile and of Curraghmore, viscounts of Decies, and earls of Tyrone. The Beresfords, by intermarriage with the Le Poers, became earls of Tyrone, marquesses of Waterford, and barons of Decies. The Fitzgeralds, barons of Decies and earls of Desmond; the Talbots, earls of Shrewsbury, in England, and earls of Waterford and Wexford in Ireland; the family of Villiers, earls of Jersey in England, and earls of Grandison in Ireland; the Scottish family of Maule, earls of Panmure, have the title of barons Maule and earls of Panmure in Waterford and Wexford; the family of Lumley Saunderson, earls of Scarborough in England, are viscounts of Waterford; the Boyles, earls of Cork, and viscounts of Dungarvan; the O'Briens, earls of Clare in the reign of James II., had also the title of viscounts of Lismore; the O'Callaghans are viscounts of Lismore in Waterford, but resident in Tipperary; the St. Legers, barons of Kilmeaden; the Villiers Stuarts, barons of Decies, and the Keane, barons Keane of Cappoquin. In Tipperary.—The Dukes of Cambridge in the Royal family, have the title of earls of Tipperary. The Butlers, of whom an account has been given above, were earls, marquesses, and dukes of Ormond, and also had the following titles in Tipperary: earls of Carriek, earls of Glengall, viscounts of Thurles, viscounts of Ikerrin, and barons of Cahir. The Mac Carthys were earls of Mountcashel; afterwards the Davises, and in modern times the Moores, are earls of Mountcashel; the Bulkleys, viscounts of Cashel; the Scotts, earls of Clonmel; the Hely Hutchinsons, earls of Donoughmore; the Kings, earls of Kingston; the Yelvertons, viscounts of Avonmore; the Maudes, viscounts Hawarden; the family of Fairfax are viscounts of Emly; the Carletons, barons Carleton; the Pritties, barons of Dunally; and the Bloomfields, barons Bloomfield.

Ecclesiastical Divisions.—The following accounts of bishops' sees in Tipperary and Waterford have been collected from Ware, Colgan, Lanigan, Archdall, Beaufort, and other sources:

The See of Ardmore, in Waterford was founded, in the fifth century, by the celebrated St. Declan, who was of the tribe of the Desians, and having studied at Rome, became highly distinguished for learning and sanctity. Ardmore was united to the see of Lismore in the latter end of the twelfth century.

The See of Lismore, in Waterford, was founded in the beginning of the seventh century by St. Carthach, who was also called Moehuda. The see of Ardmore having been annexed to Lismore as above stated, in the twelfth century, both were annexed to the see of Waterford in the fourteenth century, A. D. 1363, by Pope Urban V.

The See of Waterford was founded by the Danes of that city, in the latter end of the eleventh century; and Malchus, a Dane, who was a Benedictine monk of Winchester, was appointed its first bishop, A. D. 1096, and consecrated by Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury. The bishops of Waterford were styled by the old writers bishops of Port Lairge, the ancient name of that city. The patron saint of the diocese is Otteran, or Odran.

Cormac Mac Branán, chief of Corcachlan, was treacherously slain by his own kinsmen, namely, Conor, son of John Mac Branán, and others.

Donal, son of Henry O'Neill, was released from the English.

The Diocese of Lismore comprises the greater part of the county of Waterford, and part of Tipperary; and the Diocese of Waterford comprises the city of Waterford, with a portion of the county.

Roscrea, in Tipperary, was an ancient bishop's see, founded by St. Cronan, in the latter end of the sixth century, and was in early times annexed to Killaloe. Tir-da-glas, now the parish of Terryglass, in the barony of Lower Ormond, county of Tipperary, had a celebrated monastery, founded by St. Columba in the sixth century, and some of its abbots were styled bishops. In A.D. 736, a great synod of bishops and clergy was held at Tir-da-glas, at which attended Aodh Ollán, monarch of Ireland, Cathal king of Munster, and other princes, and regulations were passed for the collection of the dues called St. Patrick's revenue, which was payable to the see of Armagh. This place was long eminent as a seat of learning and religion, but was destroyed by the Danes in the tenth century.

The See of Emly was founded in the fifth century by the celebrated St. Ailbe, who was called the Patrick of Munster, and patron of that province. Emly was in ancient times a considerable city, and called Imleach Iubhair, which signifies Emly of the Yew Trees, and sometimes Imleach Ailbe, or Emly of St. Ailbe. The bishops of Emly were sometimes styled bishops of Munster, as it was in early times the metropolitan see of that province. The see was united to Cashel in the sixteenth century, A.D. 1578. The diocese of Emly is but small, and comprises parts of the counties of Tipperary and Limerick.

The See of Cashel was founded in the latter end of the ninth century, by the celebrated Cormac Mac Cullenán, who became archbishop of Cashel, and king of Munster, and died A.D. 908, as already stated in the account of his life given in the preceding part of this article. The patron saint of the diocese is Albert, a celebrated Irish saint of the seventh century, whom Colgan and Lanigan consider to have been bishop of Emly. Albert was brother to Erard, another celebrated Irish saint, who was bishop of Ardagh, and afterwards preached the gospel in Bavaria, and died at Ratisbon. Albert likewise became a missionary in Germany, and died at Ratisbon: (Lanigan, vol. iii., p. 111). The archbishops of Cashel were styled by the old Irish writers, bishops of Leath Mogha, and bishops of Munster. According to some accounts, St. Patrick held a synod at Cashel, attended by Ailbe, of Emly, Declan, of Ardmore, and other saints. A.D. 1101, Murtogh O'Brien, king of Munster, according to the Annals of Inisfallen, convened a great synod, or assembly of bishops, clergy, and nobility at Cashel, in which he assigned over to the see and its bishops that hitherto royal seat of the kings of Munster, which was dedicated to God, St. Patrick, and St. Ailbe; and, according to the same annals, in A.D. 1127, Cormac Mac Carthy erected a church there, called from him, Teampull Chormaic or Cormac's chapel, which in the year 1134 was consecrated at a great synod of the bishops, clergy, and nobility of Munster, held at Cashel for that purpose. A.D. 1169, Donal O'Brien, king of Thomond, erected a new church or cathedral at Cashel, which he amply endowed. A.D. 1172, a great synod of bishops and clergy was convened at Cashel, by king Henry II., in which Christian O'Conarchy, bishop of Lismore, presided as the Pope's legate; and king Henry's claim to the sovereignty of Ireland was acknowledged in that assembly. There are still remaining on the rock of Cashel many interesting antiquities, as Cormac's chapel, a round tower, and the magnificent ruins of the ancient cathedral. The Diocese of Cashel comprises the greater part of the county of Tipperary, with small portions of Limerick and Kilkenny; and the archiepiscopal see of Cashel has jurisdiction over the ecclesiastical province of Munster, under which the following are suffragan sees: Ardfert and Aghadoe, or Kerry, Cork,

A.D. 1402.

A great contest arose between O'Neill and the sons of Henry O'Neill, and the country in all directions was spoiled between them.

Cloyne, Ross, Waterford, Lismore, Emly, Limerick, Killaloe, and Killfenora.

Ancient Literature.—The following account of various learned writers, natives of Tipperary and Waterford, and of the works composed by them, have been collected from Ware, Usher, Colgan, bishop Nicholson, O'Reilly's Irish Writers, Lanigan, Brennan's Ecclesiastical History, and other sources.

The College of Lismore.—As already stated, the see of Lismore was founded by St. Carthach, in the seventh century, and St. Cathal, or Cathaldus, a native of Desies, became his successor as bishop of Lismore, and established a seminary there, of which he became regent or chief professor, and was one of the most celebrated men in Europe in that age, for learning and sanctity. He afterwards went on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and on his return to Italy, stopped some time at Tarentum, in Naples, and, from his eminent virtues, was elected bishop of Tarentum, and presided over that see many years; he died there, and his memory is still held in great veneration as the patron saint of Tarentum. While Cathaldus was a lecturer at the college of Lismore it was attended by a vast number of students from all parts of Europe, Gauls or Franks, Teutones or Germans, Bohemians, Batavians, Belgians, Helvetians, Britons, and even persons from Thule, or the Orkney Islands. Bartholomew Moroni, a learned native of Tarentum, wrote a Life of St. Cathaldus, given by Colgan, and Bonaventure Moroni, his brother, composed a laudatory poem on Cathaldus, which is given in Archbishop Ussher's work on the British Churches, and from which are taken the following passages:—

"Oceani divum Hesperii Phœchique cadentis, Immortale decus, nulli pictate secundum,
Prisca Phalanx celebrant quem jure Senatus,
Externisque dolet mitti glacialis Iberne,
Musa refer
Spargitur occiduas sensim vaga fama per urbes,
Huic juveni primis tantum conatibus omnes
Concessisse viros, eadem quos edidit ætas,
Quantum ignes superat Phœbe jam plena minores.
Undique conveniunt proceres quos dulce traheret
Discendi studium, major num cognita virtus
An laudata foret—celeres vastissima Rheni
Jam vada Teutonici, jam deseruere Sicambri,
Mittit ab extremo gelidas Aquilone Boemas
Albis, et Arverni coeunt Batavique frequentes,
Et quicunque colunt alta sub rupe Gebennas,
Non omnes prospectat Arar Rodanique fluentia
Helvetios—multos desiderat ultima Thule,
Certatim hi properant, diverso tramite ad urbem
Lesmoriam, juvenis primos ubi transigit annos,
Mirantur tandem cuncti quod cognitus heros,
Spe major, fama melior, preconia laudum
Exuperat, nullumque parem ferat æmula virtus.
Cathaldus plebi juvenis sat notus Ibernæ,
Quis referat quanta hic edat miracula, quales
Hinc abigat pestes, quantorum corda virorum
Instruat exemplo, quot inulceat ore deserto.
Jam videas populos quos abluit advena Rhenus,
Quosque sub occiduo collustrat cardine mundi
Phœbus, Lesmoriam venisse ut jura docentis
Ediscant, titulisque sacrent melioribus aras."

Lismore, from the fame of its university, became an extensive city, and had no less than twenty churches; and in a Life of St. Carthach, quoted by Smith, it is thus mentioned: "Lismore is a famous and holy city, half of which is an asylum into which no

Murtogh O'Flanagan, archdeacon of Elphin, died.

A war arose between the earl of Ormond and the earl of Desmond, and the two Mac Williams went to aid the earl of Ormond.

The Rock of Lough Key was taken by Conor woman dares enter, but it is full of churches and monasteries, and religious men in great numbers abide there, and thither holy men flock together from all parts of Ireland and from Britain, being desirous to move from thence to Christ; and the city is built upon the banks of a river, formerly called Nem, but now Avonmore, that is, the great river in the territory of Naudesi." The name Lismore signifies the great fortress, and it was in ancient times called Magh Seith, or the Plain of the Shields, and afterwards Dun Sginne, or the Fortress of the Flight, from St. Carthach having fled there for refuge. The city and college of Lismore were frequently plundered and burned by the Danes in the tenth century; and in the years 1173-74-78 the city was repeatedly ravaged by the English forces under Strongbow and Raymond le Gros; and, according to Cambrensis, Lismore was a great city at the time of the English invasion, and when taken and plundered by Raymond le Gros, the booty was so great as to load sixteen ships, which they transmitted to Waterford. The city of Lismore, with its college and churches, long a renowned seat of literature and religion, from these repeated devastations, never recovered its ancient greatness, but fell into such utter decay that its very ruins have disappeared, leaving no remains of its former magnificence.

The Book of Lismore, a large ancient Irish MS. folio, on vellum, which was accidentally discovered in the castle of Lismore, where it still remains in the library of the duke of Devonshire. It was composed at the ancient college or monastery of Lismore, and contains much valuable information on Irish history and antiquities, as lives of SS. Patrick, Bridget, and Columkille; accounts of Samhain and Anti-Christ; the history of David, son of Jesse; also accounts of the battles of Ceallaehan, king of Cashel; the battles of Crinna, Gawra, &c.; and likewise the life and conquests of the emperor Charlemagne; a history of Lombardy, &c.

The Psalter of Cashel, an ancient Irish MS., partly in prose and partly in verse, was compiled in the latter end of the ninth century by the celebrated Cormac Mac Cullenan, archbishop of Cashel and king of Munster, of whom an account has been given in the preceding part of this article. The Psalter of Cashel was compiled from the Psalter of Tara, and other ancient records, and contained the history of Ireland from the earliest ages to the tenth century, to which, according to Lanigan and others, some additions were made after the death of Cormac, bringing the work down to the eleventh century, as in the catalogue of the archbishops of Armagh, to that period; and it is stated by O'Halloran, in his History of Ireland, that the Psalter of Cashel was also called the Book of Munster, and that he had in his possession a copy of it, continued by some anonymous writer down to the reign of Mahon, king of Munster, in the latter end of the tenth century; and he also says, that the Psalter refers more particularly to the history of Munster, and the kings of the race of Heber. Keating quotes many passages from the Psalter of Cashel, of which he had a copy; and Ware mentions it as extant in his own time, and held in great estimation, and that he had got collections from it; Colgan, Dr. O'Connor, and bishop Nicolson, also give accounts of this celebrated work; and in O'Reilly's Irish Writers, at the year 908, he states that a large folio MS. in Irish, preserved in the library of Cashel, was transcribed from the Psalter of Cashel, which was extant in Limerick in the year 1712. The original Psalter of Cashel, long supposed to be lost, is stated to be deposited in the library of the British Museum in London, and copies of it are said to be in the Bodleian Library at Oxford, and in the duke of Buckingham's library at Stowe; but it is to be observed, that there is much uncertainty as to those statements; however, with respect to the contents of the Psalter of Cashel, the greater part of it is to be found in the Books of Leacan and Ballymote.

Cormac's Glossary, called Sanasan Chormaic, a glossary or etymological dictionary of difficult words in the Irish language, with derivations from Greek, Latin, and Hebrew, was also composed by Cormac Mac Cullenan. A copy of this work is in the library of Sir William Betham, with a full translation into English, made by the translator of these Annals.

Mae Craith Mac Gowan, called also Mae Craith-na-Sgel, and by some, Thomas Mac Gowan or Smith, was, according to Ware, a canon of the abbey of St. Ruadhan, at Lorha in Tipperary; and is mentioned in O'Reilly's Irish Writers, at A. D. 1425; he wrote in Irish some works on the Irish saints and ecclesiastical history, which are mentioned by Ware and O'Reilly.

Gotofrid, a native of Waterford, a Dominican monk, was one of the most learned men of the thirteenth century; he travelled in the East, and became highly skilled in the Arabic and other Oriental languages, and published at Paris many historical works, of which an account may be found in Ware's Writers.

Keating's History of Ireland. Geoffrey Keating, called the Irish Herodotus, was a native of Tipperary, and born in the parish of Tibrid, about the year 1570. He went to Spain, and studied at Salamanca, and according to other accounts also at Paris, was distinguished for his great learning and piety, and graduated as a doctor of divinity. He returned to Ireland in the reign of James I., and was appointed parish priest of Tibrid, where he died about the year 1640, and was buried in the church of Tibrid, over the door of which is a stone with an inscription to his memory. Tibrid is situated between Cahir and Clogheen, about eight miles west of Clonmel. Dr. Keating, during his retirement, spent many years in composing, from ancient MSS. and annals, his work, which contains the history of Ireland from the earliest ages to the English invasion. This work was first translated by Dermot O'Connor, a native of Cork or Kerry, who published it in London in 1723, and in 1738 it was re-published in folio, with plates and armorial ensigns of the Irish princes and chiefs; and other editions have been published in Dublin by Christie and Duffy. William Halliday, a young man, a native of Dublin, an excellent Irish scholar, translated Keating's History, of which one volume was published in Dublin by John Barlow, in the year 1811, giving the Irish on one page, and the English on the other. Dermot O'Connor's translation of Keating is very imperfect, but if a proper translation of Keating's History were published, with the necessary annotations, it could be made a very valuable work, judiciously omitting some absurd passages which Keating himself admitted to be fabulous, though he injudiciously introduced them to the great injury of the work; but the omission of these passages should be done with caution, on which a judicious Irish historian and critic alone could determine. Another defect in various Irish histories, such as the works of Keating, O'Flaherty, and many others, is that they either contain no index, or are so imperfectly and absurdly indexed that it is almost impossible to know their contents, by which the utility of these books is much diminished.

Peter Lombard, a native of the city of Waterford, studied at Westminster, under the celebrated antiquary, Camden, and afterwards at Oxford; went thence to the University of Louvain, where he graduated as a doctor of divinity, and became a learned lecturer on theology. He was appointed provost of the cathedral of Cambrai, and in 1598 promoted to the primacy of Armagh by Pope Clement VIII.; but, though appointed to the see of Armagh, he did not come to Ireland, but resided at Rome, where, from his great learning and piety, he was appointed domestic prelate to the Pope, and died A. D. 1625. He wrote a celebrated work on Irish ecclesiastical history and antiquities, entitled De Regno Hibernia Sanctarum Insula Commentarium. This book containing statements obnoxious to the English government, King James I. gave orders to the lord deputy, Strafford, to have it suppressed, saying that it contained some dangerous matter about Hugh O'Neill, earl of Tyrone. This curious and valuable work was republished at Louvain in 1632, but is now extremely rare, and some account of its contents will be found in the Anthologia Hibernica for 1793.

Luke Wadding, a native of the city of Waterford, was born A. D. 1588, his mother being Anastasia Lombard, a near relative Oge, the son of Hugh, from the sons of Fergal Mac Dermott.

Fergal O'Rourke, the intended lord of Brefney, a man of superior strength, activity, personal figure, and great hospitality, was slain in his own house by the Clan Cabe (Mac Cabes), and buried in the monastery of Sligo.

Niall Oge, son of Niall More, son of Hugh O'Neill, king of Tyrone, died, after the palm of hospitality and nobleness, and the victory of extrema unction and repentance; Bryan, son of Niall Oge (O'Neill), died shortly after, of the small-pox.

Murtoth, son of Donogh O'Dowd, a man distinguished for his noble acts and hospitality, died, and was buried at Ardnaree.

Matthew O'Scingin died of an ulcer.

Philip, son of Bryan More Mac Mahon, lord of Orgiall (Monaghan), died, and Ardgall, the son of Bryan, assumed the lordship after him.

Cuchonacht, son of Manus, son of Cuchonacht of the Primate, Peter Lombard. He went to Portugal and studied in the Irish seminary at Lisbon, where he became a Franciscan friar. He became universally celebrated for his vast learning, eloquence, and abilities, and was appointed professor of theology at Salamanca; he went from thence to Rome, where he collected all the MSS. of the celebrated John Duns Scotus, a Franciscan, a native of Ireland, and one of the most learned men in Europe in the thirteenth century. Wadding published at Lyons, in 1639, these immense works in sixteen volumes folio; he next set about compiling from collections in the libraries of Rome his grand work entitled Annales Minorum, or Annals of the Franciscans, giving the history of the Franciscan order, and of all their eminent men in every country. This vast work was first published at Lyons, and republished at Rome in 1731, in sixteen volumes folio. Doctor Wadding, who was a prodigy of learning and of literary labour, published numerous other great works, of which a catalogue may be found in Brennan's Ecclesiastical History; and he also left immense MS. collections, intended for a general history of Ireland, civil and ecclesiastical, which remain in the libraries of Rome. Dr. Wadding is also celebrated as the founder of the Irish Franciscan church and college of St. Isidore at Rome, where he died in 1657, in the 70th year of his age, and had a magnificent monument erected to his memory.

Peter Wadding, a native of Waterford, a Jesuit, became a professor at Prague and Louvain, and died in 1644; he published several theological works, of which an account may be found in Brennan.

John Wadding, a native of Waterford, is mentioned in Ware's Writers, about the year 1620; he wrote a work on Irish Ecclesiastical History against Dempster, the Scotch historian, entitled Historia Ecclesiastica Hiberniæ.

Francis Harold, a native of Waterford, a nephew of Father Luke Wadding, was a learned Franciscan, and a professor at Prague and at Rome, where he died, A. D. 1685; he published a history of the Franciscans, and other works.

Bonaventure Barron, a native of Clonmel, and a nephew of Luke Wadding, became a Franciscan and professor at St. Isidore's college in Rome, where he died in 1696; he was a man of vast learning, and wrote many works on theology, ecclesiastical history, &c.

Paul Sherlock, a native of Waterford, a Jesuit, went to Spain and became chief professor in the Irish colleges at Compostella and Salamanca, where he died in 1646; he was a man of great learning, and his works are mentioned by Ware.

John Baptist Hackett, a Dominican of the abbey of Cashel, in Tipperary, went to Italy, and was a professor of theology at Milan, Naples, and Rome, where he died in 1676; he wrote many learned works on theology.

John Hartrey, a native of Waterford, studied in Spain and became a Cistercian monk; having returned to Ireland, he resided at the celebrated Cistercian abbey of Holy Cross, in Tipperary, and wrote, about the year 1649, a History of the Cistercian monks and their monasteries in Ireland, the M.S. of which, on vellum, Harris, in his Ware's Writers, says he had in his possession in 1733, lent to him by the parish priest of Holy Cross.

Ignatius Brown, a native of Waterford, a Jesuit, studied in Spain, where he died, A. D. 1679; he wrote some learned works on theology, mentioned by Brennan.

Anthony Hickey, a native of Clare or Tipperary, a Franciscan friar, was a very learned man, and became superior of the Irish Franciscan college at Louvain, and afterwards professor at the college of St. Isidore in Rome, where he died in 1641; he published many learned works mentioned by Brennan, and also assisted Luke Wadding in compiling his great works.

Thomas Carve, a native of Tipperary, a secular priest, travelled over France and Germany, and became chaplain to an Irish regiment in the Austrian service, commanded by colonel Walter Devereux, an Irishman. Carve published an Itinerary of his travels, and wrote a poetical work in Latin, entitled Lyra Hibernica, which was published at Sulzbach in Bavaria, in 1669, and contains much curious information on the antiquities, origin, manners, and customs of the Irish people; he died at Vienna about A. D. 1660.

Dernod O'Meara, a native of Tipperary, was educated at Oxford, and became an eminent physician and poet; he wrote in Latin verse a history of the Butlers, earls of Ormond, published in London, A. D. 1615; and some valuable medical works in Latin, which are mentioned by Ware.

Laurence Sterne, the celebrated author of Tristram Shandy, &c., was a native of Clonmel: amongst the eminent literary men, natives of Cork, of whom an account has been given in the note on Desmond, was forgotten to be mentioned Arthur Murphy, the celebrated dramatist, and translator of Tacitus; also the author of Biographies of Fielding, Johnson, and Garrick; he was one of the most eminent literary men of his day, and died in London in 1805.

Lanigan's Ecclesiastical History.—John Lanigan was a native of Cashel, and born in the year 1758; he studied in the Irish college at Rome, became a doctor of divinity, and was so distinguished for his great learning and abilities, that about the year 1790 he was appointed professor of Ecclesiastical History, Scriptures, and Hebrew, at the University of Pavia, where he continued till the year 1796. He returned to Dublin, and in 1799 was appointed as translator and editor of the works published by the Dublin Society; and in 1808 was elected librarian to that institution. Dr. Lanigan having collected a great mass of materials for the ecclesiastical history of Ireland, after many years of indefatigable industry, he published that great work in the year 1822, in four large octavo volumes, republished in 1829. He died in 1828, in the 70th year of his age, and was buried in the church-yard of Finglas. This great work comprises the ecclesiastical history of Ireland, from the time of St. Patrick to the commencement of the thirteenth century, and contains vast and learned information on the history, antiquities, and topography of Ireland, compiled with great chronological and critical accuracy.

Smith's History of Waterford, written by Charles Smith, M.D., author of the Histories of Cork and Kerry, and published about the year 1746, republished in Dublin in 1774.

Ryland's History of Waterford, written by the Rev. R. H. Ryland, and published in London in 1824.

In the notes on Thomond, Desmond, Ormond, and Desies, have been given the history and topography of the entire of Munster, and in the notes of subsequent numbers will be given the history and topography of Leinster.

O'Reilly, tanist of Brefney (Cavan), died; Una, daughter of Torlogh O'Conor, was his mother.

Bryan, son of Donal O'Flaherty, the intended lord of Carn Gegain (in Galway), died.

Felim, son of Cathal Oge, was set at liberty from his confinement.

The monastery of Cuinche,¹ in Thomond, in the diocese of Killaloe, was founded for Franciscan friars by Sioda Cam Mac Namara, lord of Clan Cuilein, who made it the burial-place of himself and his posterity.

Hugh Seanchaidh (the Historian) O'Donnell, a learned historian, died.

A great contest arose between Torlogh O'Donnell, the son of Niall, and Manus O'Kane; O'Donnell completely plundered and spoiled O'Kane's country.

A. D. 1403.

Donal, son of Henry O'Neill, assumed the lordship of Tyrone.

Teige, son of Cathal Oge O'Conor, was slain by the sons of Torlogh Oge O'Conor, and by Owen MacAnabaidh O'Conor, on Maghaire-na-Naileach, and was interred in the tomb of his ancestors.

Conor Anabaidh, son of Malachy O'Kelly, lord of Hy Maine, the serpent of his race, and of all the Irish, died after extreme unction and repentance, and was buried in the monastery of John the Baptist in Tir Maine.

Fionnguala, daughter of Torlogh, son of Hugh, son of Owen O'Conor, the wife of Malachy O'Kelly, lord of Hy Maine, died after a well-spent life.

O'Conor Don and Murtogh Baaeah, the son of Donal (O'Conor), lord of Sligo, marched a force into the upper part of Connaught, where they brought the Siol Anmchadh (O'Maddens of Galway), under subjection, after which they proceeded into Clanricard to aid Ulick, the son of Ricard (Burke) against the Hy Manians, whom they also brought under subjection. Murtogh Baaeah, son of Donal, son of Murtogh (O'Conor, Sligo), lord of North Connaught, died in the castle of Sligo, in harvest.

A contest arose between the Brefnians (of Leitrim) and the Mac Donoghs, in which Tomaltach Oge, the son of Tomaltach Mac Dorchy, the worthy chief of Kinel Duachain of that tribe, and also Murtogh Oge O'Hely, an affluent landed proprietor of a Cedach (a Cantred or Hundred), and others were slain.

Maolmora (Miles), son of Cuchonacht, son of Giolla Iosa Roe O'Reilly, assumed the lordship of Muintir Reilly (in Cavan). Manus, son of Cumighe O'Kane, lord of Kianaelt (in Derry), died. Felim, son of Donal, son of Murtogh O'Conor, died. Cu-uladh Mac Gilpatrick Mac Cathmoil (or Mac Caghwell) was treacherously slain in his own country (in Tyrone) by his own people. Cormac, son of Donogh Mac Carthy, died. O'Kennedy Don (of Ormond), was slain by the sons of Philip O'Kennedy.

A. D. 1404.

Thomas Barrett, bishop of Elphin, the most eminent man in Ireland for wisdom, and a superior knowledge of divinity, died, and was interred in Arradh of Lough Con.¹

Conor Oge, son of Hugh Mac Dermott, lord of Moylurg, a bear in activity, died in harvest; and Teige, son of Hugh Mae Dermott, succeeded him in the lordship.

Cormac Mac Dermott was slain in Clanricard by a force, which was routed by the cavalry of Clanricard and Thomond.

The daughter of O'Conor Faily, the wife of Gilpatrick O'Moore, died.

Gilpatrick O'Moore, lord of Leix, fought the battle of Ath Duv (the Black Ford) against the English, in which he defeated and slew many of

A. D. 1402.

1. Cuinche, now Quin Abbey, in the parish of Quin, barony of Bunratty, county of Clare, which is stated to have been the first monastery of the Franciscans of Strict Observants founded in Ireland, and of which the extensive marble ruins still remaining shew its former magnificence. A full account of the Mac Namaras, lords of Clan Cuilein, now the barony of Tulla, in the county of Clare, and who held the rank of hereditary marshals of Thomond, has been given in the note on Thomond, in which a mistake has been made as to the head of that family, the chief representative of the Mac Namaras, lords of Clan Cuilein, being, according to a pedigree of Sir William Betham's, James D. Mac Namara, Esq. of Ayle, Tulla, county of Clare, whose estates are situated in the barony of Tulla, being part of the hereditary possessions of his ancestors.

A. D. 1404.

1. Airidh Locha Con, now Errew, in the parish of Crossmolina, situated on a peninsula in Lough Con, in the county of Mayo, where an abbey was founded by St. Tiarnan in the fifth century, and of the ancient church some ruins still remain.

them, and took from them a great booty in horses, arms, and armour.

The earl of Ormond, the chief warrior of the English of Ireland, died.

Donogh Baun O'Maolconry, chief professor in history for Siol Murray (Roscommon), died.

Giolla Duivin Mac Curtin, chief professor of Thomond, in history and music, died.

Carroll O'Daly, chief poet of Corcomroe (in Clare); Donal, son of Donogh O'Daly, who was called Bolg-an-dana (or the budget of poetry); Flann, son of John O'Donnellan, chief poet of Siol Murray (Roscommon); William O'Deoradhain (O'Doran), chief professor of Leinster; Nualadh, daughter of Donal, son of Murtoth O'Connor, the wife of Fergal, son of Cormac Mac Donogh; and Donogh, son of Mureach Mac Shanley, an affluent landed proprietor of a Cedach of Corcachlan (in Roscommon), the intimate friend of Roderick O'Connor, king of Connaught, died.

Owen, son of Murrogh, son of Caher O'Connor, was slain by the earl of Kildare.

Andrew Barrett was slain by the people of Hy Murrogh (in Galway).

A contest arose between Mac Carthy and O'Sullivan Buidhe, and Turlogh Meith Mac Mahon was Mac Carthy's admiral at that time, who overtook O'Sullivan at sea, and also the sons of Dermot Mac Carthy, who were aiding O'Sullivan against Mac Carthy; he drowned O'Sullivan on that occasion, and took Donal, son of Dermot Mac Carthy, prisoner.

Mahon Mac Namara died on his journey to Rome.

Malachy Mac Oiraghty (or Mac Geraghty), chief of Muintir Roduiv (in Roscommon), died.

Donogh Mac Cathmoil, (or Mac Caghwel), chief of the two Kinell Feradies (in the county of Tyrone), was killed by Mac Guire.

Felim, son of Hugh O'Tuathail (or O'Toole), lord of Hy Murray (in Wicklow), died.

Cathal, son of Teige Mac Donogh, the intended lord of Tirerrill, died.

Taichlech, son of Donogh O'Dowd; Tuathal, son of Malachy O'Donnellan, the intended chief professor of Siol Murray (Roscommon) in poetry; and Teige, son of Boetius Mac Egan, the intended chief Brehon (or judge), of North Connaught, died.

A. D. 1405.

Teige, son of Hugh Mac Dermott, lord of Moylurg, marched his forces to demand his lordship from the race of Conor, son of Taichlech, and also from the people of Artagh (in Roscommon), to which a man in his station was always entitled; the people of Artagh invited O'Connor Don, with the clan of Murtoth Muimnach, and the sons of Fergal Mac Dermott, to aid them against Mac Dermott; they all collected together at Lough Laban, in the territory of Artagh, and a battle took place between them, in which Mac Dermott and Donogh, the son of Mac Donnell, his constable, defeated the combined forces opposed to them, in the early part of the day, and slew many of their common soldiers; in that defeat a certain person of the defeated party took an aim in the direction where he considered Mac Dermott might be, and cast towards him his formidable, unerring spear, with which he struck him directly in the throat, of which wound Teige Mac Dermott died a week after in his own house; and Roderick, the son of Hugh Mac Dermott, then assumed the lordship of Moylurg.

Manus, son of Hugh O'Higgin, died.

Hugh O'Hanley, chief of Kinell Doffa, died, and was interred at Cluan Cairpthe (Clonaff, in Roscommon).

Richard Butler, commonly called Coscruaidh (hard foot), was slain by the son of Fachtna O'Moore.

Mac Murrogh waged war against the English, in the course of which he plundered and burned Contae Riavach (Wexford), Carlow, and Disirt Diarmada (Castle Dermot, in Kildare).

Richard Mac Rannall, the intended lord of Muintir Eoluis, died from the effects of strong liquor.

O'Connor Kerry (Dermot, the son of Donogh), was slain by Mac Maurice of Kerry.

The daughter of Donal O'Brien, wife of Philip, the son of Mahon Don O'Kennedy, died.

Giollananeev, the son of Roderick O'Kianan, chief historian of Fermanagh, died suddenly at the house of Neide O'Maolconry, in Carbery Gaura (in the county of Longford), and was buried in the monastery of Abbey Laragh.

Fergal, son of Cormac Mac Donogh, the intended chief of Tirerrill, died.

A. D. 1406.

The coarb of St. Canice¹ died.

O'Connor Don, that is, Torlogh Oge, son of Hugh, son of Torlogh, &c. the protecting and defending tower of Connaught, in hospitality and nobleness, was slain by Cathal Duv, the son of O'Connor Roe, and by John, son of Hoherd, son of Edward, son of Hoherd, son of sir David Burke, whose mother was Bean Mumhan, the granddaughter of Felim, at the house of Rickard, son of John Buidhe, son of Edmond, son of Hoherd, at Cregan, beside Fidh Iei, in Clan Connmaigh (in Galway), and John, the son of Hoherd, fell by the hand of O'Connor at the same place.

Mulroona, son of Teige Mae Donogh, lord of Tirerrill, died at his own house, after having gained the victory of repentance, and was interred in the monastery of Boyle.

Murrough O'Connor, lord of Offaley, with his son the Calvaeh, and the sons of O'Connor Roe, namely, Cathal Duv and Teige, accompanied by a body of horse, having gone to Offaley on a visit, gave a very great defeat to the English of Meath, and to Owen Mae Anabaidh O'Connor, with the retained kerns of Connaught. Both parties having marched to the upper part of Geshil (in the King's county), Mae Anabaidh (O'Connor), with his own band of kerns proceeded to Cluain-ui-Murrois, to the town of the Giolla Buidhe, the son of Maoleorra, at which place, while Owen Mae Anabaidhe, with his party, were preying the town, Calvaeh, the son of Murrough O'Connor, and Cathal, the son of O'Connor Roe, with six horsemen, overtook them; the proprietor of the town had at this time a brewing-pan, which he had borrowed from Calvaeh O'Connor to brew ale, and seeing the Calvaeh coming up he said to him, "There is your eauldron, Calvaeh, with the kern, I offer it to you;" "I accept it where it is," said the Calvaeh; the eauldron happened to be at the same time on the back of a young man of those who plundered the town, and Calvaeh O'Connor having a stone in his hand, took a lucky aim at the fellow, and struck the cauldron, which emitted a loud noise after being struck with the stone; and the plunderers who surrounded it were so much terrified and alarmed at the sound that they instantly ran away, but were hotly pursued, routed, and slaughtered, and Mae Anabaidh O'Connor was slain on the plain on the north side of the town; and they lost no less than three hundred men, both English and Irish, between that place and Cluain Aine, in Criche-na-Gedaeh (on the borders of Westmeath). It was on that expedition that the chief holy relic of Connaught, called Buacach Phatraig (the Mitre of St. Patrick) which was kept at Elphin, was taken from the English.

Teige, son of Donogh O'Beirne, chief of Tir Briune of the Shannon, died.

Niall O'Gormley, the intended chief of Kinel Moain (in Donegal), died.

Margaret, daughter of Torlogh, the son of Owen Mae Sweeney, the wife of John, son of Donal, the son of Niall O'Donnell, died.

Hugh, son of Donogh, son of Murrough O'Connor, was slain by his own kinsmen, namely, by Manus Mae Donogh, and by Hugh Buidhe Mac Donogh.

Mac Namara, chief of Clan Cuilein (in Clare), died.

A. D. 1407.

Murrough O'Kelly, grandson of Maine, archbishop of Connaught (of Tuam), a man distinguished for his wisdom, hospitality, and piety, died.

John, son of Teige O'Rourke, the intended lord of Brefney, died in Moylurg, and was interred at Druim Leathan (Drumlane, in Cavan).

The son of Teige, son of Mahon Don O'Kennedy, lord of Upper Ormond, was slain by O'Carroll.

The English gave the Irish of Munster a defeat, in which Teige O'Carroll, lord of Ely, a general benefactor to the clergy of Ireland, was slain.

O'Connor Roe, with the sons of Malachy O'Kelly and Mac Dermott, defeated, at the battle of Killaehaidh,¹ Mae William of Clanriard; and Cathal, the son of Roderick O'Connor, who was nominated king after O'Connor Don, was slain; they

A. D. 1406.

1. The Coarbs of St. Canice were abbots of Kilkenny, and so called from St. Cainneach, anglicised Canice and Kenny, a celebrated saint of the sixth century, to whom its church was dedicated, and from whom Kilkenny, in Irish, Cill Chainnigh, signifying the church of Canice, derived its name.

A. D. 1407.

1. Cill Achaídh, now called Killarduff, near Ballycastle, in the barony of Tyrawley, county of Mayo.

were both defeated, and Cathal O'Connor, William Burke, Redmond, the son of Hoberd, and O'Heyne, were taken prisoners, after many of their respective forces had been slain; in this battle were killed Ranall, the son of Donal Oge Mac Donnell, and Shane Ballach, the son of Mac Henry, and they lost many horses and much property in that defeat.

Bryan, son of Donal, son of Murtogh O'Connor, and the Mac Donoghs, who had nominated Cathal, the son of Roderick, king, at Carn Freech, proceeded to Machaire Connaught (the Plain of Connaught), and demolished the castle of Tobar Tuillsce (Tulsk, in Roscommon).

Owen, son of Cathal, son of Hugh Brefney, the son of Cathal Roe O'Connor, died, and was buried at the monastery of Boyle.

Cormac O'Ferrall (of Longford) died.

Cathal, son of O'Connor Failey, was slain by the Berminghams.

Hugh Mac Gennis, lord of Iveagh (in county of Down), was slain by his own kinsmen and people.

O'Donnell (Torlogh, the son of Niall), marched with a force into Carbury, which he plundered.

Hugh Mac Guire and Manus Eoghanach Mac Guire were taken prisoners by Niall O'Donnell and Cathal O'Rourke, and being brought before O'Donnell, he set Hugh at liberty, on the securities of Owen O'Neill and Mac Guire.

Hugh, son of Art Mac Gennis, lord of Ivcagh, was expelled from his own territory by the sons of Cuiladh O'Neill and his own kinsman, namely, the son of Murtogh Oge Mac Gennis, and he fled into Savadge's country, whither they pursued him, but were defeated by him, and Mac Gilmore was slain.

Hugh O'Flaherty, lord of West Connaught, died at an advanced age.

Owen O'Dogherty, the intended chief of Ard Midhir (in Donegal), died.

A. D. 1408.

The earl of Kildare was taken prisoner by the king of England's son (the duke of Lancaster).

The English of Dublin, commanded by the king of England's son, marched with a force into Leinster; Hitsin Tuite was slain on that expedition, and was much lamented.

Thomas, son of Hoberd, son of Edmond, son of Hoberd (Burke), was slain by the single cast of a javelin by Giollananeev, the son of William Gallda O'Teige.

Manus Mac Gauran (of county of Cavan) was slain by Baathan Mac Gillroy, with the stroke of a staff.

Miles D'Alton was slain by his own kinsmen, and his son was afterwards slain by the people of Cathal O'Ferrall, and his castle demolished.

Fergal, son of Cuchonacht O'Ferrall, died.

Conor, son of Ivar O'Hanley, was slain by the people of Corcachlan, and those of Kinel Doffa, on the plain of Cluain-na-gaileach (in Roscommon), on La na m-burach dubh (some festival day), and that was a melancholy day for the sons of Ivar O'Hanley, and for Cathal Dubhach O'Connor; and he was interred at Roscommon.

Owen O'Rourke, and the sons of Dunn Mac Gauran, made attacks against the Brefnians as far as Tirconnell.

Mac Brien of Cuanach (in county of Limerick), was treacherously slain by the English and by the Berkeley. Teige O'Grady, chief of Kinel Dongaile (in Clare), died. John Cam O'Shaughnessey was killed by the son of O'Loughlin, while playing on the plain of Cluan Ramhfota (Clonroad, in Clare).

O'Heyne was slain by the O'Dalys, on the plain of Maon Maighe (in Galway). Mac Gillmore was treacherously slain at Carrickfergus by the Savadges.

Mac Murrough (Art Mac Murrough) warred against the English and was victorious.

O'Connor Failey carried on a great war against the English, and plundered and spoiled much of their property.

Mac Ward of Cuil-an-Urtain, professor of Hy Maine, died.

The castle of Ballindun (in Sligo) was built by Conor, son of Teige Mac Donogh.

The castle of Collooney (in Sligo) was built by Murrough, the son of Cormac Mac Donogh.

A. D. 1409.

Bryan, son of John O'Hara, bishop of Achonry, died after having gained the victory of extreme unction and repentance.

The king of England's son, on leaving Ireland, liberated the earl of Kildare before his departure.

Malaehy More Mac Geoghegan was deprived of his lordship, and Fergal Roe, son of Fergal Roe, son of Donogh, was appointed in his place.

Richard Burke's leg was broken by a greyhound, which struck him while running, in consequence of which he died.

Belleek (near Ballyshannon), was plundered by Tiarnan O'Rourke, against O'Donnell and Cathal O'Rourke, while Owen O'Rourke, O'Donnell, and the Tirconnellians were encamped on the opposite side of the cataract, and Cathal and Owen on this side, and he carried away the prey from both parties.

O'Conor Roe and O'Kelly encamped about Rosecommon, and destroyed the corn of the town and of the monastery, and they turned the friars out of the monastery, lest intelligence might be sent over to the castle.

Bryan, son of Donal, son of Murtogh O'Conor, with Mae Donogh of Tirerrill, and the sons of Tiarnan O'Rourke, marched with a great force, and they put supplies of provisions and money into the castle of Rosecommon, in spite of the men of Connaught, southward of the mountain, who were all collected, both horse and foot, to oppose them; and they returned the same night into their camp, and on the following day returned to their homes.

Muintir Cuirnín (of Leitrim) having committed slaughter on each other, viz., John and Conla were killed by Dermot, the son of Murtogh O'Cuirnín, at the house of O'Duigenan, of Bally Coillte Foghair, Dermot then went to the house of Conor Crom, the son of Teige O'Rourke, his lord and foster-brother; Conor immediately took him prisoner for his misdeeds, and delivered him to the O'Rourkes and O'Cuirníns, who kept him confined afterwards for a fortnight, when he was slain by the son of John O'Cuirnín.

Murtogh Mac Egan, chief Brehon of the men of Teffia (in Westmeath), a man highly experienced in his profession, died.

Malachy, son of Mulroona Mac Donogh, and Shane Buidhe, his brother, made an attack upon Teige, son of Mulroona, son of Gilcreest Mac Donogh, in Moylurg, whom they took prisoner; the people of the country, having collected together, gave them battle, in which Malachy, the son of Mac Donogh, received a wound from a dart, of which he died.

A great war broke out between O'Brien and his sons, and the sons of Brian O'Brien, and having engaged in battle, O'Brien was defeated, and the earl of Kildare's son, who happened to be along with him and Dermot, were taken prisoners, and O'Brien was expelled from Thomond by the sons of O'Brien.

Mac Carthy Cluasach, that is, Donal, son of Fingin, son of Donogh, son of Dermot Reavar, died.

Fingin, son of Mac Con, the son of Fingin O'Driseoll, and the young O'Driscoll, died.

Murtogh Mac Gillultan, a learned historian, died.

Eigneach O'Duinín, the intended chief poet of Desmond, died of the plague.

A. D. 1410.

Donal O'Neill, lord of Tyrone, a man who was styled king of his tribe, was taken prisoner by Bryan Mac Mahon, which was an unbecoming act, and was delivered by him to Owen O'Neill for a reward, and Owen sent him to Mac Guire, to be kept in custody by him.

Rannall Mac Rannall, chief of Muintir Eoluis, died after extreme unction and repentance; and Cumserach Mac Rannall was appointed his successor to the chieftaincy, who died in a fortnight after that.

Felim Cleirach, son of Hugh, son of Felim O'Conor, died.

Teige Carraeh, the son of Torlogh Dunn O'Conor, died.

Malachy, son of Owen O'Rourke, was slain by the Connellians.

The castle of Dun Cremtanan was demolished by the men of Carbury and the people of Breeney.

Thomas, son of Mulmurry Magrath, chief poet of Thomond, died.

Sabina, daughter of Conor O'Brien, the wife of Walter Burke, died.

Cormac Oge Mac Carthy died while imprisoned by his kinsman Mac Carthy More.

Teige, son of Malachy, son of William, son of Donogh Muinaeh O'Kelly, lord of Hy Maine, a chief who was distinguished for his charity and benevolence, died after having gained the victory of repentance.

Teige, son of William, son of Conor Mac Brannan, chief of Corcachlan (in Roscommon), died on the 1st of November, in his own house at Coillte More of Cluan Sencha, after extreme unction and a sincere repentance, and was interred in the monastery of the friars at Roscommon, in the tomb of his father and ancestors.

Donogh, son of Malachy O'Kelly, succeeded Teige in the lordship of Hy Maine.

The sons of O'Conor Don carried away five hundred cows from the people of O'Conor Roe, about November, from Rath Brenan (in Roscommon).

Torlogh and Teige, the sons of O'Mulloy, and Donal, the grandson of Hoibicin O'Mulloy, were slain by the people of Clan Maoilughra (Glenmalire, in the King's and Queen's counties.)

Malachy More, son of Fergal, son of Murtogh More Mac Geoghegan, lord of Kinel Fiachaidh (in Westmeath), died after having gained the victory of extreme unction and repentance.

Donal, son of Cormac O'Hara, heir to the lordship of Lieney, died.

O'Brien returned to Thomond, after having made peace with his kinsmen, the sons of Brian O'Brien.

The English of Meath, and the lord justice, took the castle of Moybreacraighe (in Longford) from O'Ferrall.

Donal, son of Hugh O'Flaherty, lord of West Connaught, was slain in his own territory by the sons of Bryan O'Flaherty.

O'Donnell (Torlogh) marched with a force into Brefney O'Rourke, plundered and burned the country; the men of Brefney pursued and overtook them, and an engagement took place in which the pursuers were defeated, and John, son of Owen O'Rourke, with many others, were slain, and the Tirconnellians carried away the booty.

A. D. 1411.

Donal, son of Conor O'Brien, tanist of Thomond, was slain by the Barry More.

Owen, son of Murrough O'Madden, lord of Sjol Anmcha (in Galway), died.

Maolmora, son of Cuconacht, son of Gillaisa

Roe O'Reilly, lord of Brefney (county of Cavan), died.

Covhach O'Madden, the intended lord of his own estate, died.

Murtogh, son of Cu-uladh O'Neill, prince presumptive of Tyrone, died.

O'Sullivan More was treacherously taken prisoner, his eyes put out, and his son slain, by Donal Duv O'Sullivan.

Thomas, son of John, earl of Desmond, was expelled from Ireland by James, the son of Gerald.

Malachy, son of Bryan Mac Tiarnan, tanist of Tullaghonoho (in Cavan), died.

Conor O'Casey, erenach of the lands of Muintir Casey, in Devenish, and Johannes Mac Scully, erenach of his own lands in Rossory (both in Fermanagh), died.

Murtogh Midhach, the son of Bryan O'Ferrall, lord of the Port in Annaly (county of Longford), a man who was never reproached, died.

Conor, son of Gillamochuda¹ O'Sullivan, was treacherously slain by his own kinsmen.

The monastery of Eannaghdone (in Galway), was burned.

Donal Doidhiola O'Bechain (O'Beahan), a learned historian, died.

Dermot, son of Gillaisa Magrath, chief poet of Thomond, died.

Donal, son of Cathal O'Rourke (in Leitrim) died.

Taichleach Buidhe O'Hara (of Sligo), died.

The sheriff of Meath was taken prisoner by O'Conor Faily, and he exacted a great ransom for his liberation.

Mac Carthy More was expelled by the O'Sullivans.

Maolmurry Mac Sweeney was taken prisoner by O'Donnell, in consequence of the complaints and accusations of some of his own people.

Teige Caoch-na-moicheirghe, the son of Dermot Mac Carthy, the intended lord of Desmond, was treacherously slain by Felim, the son of Dermot Mac Carthy.

Mac Manus of Tir Tuathail (in Roscommon), and his son, were slain by the sons of Roderick Mac Manus.

A. D. 1411.

1. Giolla Mochuda.—It has been stated in the note on Desmond, that the Mac Gillicuddys, chiefs in Kerry, were a branch of the O'Sullivans; and it is probable they took their name from the above Giolla Mochuda O'Sullivan.

A. D. 1412.

Donal, son of Niall O'Donnell, died.

Hugh, son of Henry O'Neill, made his escape from Dublin, where he had been imprisoned for ten years, and brought several other prisoners along with him, among whom were the son of Mac Guire (of Fermanagh), and the son of O'Neill, namely, his own brother's son; and it was on O'Neill's account he became a hostage; after his escape the entire province (of Ulster) was much disturbed, the English demanding O'Neill to be delivered to them by Owen O'Neill, O'Donnell, Mae Guire, and the Orgiallians.

Tiarnan Oge, the son of Tiarnan More (O'Rourke), heir to the lordship of Brefney, died in the 36th year of his age, in the month of April.

Cuchonaicht Mae Tiarnan, chief of Tullaghonoho, was slain by the people of Fermanagh, in his own house at Croaghan Mae Tiarnan (Croghan, near Killeshandra, county of Cavan), in a nocturnal attack, and they slew men, women, and children, burned the town, and then returned.

Donogh, son of Donal Mae Gillfinen (of Fermanagh), died.

Ricard Barrett having gone to plunder Coolearney (in Mayo), the gentlemen of the country put him to flight, and pursued him to the Moy, in which he was drowned, together with many of his people, and others of them were taken prisoners.

Edaleis, and the son of the earl of Kildare, fell by each other's hands at Kilmoehellog (Kilmallock, in Limerick).

A contest arose between O'Donnell and O'Kane, joined by the sons of John O'Donnell; O'Kane and the sons of John O'Donnell having marched with their forces into Tirconnell, they slew fourteen of O'Donnell's men, together with the son of Felim O'Donnell, and Cathal, the son of Rannall O'Boyle.

Bryan, son of Donal, son of Murtoth O'Conor, marched with a great force, about Lanmmas, into Gaileanga (Gallen, in Mayo), from thence to Clan Cuain, to Carra, and to Conmaiene Cuile Tola (Kilmmain), to which territory he brought the Clan Maurice-na-mBrigh, with their troop of cattle-drivers; the Clan William Burke, the O'Flahertys, the O'Malleys, the Barretts, the people of Gallen, and the Costelloes, collected together to oppose him, but with all their combined forces they gave him neither skirmish nor battle, although Bryan ravaged their territories despite of them, destroyed their crops and burned their fortresses, viz., Castlebar, Lethinsi (castle of Lehinch), and the town of Lough Mask; and having left Clan Maurice, with their troop of cattle-drivers, in their own country, he obtained peaceable terms from the English and Irish on that occasion, and then returned safe to his own home.

Owen, son of Donal, son of Murtoth O'Conor, marched a force into the plain of Connaught, at the invitation of the sons of Torloagh O'Conor, and spoiled the portion of the plain belonging to Felim's grandsons, and carried away cattle and hostages.

Sabina, daughter of Tiarnan O'Rourke, the wife of Edmond, son of Thomas, the son of Cathal O'Ferrall, died.

Roderick, son of Cathal O'Ferrall, was slain in Maehaire Chuirene (barony of Kilkenny West, in Westmeath), by the cast of a javelin.

Henry V.¹ was proclaimed king of England on the 20th of March.

Bryan O'Conor marched a force into Tir Hugh (in Donegal), burned the country as far as Murvaeh, and slew Coiline Mac Coilin at Ballyshannon.

Mae Brady, chief of Cuile Brighdin (in county of Cavan); Manus Mac Rannall, the son of Loughlin O'Rourke, and Cuabha Mae Gorman, died.

A. D. 1413.

Henry Barrett was taken prisoner by Mae Watten (Robert), in the church of Errew of Lough Con (in Mayo), out of which he took him by force, after thus profaning the town; and every night the saint of the place, namely, Tiarnan of Errew, appeared to Mae Watten in a vision, demanding the prisoner, whose liberation he at length obtained, and Mac Watten dedicated a quarter of land for ever to St. Tiarnan, as an eraié for having profaned his place.

Conor O'Dogherty, chief of Ard Midhair, and lord of Inis Owen, a man of unbounded generosity

A. D. 1412.

1. Henry V.—King Henry IV. died on the 20th of March, 1413, and was succeeded by his son Henry V.

and general hospitality to the poor and needy, died.

Tuathal O'Malley having gone for refuge into the province of Ulster, there remained for a year, at the end of which time he set out for home with seven ships, about the festival of St. Columkille, but a storm overtook them off the western coast, which drove them to the south of Alban (Scotland), where six of the ships were lost with their crews, among whom were the two sons of Tuathal O'Malley; Donogh, son of Owen Connachtach Mac Sweeney; Donal Ballach, the son of Mac Sweeney Girr, together with two hundred and forty others, and Tuathal with much difficulty landed in Scotland.

Cathal, son of Owen O'Madden, lord of Siol Anmcha, died.

Thomas Oge O'Reilly, and the Mac Cebes, having gone on a hostile incursion into Meath, they burned and committed depredations therein, but were overtaken by the English, who slew Mahon Mac Cabe, Loughlin Mac Cabe, and a great many of their people; and Thomas Oge received an arrow (or dart) in his leg, from the effects of which he was ever after lame.

Cormac, son of Teige, son of Roderick O'Connor, died on the 6th of the Kalends of May.

Torlogh, the son of O'Connor Faily, died from a fall.

Bebin, daughter of Roderick, the son of Tomaltach Mac Donogh, the wife of Owen, son of Donal O'Connor, died.

The entire of Limerick, both stone and wooden buildings, was burned by one woman.

Mac Murrough, that is, Art, the son of Art Cavenagh, lord of Leinster, defeated the English of the Contae Riavach (Wexford), and slew and took prisoners great numbers of them.

O'Byrne (of Wicklow), likewise gave the English of Dublin a signal overthrow, in which great numbers of them were slain, and taken prisoners.

Colla, son of Teige O'Kelly, heir to the lordship of Hy Maine; Malachy Mac Manus, the son of Donal; O'Meagher, chief of Ikerrin (in Tipperary), and Mac Egan of Ormond, all of which family were learned in the laws, died.

O'Flynn, chief of Siol Maolruain (in Galway), was slain by the son of Murtogh O'Flynn.

A. D. 1414.

Donal O'Heoghain, dean of Lough Erne (dean of Clogher), died on the 3d of the Nones of October.

The monastery of Sligo was burned by a candle in the spring of this year.

The sons of Henry O'Neill attacked Owen, the son of Niall Oge O'Neill, and took him prisoner as a pledge for O'Neill, whom Owen had then in imprisonment, and both were liberated one for the other, after which O'Neill, that is, Donal, resumed his lordship.

Murrough O'Connor, lord of Offaley, and Fergal Roe Mac Geoghegan, lord of Kinel Fiacha Mac Neill, gave a great defeat to the English of Meath, at Kil Echain,¹ in which the baron of Screen, and a great many officers and common soldiers, were slain, and the son of the baron of Slane was taken prisoner, for whom was obtained a ransom of fourteen hundred marks; and for Dardis the lawless, and the other prisoners who were taken, was received a ransom of twelve hundred marks, besides a reward and fine for intercession.

Hugh, son of Cathal O'Connor, died.

Mac Carthy of Carbery, that is, Donal, the son of Donal, died.

The earl of Desmond² came to Ireland, and he brought over many Saxons with him to spoil Munster.

The earl of Ormond arrived in Ireland from the king of England.

John Stanley came to Ireland as the king of England's viceroy, a man who gave neither toleration nor termon (sanctuary) to ecclesiastics, laymen, or literary men, but all with whom he came

A. D. 1414.

1. Cill Echain is considered to be Killucan in Westmeath; and this battle was fought on the 10th of May; the baron of Screen, slain in this battle, was Thomas Marward, the family of Marward being in former times barons of Screen in Meath; the Flemings were barons of Slane in Meath, and Christopher Fleming was the person above-mentioned, for whom the great ransom was received; and Dardis the lawless, who is also mentioned, was Jenico Dartas or Dardis, a native of Gascony, who was a celebrated military commander, sent to Ireland by the English government at that time, and was probably called the lawless on account of his having plundered various parts of the country.

2. The earl of Desmond at this time was Thomas Fitzgerald; and the above-mentioned earl of Ormond was James Butler, who was afterwards appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland; sir John Stanley was appointed lord deputy of Ireland, and landed at Clontarf in October, 1413, and died at Ardee on the 6th of January following, his death being occasioned, according to the annals, by the severe satires of the Bard O'Higgin, whom he had plundered; he was of the family of the Stanleys, earls of Derby.

in contact he subjected to cold, hardship, and famine; and he it was who plundered Niall, the son of Hugh O'Higgin, at Uisneach of Meath (Westmeath); but Henry D'Alton plundered James Tuite and the king's people, and gave to the O'Higgins a cow in lieu of each cow, of which they had been plundered, and afterwards escorted them into Connaught; the O'Higgins, on account of Niall, then satirized John Stanley, who only lived five weeks after the satirizing, having died from the venom of their satires; this was the second instance of the poetic influence of Niall O'Higgin's satires, the first having been the Clan Conway turning grey the night they plundered Niall at Cladain, and the second the death of John Stanley.

Conor, son of Geoffrey O'Flanagan, the intended chief of Clan Cathail (in Roscommon), died on the sixth day of November.

Eochy Mac Mahon, tanist of Orgial (Monaghan), was taken prisoner by Bryan Mac Mahon and the English.

Murrough O'Henesy, lord of Clan Colgan (in King's county), died.

Art Cavenagh, heir to the kingdom of Leinster, died.

Mulroona, son of Fergal Mac Dermott, lord of Moylurg, died.

O'Driscoll More (of Cork) was treacherously slain by the crew of a merchant vessel.

A. D. 1415.

Edmond Mac Finnavar, prior of Inismore on Lough Gamhna (Lough Gawna, in Longford), died on the 27th of April.

Lord Furnival¹ arrived as lord justice of Ireland; he plundered Leix of O'Moore (in Queen's county), and took the castle of the son of Fahtna O'Moore; he carried away great preys of cows, horses and other property from Oriel, spoiled and plundered Mac-na-in-Breathnach (Walsh), and hanged Gerald, the son of Thomas Caoch, of the blood of the Geraldines; he also plundered a great many of the bards of Ireland, namely, Dermod O'Daly of Meath, Hugh Oge Magrath, Duvthach Mac Keogh the learned, and Maurice O'Daly; and in the following summer he plundered O'Daly of Coreomroe (in Clare), namely, Fergal, son of Teige, the son of Aongus Roe; he plundered Bruighinda-Choga,¹ in Machaire Cuirene, and not that alone, but he gave no termon, nor spared either saint or sanctuary, while he remained in Ireland.

Hugh O'Malley committed great depredations on Dermod O'Malley, and Dermod having taken possession of the Island of O'Malley, Hugh pursued him thither, and a battle ensued, in which Hugh O'Malley, lord of Umalia, was slain by Dermod, and also his son Conor, together with the son of Thomas O'Malley, and Donal, the son of Dermod O'Malley; the inheritance of Umalia was henceforth wrested from the race of Hugh, and Dermod assumed the lordship.

Tomaltach Roe, the son of Conor Mac Maurice, died.

Closach O'Coffey, a man distinguished for his poetry and humanity, died.

Dermod, son of Dermod, son of Conor, son of Tomaltach Mac Dermott, was slain by the sons of O'Conor Don, and was interred in the monastery of Athdalaarg (Boyle.)

Cahir, son of Donogh O'Ferrall, and Hugh, son of Donogh O'Kelly, died.

Tomaltach, son of Teige O'Beirne (of Roscommon), was slain in a nocturnal attack by Fergal, the son of Dermod Mac Rannall, at Cluain Sith, in Bally Elli, in the house of Mac-an-Donnaigh, and the daughter of Loughlin O'Hanley was burned there also on the 6th of the Ides of January.

Conor, son of Bryan, the son of William Mac Geoghegan was killed at Kileuarachte (Kilecoursey, in King's county).

Commotions arose between the people of Lieney (in Sligo), and having engaged in battle, the

A. D. 1415.

1. Sir John Talbot, lord Furnival, above-mentioned, was appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland, and landed at Dalkey in September, 1414; he was afterwards earl of Shrewsbury, and a celebrated commander in the wars of Henry V. in France. Lord Furnival, after waging war with the Irish chiefs, in various parts of the country, departed from Ireland in the year 1419, and, according to Marlburgh, in his Chronicle, "carrying along with him the curses of many, because he being run much in debt for victual and divers other things, would pay little or nothing at all." His brother, Richard Talbot, archbishop of Dublin, was appointed lord justice.

2. Bruighin-da-Choga, or the fortress of the two wars, was situated in Machaire Cuirene, now the barony of Kilkenny West, in Westmeath, a place celebrated in the Ossianic poems.

eastern portion were defeated and many of them slain; and Art, the son of O'Hara, was taken prisoner and hanged by them at their own house.

The sons of Dermot Duv O'Flaherty were taken prisoners and slain by their own kinsmen, and the Giolla Duv O'Flaherty.

A.D. 1416.

Adam Lexid (Adam Lyns, in Ware), bishop of Ardagh, an English friar, was burned at Rath-easbuic (Rathaspick, in Westmeath); and Conor, son of Fergal, son of Cuchonacht O'Ferrall, was elected his successor by the chapter of Ardagh. O'Hainmiche, dean of Killala, died.

Maurice O'Coineoil, the coarb of Drumcliff (in Sligo), was burned in his own house by robbers.

Thomas Mac Innoglaidd, erenach of Kilhoiridh (Killerry, in Sligo), and chief master of Connaught in laws, died after having gained the victory of repentance.

Luke O'Treabhair (O'Trevor), erenach of Kilfearga (Killargy, in Leitrim), died after a well spent life.

The monastery of Sligo, which had been burned, was rebuilt by Bryan the friar, the son of Dermot Mac Donogh.

Gormley, daughter of Niall More O'Neill, the wife of John O'Donnell, died.

Ardgall, son of Bryan More Mac Mahon, lord of Orgial (Monaghan), died.

Cumeadha, son of John Mac Namara, heir to the chieftaincy of Clan Cuilein, died.

Mac Jordan Dexeter, with his kinsmen, made an attack on the sons of John O'Hara; and O'Hara himself, with Torlogh Carrach, son of Donal, the son of Murtoth O'Conor, and the cavalry of Carbury (in Sligo), were met by the advanced party of Mac Jordan's forces, who slew O'Hara and wounded Manus, son of Donogh, son of Murtagh O'Conor, together with the son of Hugh Mac Donogh, and Torlogh Carrach, the son of Donal (O'Conor); Mac Jordan, after that, plundered the district, but the people of the entire country having collected together, pursued them, and Mac Jordan was defeated and slain; and Hugh O'Ruadhain, with O'Ruadhain himself; the two sons of Thomas, son of Myler; and Mac Duarcain, lord of Cul Aneiridh (in Mayo), were also slain, with many others.

A contest arose between the people of Fermanagh and the men of Brefney, concerning the rent of Cathal, the son of Hugh O'Rourke, who was then in alliance with the people of Fermanagh; a battle was fought between them, in which the party of Hugh Mac Guire, and of Cathal O'Rourke, were defeated by Teige and Donal O'Rourke, and Teige, the son of Fergal O'Rourke, with nine others, were slain, and eleven horses were taken from them on that occasion.

Hugh Buidhe and Teige O'Rourke, with Mac Cabe, made another attack on Muintir Pheodachain (Pettigo in Fermanagh), but the people of Fermanagh, from Lough Erne westward, with Cathal O'Rourke and Owen O'Rourke, pursued them, and the sons of O'Rourke endured the hardship of that pursuit, until they came up to a place where they had planted their galloglasses in ambush; both parties then turned upon their pursuers, and slew Donogh and John O'Rourke, with the two sons of Malachy, the son of Flaherty O'Rourke, and forty-eight of the people of Fermanagh.

Donal, son of Tiarnan More O'Rourke, died of the small-pox, and his death was very much lamented in Gairbh Thrian of Connaught (the rough district of Connaught, or Leitrim).

Graine, the daughter of Flaherty O'Rourke, died.

Teige Oge, the son of Teige Roe Mac Dermott Gall, lord of Airteach, died after the festival of St. Michael, in the house of the friars at Roscommon, and was interred in the monastery.

The church of Inismore on Lough Gil (in Sligo), was burned, in which were destroyed the manuscripts of O'Cuinnin; the Lcabhar Gearr (or Short Book) of the O'Cuinnins, together with many other precious articles.

James, the son of Richard Bermingham, died.

John Mac Costello having gone on a predatory excursion against Edmond of the Plain, committed great plunder, and slew himself with a javelin, after having secured the prey.

John O'Cannavan, parson of Tir Fiachra of the Moy (in Sligo), died.

Felim, son of Hugh O'Conor, was slain by the sons of O'Conor Don.

Edmond Burke committed great depredations on Bermingham (in Galway), whom he took prisoner, and confined in the town of Lough Mask.

O'Donnell and Bryan O'Connor made a peace with each other.

O'Connor Fairly gave a great defeat to the English of Meath, and took from them much property, including horses, accoutrements, and also prisoners.

A great number of Saxons came to Ireland.

Mac Murrough defeated the English of Condae Riavach (Wexford), and having slain and taken prisoners seventeen score of them (340), they made peace with him on the following day.

A. D. 1417.

Art Cavenagh, king of Leinster,¹ the son of Art, son of Murtogh, son of Maurice, lord of Leinster, a man who defended his province against the English and Irish, from the age of sixteen to his 60th year; a man distinguished for his hospitality, knowledge, and feats of arms; a man full of prosperity and royalty; a founder of churches and monasteries by his bounty and contributions, died, after having been forty-two years in the government of Leinster, on the 7th day after Christmas; some state that it was by drinking a poisonous draught, which a woman gave him at Ross Mac Briuin, and also to O'Doran, the Brehon of Leinster, that both died; Donogh his son succeeded him in the government.

Master John, parson of Devenish, died.

Dermod Lamhdearg (the Red-handed) son of Art Cavenagh, the son of the king of Leinster, died.

Roderick, the O'Dowd, son of Donal, son of Bryan, son of Taichleach O'Dowd, the fountain of prosperity and wealth of Hy Fiaehra (in Sligo), died in his own town on the festival of St. Bridget, within a month of spring, and was succeeded by Teige Riavaeh his brother. It was during the time of this Teige, that the Book of Oiris of Leacan was written.

Roderick, son of Murrough O'Flaherty, Roderick, son of Dermod Duv O'Flaherty, together with sixteen of the O'Flahertys, were drowned on the coast of Umalia (in Mayo).

A. D. 1417.

1. Art Cavenagh, king of Leinster, here mentioned, was the celebrated warrior Art Mae Murrough O'Cavenagh, of whose exploits in his contests with the English forces, under king Richard II., an account has been given in a note in these Annals, at the Thomas, the son of Mac Maurice of Kerry, was slain by James, the son of the earl of Desmond.

Mathew, son of Cuchonacht O'Ferrall, lord of Moy Treagha (in Longford), died.

Cormac Ballaeh, son of Fergal, son of Cuchonacht O'Ferrall, was slain by the English.

A great contest arose between O'Neill and the Tirconnellians; O'Neill made a nocturnal attack on the camp of Naghtan O'Donnell at Carn Glass, between Raphoe and Donoghmore, and, having surprised the persons there in their sleep, they took from them twenty horses, obtained great booty, including arms, armour, and clothing, and slew and took prisoners eleven of them; and Naghtan himself escaped by his valour, feats of arms, and intrepidity.

Una, daughter of Donal O'Neill, the wife of Niall Oge O'Neill, died.

A great war broke out in Leinster between the English and the Irish.

A. D. 1418.

The bishop O'Driscoll and Mac Con O'Driscoll, his brother, lord of Corca Laighe (in Cork), and Dermot, the son of Mac Carthy Cluaisidh, tanist of Hy Cairpre (Carbery, in Cork), died.

Niall O'Donnell committed great depredations and plunder on O'Neill, and expelled him across the Bann, eastward to Mac Quillan's country (in Antrim).

Lord Furnival committed great depredations on Hugh, the son of Art Mac Gennis, lord of Iveagh, in Ulidia; Mac Gennis (that is Hugh) and the son of O'Neill Buidhe pursued the English as they were carrying away the plunder, and defeated them after they had left the booty behind them, and an immense number of the English were slain and taken prisoners by Mac Gennis on that occasion.

Bryan Ballaeh, son of Hugh, son of Felim O'Connor, a man who never refused any person a request which lay in his power, died, and was interred at Roseonimon.

year 1399; the place of his death is mentioned as Ross Mac Briuin, now Old Ross, in the county of Wexford, which was also called Ross Mac Treoin, and where the Mac Murroughs, kings of Leinster, had one of their castles in those times.

Owen, son of Tiarnan More O'Rourke, tanist of Brefney, was drowned after Christmas, while returning from Inis-na-dTorc, on Lough Fionnmhaighe (in Leitrim), whither he had gone on a visit to his father, who was then on his death bed.

Tiarnan More, son of Ualgarg O'Rourke, lord of Brefney, the bravest and most valiant man of the race of Hy Briune, a man who wrested his estates from his enemies by the force of arms, died at an advanced age on the festival of St. Bridget, and was buried in the monastery of Sligo, and Hugh Buidhe O'Rourke succeeded his father.

Teige, that is the Mac Clancy, son of Cathal, son of Teige, chief of Dartry (in Leitrim), died a fortnight after he had entered the monastic order, and his son Cathal succeeded him.

Richard, son of Thomas O'Reilly, lord of East Brefney (Cavan), was drowned in Lough Shilean, together with Owen O'Reilly, his son; Philip, the son of Gillaisa Mac Caffrey, dean of Dromlane, and vicar of Eanach Garv (Annagh or Annageliffe, diocese of Kilmore), and many other persons of note; but Fiongualla, daughter of Mac Rannall, the wife of O'Reilly, escaped being drowned, by her expertness in swimming.

Leinster.—In this article, and in succeeding notes, will be given the history and topography of Leinster. At A. D. 1363, in these annals, have been shewn the ancient divisions of Ireland into five provinces or kingdoms, and the boundaries of each. The ancient kindom of Leinster comprised the present counties of Wexford, Wicklow, Carlow, and Queen's county, the greater part of Kilkenny, King's county, and Kildare, and that part of Dublin south of the river Liffey. Parts of Kilkenny, bordering on Tipperary, and the southern parts of the King's county, belonged to ancient Munster, and some of the northern part of the King's county belonged to the province of Meath. The above-named territories continued to be the limits of Leinster down to the reign of Elizabeth, as may be seen in Spenser's View of Ireland, but in after times the old kingdom of Meath was added to Leinster, and also the county of Louth, which was part of the ancient kingdom of Ulster.

Leinster in early times was called Gaillian or Coige Gaillian, and got its name, as stated in O'Connor's Dissertations, and in Keating, from its being possessed by the tribe of Firbolgs called Fir-Gaillian, signifying Spear-men, but it afterwards got the name of Laighean from the following circumstance:—Nearly three centuries before the Christian era, Labhra Loingseach, or Lavra of the ships, an Irish prince, having been banished to Gaul, became commander of the forces to the king of that country, and afterwards led an army of 2200 Gauls to Ireland, for the recovery of the crown. He landed at the place afterwards called Lough Garman, now the bay of Wexford, and proceeded to Dinnrigh, an ancient fortress of the kings of Leinster, which was situated near the river Barrow, between Carlow and Leighlin, and there put to death Cobhthach Caolbreagh, the king who had usurped the throne, and became himself monarch of Ireland. The Gaulish troops brought over by Lavra were armed with greenbroad-headed spears, called Laighin, which were introduced amongst all the forces of the province, hence it got the name Coige Laighean, or the province of the Spears, and from Laighean, pronounced Laen, has been formed the word Leinster.

1. Hy Kinselach and Cualann.—Under this head will be given the history and topography of the ancient territories comprised in the present counties of Wexford, Wicklow, and Carlow, with their chiefs and clans, and the possessions of each in ancient and modern times, collected from the various works already enumerated in the notes on Thomond, Desmond, Ormond, and Desies. The extensive territory of Hy Kinselach derived its name from Eana Cinselach, king of Leinster, in the fourth century, and comprised the present counties of Wexford and Carlow, with some adjoining parts of Wicklow, Kilkenny, and Queen's county.

Cuala, Cualan, or Crioch Cualan, that is the country of Cualan, was the designation of the greater part of the ancient territory now forming the county of Wicklow, and its name was derived from Cuala, one of the sons of Breogan, who was one of the commanders of the Milesian colony from Spain, and took possession of this country, which was called after him Sliabh Cualan, or the Mountain of Cuala; and it is mentioned that two fortresses in the territory of Cualan were erected by the Milesians, one at Turlogh Invear More, now called Arklow, by Amergin, and the other by Seaghda, at Dun Deilinis, now Delgany.

Ancient inhabitants of Leinster.—There are various colonies placed in ancient Leinster, according to our old annalists and topographers.

The Belgians.—The colony called by our old Irish writers Fir-Bolg, i. e. Viri Belgici, or men of Belgium, of whom an account has been already given in the notes on North and South Connaught, Thomond, and Desmond, are stated to have been Scythians, and to have sailed to Ireland from Greece, and to have landed with a large force in Connaught, at Erris, in Mayo, and another body of them landed under one of their commanders named Slainge, the son of Dela, at a place called after him, Inbhear Slainge, now the Bay of Wexford, from which the river Slaney also derived its name. The Fir-Bolg were divided into two great tribes, namely, the Fir-Domnann, who possessed Connaught, and are called by O'Flaherty and other writers Fir-Domnians and Dannionians; and the Fir-Gaillian, signifying spearmen, who possessed Leinster; they are placed on Charles O'Connor's Map of Ancient Ireland, in the counties of Wexford, Wicklow, and Carlow, under the name of Galenii, or Galenians, under which name they are also mentioned in O'Flaherty's Ogygia. Our old annalists represent the Firbolg as a race of Scythians, and the name is considered by O'Brien, in his Dictionary, at the word Bolg, to be derived from Fear, a man, and bolg, a quiver, in consequence of their being armed chiefly with bows and arrows, and it may be observed that the Scythians were famous archers. The Firbolg are considered by various writers to have been a colony of the Belgae, from the northern parts of Gaul or Belgium, and adjoining parts of Germany, which country was called by Cæsar, and other Roman writers, Gallia Belgica. These Belgians were the most warlike nation in Gaul, whom the Roman armies, under Cæsar, found very difficult to conquer, and of whose different tribes, the Bellovaci, Menapii, Atrebates, and Remii, interesting accounts are given in Cæsar's Commentaries. The Belgians of Gaul are considered to have been Celts or Celto-Scythians, and to have spoken a dialect of the Celtic tongue, which was also the language of the Firbolg or Belgians of Ireland. The Belgians of Gaul, in early times, also colonised the southern parts of Britain, and when the Romans, under Cæsar, invaded Britain, they found the whole southern coast, from Suffolk to Devonshire, occupied by Belgic tribes, as the Cantii, in Kent, the Trinobantes in Essex and Middlesex, the Regni and Atrebates in Surrey, Sussex, Hampshire, Wiltshire, and Somerset, and the Damnonii in Devonshire; the capital city of the British Belgians was Venta Belgarum, now Winchester. According to various antiquaries, the Belgians who settled in Ireland are said to have come from Britain in the first century, having fled to this island when Britain was conquered by the Romans; but though some of the British Belgians may have come to Ireland at this time, all our

The Caislean Beag (or small castle), was erected by William O'Kelly, in the space of fifteen days, at Roscommon, opposite the great castle, in spite of all the English and Irish of Connaught who opposed him, and who aided the sons of Torlogh O'Conor, in the summer of this year.

The sons of Donal, the son of Murtoth O'Conor, and the Clan Donogh (O'Conors), marched with a great force to demolish the small castle, and did not halt until they pitched their camp around in every direction; however, they got no advantage by that, for the castle was bravely defended; and when they could not succeed, they put provisions into the great castle, and burned the church of Cuil Siline on that occasion.

Lasarina, daughter of Cathal, son of Hugh Brefnach (O'Conor), the wife of Malachy, son of Flaherty O'Rourke, died.

A peace was concluded by the Clan Donogh (O'Conors) with each other, as long as Mac Donogh O'Conor should continue their lord.

Donal, son of Malachy, the son of Maurice Mac Donogh, died at his own house.

A great war arose between the son of O'Neill of Claneboy and the Albanaigh (Scots), and the English of Ulidia (county of Down), and of the Routes (in the county of Antrim).

ancient annalists agree in their accounts of the Firbolg having arrived in Ireland many centuries previous to that period, and as far back as a thousand years before the Christian era.

The Tuath De Danan colony, of whom an account has been given in the notes on North and South Connaught, having conquered the Firbolgs or Belgians, became possessors of the country; but the Danans themselves were conquered by the Milesians, who became masters of Ireland.

The Brigantes.—In the Map of Ancient Ireland, by Ptolemy, the Greek geographer in the second century, as given by Ware, and according to various other geographers, the Brigantes are placed as inhabiting the territories in Leinster and Munster now forming the counties of Wexford, Waterford, Tipperary, Kilkenny, Carlow, and Queen's county; and according to the old English geographers, Richard of Cirencester and Camden, these Brigantes fled for refuge, in the first century, from the north of England, or Yorkshire, to Ireland, from the Romans, on their invasion of Britain; but though some of these British Brigantes might have fled to Ireland at that period, their arrival in Ireland was many centuries before that time, according to our ancient annalists. The Irish Brigantes, according to our old writers, originally came from Brigantia, in Spain, and were of the same stock as the Milesians; or rather, a branch of that colony, being the descendants of Breogain, grandfather of Milesius. This Breogain was king of Spain, and a celebrated warrior, and his sons came as commanders in the Milesian expedition to Ireland along with Heber, Heremon, and the other sons of Milesius, and the posterity of Breogain got the name of Clanna Breogain, signifying the descendants of Breogain, and Latinized Brigantes. The Clanna Breogain are mentioned by different writers under the name of Ithians, as descendants of Ith, the son of Breogain, and are also called Lugadii, or Lugadians, from Lugaidh, the son of Ith. An account of the chief families of the Clanna Breogain, or Ithians, has been given in the notes on Thomond and Desmond. According to our old writers, great numbers of the Tuath de Danan, Firbolg, Clanna Breogain, and Picts, were expelled from Ireland by the Milesians in the early ages, and settled in various parts of Britain. The British Brigantes possessed the northern parts of England, now the counties of York, Lancaster, Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Durham, and were celebrated for their valour and resistance to the Romans. The origin of the Brigantes of Ireland and Britain, like that of many other ancient people, has puzzled antiquaries; some of whom are of opinion that the Brigantes came from Spain, and were of Phenician origin; but the learned Baxter, in his Glossary of British Antiquities, considers that the Brigantes came originally from Phrygia and Armenia, and passed into Thraee and other parts of Europe, which seems partly to coincide with the old Irish writers, according to whose accounts the Milesians and Clanna Breogain of Spain were of Scythian origin, and came from those parts on the borders of Europe and Asia, between the Euxine and Caspian seas. The Brigantes, both of Ireland and Britain, being Celts, or Celto-Scythians, spoke a dialect of the Celtic language.

The Picts, called by the Irish writers Cruithnigh, or Cruithne, which signifies painted men, are stated in the Psalter of Cashel, according to Keating and others, to have come to Ireland from Thraee, in the reign of Heremon, nearly a thousand years before the Christian era, and to have landed at Inverslainge, now the bay of Wexford, under two chief commanders, Gud and Cathluan; but not being permitted to settle in Ireland, they sailed to North Britain, and took possession of the country afterwards called Caledonia by the Romans, now Scotland, over which the Pietish kings ruled for many centuries, till conquered by the Milesian colonies from Ireland under Cairbre Riada and his successors, from the third to the seventh centuries, and from these colonies were descended the Scottish kings, and the house of Stuart. A colony of the Picts from North Britain settled in Ulster in early times, chiefly in that part called Dalaradia, in the counties of Down and Antrim, where they resided many centuries under their own princes and chiefs, mixed by intermarriages with the old Milesian tribes of the race of Ir, called Irians, or Clanna Rory. The venerable Bede states that the Picts came to Ireland from Scythia and Pinkerton, and others are of a similar opinion, that they were Goths or Scandinavians, of Scythian origin, and that their language was a dialect of the Teutonic. The Picts also, according to our Irish annalists, in their progress to Ireland, settled a colony in Gaul, in the country called from them Pictavia, or the province of Poitou, and from them are descended the Vendéans of France. The Picts of Britain are celebrated in history in their wars with the Romans.

The Menapians, of whom an account has been given in the notes on Ormond and Desies, are placed on Ptolemy's Map of Ancient Ireland in Ware, under the name of Menapii, as inhabitants in the second century of the territories now forming the counties of Waterford and Wexford. These Menapians, according to Camden and other antiquaries, were a colony of the Menapii from Belgic Gaul. The city of Menapia, on the map of Ptolemy, is considered to have been the place afterwards called Wexford; or probably, as stated in Fraser's Survey of Wexford, Menapia was the ancient city of Ferns. The celebrated Carausius, a Menapian, who in the third century became Roman emperor of Britain, is considered by Usher, Ware, Camden, and other antiquaries to have been a native of the city of Menapia in Ireland, as the Roman writers state that he was a citizen of Menapia. He was trained up from his youth to naval expeditions, and was a man of extraordinary military abilities and bravery; he entered into the Roman army in Britain in the reign of the Roman emperors Diocletian and Maximian, and was appointed commander-in-chief of their fleets in the northern seas, to bring under subjection the Franks, Saxons, and Scandinavians, who attacked the Roman settlements in Gaul and Britain. Carausius having conquered these pirates, he at-

A. D. 1419.

UGH O'Flanagan, prior of Lisgoole (Fermanagh), died.

John Mac Cormac, bishop of Raphoe, died.

A great contest arose between O'Neill, that is, Donal, the son of Henry Aimhreidh, and Owen, son of Niall Oge, presumptive prince of Tyrone; Owen went to solicit the friendship of O'Donnell, that is, Torlogh, and entered into amicable arrangements with him, after which Owen mustered a very great force to march into Tyrone, and being joined by Bryan Mac Mahon, lord of Orgiall (Monaghan), and Thomas Mac Guire, lord of Fermanagh, they assembled at one place to meet Torlogh (O'Donnell), and they all then proceeded into Tyrone, plundered the entire of the country, and expelled O'Neill in disgrace from Tyrone; they then made excursions among the English beyond the Bann, and plundered the son of O'Neill of Claneboy, in the Glynes (in Antrim).

Bryan O'Conor marched a very great force of the men of North Connaught, with many of the English, at the request and invitation of O'Neill, and they spoiled the entire of Tir Hugh (in Donegal) from Ath-na-nGall, as far as Ballyshannon, including hay, corn, and dwellings, and burned Murbhach, the fortress of O'Donnell, during the time that O'Donnell was with his forces in Tyrone, after which Bryan, the son of Donal (O'Conor), the son of Murtogh, and his men returned to their homes.

tained such great power and popularity, that in A. D. 288, he assumed the Purple, and declared himself Roman emperor in Britain, and having defeated the forces of the emperor Maximian in several naval engagements, Maximian was compelled to acknowledge him as his associate in the empire, and there are still extant several coins of Carausius, as Roman emperor of Britain. After a reign of about ten years, Carausius, whose power became obnoxious to the Roman emperors, was slain through their influence by Alectus, who became chief commander in Britain.

The Gaulish colony in Leinster.—As already shewn in the preceding part of this article, an Irish prince named Labhra Loingseach, in the third century before the Christian era, being banished into Gaul, came from thence to Ireland, with a force of two thousand two hundred Gaulish auxiliaries, and landed at the bay now called Wexford. This place, as stated in Charles O'Conor's Dissertations, was called Loch Garman, a name which was afterwards applied to the whole of the territory now forming the county of Wexford, from this colony, who settled there, and were called Garmans, as having come from the northern parts of Germany, adjoining Gaul, and are considered by O'Conor to have been the same people as the Menapians.

The Caucians.—A tribe or colony called Cauci, are placed on Ptolemy's Map of Ireland, in the territories now forming the counties of Wicklow and Kildare, and considered by Ware and others to have been a colony of Belgians or Germans, the same as the Chauci of Northern Germany.

The Danish colonies in Leinster.—The Danes being, in the ninth, tenth, and eleventh centuries, in possession of Dublin, and various parts of Wexford and Wicklow, many of the inhabitants of those counties are of Danish descent.

The Anglo-Saxon colony in Wexford.—The English soldiers who came over with Strongbow, Hervey de Monte Marisco and others, in the reign of Henry II., as allies of Dermot Mac Murrugh, king of Leinster, got possession of the baronies of Forth and Bargie, where their descendants remain to this day, unmixed with the natives, and speak their ancient language, a dialect of the Anglo-Saxon, of which specimens are given in Vallancey, and in Fraser's Survey of Wexford.

Ancient history of Leinster.—Our old annalists state that the Milesians having attempted to land at Inver Slaney, or the Haven of Wexford, the Tuath De Danans assembled their forces and prevented them; but after the Danans were conquered, Heremon, the first Milesian monarch of Ireland, bestowed the kingdom of Leinster on Críomthan Sciathibel, a Firbolg prince, as a reward for the assistance given to the Milesians by the Firbolg against the Danans. Heremon erected a fortress, or royal residence, at Airgid Ros, called also Rath Beathaidh, on the banks of the river Feoir, in Ossory, now the Nore, in the county of Kilkenny; and he died at Rath Beathaidh, and was buried there; this place is still known as Rathbeagh, and situated within five miles of Kilkenny. The Milesians of the race of Heremon afterwards ruled as kings of Leinster, and many princes of the Heremonians of Leinster also became monarchs of Ireland. Sedna, of the race of Heremon, was king of Leinster about five centuries before the Christian era, and is said to have founded a royal city at Rath Mine, supposed to be Rathmines, near Dublin. Ugaine Mor, or Hugony the Great, a celebrated monarch of Ireland, about three centuries before the Christian era, was of the Heremonians of Leinster, and from his posterity sprung the chief families of that province. Labhra Loingseach, already mentioned in the former part of this article, and Fergus Fortamhuil, or Fergus the Strong, so called from his exceeding great strength of body, and the grandson of Fergus, called Críomthan Cosgrach, or Crimthan the Victorious, who is styled champion of the Heremonians of Leinster, were all monarchs of Ireland, in the third and second centuries before the Christian era. A short time before the Christian era, Eochaidh Feidhlioch, monarch of Ireland, of the race of Heremon, on dividing Ireland into five provinces, appointed a prince of his own race, named Rossa Ruadh, or Ross the Red, as king of Leinster; this Ross was married to Magach, a princess of the Firbolg race, by whom he had a son, called Cairbre Nia-fear, or Carbre the Warrior, who became king of Leinster; and it is stated that the Firbolg or Belgians had extensive tracts of land under him as tenants, but that he exacted such excessive rents from them that they were forced to give up their farms and remove into Connaught, where they obtained lands from

Hugh Buidhe O'Rourke, who was lord of Brefney for the space of one year and a half, died, and Teige O'Rourke was elected his successor by the O'Rourkes from Slieve-an-Iarain westward, while Oilioll and Meva, then king and queen of that province. This Cairbre Niafear was married to Feidhlimia, daughter of Concovar Mae Neasa, the celebrated king of Ulster. Finn, the poet, another son of Ross the Red, became progenitor of the kings of Leinster; and his descendants, Cu-corb, or the hero of the chariot; Mogh-corb, or the chief of the chariot, and Nia-corb, or the warrior of the chariot, were all kings of Leinster in the first century; and Messincorb, or the courageous chief of the chariot, a prince of the same race, whose descendants were called Dal-Messincorb, founded the powerful family of Messincorbians, which produced several eminent men, mentioned by O'Flaherty and others, and had a large territory in the now county of Wexford; and Messincorb had a grandson called Garcon, whose descendants possessed an extensive territory along the coast, in the present counties of Wexford and Wicklow, called Hy-Garcon; and this district is remarkable in ancient history, as connected with the mission of Palladius, and of St. Patrick, in Ireland, whose progress was opposed by Nathi, a Pagan prince of Hy-Garcon, of which an account may be seen in Lanigan's Ecclesiastical History.

The Leinster Tributes.—In the second century, Eochy Ainecheann, king of Leinster, was married to a daughter of Tuathal Teachtnar, the celebrated monarch of Ireland, and having caused the death of his queen, and of her sister, by his cruel treatment, the indignant monarch, Tuathal, invaded Leinster, and brought Eochy under subjection, and levied on the province an erac or fine, to be paid every second year to the succeeding monarchs of Ireland, consisting of three thousand cows, three thousand sheep, three thousand hogs, three thousand copper cauldrons, three thousand mantles, and three thousand ounces of silver. This fine was called Boroimhe Laighean, signifying the tribute of Leinster, and is mentioned by various writers, under the name of the Boroinean, or Boarian tribute, as the word Boroimhe signifies a tribute of cattle. This tribute was seldom paid voluntarily, but enforced by the monarchs, at the head of powerful armies, and in its exaction were fought many of the bloodiest battles recorded in Irish history. It was continued during the reigns of forty monarchs, for a period of more than five hundred years, namely, from the second to nearly the eighth century, when it was abolished through the influence of St. Moling, bishop of Ferns, A. D. 675, in the reign of Fionachta, monarch of Ireland, though an attempt at its recovery was made, A. D. 722, by Feargal, a succeeding monarch.

The Tribute of Eidirsecol.—A short time before the Christian era, Eidirsecol, of the race of the Clanna Deaga of Munster, a branch of the Heremonians of Ulster, was monarch of Ireland, and having been killed by the people of Leinster, Conaire Mor, or Conary the Great, his son, who succeeded as monarch of Ireland, levied as a punishment for the death of his father, on the province of Leinster, a tribute called Eirie-ni-Eidirsecol, or the Fine of Eidirsecol, to be paid annually every 1st of November, and consisting of 300 cows, 300 steeds, 300 gold-handled swords, and 300 purple cloaks. This tribute was sometimes paid to the monarchs of Ireland, and sometimes to the kings of Munster, and its levying led to many fierce battles for a long period.

The Tribute of Brian Boru.—In the wars of Brian Boru, in the tenth century, the Danes were assisted by the people of Leinster, but Brian having reduced both to subjection, levied as a punishment on the Lagenians a yearly tribute, the same as the old fine of Eidirsecol, consisting of 300 cows, with brass yokes, 300 steeds, 300 gold-hilted swords, and 300 purple coloured cloaks, independent of the annual tribute he received from Leinster as monarch of Ireland, which consisted of 300 bullocks, 300 hogs, and 300 loads of iron; and from the people of Ossory 60 beeves, 60 hogs, and 60 loads of iron: and he compelled the Danes of Limerick to deliver him yearly 365 pipes of red wine, and levied 150 pipes of wine on the Danes of Dublin.

The Will of Cahir More.—Cuthair More, or Cahir the Great of the Heremonians of Leinster, was king of Leinster, and afterwards monarch of Ireland, in the second century; he died A. D. 177, and divided his great possessions amongst his thirty sons. His will, a very curious and interesting document, is given by O'Halloran and other historians from the Book of Leacan, and there is also a copy of it in the Book of Ballymote. To his eldest and favourite son, Rossa Failge, or Rossa of the Rings, he bequeathed the sovereignty of the kingdom of Leinster, together with 10 swords and 10 shields, ornamented with gold and silver, and 10 golden cups; to his second son, Daire Barach, he bequeathed the territory of Tuath Laighean, considered to be part of the counties of Wicklow and Dublin, and dominion over the Gaileangas or Galenians, who were descendants of the Firbolg, and he also left him 150 spears, 50 shields, and 50 swords, all of exquisite workmanship, and ornamented with gold and silver, together with 7 military standards, and 50 rings of pure gold; to his third son, Breasal, he left seven ships, 5 four-horsed chariots, 50 shields embossed with gold and silver, and 5 golden-hilted swords, together with the lands on the banks of the river Amergin, and dominion over the inhabitants—(the river Amergin is supposed to be the Avonmore, or Ovoca, in Wicklow); to his fourth son, Cetach, he left lands; to his son Oilioll he left his backgammon-tables; to Crimthan he left 50 playing-balls of brass, with brass maces, 10 backgammon-tables, and two chess-boards, all of beautiful workmanship; to his youngest son, Fiacha Baiccada, he left the territory of Lough Garinan, now the county of Wexford, also 50 large vessels made of red yew, 50 drinking-cups or methers, and 50 piebald steeds, with bridles and brass bits; to his nephew, Tuathal Tigeach, he gave 10 chariots, with horses and harness, together with 30 shields and 50 swords, ornamented with gold and silver, 5 pair of backgammon-tables, and 5 chess-boards; to Mogheorb 100 black and white cows, with their calves coupled in pairs, with brazen yokes, 100 shields, 100 swords, 100 red javelins, 50 saffron-coloured cloaks, with 100 gold pins for cloaks, 100 horses of different colours, 50 chariots, 50 trumpets, 50 standards, 100 costly goblets, 100 chess and backgammon tables, 50 large vats made of yew, and 50 copper cauldrons; and to the prince of Leis (or Leix, in the Queen's county), he left 100 cows, 100 shields, 100 swords, 100 spears, and 7 spotted standards. As to the golden ornaments, swords, shields, &c. mentioned in this will, it appears that such articles were in great abundance in Ireland in the early ages, as sufficiently demonstrated by the fact, that in various parts of the country have been found, in bogs, ramparts, and ancient fortresses, golden crowns, worn by ancient kings and queens, torques, or golden collars, golden gorgets and bracelets, crescents, large hollow golden balls, fibulae, breast-pins or brooches, golden-hilted swords, golden goblets, and a variety of other ornaments, the uses of which are unknown at the present day; some of these articles were from half a pound to two pounds weight, and many of them are still to be seen in museums and private collections, but vast quantities of these interesting antiquities have been barbarously sold to goldsmiths, and melted down, though such valuable specimens of ancient art should be most carefully preserved.

The Cahirians, or posterity of Cahir More, formed the principal families in Leinster. From his son, Rossa Failge, were descended the O'Conors Failge, called O'Conors Faily, princes of Hy Failge, or Offaley, which comprised a great part of the King's county, with part of the Queen's county and Kildare; the O'Dempseys, lords of Clan Maliere; the O'Dums; the O'Regans, Mac Colgans, O'Hartys, and some other chiefs in the King's and Queen's counties, and Kildare. From Fiacha Baiccada, his youngest son, were descended the Mac Murrongs, kings of Leinster; the O'Cavenaghs, O'Byrnes, O'Tooles, O'Murphys, O'Mulrians or O'Ryan, the O'Kinsellaghs, O'Duffys, O'Dowlings, O'Cormacs, O'Muldoons, and other chiefs, in Wexford, Wicklow, Carlow, and other parts of Leinster. From Daire Barach, another son of Cahir More, were descended the O'Gormans, O'Mullens, O'Mooneys, &c. The other chief families of Leinster of the Heremonians, descended from the same stock as the ancestors of Cahir More, were the Mac Gillpatrick, or Fitzpatrick, princes of Ossory; the O'Dwyers, chiefs in Tipperary; the O'Nolans, chiefs in Carlow; the O'Brenaus, chiefs

Art, son of Teige, the son of Ualgarg (O'Rourke), was chosen in opposition to him, from Slieve-an-in Kilkenny, &c. Of the Irian race, or Clanna Rory of Ulster, some powerful families were settled in Leinster, as the O'Moore's, princes of Leix in the Queen's county; the O'Lawlors, &c. An account of all the above-named chiefs and clans, and others of Leinster, will be given in the course of this article, and in subsequent notes.

The monarch Tuathal, in the second century, having conquered and beheaded Eochy Aincheann, king of Leinster, of whom an account has been given above, appointed as king of that province his brother Eric, a prince of Damnonian or Firbolg descent.

Battle of Maistean.—In the time of the monarch Con of the Hundred Battles, in the second century, Eochy, son of Eric, the Damnonian king of Leinster, according to O'Flaherty, having refused to pay the Leinster tribute, Con marched a powerful army to enforce its payment, but was defeated in a great battle at Maistean, now the Rath of Mullaghmast in Kildare, in which several thousands were slain, and Eochy, king of Leinster, led his victorious forces to the palace of Tara, of which he held possession for four years.

Battle of Cnucha.—Con of the Hundred Battles having appointed Criomthan, the son of Niacorb, as king of Leinster, Criomthan endeavoured to exclude from power the posterity of Cahir More. At this time Cumhal, a celebrated chief, and father of the renowned Feinian hero Fionn Mac Cumhail, was commander of the Leinster warriors named Clanna Baoisgne, who were so called from Baoisgne, the grandfather of Cumhal, and having formed the project of dethroning the monarch Con, and restoring the race of Cahir More, he assembled his forces, and in conjunction with the Heberians of Munster, headed by their heroic king Eogan More, he marched to oppose Con. The monarch Con having collected all his forces, the two powerful armies, about A. D. 190, fought a terrific battle at Cnucha, in Moy Liffey, according to the Book of Ballymote, in which many thousands were slain on both sides, but the victory was at length won by the troops of the monarch Con, chiefly through the valour of the celebrated warrior Goll, the son of Morna, a champion of Damnonian or Firbolg descent, who commanded the Connaught forces, and slew the heroic Cumhal in single combat. This battle was fought, as above stated, at Magh Liffe, or the Plain of the Liffey, at a place called Cnucha or Knock, which signifies a hill, and is considered to be the place now called Castleknock, near Dublin.

Battle of Cnamhrois.—About A. D. 290, Cairhre Liffeachair, or Carby of the Liffey, so called from having been brought up near that river, monarch of Ireland, in order to enforce the Leinster tribute, invaded that province, but his forces were defeated by the Lagenians, in a great battle fought at Cnamhrois in Leinster, in which nine thousand of the monarch's troops, together with three of his sons, were slain.

Eana Cinsealuch, a warlike prince, a descendant of Cahir More, became king of Leinster about the middle of the fourth century; and it is stated that he and his allies, the Munster troops, under their king, Lughaidh Lamhdearg, of the race of the Dalcassians, defeated in fifteen great battles the forces of Eochy Muighmeodon, monarch of Ireland, who had repeatedly invaded Leinster, attempting to recover the Boarian tribute; and in one of these battles the monarch Eochy was slain. Eochy, son of Eana Cinsealach, is said to have been the first Christian king of Leinster, in the beginning of the fifth century. This prince, being very valiant and ambitious, aspired to the monarchy of Ireland, and even fixed his residence for a short time at the royal palace of Tara, in opposition to Niall of the Nine Hostages, who was then monarch of Ireland, but being reprimanded by the Arch-Druid of Tara for his unwarrantable conduct in attempting to usurp the throne, he relinquished his pretensions and retired from Tara. Eochy having afterwards slain the son of Laidghan, who was the favourite Druid of Niall, the monarch invaded Leinster, and defeated the forces of the province, and having demanded Eochy to be delivered into his hands, he caused him to be chained to a great stone, and the Druid whose son he had slain being resolved to put him to death, sent nine soldiers for that purpose; but Eochy, who was a man of immense strength, seeing them advance, made a prodigious effort, and having broken his chain, set upon the assassins, most of whom he slew, and made his escape; having fled to North Britain, he afterwards followed the monarch Niall, who had made a military expedition into Gaul, and watching an opportunity, he discharged a poisoned arrow at the king, and slew him while reclining unawares on the banks of the Loire, and thus fell the celebrated monarch Niall of the Hostages. The great pillar-stone to which Eochy was chained remains to this day, as stated by Keating and others, a short distance south of Tullyophelim, or Tullow, on the west side of the river Slaney, in the county of Carlow, and is called Cloch-an-Phoill, signifying the stone with the hole. According to the ancient Irish MS. called the Book of Leinster, which is contained in the Books of Leacan and Ballymote, these perforated stones were originally erected for the purpose of punishing criminals, who were bound to them by chains. There are several of these perforated pillar-stones, called hole-stones, still remaining in various parts of Ireland, amongst others, one at Doagh, in the county of Antrim, another in the church-yard of Castledermot, in Kildare, and one near the church of Kilmelchedar, in Kerry.

Iarain eastward, by the O'Reillys, the people of Tulloghonoho (Mac Tiarnans), and the tribe

Battle of Athadara.—A. D. 457, Laoghaire, monarch of Ireland, son of Niall of the Hostages, having invaded Leinster with a powerful army to levy the Boarian tribute, was defeated by the Leinster forces under Criomthan, king of Leinster, son of Eana Cinsealach, in a great battle at Atha Dara, or the Ford of the Oaks, either on the river Barrow, or Liffey, in the county of Kildare, in which many thousands of the troops of Laoghaire were slain, and he himself taken prisoner, but he was liberated on solemnly swearing by the Sun, Moon, and Wind, which were the three chief deities of the Druids, that he would never again attempt to recover the Leinster tribute; it is however recorded, that Laoghaire having violated his oaths, was, as a punishment for his perjury, struck dead by lightning, A. D. 462, at a place called Greallach Dabhuill, near the river Liffey. A. D. 476, Fraoch, king of Leinster, was slain in a great battle fought at Granard, in the present county of Longford, of which an account is given in the Annals of the Four Masters; at Granard is a large moat, the sepulchral mound of some ancient king or warrior.

Battle of Cell Osnadh.—In the reign of Lughaidh, monarch of Ireland, a great battle was fought at Cell Osnadh, or Moy Fea, about four miles eastward of Leighlin, in the county of Carlow, between the armies of Leinster and Munster, the Leinster forces being commanded by Murtogh, son of Earca, Iollan, son of Dunlaing, king of Leinster, and Eochy Guineach, or Eochy the wounder, and the men of Munster by their king Aongus, the son of Natfraoich; in which, after many thousands were killed on both sides, the Munster forces were defeated, and Aongus himself, together with Eithne his queen, were slain. A further account of this battle is given in the Four Masters.

Battle of Bealach Duin or Dun Bolg.—Brandubh, or the Black Raven, so called from the colour of his hair, a descendant of Cahir More, became king of Leinster in the latter end of the sixth century; he is celebrated as having granted to St. Maidoc, Moeg, or Aedan, the territory about Ferns, where that saint founded the cathedral and see of Ferns. In the time of Brandubh, Aodh, monarch of Ireland, son of Airmireach, marched a powerful army into Leinster, for the recovery of the Boarian tribute, but was defeated by the Leinster forces under Brandubh, in a great battle at Bealach Duin, or Dun Bolg, in Hy Kinsellagh, fought A. D. 594, in which many thousands of the royal troops, together with the monarch Hugh himself, were slain. This battle appears to have been fought in some part of Wexford or Wicklow, near the sea shore; the place called Dun-Bolg, signifies the fortress of the Firbolg or Belgians, and in a verse quoted from an ancient poet, by the Four Masters, it is stated that "the wave which the tempest carries against the shore, indicates the sepulchre where lies the arrow by which Hugh, the son of Airmireach, was slain."

Battle of Almaine.—Fergal, monarch of Ireland, in the beginning of the eighth century, having collected all the forces of Leath of Malachy Mac Rannall, in consequence of which the entire of the Gairbh-thrian of Connaught¹ was put into commotion.

Cathal, son of Hugh Mac Guire, a worthy heir to the lordship of Fermanagh, the most distinguished man of his time, in his own country, for noble deeds, died.

Peregrine, son of Niall O'Mulloy, died.

Cuinn, or Meath, Ulster, and Connaught, amounting to twenty-one thousand men, marched into Leinster to enforce payment of the Boarian tribute, and Donogh, the son of Murrogh, king of Leinster, and Hugh, son of Colgan, heir presumptive to the crown of that province, having assembled the Leinster forces, a tremendous battle was fought between them at Almluin, in which the monarch's army was defeated, and Fergal himself, together with one hundred and sixty chosen chiefs fell, and seven thousand soldiers on both sides were slain. This battle, under the name of Cath Almhaine, is celebrated in Irish history, and was fought at the Hill of Allen, in Kildare, according to O'Flaherty's Ogygia, on the 11th of December, A.D. 722, and an account of the various chiefs slain in this battle is given in the Four Masters, who quote a passage from an ancient poet, which states that "Donogh, the son of Murrogh the noble, and Hugh, the son of Colgan of the red sword, slew Fergal the claimer of tributes, in the famous battle of Almhaine."

Battle of Ath Senaith or Uchbadh.—Aodh Ollan, monarch of Ireland, having collected the forces of Meath, Ulster, and Connaught, marched into Leinster, and Aodh, the son of Colgan, king of Leinster, led the forces of that province to oppose them, and a furious battle was fought between them, in which the army of Leinster was totally defeated, and nine thousand of them slain, together with their king, Hugh, the son of Colgan, who was killed in single combat by the monarch, Hugh Ollan. Amongst the princes slain in the Leinster army are mentioned Hugh, the son of Congalach, king of Hy Kinsellagh, and Brann, the son of Murrogh, king presumptive of Leinster, with many other princes and chiefs. The Four Masters state that heroes were slain, bodies decapitated, and the Lagenians overwhelmed, scattered, and destroyed in this direful battle, and that only a few persons fled from it to tell the tale; and in a verse quoted by them from an ancient poet, it is said that "from the fierce battle of Uchba, in which Fenians or heroes were destroyed, there had not been before such a clang of white arrows by the men of Leinster, in Ireland;" and in a verse on this battle, by the monarch, Hugh Ollan himself, it is said "the great Hugh was in that battle, the king was there in his ire, the great Shannon mourned that fight near the church of Kieran of Clonmacnois." It appears by the above passage, that this battle was fought at a ford on the Shannon, near Clonmacnois, and was probably the place now known as Shannon Bridge. The battle of Ath Senaith, or Uchba, was fought, according to the Four Masters, A.D. 733, but according to the Annals of Tigearnach, quoted in O'Flaherty's Ogygia, (vol. II., p. 376), it was fought on a Wednesday, the 14th of September, A.D. 738.

Battle of Rath Beathach.—In the reign of Donal, son of Murrogh, monarch of Ireland, A.D. 749, the Piets of Ulster, with a powerful force, invaded Leinster, but were defeated by the troops of that province, in a great battle fought at Rath Beathach, in Ossory, now Rathbeagh, near Kilkenny, in which Cathasach, their general, son of Oilíoll, king of the Piets, together with an immense number of his men, were slain.

Battle of Beallach Mughna, or Moy Ailbe, fought A.D. 908, at Ballymoon, or Ballaghmoon, on the borders of Carlow and Kildare, in which the Munster forces, under Cormac Mac Cullenan, archbishop of Cashel, and king of Munster, were defeated, and six thousand of them slain, together with Cormac Mac Cullenan himself, by the army of the monarch Flann Siunua, has been described in the note on Ormond.

In the ninth, tenth, and eleventh centuries, are recorded repeated ravages of the Danes in Wexford, Wicklow, and Carlow, and destruction of abbeys, churches, &c., as those of Ferns, Glendalough, Leighlin, and other places.

Battle of Glen-Mama.—The people of Leinster refusing to pay the tribute imposed on them by Brian Boru, confederated with the Danes of Dublin, and their combined forces, under Harold, the son of Aulaf, and Coilen, son of Etigen, with the nobles of Dublin, and the men of Leinster, under their king Maolmordha, fought a great battle at Glenn Mama, with the troops of Munster, under Brian Boru, and his son Murrogh, aided by Malachy, monarch of Ireland, with the men of Meath. The Danish forces, and their Lagenian allies, were totally defeated, and five thousand of them, according to some accounts, and according to Mae Geoghegan, six thousand were slain, together with Harold, the son of Aulaf, Coilen, the son of Etigen, and many other chiefs. The Four Masters quote the following passage from an ancient poet, on this battle: "they came to the valley of Mama, and having no water convenient, they were forced to drink of the unhealthy pools, and fought with stones towards the end of the battle; the victory was gained triumphantly by the kings, as far as the northern woods, and they burned Dublin the beautiful, after laying waste the plain of Leinster." This battle was fought A.D. 999, or according to the Four Masters, 998, at Glen Mama, a valley near Dunlavin, on the borders of Wicklow and Dublin. After the victory Brian and Malachy came to Dublin, where they remained a week, and took from the Danes great quantities of gold and silver, with many captives, burned the fortress and expelled Sitric, son of Aulaf, king of the foreigners. In the same year Donal, son of Donal Claon, king of Leinster, was taken prisoner by Sitric, and the Danes of Dublin; and A.D. 1018, Brann, son of Mulmora, king of Leinster, was taken prisoner by the Danes of Dublin, who pulled out his eyes, of which punishment he died.

Battle of Delgany or Delgene, called also Derge Mogoroc, in Hy Briuin Cualainn, now Delgany, in the county of Wicklow, was fought, according to the Four Masters, A.D. 1021, between the Danish forces of Dublin, commanded by their king Sitric, and the men of Leinster, under Ughaire, son of Dunlaing, king of that province (to avenge the death of Brann, king of Leinster, who had been killed by the Danes), in which the Danish forces were defeated with great slaughter; and according to Mae Geoghegan, six thousand of them slain. Mulmora Mac Murrogh was king of Leinster in the latter end of the tenth, and beginning of the eleventh century, and was conspicuous in those times for having assisted the Danes at the battles of Glen Mama and Clontarf, in the latter of which he was slain; from his father Murrogh, the family took the name of Mac Murrogh. Dermot, surnamed Maol-na-mBo, of the same family, became king of Leinster about A.D. 1030; he was married to a daughter of Donogh O'Brien, king of Munster, and being a very warlike prince, and having reduced to subjection the people of Munster, Connaught, and Meath, and compelled them to give him hostages and tribute, he was for some years acknowledged as monarch of Ireland; and it is stated by O'Halloran and others, that he made the people of Wales and the Hebrides his tributaries; an account of his various battles is given in Mae Geoghegan. Having defeated the Danes of Dublin, he became king over them, but after many years of power as chief king of Ireland, Dermot having entered into a contest with Conor O'Melaghlin, king of Meath, his forces were defeated by the men of Meath with great slaughter, and he himself slain in a fierce battle fought at Odhbha, in Meath, according to O'Flaherty's Ogygia, on Tuesday, the 7th of February, A.D. 1072. Dermot Mac Maol-na-mBo, is praised as an excellent prince by many writers, and Caradoc of Lancarvan, in his Welsh Chronicle, says he was one of the best and worthiest princes that ever reigned in Ireland—"Dermotum optimum et dignissimum principem qui unquam in Hibernia regnavit." Murrogh Mac Murrogh became king of Leinster, and assumed great authority over the Danes of Dublin; but in a conference held with them in that city, about A.D. 1150, Murrogh was assassinated, and his body ignominiously buried along with that of a dog, as stated in Hammer's Chronicle. Dermot Mac Murrogh, his son, is notorious in Irish history for Ferceart, the son of Higgin, the son of Gillananev O'Higgin, the chief of the race of Gillananev O'Higgin, died.

his abduction of the wife of Tiarnan O'Rourke, prince of Brefney and his invitation of the English to Ireland as allies under Strongbow and his followers, for the recovery of his kingdom of Leinster, from which he had been expelled by king Roderick O'Connor; he is called by the Irish writers Diarmaid-na-nGall, that is Dermot of the Foreigners, from his having brought over the English, and he gave Eva his daughter, by his wife, the daughter of O'Moore, prince of Leix, in marriage to Strongbow, at Waterford, A. D. 1171, and conferred on him the title of heir presumptive to the kingdom of Leinster. An account of Dermot Mac Murrough and of Strongbow, has been given in notes in these Annals at the years 1171, 1176, and also in the notes on Ormond and Desies. Donal Caomh-anach, or Cavenagh, a son of Dermot Mac Murrough, succeeded partly to the inheritance of the kingdom of Leinster, and from him some of his descendants took the name of Cavenagh, or Mac Murrough Cavenagh. The Mac Murroughs maintained their independence, and held the title of kings of Leinster, with large possessions in Wexford and Carlow, down to the reign of Elizabeth, and many celebrated and valiant chiefs of them are mentioned in the course of these annals, who waged war with the English for many centuries. Art Mac Murrough Cavenagh, of whose exploits in his contests with the English forces, under king Richard II., an account has been given in a note in these annals, at A. D. 1399, was one of the most celebrated chiefs; and Donal O'Cavenagh, surnamed Spainagh, or the Spaniard, was a famous leader in Leinster, in the wars against Elizabeth. The ancient kings of Leinster had fortresses, or royal residences, at Dinnrigh, near the river Barrow, between Carlow and Leighlin, and at the Naas in Kildare, and in after times had castles at the city of Ferns, in Wexford, which was their capital, and also at Old-Ross, in Wexford, and at Ballymoon, in Carlow. The Mac Murroughs were inaugurated as kings of Leinster, at a place called Cnoc-an-Bhogha, attended by O'Nolan, the king's marshal, chief of Forth, in Carlow, by O'Doran, chief Brehon of Leinster, and by Mae Keogh, his chief bard. The Mac Murroughs are thus designated in the topographies of O'Dugan and O'Heerin:—

"Let us now proceed to Leinster,
An extensive land of wealthy warriors,
Of lasting fame are the mansions of the heroes,
Where lie the tombs of the valorous Gael.

"In the east I shall now enumerate
The generous chiefs of the province in due order,
A scion from whom no unkindness we'll receive,
With Mae Murrough we take our abode.

"We give the lead from the chiefs of the Gael
To the princes of the clans of Cahir;
Let us mention respectively in the eastern country
Each chief of them over his own territory.

"The high king of Naas, the tree of Brogha,
The lord of Leinster is Mac Murrough,
The province he holds in his possession,
The Fenian hero charters all its lands."

The O'Cavenaghs in modern times became the representatives of the Mac Murroughs, kings of Leinster, and there are several respectable families of the name in the counties of Carlow and Wexford, the head of whom is O'Cavenagh of Borris, in Carlow. The O'Cavenaghs held a territory called Hy Cavenagh, now the barony of Idrone East, in Carlow.

The following accounts of the chiefs and clans of Wexford, Wicklow, and Carlow, and the territories possessed by each, have been collected from the topographies of O'Heerin, O'Dugan, O'Brien, O'Halloran, and various other sources. It appears that O'Dugan collected part of the topography of Leinster, but it was chiefly compiled by O'Heerin, of whom an account has been al-

David, son of Tanaidhe O'Maolconry, died of a plague at his own house at Coillmhore-na-mBreathnach, after repentance and extreme unction, and ready given in the notes on Thomond and Desmond, and other places. O'Heerin thus commences his topography:—

"An addition of knowledge on sacred Erin,
He is not a good historian who is not a sage,
A proper history from me, of the tribes,
And of the hosts from the flowing Boyne.

"Such as have been omitted by another
Of the nobles of Fola (Ireland) of the verdant plains,
Of all those tribes I shall treat,
From the hospitable mansion of each lord.

"This portion which was divided by Con
O'Dugan the fair and brown-haired;
Neglected the history of its men,
Which is not unbecoming to relate.

"It was not ignorance that caused him thus
Not to compose it from the first day;
This task however he has left to me,
As he neglected the sons of Cahir.

"The portion of Con of the mirthful heart,
He has composed from ancient records;
He has mentioned all both east and west,
Each man entitled to property.

"Leath Mogha, the portion of Heber the Fair,
The two southern territories of Erin;
Thus the plain of Leinster is mine,
And each brave man to the bay of Limerick.

"These two provinces of the lands of the Gael,
And the country of the clans of Cahir;
The hosts of various districts from land to sea,
We shall give to each their own territories.

"The southern part of fair Fola,
We mark by our journey from the fortress of Dublin,
Westward to Burren by a rising ridge,
This land which is so fairly divided."

I. O'Tuathail or O'Toole, chief of Hy Muiredhaigh, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"O'Toole of the fortress famous for mead,
Is chief of the valiant tribe of Hy Murray,
As far as Almain of melodious music,
Of verdant, grassy, fertile plains."

Hy Murray was an extensive territory in the western part of Wicklow, comprising the greater part of the present baronies of Talbotstown and Shillelagh, in that county; and it appears from the poem that the power of the O'Tooles extended as far as Almain, now the hill of Allen, in the county of Kildare, thus containing a great portion of the baronies of Naas, Kilcullen, Killea and Moone, and Connell, in that county. The O'Tooles were in ancient times styled princes of Imaile, which appears to have been a name applied to their territory, and is still retained in the Glen of Imaile, in Wicklow, where they had their chief residence; and they also had castles at Carnew, Castlekevin, Castledermot and other places. They took their name from Tuathail, one of their princes in the tenth century, and being one of the head families of Leinster, of the same race as the Mac Murroughs, they were eligible to be kings of that province. The celebrated St. Laurence O'Toole, archbishop of Dublin at the time of the English invasion, was son of Murtogh O'Toole, prince of Imaile, and many distinguished chiefs of the name are mentioned in the course of these annals. They maintained their rank, and held large possessions down to the Elizabethan and Cromwellian wars, when their estates were confiscated; several of them were knighted at various periods, and Sir Charles O'Toole, an officer in was buried in the monastery of John the Baptist, in the town of Trim, and this David was the son of the chief professor of Siol Murray (Rosecommon).

Dermod Roe, the son of Torlogh Oge O'Connor, died.

king James's army, is said to have been the person who killed the Duke Schomberg at the battle of the Boyne, and several of them were distinguished officers in the Irish Brigades in the service of France and Spain. The O'Tooles are still numerous in the counties of Wicklow, Dublin, and Kildare. II. O'Brain, O'Broin, or O'Byrne, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"Another exalted noble tribe,
Are the O'Byrnes, a clan fierce in pursuit."

The O'Byrnes took their name from Brann, one of their chiefs in the tenth century, were powerful chiefs, and possessed an extensive territory in the county of Wicklow, called Ily Briuin Cualan, comprising the greater part of the barony of Ballinacor, which was called O'Byrne's country, and also the Ranelagh; hence they were styled lords of Ranelagh, and had their chief castle at Ballinacor. The O'Tooles and O'Byrnes, at the head of the Wicklow clans, for a period of three hundred years, maintained an incessant warfare with the English forces, whom they defeated in numerous fierce engagements; many valiant chiefs of the O'Byrnes are mentioned in those times, particularly Pheagh Mac Hugh O'Byrne, who was a famous leader in the wars against Elizabeth. It appears from Cambrensis Eversus, that the O'Byrnes were nominated chiefs by the Mac Keoghs, at a place called Dun Caillighe Beirre. The O'Byrnes are still numerous in Wicklow, Dublin, Kildare, and many other parts of Ireland, and there are several respectable families of the name. III. O'Ceallaigh, or O'Kelly, and O'Taidhg or O'Teige, are given by O'Heerin as chiefs of Hy Maile, and of Ily Teigh, and are thus mentioned:

"O'Teige obtained a productive country,
Imaile, a land which is free from gloom;
O'Kelly obtained Ily Teigh eastward
By purchase for his valiant clan."

This ancient family of O'Teige have anglicised the name to Tighe, and the O'Kellys here mentioned were of the same race as the Mac Murroghs, O'Tooles, O'Byrnes, and other families called Cahirians, or Leinster Hecnonians, and therefore of a different descent from the O'Kellys, princes of Ily Maine in Galway. The O'Kellys were chiefs in Criche Cualan, a name which was applied to the northern part of Wicklow, and comprised the baronies of Rathdown, Newcastle, and Arklow. IV. Mae Giollamocholmoge is given by O'Heerin, as a chief of Cualan, and thus mentioned:

"A lord whose lands are rich and verdant,
Is the gentle Mae Giollamocholmoge,
Free and powerful warriors in their woods,
They rule over the mild men of Cualan."

The chief called Mae Giollamocholmoge, is mentioned in the contests of the Anglo-Normans, under Strongbow and his followers, with the Danes of Dublin. V. O'Cosgraidh, O'Cosgry or O'Cosgrave, and O'Fiachraidh, other chiefs in Cualan, are thus mentioned by O'Heerin and O'Dugan:

"Other princely chiefs also obtained this land,
The nut-producing country of the plain of Cualan,
O'Cosgrave of the numerous clan,
Rules over the saffron-clad conquering warriors."

"The prince of Ily Nennehlais in the east,
Is O'Fiachry of the extensive lands,
The subduer of the foreigners resides here,
I mean O'Cosgrave on the plain of Cualan."

VI. O'Gaithin or O'Gahan, and O'Dunlaing, probably O'Dowling, Murrogh, son of Bryan O'Flaherty, lord of West Connaught, died.

O'Neill went to the house of Owen O'Neill, and having amicably concluded a peace with each other, he restored his lordship to O'Neill.

are given by O'Heerin as chiefs of Siol Elaigh and the Lagan, and thus mentioned:

"The race of Elaigh, the tribe of steeds,
To protect which is proper for O'Gahan,
Chief of the clan, powerful in friendship,
O'Dunlaing was the warrior of the Lagan."

The territory of these chiefs called Siol Elaigh, is now the barony of Shilelagh, in the south of Wicklow. VII. O'Murehadha or O'Murphy, chief of Criche O'Felme or Ily Feidhlime, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"An extensive and profitable lordship
Was obtained by O'Murphy of smooth and fair plains,
The country of Ily Felimy the chief received
An inheritance handed down from his ancestors."

The O'Murphys were one of the Cahirian families of Leinster, a branch of the same race as the Mae Murroghs, kings of that province. The territory of Ily Felimy, which they possessed, extended along the sea coast, and was commonly called the Murrowes, and comprised the barony of Ballaghkeen, in the county of Wexford. The O'Murphys were powerful chiefs in ancient times, and at the present day the name is one of the most numerous in Ireland, and found in all the counties of Leinster, and in various parts of Munster, Connaught, and Ulster, and there are many respectable and wealthy families of them in various parts of Ireland. VII. O'Gairbhídh, or O'Garvey, another chief in Ily Felimy, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"In Ily Felimy, a delightful district,
Fair are the lands possessed by the O'Garveys,
Fenian heroes of the hill unite in the tribe,
Each man of whom is free from grief and sorrow."

IX. O'Cosgraidh or O'Cosgrave, chief of Beantraidhe, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"From the Barrow eastward to the Slaney,
Is the country possessed by the Clan Cosgrave,
The host of Bantry of ringletted hair,
A noble tribe with hawk-like sparkling eyes."

The territory possessed by the O'Cosgrave, is now the barony of Bantry, in the county of Wexford. X. O'Duibhlin, probably O'Dugan, another chief, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:—

"Lord of the extreme southern land,
Which is worthy of being recorded,
O'Dugan is its rightful inheritor,
Over the host from the dark pool of the fair shrubs."

The territory of this chief being mentioned as in the extreme southern land, must have been in the barony of Shelburne, in Wexford. XI. O'Loreain, or O'Larkin, chief of Fothart, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:—

"The Fenian heroes of Forth of the Carn,
The fair rising ground of strength and beauty,
A hero whose deeds are mighty in spears,
He is the affluent chief O'Larkin."

The territory possessed by this chief, is now the barony of Forth, in the county of Wexford, and Carn, where he had his fortress, is the head land called Carnsore point. XII. O'Hartghoile, Teige, son of Donal O'Kelly, lord of Clan Mac Owen (in Galway), died.

probably O'Hartly, chief of Crioch-na-gCenel, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin :

"Criochnageneal, a delightful district
In the land of the fertile soil,
A country the fairest under the sun,
Its rightful inheritor is O'Hartley."

This territory appears to have been situated near O'Larkin's country, above-mentioned. XIII. O'Riaghain, O'Riaian, or O'Ryan, sometimes written O'Maolrian, or O'Mulrian, lord of Hy Drona, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin :

"Hereditary to O'Ryan is a fair district,
A territory, extensive is the land,
Hy Drona of peaceful pleasures,
It is more fitting for him than a strange country."

The territory of Hy Drona comprised the present baronies of Idrone, in the county of Carlow, which was in ancient times possessed by the O'Ryan, who were powerful chiefs, and styled princes of Hy Drona, and many of them are mentioned in early times in the Four Masters, and Annals of Inisfallen. An account of the O'Ryan, who had extensive possessions in Tipperary, and were a branch of the O'Ryan of Carlow, has been given in the note on Ormond. The O'Ryan are still very numerous in Carlow and Tipperary, and there are many respectable families of the name in those counties. XIV. O'Nuallain, O'Nolan, or O'Nowlan, chief of Fotharta Feadha, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin :

"O'Nolan, a faultless hero,
The truly hospitable head chief of Fothart."

The territory of Fotharta, possessed by the O'Nolans, is now the barony of Forth, in the county of Carlow; they were chiefs of note in ancient times, and appear to have been marshals of Leinster, as, according to Cambrensis Eversus, they presided at the inauguration of the Mac Murroghs as kings of Leinster. Several chiefs of the O'Nolans are mentioned in the course of these annals, and the name is still numerous and respectable in the counties of Carlow and Wexford. XV. The O'Kinsellaghs, O'Cahills, O'Doyles, O'Bolgers, and Mac Coskleys, were numerous and powerful clans, and had large possessions in the county of Wexford and Carlow. The O'Briens, or Mac Briens, and O'Moore, were also respectable families in Wexford. The O'Dorans held the high office of hereditary Brehons of Leinster, and being the chief judges of that province, had extensive possessions under the ancient kings.

Wexford was formed into a county in the reign of king John, and was, as already stated, part of the ancient territory of Hy Kinsellagh, and was called by the Irish writers the county of Lough Garman, as already explained in the preceding part of this article; it was also called Cantae Riavach, signifying the Grey County, from some peculiar greyish appearance of the country, which Camden incorrectly states to have meant the Rough County. It got the name of Wexford from the town of Wexford, which was called by the Danes Weisford, signifying the western haven, a name given to it by the Danish colony who possessed that city in the tenth and eleventh centuries. The greater part of Wexford was in former times also sometimes called the county of Ferns, as stated by Spenser, from the city of Ferns, which was the capital of the Mac Murroghs, kings of Leinster.

Carlow was formed into a county in the reign of king John; it was called by the Irish writers Cathairloch and Ceatharlach, anglicised Catherlough, and the name is said to have been derived from Cathair, a city, and loch, a lake, thus signifying the City of the Lake, as it is stated that there was in former times a lake adjoining the place where the town of Carlow now stands; but there is no lake there at present.

Wicklow was formed into a county in the reign of James I., its O'Driscoll More, the White Knight (both in Cork), and his son, died.

name being derived from the town of Wicklow, which, it is said, was called by the Danes Wykinlow or Wykinlough, signifying the harbour of ships; it was called by the Irish Kilmantan, and according to O'Flaherty's Ogygia, the name of Wicklow was derived from the Irish Buidhe Cloch, signifying the yellow stone or rock, and probably so called from the yellow colour of the granite rocks.

Carlow is a fine and fertile county, particularly productive in corn, and famous for butter. Wexford contains much interesting scenery, chiefly along the river Slaney. The majestic mountains, beautiful valleys, and wild glens of Wicklow, so well known to tourists, abound in scenery of surpassing magnificence and beauty; and the county contains many antiquities, particularly the venerable religious ruins of Glendalough. Wicklow was in ancient times covered with extensive forests, and the oak woods of Shillelagh, on the borders of Wicklow and Wexford, were celebrated in former times. Wicklow also contains very valuable mines of copper, lead, iron, and sulphur, and the finest granite quarries in the world, its extensive mountains being composed of granite rocks. The gold mines of Wicklow, celebrated in history, were situated in the mountain of Croghan Kinsellagh, near Arklow, and pieces of solid golden ore, of various sizes, were found in the rivulets, one of which was twenty-three ounces in weight. The silver mines situated at Clonmines, in the county of Wexford, were, as stated in Fraser's Survey of Wexford, worked by the Danes of Wexford in the tenth century, who had a mint, where they struck several coins in that city.

Anglo Norman and English families.—The counties of Waterford and Wexford were intimately connected with the Anglo-Norman invasion under Strongbow and his followers, of which event a full account has been already given in the notes on Ormond and Desies. Dermot Mac Murrogh, king of Leinster, as stated in the preceding part of the present article, after giving his daughter Eva in marriage to Richard de Clare, earl of Pembroke, commonly called Strongbow, at Waterford, in the year 1171, also conferred on him the title of heir presumptive to the kingdom of Leinster. After Dermot's death, Strongbow succeeded to the sovereignty of Leinster in right of his wife Eva, by whom he had an only daughter, Isabel, who became heiress of Leinster, and was married to William Marshall, earl of Pembroke, who, in right of his wife, enjoyed the sovereignty of Leinster. Marshall, earl of Pembroke, had by his marriage with Isabel, five sons and five daughters; all the sons, namely, William, Richard, Gilbert, Walter, and Anselm, became, in succession, earls of Pembroke, and lords or princes of Leinster; but all having died without issue, the male line became extinct; the five daughters were all intermarried into noble families in England, and the different counties of Leinster were divided amongst them and their posterity; of which a full account will be found in Hammer's Chronicle, and in Baron Finglas's Breviate of Ireland in Harris's Hibernica.

In the county of Wexford the noble families of de Mountchensy, and de Valence, in England, in the thirteenth century got large possessions, with the title of lords of Wexford, by intermarriage with a daughter of Marshall, earl of Pembroke, above mentioned; and by intermarriage with the de Valences, the Talbots, earls of Shrewsbury, became lords of Wexford. The chief Anglo-Normans who came over with Strongbow, and got large grants of lands in Wexford, were Maurice Fitzgerald, ancestor of the earls of Kildare and Desmond; Hervey de Monte Marisco, and Robert Fitzstephen. The other old English families who settled in Wexford were, the Carews, Talbots, Devereuxes, Staffords, Sinnotts, Suttons, Keatings, Powers, Walshes, Fitzharrises, Fitzhenrys, Derenzys, Mastersons, Butlers, Browns, Rossiters, Redmonds, Esmonds, Hores, Harveys, Hayes, Hughes, Codds, Commerfords, Colcoughs, Lamberts, Boyces, Morgans, Tottenhams, Rams, Furlongs. In the first volume of the Desiderata Curiosa Hiberniæ, an account is given of various patentees and undertakers who, in the reign of Elizabeth and James I., got extensive grants of the forfeited lands which were confiscated in the county of Wexford. The following persons obtained lots of those lands, varying from five hundred to one

The Calvaeh O'Connor Faily was treacherously taken prisoner by the son of sir Libiner Prene, who sold him to lord Furnival, the king of England's viceroy in Ireland, and the night after he had been taken, he, with his companion in confinement, made his escape to his own house.

thousand, and two thousand acres each, namely, sir Richard Cooke, sir Laurence Esmond, sir Edward Fisher, Francis Blundell, Nicholas Kenny, William Parsons, sir Roger Jones, sir James Carroll, sir Richard Wingfield, marshal of the army, sir Adam Loftus, sir Robert Jacob, captain Trevillian, captain Fortescue, and to Conway Brady, the queen's footman, six hundred acres. Several families of the old proprietors in Wexford are enumerated, with the lands they possessed, and the regrants of part of those lands which they obtained, as the Mastersons, Mac Murroughs, Mac Briens, Mac Dowlings, Mac Dermotts, Malones, Cavenagh's, Moores, O'Bolgers, O'Dorans, Sinnotts, Walshes, Codd's, &c.

In Carlow the following have been the chief old English families. The family of de Bigod, earls of Norfolk, by intermarriage with the daughter of William Marshall, earl of Pembroke, already mentioned, became lords of Carlow in the thirteenth century; and in A. D. 1346, the county of Carlow was granted to Thomas Plantagenet or de Brotherton, earl of Norfolk, and marshal of England, and his successors, the Mohrars and Howards, dukes of Norfolk, possessed the county of Carlow down to the reign of Henry VIII., when they were deprived of it in consequence of the law against absentees being enforced; and after that time the Butlers, earls of Ormond, became possessed of a great part of Carlow. It may be here observed, that in the fourteenth century the Courts of Exchequer and Common Pleas were for a long period held at Carlow. The other chief English families who settled in Carlow were the following: the Butlers, Browns, Burtons, Bagnals, Carews, Cookes, Eustaces, Rochforts, Cheevers, Ponsonbys, Astles, Bunburrys, Blaekneys, Doynes, Bruens, &c.

In Wicklow, Maurice Fitzgerald and his descendants in the reigns of Henry II. and King John, got extensive grants of lands about Arklow; and Walter de Riddiesford, who had the title of baron of Brey, got from King John a grant of the lands of Imale, in Wicklow, and of Castledermot in Kildare, both of which belonged to the ancient principality of O'Toole. The other chief English families of Wicklow were the Butlers, Talbots, Eustaces, and Howards.

Nobility.—The following have been the noble families in Wexford, Wicklow, and Carlow, from the reign of King John to the present time.

In Wexford, the de Montchenseys and de Valences, lords of Wexford; the Talbots, earls of Shrewsbury in England, and earls of Waterford and Wexford in Ireland; the family of Petty, marquesses of Landsdown in England, are earls of Shelburne in Wexford; the Butlers, viscounts Mountgarret; the Keatings, barons of Kilmanaman; the Esmonds, barons of Limbrick; the Stopfords, earls of Courtown; the family of Loftus, earls of Ely; the family of Phipps, barons Mulgrave, of New-Ross, in Wexford, earls of Mulgrave, and marquesses of Normanby in England; the Ponsonbys, viscounts of Duncannon; the Annesleys, viscounts Mountmorris; the Carews, barons Carew.

In Carlow, the de Bigods, Mowbrays, and Howards, dukes of Norfolk, were lords of Carlow; the Butlers, barons of Tullyophelin, and viscounts of Tullow; the Carews, barons Idrome; the O'Cavenagh's, barons of Balian; the Cheevers, viscounts Mountleinster; the Fanes, barons of Carlow; the Ogles, viscounts of Carlow; and the Dawsons, viscounts of Carlow; the Knights, earls of Carlow; the celebrated duke of Wharton, lord lieutenant of Ireland in the reign of Queen Anne, was created marquess of Carlow.

In Wicklow, the Howards, earls of Wicklow; the Stuarts, earls of Blessington; and the Boyles, viscounts Blessington; the Wingfields, viscounts Powercourt; the Maynards, barons Maynard; the family of Cole, barons of Ranelagh; and Jones, viscounts Ranelagh; the Butlers, barons of Arklow; the Eustaces, viscounts of Baltinglass; and the Ropers, viscounts of Baltinglass; the Stratfords, barons of Baltinglass and earls of Aldborough; the Probys, earls of Carysfort; the Brabazons, earls of Meath; the Berkeleys, barons of Rathdown; and the family of Monk, earls of Rathdown; the earls Fitzwilliam, in England, have extensive possessions in Wicklow.

Ecclesiastical Divisions.—The following have been the bishops' sees in Wexford, Wicklow, and Carlow.

The See of Sletty.—A church was founded at a place called Sleibht'u, by St. Fiech or Fielus, a celebrated disciple of St. Patrick in the fifth century. Sletty was situated in Ily Kinsellagh, near the river Barrow, about a mile from the present town of Carlow, on the borders of the Queen's county; it gives name to a parish in that county, and the ruins of an ancient church still remain. St. Fiech made Sletty a bishop's see, and in the fifth and sixth centuries it was the chief see of Leinster, but was afterwards annexed to Leighlin.

The See of Leighlin.—A monastery was founded here in the beginning of the seventh century by St. Gobban, and shortly after, St. Molaisre, who was also called Laserian, made Leighlin a bishop's see. In A. D. 630 a great synod of bishops and clergy was held at Leighlin, to regulate the time for the celebration of Easter. The abbey of Leighlin became celebrated under St. Laserian; and it is stated, that at one time it contained fifteen hundred monks. The Diocese of Leighlin comprises the whole of the county of Carlow, a considerable part of the Queen's county, with some portions of Kilkenny and Wicklow.

The See of Ferns was founded by St. Moeg, in the latter end of the sixth century. The name Moeg, in Irish Maolhog, is latinised Maidoc, also Aedanus and Aidanus, and anglicised Moeg, or Maidoc, also Aidan or Edan; Giraldus Cambrensis says "Sanctus Aidanus qui et Hibernice Maidoc dicitur." The celebrated St. Moeg, or Aidan, was a native of that part of Breckney now called the county of Cavan, and founded there the abbey of Dromlane; he afterwards went to Britain, and studied some time under St. David, bishop of Menavia, in Wales, and on returning to Ireland, Brancubh, king of Leinster, granted him the territory about Ferns, where he founded the cathedral and see of Ferns, and died at an advanced age, on the 31st of January, A. D. 632. The see of Sletty, as already stated, was the chief see of Leinster, in the fifth and sixth centuries; but in the beginning of the seventh century, Ferns was made the metropolitan see of that province; hence the bishops were styled bishops of Leinster, and Ferns continued to be the chief see until the beginning of the ninth century, when Kildare was constituted the metropolitan see, and continued so till the twelfth century, when Dublin was constituted archiepiscopal see of Leinster. In the Lives of St. Moeg, quoted by Colgan and Lanigan, it is stated that at a great synod in Leinster, the king Brandubh, with the clergy and people, decreed that the archiepiscopal see of Leinster should be that of St. Moeg, "Deinde facta synodo magna in terra Laganiensium decrevit rex Brandubh et tam laici quam clerici ut archiepiscopatus omnium Laganiensium semper esset in sede et cathedra Sancti Moedoc." Ferns, called in ancient times Fearna Maolhog, or Ferns of Moeg, became a great city, and was the chief residence of the kings of Leinster, but fell into decay from its repeated ravages by the Danes, in the tenth and eleventh centuries. The diocese of Ferns comprises nearly the whole of the county of Wexford, with small portions of Wicklow and Queen's county.

The see of Glendalough was founded by St. Caoingin, or Kevin, in the sixth century. The name in Irish is Gleannaduloch, signifying the valley of the two lakes, it being situated in a beautiful valley containing two lakes, and surrounded with magnificent mountains in the county of Wicklow. Glendalough has been called by Latin writers Episcopatus Bistagniensis, or the Bishopric of the two Lakes; and by Pope Lucius III. it is mentioned as Episcopatus Insularum, or the Bishopric of the Isles. The diocese of Glendalough, in ancient times, comprised the county of Wicklow, and a great part of the county of Dublin; it was annexed to the see of Dublin in the thirteenth century, A. D. 1214, but the archbishops of Dublin being all English, Mac Murrough, lord of Leinster, that is, Donogh, the son of Art Cavenagh, was taken prisoner by lord Furnival, which was a lamentable loss to the Irish.

Thomas Bacach (the lame), the son of the earl of Ormond, having gone to aid the king of England in the war in France, died there while with the king, and the greater part of those who accompanied him from Ireland, died in like manner either in France or England.

Fereadach, son of Teige, the son of Donal O'Kelly, was slain by the grandson of William Oge O'Kelly.

Donogh, the son of Murrough O'Connor, died suddenly in the porch of Sligo castle.

Murrough O'Connor, the intended lord of Offaley; Cathal, the son of Hugh Mac Guire; Dermot Roe, the son of O'Connor Don; Mac Maurice-na-mBrigh, a man of wisdom and learning; O'Dooyiarma; Murrough, son of Cathal, son of Hugh Brefsnach (O'Connor); Gillananeev O'Mithigheine, the Coarb of Beallach; Tomaltach Mac Clancy; the Barry More, and O'Sullivan, died.

A. D. 1420.

The monastery of St. Francis at Askeaton, in Munster, on the banks of the Shannon, in the diocese of Limerick, was founded for Franciscan friars by the earl of Desmond, and he erected there a tomb for himself and his posterity.

Matthew O'Brenan, master, parson, and erenach of Doire Maolain (Derryvullan, in Fermanagh), died on the 6th of the Ides of September.

The erection of the castle of Bundroos (in Leitrim, at the bay of Donegal), was commenced by Bryan, son of Donal, son of Murrough O'Connor; and the Tirconnellians having come with their forces to prevent the work, Bryan collected a party to resist them, consisting of his own kinsmen, O'Rourke (that is Teige), and Mac Donogh, with their respective troops, so that the Tirconnellians did not attempt to pass the entrenchments on the borders on that occasion; but having remained encamped on the coast of Eas Roe (Ballyshannon), the sons of O'Donnell, Niall Garv, Donal, and Neaghtan, came to the plain with a troop of cavalry; the sons of Bryan O'Connor came with another body of cavalry, on the other hand, to reconnoitre Ballyshannon, so that the two forces confronted each other; the Connellians attacked and put to flight the Carburians (people of Carbury, in Sligo), in which defeat John, the son of Bryan O'Connor, Hugh Buidhe Mac Donogh, Cathal, son of Dermot, son of Cormac, son of Roderick, and Owen O'Dowd, were slain; Bryan O'Connor having received intelligence of this disaster, marched with his forces to Moy Eni; in five nights after, Owen O'Connor and Turlogh Carach, the sons of Donal, the son of Murrough, proceeded with a large body of horse across the river at Ballyshannon, at which time the sons of O'Donnell were with their cavalry at Port-na-long (the Port of the Ships), on the opposite side of the cataract, where they were after drinking their wine; Owen having received intelligence of this, attacked them by night, and slew Donal, the son of Torlogh O'Donnell, the intended lord of Tyrconnell, with many others, who are not recorded; Niall O'Donnell fled to the shore, and swam to one of the merchant vessels then in the harbour, and Bryan O'Connor returned home after that victory.

Owen, son of Roderick O'Connor, died on the eighth of the Kalends of March, and was interred at Clonmacnois.

Teige, son of Fergal O'Hara, tanist of Lieney, died.

Cathal, son of Teige Mac Clancy, chief of Dartry (in Leitrim), and Hugh Buidhe Mac Clancy, were slain in Cathal's house by their own kinsmen, Teige, Maurice, and Henry, about the festival of St. Bridget.

The earl of Ormond, lord justice of Ireland, could not obtain peaceable possession of it till the fifteenth century. Glendalough, in ancient times, was a celebrated seat of learning and religion, and contained a large city; but being repeatedly ravaged by the Danes, during the ninth and tenth centuries, and by the English in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, it fell into complete decay; but its former greatness is sufficiently demonstrated by the extensive ruins of a cathedral and seven churches, a round tower, and other interesting antiquities, which still remain.

An account of the ancient literature of Leinster will be given in the notes of subsequent numbers.

A. D. 1410.

1. Gairbh Thrian Chonnacht, signifying the rough district of Connaught, comprised, as it appears by the Annals, the greater part of both Brefsnes, that is, of West Brefsney, or Leitrim, and of East Brefsney, or the county of Cavan.

was in war with the people of Ulster, aiding O'Neill, and he brought Mae Gennis under subjection, and delivered his hostages to O'Neill.

William, son of Malachy, son of William O'Kelly, the intended lord of Hy Mainc, a man full of prosperity and hospitality, died after the victory of extreme unction and repentance.

O'Neill, that is Donal, having been expelled from the province of Ulster by Owen O'Neill, and the son of O'Neill of Claneboy, and by Niall Garv O'Donnell, and all the chiefs of the province, came to Sligo to the house of Bryan (O'Conor), son of Donal, son of Murtogh, lord of North Connaught.

A contest arose in Fermanagh between Hugh Mac Guire and the Mae Guire, in which Donal, the son of Hugh, was slain.

The Barry More (that is John), died. Hugh Buidhe O'Fallon, died.

Giolla-na-naomh O'Huidhrin,¹ a learned historian; Roderick, son of David O'Duigenan, another learned historian; and Fergal O'Daly, chief poet of Coreomroe (in Clare), died.

The bishopric of Raphoe was obtained for O'Gallagher (Laurence or Lughlin O'Gallagher).

Eachmarcach Roe Mac Conmidhe, a very learned poet, died.

A. D. 1421.

Nicholas Mac Brady,¹ bishop of Brefney, a man distinguished for his wisdom, piety, continence, and uprightness, died.

Thomas Oge O'Reilly, the most illustrious heir to a lordship, in hospitality and feats of arms, of any in his time, of the race of Aodh Fionn (Hugh, the Fair, king of Connaught in the seventh century), died at his own house (in Cavan).

Roderick, son of Hugh Mac Dermott, lord of Moylurg, a man of general hospitality, died at the Rock (of Lough Key) on the 11th of the Kalends of May, and was buried in the monastery of Boyle; he was succeeded by Toinaltach, the son of Conor.

Murrough O'Conor, lord of Offaley, a man who defeated the English and Irish, who opposed him in many battles, after having gained the victory over the world and the devil, died at his own fortress, and was interred in the monastery of Killaheidh (Killaughey, in King's county).

A contest having arisen between the O'Rourkes and Mac Donoghs, O'Rourke mustered a great force, and O'Donnell, that is, Torlogh, came with his party to relieve and support him, as did also Hugh Mac Guire with his forces, and O'Rourke himself and his people, with all these allies, having marched into Tirerrill, burned the country and slew Cathal, the son of Mac Donogh, and many others on that occasion.

Niall O'Donnell and his forces, and O'Rourke with his troop of cattle-drivers, having marched to the shore of Ballyshannon, the Mac Donoghs, and Cathal, the son of Roderick O'Conor, went in their absence to the fortress of O'Rourke, burned the town (Dromahair, in Leitrim), demolished the castle, and destroyed all the cattle folds of the country; the Connallian forces were at this time encamped at Ardfearna (Glenfarn, in Leitrim), and those of Carbury (in Sligo), were at the castle of Bundroose, and between both parties many men and horses were slain and wounded daily; Murtogh Buidhe, the son of Cosnavaeh O'Dowd, O'Maonaigh, and the son of Donogh Cavenagh, were slain by the Connellians on that occasion; and Hugh, son of Murray Roe Mac Lughlin, was drowned at Ballyshannon; and after that they made peace.

Cathal O'Rourke, and his sons, made a nocturnal attack on Mac Claney at Iniseaoin on Lough Melge (Lough Melvin, county of Leitrim); the guards of the lake, namely, the Mac Gloins, delivered up the boats of the lake to Cathal and his

A. D. 1420.

1. Giolla-na-naomh O'Huidhrin, or Giollanacv O'Heerin, was the celebrated historian and topographer whose work on the topography of Leinster and Munster has been so often quoted, and is given in the annotations annexed to these Annals.

A. D. 1421.

1. Nicholas Mac Brady, bishop of Brefney, or diocese of Kilmore. There were several of the Mac Bradys, of the ancient clan of that name in the county of Cavan, bishops of Brefney or Kilmore, and other sees. Roderick Mac Brady was appointed by Pope Boniface IX. bishop of Brefney, A. D. 1396; and Gilbert Mac Brady was appointed the same year bishop of Ardagh. Nicholas Mac Brady, above-mentioned, bishop of Brefney, died A. D. 1421. Andrew Mac Brady, appointed by Pope Nicholas V. bishop of Kilmore, died A. D. 1456. Thomas Mac Brady, bishop of Kilmore, died A. D. 1511. Richard Brady, bishop of Kilmore, died about the year 1600. Andrew Brady was R. C. bishop of Ardagh, from about 1780 to 1795.—See Ware's Bishops and Brennan's Ecclesiastical History.

sons; and they took young Mac Clancy prisoner, and possessed themselves of the lake, and of its castle; five of the sons of Mac Clancy, and a great number of the men of Dartry, were slain by these, and the other sons of Mac Clancy then went into Carbury, (in Sligo).

More, daughter of Brian O'Brien, the wife of Walter Burke, and previously the wife of Teige O'Carroll (of Ely), the most distinguished woman in Munster in her time, in fame, hospitality, good sense, and piety, died; she was generally called More of Munster.

Cormac of the Wood, the son of Mac Carthy Carbery (in Cork), the best lord's son of Munster of his time, was slain by the sons of Owen Mac Carthy.

The Giolla Riavach O'Clery, a learned historian, died after a well-spent life.

Owen O'Neill was apprehended by the son of O'Neill, of Claneboy, while on his journey to hold a conference with the earl at Dundalk.

Mac Gillpatrick, and the son of Libned Afrene, an Englishman, marched with twelve score soldiers to plunder Leix (in the Queen's county), and they did not halt until they arrived at the monastery of Leix; O'Conor Failey met them there, attacked Mac Gillpatrick and the English, and defeated them with slaughter, and his people gained great prizes of arms, armour, and accoutrements, which belonged to the English; and O'Conor, that is Murrough, then returned home, and having been taken ill of a severe disease, retired to the Friary of Killaghy, entered amongst the monks and took the monastic habit; he appointed his kinsman, Dermot O'Conor, to succeed him, and O'Conor himself died in a month after he became a friar, after a well-spent life.

Art, son of Teige O'Rourke, was appointed the O'Rourke, in opposition to Teige, the son of Tiarnan.

A. D. 1422.

Torlogh, son of Niall Garv O'Donnell, lord of Tirconnell, assumed a monastic habit in the monastery of Eas Roe (Ballyshannon), after having gained the palm over this transitory life, and his son, Niall Garv, was appointed his successor.

Roderick, son of Conor O'Conor, lord of Corcomroe (in Clare), was slain by his own kinsmen, namely, the sons of Felim O'Conor, at his own town in Caislean-na-Dumhcha.

Owen O'Neill was released by his wife and sons from O'Neill of Claneboy.

Dermot, son of Teige Mac Dermott, was slain.

Donal Finn O'Flaherty, was slain by the sons of Donal O'Flaherty.

O'Donnell, that is Niall; O'Neill; Owen O'Neill, and O'Neill of Claneboy, with the chiefs of the province, having proceeded with their forces, burned and plundered the entire of Carbury, as far as Sligo; Owen O'Conor, with Torlogh Carrach and O'Rourke, collected their forces to oppose them at Sligo, and gave battle to the eastern party, in which seven of them were slain by the Conacians, and the others marched from thence into Tirerrill, and spoiled the entire country.

The young Cosnamach Mac Egan, chief professor in Brehonism (laws), of Kinel Fiacha (Mac Geoghegans of Westmeath), and of O'Conor Failey (in King's county), was slain by the sons of O'Melaghlin, by an accidental cast of a javelin.

Niall Garv, son of Torlogh, the son of Niall Garv O'Donnell, having proceeded into Fermanagh, brought Mac Guire, Mac Mahon, and Mac Gennis under subjection, and took them with him to O'Kane, who paid him his tribute; from thence they proceeded, accompanied by the O'Kane, to O'Neill of Claneboy, and to the Glyuns (in Antrim), and they completely plundered the son of John Bissett, and burned the country; they then proceeded into Claneboy, and Magh Line (Moylinny, in Antrim), conveyed their booty to Carrickfergus, and then returned home.

Henry VI.¹ was proclaimed king of England on the 31st of August.

Niall O'Donnell and O'Neill, with the chiefs of the entire province, marched their forces against

A. D. 1422.

1. Henry VI. The death of Henry V. took place at Vincennes, in France, on the 31st of August, A. D. 1422, in the 34th year of his age; he took the title of regent of France, in consequence of his conquests in that country, and was succeeded as king of England by his son Henry VI., then an infant only eight months old, who was soon after proclaimed at Paris king of France, a title borne by the succeeding kings of England down to the reign of George III., when it was abolished by Bonaparte.

O'Neill of Claneboy, took his strongholds, overran his woods, and brought him under subjection; he gave hostages to O'Neill, and they took from him all the treasure he had taken from Owen O'Neill, together with other property.

The same Niall (O'Donnell), having collected the chiefs of the province, namely, O'Neill, the sons of Henry O'Neill; Owen O'Neill, with his sons and kinsmen; the sons of Cú-uladh Roe O'Neill; the people of Fermanagh, and the Orgialians, with Mac Mahon, Mac Guire, Mac Gennis, O'Hanlon, O'Neill of Claneboy, with their forces; the O'Kanes and Conallians, with their galloglasses, and the English of the province, all marched into Connaught; the sons of Cormac Mac Donogh, and the sons of Mulroona Mac Donogh joined these forces, having been dispossessed of their properties by Conor Mac Donogh, their father's brother, his sons, and Tomaltach Oge Mac Donogh, for Mac Donogh erected a castle on the lands belonging to the sons of Mulroona Mac Donogh, at Caisiol-Locha-Deargain (Castledargin in Sligo), completely destroyed their crops, and expelled them afterwards into Mae William Burke's country. It was at their request that this great force came to spoil North Connaught, and the same forces having marched into Carbury, (in Sligo), they slew and wounded several persons at the castle of Bundroos, burned and plundered the country, and then proceeded to Sligo; Owen, the son of Donal (O'Conor), and Torlogh Carrach, attacked and defeated the rear of their forces, slew seven of them, and wounded some of their men and horses; the army remained at Killery (near Sligo), that night, and on the following day marched into Tireragh to spoil the country; O'Dowd came and made peace with Niall, and gave him hostages in behalf of his own country; from thence they proceeded into Tirerrill and Corran, and spoiled and burned the country, and while the sons of Cormac, and the sons of Mulroona (Mac Donogh), were engaged in burning the upper portion of the country, they were overtaken by Tomaltach Oge, and by the sons of Mac Donogh, near Cluain Gad, where a battle took place between them, in which Maurice Mac Cormac, Dermot son of Mulroona Mac Donogh, and the son of Donal Mac Hugh of Gaovach, were slain; the Ultonian forces remained that night at Castledargan, after spoiling the country, and having proceeded to O'Rourke, whom they took prisoner, they returned home across the Erne.

A. D. 1423.

Conor O'Coineoil, the bishop; and O'Bolan, the coarb of Drumeliff, died.

Maurice, son of Matthew, the son of Osgar Mac Guire, archdeacon of Clogher, parson of Aghalurcher, lord of Claoíninsi (Cleenish), and of Rosairthir (Rossory), died on the sixth of the Kalends of May.

Torlogh, son of Niall Garv O'Donnell, lord of Tireonnell, Kinel Moain, and Inisowen, a man of peace, prosperity, and affability, died in a monastic habit, in the monastery of Eas Roe, after having gained the victory of extreme unction and repentance.

O'Neill (Donal), and O'Donnell, (Niall), and Owen the son of Niall, marched with the Irish of Ulster to attack the English; they first proceeded to Traghbally (Dundalk), to the plain of Oriel, to Louth, and from thence to Meath, where they engaged in battle with the king of England's viceroy,¹ in which the commanding knight of the English battalions, with many more of their people, were slain, and the Irish obtained immense booty on that expedition. They then made peace with the English, and put Dundalk, and all the English of the surrounding country, under tribute.

The castle of Ballyshannon was built by Niall, the son of Torlogh O'Donnell.

O'Kennedy Finn, lord of Ormond, and Faolan Mac Gowan, a learned historian, died.

A. D. 1424.

Conor O'Ferrall, bishop of Conmaicne (Ar-

A. D. 1423.

1. The King of England's Viceroy at this time was James Butler, earl of Ormond. In an interlineation in the Annals it is stated, that the English knight above mentioned was slain by Mulroona Mac Sweeney, chief constable of O'Donnell's forces in Connaught, through whose valour the English forces were defeated, and one hundred of them killed in this engagement; and that they compelled the English to agree to a peace and to pay tribute, and that valuable articles and hostages were taken from them as security.

dagh), a man of dignity, honour, benevolence, learning, charity, and humanity, died

Gillaisa, the son of Bryan Mac Tiarnan, heir to the chieftaincy of Tullaghonoho (in Cavan), a man who kept a general house of hospitality, died after the victory of repentance.

A great contest arose among the O'Rourkes, after the death of Hugh Buidhe O'Rourke.

Teige, son of Tiarnan O'Rourke, made peace with the O'Reillys, and with Owen, the son of John O'Reilly; and the lordship of the entire of Brefney, was given to Teige, after he had attacked Art Mac Angaidh (O'Rourke), and burned his town; Art made submission after they had been in contention for the space of four years.

Malachy Mac Cabe, constable of the two Brefneys, of Fermanagh and Orgiall (Monaghan), died of the plague.

A great number of Saxons arrived in Ireland with the earl of Ormond, by which circumstance the English gained great power.

The earl (of Ormond), with the Saxons and the English of Meath, committed great depredations in the plain of Armagh, and in Machaire Mucnamha;¹ they made another attack on Mac Gennis, and demolished his castle at Lough Bricren (Lough Brickland, in the county of Down), and slew his constable of galloglasses, and the greater portion of the garrison of the castle. A great war and commotion arose in the province of Ulster, occasioned by the English on that expedition; the chiefs and nobles of the province, headed by O'Neill, O'Donnell (Niall), and Owen O'Neill, including the lords, warriors, and chiefs, collected their forces to oppose the English; but some of the chiefs of the province having joined the English in that war, namely, Mac-I-Neill of Clanboy, O'Hanlon, and Manus Mac Mahon, Mac Gennis was expelled from his territory by Mac-I-Neill of Clanboy, and the English, and was obliged to take refuge among the Irish of the province.

Mac Gennis, that is Hugh, died of a fit of sickness, and his son Roderick was appointed his successor.

A. D. 1424.

1. Machaire Mucnamha, or the plain of Mucnamha, now the parish of Mucknoe, in the barony of Cremorne, county of Monaghan, in which parish is situated the town of Castle-Blayney.

2. The earl of March was Edmund Mortimer, earl of March and Ulster, who, in 1423, was appointed lord lieutenant, and ar-

Mac William of Clanrickard, that is Ulick Burke, died at his own house, after having gained the victory over the world and the devil.

O'Kelly, lord of Hy Maine, that is Donogh, son of Malachy, son of William, son of Donogh Muinach, was slain by his own brother William's sons, while endeavouring to establish his lordship over them.

Mulroona Mac Sweeney, constable of Tirconnell, the star of defence and bravery of the province, died.

Gillaisa, the son of Bryan Mac Tiarnan, chief of Tullaghonoho, died.

The earl of March,² the king's viceroy, arrived in Ireland about the festival of St. Michael, and the English of Ireland submitted to him.

Roderick Mac Sweeney, the son of Mac Sweeney of Connaught, was slain by Cathal Duv O'Connor, together with several other galloglasses. Conor, son of Murtogh, son of Cathal, son of Hugh Brefney O'Connor, was slain on that occasion.

A. D. 1425.

The bishop Toimineach, namely, Thomas, son of William Duv, son of Maigeog, died a week before the festival of St. Bridget; he was a man full of wisdom, knowledge, and benevolence.

The earl of March, the king of England's viceroy in Ireland, died of the plague about the festival of St. Bridget.

O'Neill, and Owen O'Neill, Naghtan O'Donnell, Mac-I-Neill Clanboy, Mac Quillan, Mac Donnell of the galloglasses, and O'Mellain, the keeper of St. Patrick's adjuration bell, came to the earl's house, and were taken prisoners by lord Furnival,¹ an English earl, after the death of the earl of March, and he took those chiefs with him to Dublin as prisoners.

The Regent of Scotland, that is, Muredach Stuart, with his son Walter Stuart, and the Maormor of Leamhna, were put to death by the king of Scotland, namely, the son of the lame rived in Ireland with a great army; he died of the plague the year following at the castle of Trim, in Meath.

A. D. 1425.

1. Lord Furnival was John Talbot, earl of Shrewsbury, who had a few years before been lord lieutenant of Ireland, and was again appointed to that office.

king, and the other son of the Regent, that is James Stuart, and the son of the earl of Lennox, were expelled into Ireland.²

Owen O'Neill was released from the English.

Bryan Ballaeh, the son of O'Neill Buidhe, the most distinguished man in his time for hospitality, for presents, benevolence, and knowledge in arts and sciences, was slain by the rusties of the Roek (Carrickfergus), together with John, the son of Henry O'Neill.

Gormley, daughter of Donal O'Connor, and wife of Tiarnan O'Rourke, died after repentance.

Teige O'Fallon, chief of Clan Huadaeh (in Roscommon), was treacherously slain in his own castle by his kinsmen.

Roderick Roe O'Higgin, a very learned poet, died.

Magrath, the son of Flynn Magrath, chief poet of Thomond, a man of wealth and prosperity, died.

Mae Gowan of the Stories, that is, Thomas, the son of Gillananeev Mae Gowan, chief historian to O'Loughlin of Coreomroe (in Clare), died.

Bryan Garv and Manus, the sons of Mae Donogh of Tirerrill, that is Mulroona, the son of Teige Mae Donogh, were slain by the sons of their uncle Cathal Mae Donogh.

A. D. 1426.

Naghtan O'Donnell, who was imprisoned with the English, was released by O'Donnell, i. e. Niall, his brother, for whose liberation an immense deal of property was paid, besides leaving another hostage in his place, namely, Torlogh O'Donnell, who however, made his escape from the English, with four others who were confined along with him.

O'Connor Roe, that is Torlogh, the son of Hugh, son of Felim, a man who both spoiled and defended Connaught; a man distinguished for his skill and knowledge in the arts and sciences, died after having gained the victory of repentance, and conquering the world and the devil.

A. D. 1425.

2. Regent of Scotland. Robert Stuart, duke of Albany, was appointed Regent of Scotland, during the minority of James Stuart, heir to the throne; and on the death of Robert, his son Muredach, duke of Albany, became regent. James Stuart having been kept a prisoner many years in England, was at length liberated, and in 1424 became king of Scotland as James I; Muredach, the regent, having aspired to the crown, was beheaded, together with his son Walter, and the earl of Lennox. James Stuart, Felim, son of Murtogh, son of Donal, the son of Murtogh O'Connor, heir to the lordship of North Connaught, died.

Conor O'Brien, lord of Thomond, died at an advanced age on Easter Saturday, and Teige, the son of Brian O'Brien, was appointed his successor.

Torlogh Mac Mahon Bodhar, lord of Coreabaisein (in Clare), was slain and burned at an advanced age, by his own kinsmen, in a nocturnal attack.

Conor Crom, the son of Teige O'Rourke, died.

Roderick, that is, the Mae Gennis, son of Hugh Mae Gennis, was slain in his own house by Bryan Mae Gennis.

Henry Caoch, the son of O'Neill Buidhe, had his eyes put out by his own kinsmen, the sons of Bryan Ballaeh, the son of O'Neill Buidhe.

Teige Mae Gillfinnen, and his son Hugh, were slain by Art, the son of Owen O'Neill.

O'Duigenan, of Kilronan, that is, Philip, the son of David, chief historian of Clan Maolroona (Mae Dermotts, princes of Moylurg), died.

O'Hely More, that is Conor Caoch O'Hely, died.

O'Neill and Owen O'Neill, the sons of Niall, made peace with each other, and Owen having made his submission to O'Neill, the lands he had been deprived of during the time of their quarrels were settled between them.

Kian, the son of Gilla Oilbe Mae Gowan, a learned historian, and a man who kept a house of general hospitality, was killed by the kick of a horse.

Bebinn, the daughter of Tiarnan O'Rourke, lord of Brefne, died.

Richard Mae Jordan of the Wood (in Mayo), was taken prisoner by Owen, the son of O'Flaherty, who delivered him into the hands of Mae Jordan Duv, by whom he was plundered.

Fereadach, son of Bryan O'Kelly, died of the plague.

John, the son of Bermingham, was slain by Thomas, his own brother's son.

another of Muredach's sons, retired to the Highlands, and raised a rebellion, but was forced to fly to Ireland, with some of the nobility, his associates; it appears that this James Stuart, whose death is mentioned in these Annals at the year 1429, had a powerful party supporting his claims to the crown of Scotland, as a fleet was sent to Ireland to bring him home. The Maormor of Leamlua above-mentioned, was the earl of Lennox, the title Maormor being applied, in the Irish and Gaelic languages, to the Great Stewards, or earls of Lennox, Marr, and Moray, in Scotland.

A. D. 1427.

'MULLOY, i. e. Fergal, lord of Fercall (in King's county), died, and Roderick, the son of Niall O'Mulloy, was appointed his successor.

Roderick O'Dunn, chief of Hy Riagain (in Queen's county), died.

Donal, son of Art, son of Gillcreest O'Rourke, died.

Murrogh, son of Torlogh, son of Murrogh-na-Raithnidhe O'Brien, was slain by his brother.

Dermod O'Mahony, lord of Fuinn Iartharaidh (the western land in the barony of Iveragh, county of Kerry), a man distinguished for his hospitality, and who never refused a favour, died after having gained the victory of repentance. Cormac Oge Mac Dermott died.

Catherine, daughter of Ardgal Mac Mahon, the wife of O'Neill, that is Owen, the son of Niall Oge, died.

Una, daughter of Hugh Mac Guire, the wife of O'Rourke, that is Teige, the most hospitable, charitable, and pious woman of her time in North Connaught, died in the latter end of Lent.

Fergal Mac Tiarnan, heir to the chieftaincy of Tullaghonoho, died.

Bryan, son of Fergal Mac Gauran, son of the chief of Tullaghaw, died.

Bryan O'Daimhin (or O'Devin), chief of Tyrkenfoda (Tyrkenney, in Fermanagh), died.

Aine, daughter of O'Beirne, the wife of Mac Rannall, i. e. Geoffrey, died.

The son of Donal, son of Mahon Dunn O'Kennedy, lord of Upper Ormond, was slain by Walter Tobin, with a single cast of a javelin.

Niall O'Donnell, i. e. the O'Donnell, lord of Tirconnell, marched a force into Trian Congail (in Antrim), to aid the grandsons of Mac-I-Neill, of Claneboy, against O'Neill, and on that expedition O'Donnell defeated Mac Quillan, and slew a great number of his people; he also took prisoners the two sons of Donogh Mac Sweeny, who aided Mac Quillan; and the people of O'Donnell, and the grandsons of Mac-I-Neill Buidhe, gained much booty and valuable property on that day.

The earl of Ormond marched with an army into Muintir Maolmordha (county of Cavan), burned the town of O'Reilly (Cavan), and demolished his castle.

Hugh O'Malley, the son of Dermod, heir to the lordship of Hy Malia (in Mayo), having gone with his fleet to Tirconnell, was killed by the cast of a javelin while in the rear of his party, on his return to his ship.

A. D. 1428.

Mac Murrogh, lord of Leinster, namely, Donogh, the son of Art Cavenagh, who was imprisoned in England for the space of nine years, was ransomed by his own province, which was joyful news to the Irish.

Dermod O'Kane, lord of Kianacht, and of the Creeve, (in Derry), a man full of prosperity and of honour, died.

Robert, the coarb of St. Cailin (abbot of Fenagh in Leitrim), died.

Hugh the Hospitable, son of Philip Mac Guire, the most famous man of his time for nobleness and hospitality, died at Kinsale on the night of his arrival in Ireland, on the 8th of the Ides of August, after having performed the pilgrimage of St. James¹, and rigidly repented of his sins; Thomas Oge Mac Guire, who accompanied him, conveyed his body to Cork, where it was buried.

Mac Namara, chief of Clan Cuilein, (in Clare), a man of charity and hospitality, who suppressed theft and robbery, and established peace and security in his own estate, died.

Cormac O'Beirne, chief of Tir Briuin (in Roscommon), died.

Hugh Oge Mac Guire, the son of Hugh, was slain by Mac Gillfinnen, and by the sons of Donogh Ballach Mac Gauran.

The castle of the sons of Hugh Mac Guire was taken by Mac Guire and his sons, who expelled the sons of Hugh from the country, and completely plundered their people.

A. D. 1428.

1. The Pilgrimage of St. James was that of St. James of Compostella in Spain, a celebrated place of pilgrimage in former times.

John, the son of Thomas O'Reilly, was treacherously slain by his own clan.

Gilbert O'Flanagan, heir to the chieftaincy of Tura (in Fermanagh), died.

Mac Jordan Dexter, and John Mac Costello, made a hostile incursion into Tŷrawley (in Mayo), against Thomas Barrett and the sons of Mac Wattin, whom they plundered; Richard Barrett was slain while pursuing the prey, and John Fionn Mac Costello was also killed on that occasion.

Henry Barrett, the son of Wattin, died.

Ivar, son of Edmond Mac Rannall, heir to the chieftaincy of Muintir Eoluis, was slain by Cathal, the son of Mac Rannall.

A. D. 1429.

James Stuart, son of the regent of Scotland, and also king presumptive of Scotland, having been expelled from Scotland into Ireland, died, after a fleet had come from the men of Scotland for him, to make him king.

Niall O'Dogherty, chief of Ardmiodhair, died.

Graine, daughter of Niall More O'Neill, the wife of O'Donnell, i. e. Torlogh of the Wine, died.

O'Flanagan of Tura, i. e. Gillaisa, was slain by the sons of Hugh Mac Guire, in his own house, in a nocturnal attack.

A contest arose between O'Rourke, i. e. Teige, and O'Reilly, i. e. Owen, and the sons of Mahon O'Reilly, and the English of Meath having joined O'Rourke against O'Reilly, burned O'Reilly's town (Cavan); O'Reilly then, having induced O'Neill, the Orgiallians (people of Monaghan and Louth), and those of Fermanagh to come to his aid, he sent his cattle-driving troops with those chiefs to Achaidh Kilmore¹; O'Rourke, Mac Mahon, the baron of Delvin (Nugent), and Mac Cabe, pursued them with a great force to Achaidh Kilmore; O'Neill, and his sons and galloglasses, the men of Fermanagh, with O'Reilly and his kinsmen, attacked them there, and defeated them in the battle of Achaidh Kilmore, in which the baron of Delvin, with Mac Cabe, Henry Mac Cabe, Dermot O'Rourke, and many others, were slain and taken prisoners by O'Neill on that occasion.

A. D. 1429.

1. Achaidh Kilmore, where this battle was fought, is considered to have been some place in the parish of Kilmore, county of Cavan.

Donogh Mac Gilfinnen died.

Hugh Direach O'Donnell, the son of Torlogh of the Wine, and his son, were slain by Torlogh, the son of Niall Garv O'Donnell, on the 8th of February.

Roderick O'Dogherty died in the same quarter at Fathan Mura Othna (Fahan of St. Mura, in Donegal).

The men of Brefney sustained a severe loss, both in slain and wounded, by Muintir Feodachain (people of Pettigo, in Fermanagh), at Tulach Odra, on Slieve-da-chon, having lost no less than forty persons, along with Conor, the son of Donal Mac Sweeny, who had gone on that incursion through folly and youth; and some of the people of Dartry (in Leitrim), and others of Hugh Mac Guire's clan, were also slain.

Murrough, the son of O'Byrne (of Wicklow), died.

Malachy, son of Conor Anabaidh O'Kelly, son of the lord of Hy Maine, was killed by the cast of a dart, by Shane Cam O'Teige, of the people of O'Conor.

Malachy O'Malley, heir to the lordship of Hy Malia, was slain by the sons of O'Malley.

Mahon, son of Thomas O'Cuirnin, chief professor of Brefney, a learned historian and musician, died in his own house.

O'Coffey, i. e. Malachy Mac-an-Classaigh O'Coffey, was slain by Edmond, the son of Hoberd D'Alton (in Westmeath).

A. D. 1430.

Gillananeev O'Lennan, canon and sacristan of Lisgoole, (in Fermanagh), died.

Owen, the son of Niall Oge O'Neill, marched a great force against the English of the plain of Oriel (in Louth), and plundered, burned, and laid waste all belonging to the English of the entire plain; he also burned the fortress of Dundalk, and having compelled the inhabitants to submit, and pay him tribute, he returned home with triumph and victory.

Owen O'Neill, accompanied by the chiefs of the province, marched with another great force into Annaly (county of Longford), and proceeded to the old fortress (of Longford); he went from thence to Coill Salaidh, where he remained for some time, after which he proceeded to Freamhain of Meath (near Mullingar), to which place the Irish of the south repaired to Owen, to receive his pay, namely, O'Conor

Faily, that is the Calvach; O'Mulloy, O'Madden, Mac Geoghegan, and O'Melaghlin; the entire of Westmeath, together with Kilbixey, was burned by these forces, after which the baron of Delvin (Nugent), the Plunketts, the Herberts, and the English of West Meath in general, waited on Owen O'Neill, in order to pay him tribute, on behalf of their country, which they did, and made peace; Owen then returned home victoriously and triumphantly, and took with him the son of O'Ferrall, i.e. the son of Donal Buidhe, to Dungannon, as a hostage for O'Ferrall's lordship.

Mac Guire, i. e. Thomas, the Giolladuv, lord of Fermanagh for thirty-six years, a man of unbounded hospitality to rich and poor, a founder of monasteries, churches, chapels, and many images; a pacificator of the chiefs and country; a defender of his territory against aggressors; a man beloved both by the laity and clergy for the justness of his government, died, after having gained the victory of repentance and extreme unction, and his son Thomas Oge was appointed his successor, according to the election of the clergy and laity.

Niall, the son of Henry O'Neill, died.

A great contest arose between M'Carthy Riavach and the earl, that is James (earl of Desmond); the earl took the castle of Kilbrittain (in the county of Cork), from Mac Carthy, and gave it to Donogh Mac Carthy, the brother of Mac Carthy, who was along with him demolishing the castle.

Mac William of Clanrickard, Mac Donogh of Tirerrill, and Bryan, the son of Donal, the son of Murtogh O'Conor, marched a force into Conmaicne Cuile (in Mayo), where they made great conflagrations, slew Hugh, the son of O'Conor Roe, and Carbry, the son of Bryan O'Beirne, and returned home victoriously; the castle of Tulsk (in Roscommon) was taken by Cathal, the son of O'Conor Roe, from the sons of Torlogh Oge, the son of Hugh, the son of Torlogh O'Conor.

Bryan, the son of Tiarnan Oge O'Rourke, was slain by the sons of Malachy Mac Rannall, at Maoithil Manchain (Mohill of St. Manchan, in Leitrim); and Donogh, the son of Tiarnan, was compelled to take refuge in the monastery of Mo-hill; Donogh, however, came out to his people under the protection of Mac Rannall, and a peace being made between them, Bryan's eraic (fine) was after that paid by O'Rourke.

Art O'Rourke, heir to the lordship of Brefney, was treacherously slain in his own house by his brother's son, namely, Manus, the son of Conor O'Rourke, a week before Easter.

Teige Mac Donogh, the son of Murtogh, died.

William Roe, the son of Loghlin O'Rourke, died.

Donogh Oge, the son of Mac Loghlin, died.

Fergal, son of Boetius, the son of Teige Mac Egan, chief Brchon of North Connaught, a man learned in the laws and sciences, and who kept a house of hospitality for all persons who came to his place, died after a well-spent life.

A. D. 1431.

O'Martain, or O'Martin, bishop of Clogher, died.

O'Maolagain, or O'Mulligan, bishop of Leighlin, died.

Teige O'Heoghain, official of Lough Erne, (vicar general of Clogher), a man of learning, died.

Simon Mac Garraghan, one of the canons of Lisgoole (in Fermanagh), died.

O'Conor of Corcomroe, i.e. Murtogh, was slain by his own brother's sons.

Con O'Melaghlin, king presumptive of Meath, was slain by the people of Annaly, and the English of West Meath; and his kinsman, Corc, was taken prisoner.

Gerald Cavanagh, king presumptive of Leinster, a man distinguished for his hospitality and feats of arms, died.

Mac Rannall, i. e. Geoffrey, an accomplished man, and the chief of his own tribe, died.

John, son of Cuchonacht, the son of Philip Mac Guire, was slain by the people of Tullaghaw (in Cavan), after having gone on a visit to their country at their own invitation, and Bryan Caoch, the son of Mac Gauran, was the person who acted treacherously towards him, which was an unprofitable act for him, for he himself, and a number of his people, were slain; John had only seven persons on his side, while those opposed to him were forty, by whom he was overwhelmed, and thus slain.

Mac Guire, i.e. Thomas, marched with a great force into Tullaghaw, to be avenged for his kinsman's death; he preyed, plundered, and spoiled the country, and slew many of its chiefs, and also burned the town of Mac Gauran (Ballymac Gauran), and victoriously returned home.

Manus Mac Mahon committed great depredations on, and slew many of, the English.

Owen O'Neill, Mac Guire, and O'Reilly, marched with a great force to attack Mac Quillan, (in Antrim), and plundered and spoiled his country, and Owen, with his forces and Caoraighacht (the cattle-driving, or preying troops), remained half-a-quarter of a year in the country, destroying the corn, and burning the dwellings, and then returned to Tyrone.

Henry, son of Owen, the son of Niall Oge O'Neill, was taken prisoner by Naghtan O'Donnell; Owen O'Neill and Naghtan having held a conference with each other, made peace, and settled their disputes, and Henry was set at liberty.

Naghtan O'Donnell went to attack the castle of Lough Laoghaire (on the borders of Tyrone and Donegal, at the lower end of Lough Erne), took it from Torlogh O'Donnell, and carried away all the property he found in it.

The English, with a great force of cavalry, marched to plunder the territory of Clan Caoch O'Reillys¹; on the same day Manus, the son of Ardgall Mac Mahon, went to plunder the English settlements, and having received intelligence of the proceedings of the English, he quickly went in pursuit of them, and found them watching their plunder; he vigorously attacked them, took their prey from them, made their chiefs prisoners, and slew others of them, and returned home victoriously.

Donal Mac Gillpatrick, the son of the lord of Ossory, died.

Barduv (the Dark-haired), daughter of O'Rourke, a pious and hospitable woman, died.

Aine, daughter of O'Rourke, the wife of O'Ferrall, died.

Mac Cornick of Fermanagh, i.e. Gillpatrick, and Murtoogh, the son of Philip, were slain by Donogh Mac Cormick and his people.

Macin, son of Henry O'Gormley, was slain by Donal, son of Teige, the son of Cathal Oge, and by O'Duinnin.

Gilbert O'Duignan, Owen O'Felan, a learned poet, and Donal, the son of David O'Toole, died.

Conal, son of Naghtan O'Donnell, entered Tir Hugh to plunder Mac Nulty; the O'Gallaghers, and the son of Mac Nulty overtook and slew Conal, with the east of a javelin.

Mac Murrogh, lord of Leinster, that is, Donogh, the son of Art Cavenagh, made a hostile incursion into the county of the town of Dublin; the English marched out to oppose him, but were defeated in the early part of the day by Mac Murrogh, who killed many, and took much booty from them; the English having re-assembled on the same day, overtook Mac Murrogh's people, who had much booty, attacked them in the evening, defeated them, and slew some of their party, together with Mac Maidh Mac Teige O'Byrne; and two sons of O'Conor Kerry and O'Toole were taken prisoners.

A. D. 1432.

Art Mac Caghwel, bishop of Clogher, a man of piety, who kept a house of general hospitality for the poor, and the pilgrims of God, died after repentance.

O'Neill, that is Donal Boec, the son of Henry Aimreidh, was slain in O'Kane's country by the two sons of Dermot O'Kane, namely, Donal and Aibhne, aided by the rest of the O'Kanes, after they had taken by assault the house in which he had been; they also slew Donal, the son of Niall, Patrick O'Mulcullan, and the son of O'Mellan; Owen, the son of Niall Oge O'Neill, was inaugurated his successor, on Leac-na-riogh (the Stone of the kings), at Tullaghoge (in Tyrone).

A conference was held between O'Neill (Owen), and the sons of Donal (O'Conor Sligo), the son of Murtoogh, namely, Owen and Torlogh Carrach, at Caoluisge (near Ballyshannon, on the river Erne), for the purpose of combining against O'Donnell; four score horsemen was the number that attended

A. D. 1431.

1. The Clan Caoch O'Reilly were a powerful tribe of the O'Reillys, so called from one of their ancient chiefs named the Caoch O'Reilly, which signified the one-eyed O'Reilly: this clan possessed an extensive district, which got its name from them, and now forms the barony of Clankee, in the county of Cavan, towards the borders of Monaghan, the term Clan Caoch being anglicised Clankee; and it may be here mentioned that Clannahon, another barony in the county of Cavan, derived its name from being possessed by the clan or descendants of Mahon O'Reilly, who was lord of Clannahon, and prince of East Brefney, in the fourteenth century.

there, and the MacDonoghs (of Sligo), also repaired thither. O'Donnell, namely Niall, sent his party to guard the pass, in order to prevent the conference; O'Neill and Mac Guire having come to the narrow pass, were met by O'Donnell's people, and as soon as Mac Guire's party landed on the opposite side, they were put to flight through Miodhbolg, and a great number of persons were killed and wounded by the Tirconnellians on that occasion, but the sons of Donal, the son of Murtogh (O'Connor), arrived at the place where O'Neill was; they shook hands, in confirmation of their alliance and friendship to each other.

A great contest arose between O'Neill and O'Donnell, and Henry, the son of O'Neill, having gone to Sligo for the sons of Donal, the clan of Murtogh (O'Conors), O'Donnell and O'Rourke, namely Teige, and the sons of Hugh Mac Guire, were watching them while Henry remained in the west; Henry, accompanied by the Carbreans (of Sligo), entered Moyene (a plain in Fermanagh, on the borders of Donegal, near Ballyshannon); and Mac Guire, that is Thomas Oge, sailed with a fleet to Caoluisge, (on the river Erne), to meet Henry and the Carbreans, whom he conveyed to his house; O'Neill, Mac Guire, and the son of Mac-I-Neill Claneboy, marched with a great force into Kinel Moain, (in Donegal), in the neighbourhood of O'Donnell, where both parties remained encamped opposite each other from the festival of the cross until Lammas, and during that period many persons were killed and wounded on both sides; the town of O'Donnell and the town of Naghtan (O'Donnell) were burned on that expedition; and both parties returned to their homes without making peace or ceasing hostilities.

Great and frequent depredations were committed on the English, and numbers of them slain, by Manus Mac Mahon (of Monaghan), who raised their heads on the spear-poles of the guards of the town of Lurgan (Lurgan-Green, in the county of Louth), Manus's own fortified residence, a disgusting and hateful sight to those who beheld their putrefaction.

Owen, the son of Mac Carthy Riavach, having gone on a predatory excursion to Kinsale, was killed by the cast of a dart.

Mac Mahon, namely, Bryan, the son of Ardgall, having risen in opposition to O'Neill, and his own kinsmen Roderick and Manus, went with his Cao-raighacht (predatory band), to the English; and the English having mustered their forces, marched with Mac Mahon into Orgiall, burned Dartry of Coininsi¹, and proceeded from thence to the plain of Armagh, and having taken out of the churches all the provision stores, and burned them on the plain of the town, they took large sums from the professors and clergy of the town, for abstaining from burning their churches, after which the English and Mac Mahon returned to their homes.

Malachy Maineach Mac Namara, chief of Clan Cuilein (in Clare), died.

Teige O'Mahon (or Mac Mahon), heir to the lordship of Corca Baiscin (in Clare); Maolmora O'Reilly, and Torlogh, son of John O'Reilly (in Cavan); and Cathal, son of Thomas O'Ferrall, died.

O'Duigenan, that is, Matthew Glas of Kilronan, a learned professor of history, died.

Gregory, son of John O'Maolconry, the intended chief historian (of Connaught), died.

Teige, son of Donal, the son of Bryan O'Dowd, lord of Hy Fiachra (in Sligo), a man who secured his hereditary property to every person in his country, both lay and ecclesiastical, a man who patronized poets and learned men, died on the 16th of January.

Niall Roe, the son of Henry O'Neill, died.

Walter Burke, the grandson of the earl of Ulster, a charitable, humane man, died.

O'Donnell committed great depredations on O'Neill; Bryan Oge O'Neill also committed plunder on O'Neill the same day.

A great contest arose between O'Carroll, lord of Ely (in Tipperary and King's county), and the earl of Ormond; and the earl, having marched with a great force into Ely, spoiled the country, and demolished O'Carroll's two castles.

Mac Murrough, lord of Leinster, greatly spoiled the English settlements, but the English having

A. D. 1432.

1. Dartry of Coininsi. The term Coininsi signifies the district of the islands which appears by the Annals to have comprised the present barony of Dartry, in the county of Monaghan, in Mac Mahon's country, and also some adjoining parts about the islands and rivers, on the borders of Cavan and Fermanagh, as mentioned in these Annals at the year 1520.

made an attack on him, he put them to flight, took Walter Tobin and others prisoners, and slew and wounded many more.

A. D. 1433.

A great contest arose between the Tirconnellians and the Tyronians; and O'Donnell, namely, Niall Garv, the son of Torlogh of the Wine, marched his forces into Duv Thrian (the Black District), to aid Mac Quillan¹; and O'Neill, that is, Owen, led a great force in pursuit of O'Donnell and Mac Quillan; at this time Mac Donnell of Scotland came with a large fleet to aid O'Neill, and the Scots proceeded to attack the preying parties of Mac Quillan, and of Robert Savadge, whom they overcame, and committed great slaughter and destruction on Robert's and Mac Quillan's people; and such of their party as escaped from the Duv Thrian were mostly slain at the shallow pass at Newcastle (in the parish of Kilcoo, county of Down); after that O'Neill, Henry his son, and Mac Donnell, marched with their forces to Ardglass, which they burned; and Mac Donnell afterwards, with his Scots, proceeded from Ardglass in their ships to Inisowen (in Donegal), while O'Neill with his party proceeded by land to co-operate with them in plundering Tirconnell; at this time Naghtan O'Donnell, and the daughter of O'Conor Faile, the wife of O'Donnell, with the sons of the Tirconnellian chiefs, met them in Inisowen, and made peace with O'Neill, without O'Donnell's permission; and O'Donnell, with Mac Quillan, went to the English of Meath, and entered into terms of alliance and friendship with them, and also with the king's viceroy; and they marched a great force to the plain of Armagh, and the English ravaged the monastery, but returned home without gaining a conquest on that expedition. O'Donnell went westward through Meath to Athlone, from thence to Hy Maine and through the plain of Connaught in-

A. D. 1433.

1. The Mac Quillans, of whom an account has been given in the note on Dalriada, were powerful chiefs, and possessed a large territory in the northern part of the county of Antrim; they are said to have come originally from Wales in the twelfth century, and the name is stated to have been Mac Lewillyn, in Irish Mac Uidhilin. After long and fierce contests they were finally conquered, and dispossessed of their territory, by the Mac Donnells of the Hebrides, or Lords of the Isles, several chiefs of whom, with powerful forces, came from Scotland, and settled in Antrim, as to Moylurg (in Roscommon) to Mac Dermott and to O'Rourke, that is Teige, the son of Tiarnan, and O'Rourke accompanied him across the river Erne; O'Neill and Mac Guire came to Caoluisge to hold a conference with O'Donnell, where they concluded amicable terms with each other; Mac Quillan was protected by the English of the plain of Oriel, after he had been expelled by O'Neill.

Eignachan O'Donnell, the son of Torlogh, went to plunder his brother, Donogh O'Donnell of the Wood, who pursued and slew him at Belathcaolain.

A contest took place between Mac Rannall of the plain and the sons of Malachy Mac Rannall; the sons of Malachy, having engaged for payment the services of the Clan Mahon Mac Cabe, made an incursion into the plain, and burned the town of Cathal Mac Rannall; the other party, having mustered a large body, pursued them when leaving the town, and having perceived the sons of Mahon (Mac Cabe), in the rear of the plundering party, they slew three of Mahon's sons, Ross, Donogh, and Bryan, with many others, and Roderick, their eldest brother, was taken prisoner, being half dead at the time, but the fifth son, Torlogh Balach, made his escape; Una, the daughter of John O'Reilly, was their mother.

Cathal, son of Manus Mac Guire, a man who kept a house of general hospitality, died, and his son Cathal was appointed his successor by O'Neill and Mac Guire.

Cathal Duv, the son of O'Conor Roe, died.

Margaret, the daughter of O'Carroll, the wife of Calvach O'Conor Faile, gave two general entertainments to the learned men and clergy.

A famine occurred in the summer of this year, which was designated for a long time afterwards "the summer of slight acquaintance," for no one would recognize friend or relative on account of the greatness of the famine.

O'Kane, i. e. Geoffrey, the son of Connuidh O'Kane, died.

mentioned in these Annals, in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, and from them are descended the noble family of the Mac Donnells, earls of Antrim; and it may be here observed, that the Mac Donnells of the Hebrides, styled Lords of the Isles in Scotland, were originally descended from the Irish chiefs who settled in Albany, and were of the race of Clan Colla, of whom an account has been given in the note on Orgiall. The family of the Savadges, so frequently mentioned at this period, were of English descent, and had large possessions in the county of Down.

Mac Namara, the son of Conceand More, chief of Clan Cuilein, died.

Mac Quillan, having been expelled from his own country by the Mac-I-Neills of Claneboy, was forced to take refuge in the Ardes of Ulidia (in county of Down), with Savadge.

A. D. 1434.

Felim, son of Mahon O'Loughlin, bishop of Kilfinabra (Kilfenora), died.

A contest arose between O'Donnell, i. e. Niall, and his brother Naghtan, on account of the death of Eignaghan O'Donnell, and many depredations and slaughters were committed on both sides; Naghtan having allied himself to the sons of Donal, the son of Murtogh (O'Conor), O'Donnell plundered the plain, and also Carbury (in Sligo), on the sons of Donal, the son of Murtogh, and Naghtan. Naghtan, Bryan, the son of Donal, and all the sons of Donal, having entered the plain in Tir Hugh, to retaliate for those depredations, they burned the dwellings, slew some, and took much booty; Naghtan again entered Tir Connell, and plundered Conor, the son of O'Donnell, and Conor entered the territory of Carbury, and plundered the whole district; the same contest having continued between O'Donnell and Naghtan, the latter joined Mac Quillan, and Bryan Oge O'Neill, to carry on the contest against O'Donnell; O'Donnell and O'Neill besieged Naghtan's castle, namely, Castlefin (in county of Donegal), and having remained there for a considerable time carrying on the siege, they found it impossible to take the fortress.

Luke O'Lennon, prior of Lisgoole; and Matthew O'Congaile (or O'Connelly), ercnach of Ros-sory (both in Fermanagh), died.

O'Neill, i. e. Owen, and O'Donnell, that is Niall, marched with the whole forces of the province (of Ulster), to spoil and plunder the English of Meath; the English of Dundalk came to O'Neill, and paid him his tribute, and gave him much valuable articles besides; they (O'Neill and O'Donnell), afterwards proceeded and burned the plain of Oriel; and the sons of O'Neill went to burn some of the fortresses belonging to some of the English, and while engaged in the burning they did not perceive them until the king's viceroy, with his forces, came up to them; Henry and Hugh, the sons of O'Neill, sent their party before them, while they themselves covered the retreat, and made their escape without losing a man.

O'Donnell and his son Torlogh, heir to the lordship of Tirconnell, and Mac Caghwell, passed in another direction the same day to plunder property, but unfortunately for them they were met by an immense body of English cavalry, who surrounded them on every side; they defended themselves for a long time, until at length Torlogh O'Donnell, Mac Caghwell, and Hugh Macanaspy Mac Caghwell, with many others, were slain; O'Donnell, after the loss of his people, was taken prisoner, and was delivered bound to the son of John Stanley (Sir Thomas Stanley), the king's viceroy, who had come to Ireland, and he was sent to Dublin to be imprisoned; and the son of Manus Caoch O'Donnell was also taken prisoner along with O'Donnell on that occasion.

O'Rourke, i. e. Teige, the son of Tiarnan; Donn Cathach Mac Guire; and O'Byrne, i. e. Donogh, died.

Maolisa Mac Conway, chief poet of O'Neill (in Tyrone), and Sencha Mac Curtin, chief historian of Thomond, a man versed in various arts, died.

Dermot, son of Murtogh Garv O'Shaughnessy, was killed by his own horse, while it was in the act of being shod.

O'Kelly, Mac Dermott, and Teige, the son of O'Conor Roe, went to attack Ballintobber; they and the people of the town having fought, many persons were killed and wounded, both inside and outside of the town; and one of the party outside having chipped the end of a wattle which he held in his hand, he lighted and cast it into the town, which having fallen on the side of a house, set it on fire, which communicated to the next house, until the greater portion of the town and wall were burned, with an immense deal of valuable property.

A. D. 1435.

The Red bishop, O'Hara, bishop of Achonry, died.

O'Donnell, i. e. Nial Garv, was conveyed to England.

An extraordinary frost and ice occurred this year, which was so intense that the people were enabled to travel over all the lakes and rivers of Ireland on the ice.

O'Ferrall, i. e. Donal, the son of John, chief of Annaly, died.

Bran O'Byrne, heir to the lordship of Crioch Branaeh (O'Byrne's country, in Wicklow), died.

O'Neill having marched with his forces into Fermanagh, pitched his camp at Creev O'Fuad-daehain (Pettigo), where he remained three days and three nights; the people of Fermanagh sent their cattle and other properties over Lough Erne westward, not in boats, but on the ice of the lake, over which horses and beasts of burden passed from the greatness of the frost. Mac Guire, having collected his forces to oppose O'Neill, made peace with him, and afterwards joined him, upon which O'Neill marched with his troops into Tirconnell, and burned and plundered a great portion of it, on which occasion he slew John, the son of Donal O'Donnell, with the cast of a javelin, and returned home victoriously.

Donal, son of Owen Mac Carthy, a general benefactor to the poor and indigent, was killed by Teige, son of Cormac, the son of Dermod Mac Carthy.

Don Mac Conchonacht Mac Guire died in canonical orders at Cluain Eois (Clones), after having gained the victory of repentance, having previously resigned the cares of this world for the love of God.

Bryan Oge O'Neill and Naghtan O'Donnell combined in a contest against O'Neill and his sons Henry and Owen; O'Neill and his sons marched with their preying parties into Kinel Moain, to meet Naghtan and Bryan, and did not halt until he encamped in the Rosses (in Donegal); when Naghtan and Bryan Oge received intelligence of this, they hastily collected their forces together to attack O'Neill's camp, and having marched directly, they attacked O'Neill and beat him out of his camp, and took possession of it; O'Neill, his sons, and Mac Donnell of the galloglasses, felt ashamed and dissatisfied at being dislodged after that manner, and, by the advice and entreaty of Henry, they came to the resolution of retaking the camp by surprise; but the young soldiers became over excited, suddenly and rashly rushed forward in a confused and disorderly manner to attack the camp, led on by Henry, and never halted until they got among the thick of the enemy; Mac Donnell of the galloglasses and Mac Sweeney of Fanad, having encountered each other, heroes were hacked and harassed on either side in every direction; friends or foes could not distinguish each other from the darkness of the night, and the close contact of those engaged; sparks of fire flashed from the helmets of warriors, and from the swords of champions; Hugh O'Neill and Bryan O'Neill having met in a personal encounter, Hugh made a thrust of his spear at Bryan, and wounded him severely, after which, Bryan and Naghtan withdrew from the fight, leaving the galloglasses after them; Mac Sweeney having perceived Naghtan and Bryan Oge retiring from him, he commanded a retreat, which he himself covered, and thus left the field without dispute to O'Neill; Henry and his kinsmen having noticed this, they pursued Mac Sweeney to Slieve Truim, where they defeated him, and took himself and many others of his people prisoners, and O'Neill was thus victorious on that expedition. Naghtan O'Donnell gave the castle of Ballyshannon to Bryan Oge O'Neill, on condition that he should join him in the contest against O'Neill; but Bryan afterwards deceived him, and, after having left his guards in the castle of Ballyshannon, he proceeded to O'Neill's place, without the knowledge of Naghtan; but as soon as Bryan appeared before O'Neill, he was made prisoner by him, and he cut off one of his hands and one of his feet, and he also treated his two sons in the same manner, of which one of them instantly died.

O'Gara was killed by his own kinsmen, on Inisbolg at Lough Teched (Lough Gara in Sligo).

Donal, son of Fergal Caoh O'Hara, was slain by the son of Manus, the son of Dermod Mac Donogh.

The castle of O'Rourke was taken by Donogh Bacach O'Rourke from the sons of Teige O'Rourke, after which the sons of Tiarnan O'Rourke committed depredations on Donogh Bacach at Coillanama (in Leitrim).

Loughlin O'Rourke, the son of Teige O'Rourke, was nominated the O'Rourke.

Naghtan O'Donnell committed great depredations on O'Neill.

Bryan Oge, the son of Henry O'Neill, having gone on a predatory incursion into Tirlugh, a party from the house of O'Donnell, i. e. Niall, overtook him, and recovered the prey, took himself prisoner, and slew a great number of his people.

Corinac O'Donnallan, the son of Malachy;

Donal Bacach O'Higgin; and Carbry O'Cuirnin, died.

Mac Watten, i. e. Robert Barrett, lord of Tyrawley, a charitable, humane, and hospitable man, and one who defended his territorial estates in despite of the English of Connaught, died.

A. D. 1436.

O'Connor Faily carried on a great war against the English, by burning, plundering, and slaying, in revenge of O'Donnell, his relative by marriage, whom they had in confinement.

Niall, son of Owen O'Neill, with many of his people, were slain in an attack made on him in his own house by the clan Mac Kenna of Truagh (in Monaghan), aided by the sons of Henry O'Neill, and by the Orgiallians.

Conor, son of John O'Reilly, the son of the lord of Brefney, a man distinguished for his hospitality, died.

The Cranoge of Lough Leary (a fortress on the lake in lower Lough Erne), was taken possession of by the sons of Bryan O'Neill; O'Neill and Henry (O'Neill), having come to the lake, they summoned thither Thomas Oge Mac Guire, and he having arrived, they commenced constructing boats to go to the Cranoge, but the sons of Bryan, who were then in the Cranoge, came to the resolution of delivering it up to O'Neill, and of making peace with him; O'Neill and Mac Guire after that went on a hostile incursion into Tirhugh, where they committed great depredations and damages, and afterwards returned to their homes.

Morogh, son of Cormac Mac Donogh, heir to the lordship of Tirerrill, died.

The sons of Tomaltagh Oge Mac Donogh went on a hostile incursion into Coolavin (in Sligo), to attack O'Gara and Teige Mac Donogh, but were put to flight, and seven of them slain, along with Conor Cam O'Gara, who had treacherously slain O'Gara, his own brother, on a previous occasion.

Manus Roe, son of Malachy, the son of Flaherty O'Rourke, died.

Gillaisa Mac Egan, chief Brehon to Mac Watten (Barrett of Mayo), a pious, charitable, and humane man, and professor of a school of laws and poetry, died.

Geanan Mac Curtin, the intended chief historian of Thomond, was drowned; and there was not in the south of Ireland a better historian in his time.

A. D. 1437.

The archbishop of Connaught (Tuam) of the Bermingham family, died.

A peace was concluded between O'Neill and Naghtan O'Donnell.

Conor O'Donnell made a hostile attack on the son of Naghtan O'Donnell, on which occasion the two sons of Owen Roe Mac Sweeny, with many others, were slain.

A contest arose between O'Connor Faily and his brother Cahir O'Connor, who, having joined the English, led them into Offaley, and burned the town of Dermot O'Connor, with several other castles, and slew and wounded many people.

O'Connor Faily also carried on a great contest against the English of Meath, during which he plundered and slew many of them.

Henry O'Ryan, lord of Hy Drona (Idrone, in the county of Carlow), died.

Mac Costello, i. e. Edmond of the Plain (in Mayo), died.

A great contention arose between Mac Mahon and Manus Mac Mahon, on which occasion Manus joined O'Neill and his sons, and Mac Mahon joined the English.

A great contest broke out between O'Neill and young Bryan O'Neill.

Malachy O'Maolconry, and Gillpatrick, the son of Conor O'Cormick, died.

A. D. 1438.

Loghlin O'Gallagher, Bishop of Raphoe, died.

The prior of Kill Maighneann (Kilmainham, at Dublin), grandson of the earl of Kildare, died.

The abbot of Kilnamanagh, and Nicholas O'Meeny, vicar of Castleconnor (both in Sligo), died of the plague.

Donogh O'Donnell of the Wood was slain by Conor Don O'Donnell, in Tirenda (in Donegal), who plundered him on the same occasion.

Cahir O'Dogherty died; Philip Mac Guire was taken prisoner by Mac Guire.

Conor, the son of Murtogh O'Dowd, lord of Clan Donogh O'Dowd, and his three sons, were treacherously killed at night by his own kinsmen, namely, Taichleach, son of Cormac, the son of Donogh O'Dowd, Roderick, the son of Taichleach, Loughlin, the grandson of Loughlin O'Dowd, and Henry Barrett.

William, the son of Roderick O'Dowd, died.

O'Connor Faily still carried on the war against the English of Meath, in revenge for O'Donnell.

The son of Mac Clancy, that is, Henry Ballach, was slain by a party of the people of Fermanagh, at the town of Bryan O'Higgin, in Moyene (near Lough Erne).

John, the son of Edmond Burke, died of the small-pox; and William Barrett, the son of Mac Watten, died.

William, the son of John Burke, died at his own house.

A peace was concluded between O'Connor Faily and his brother, Cahir O'Connor.

O'Brien, i. e. Teige, the son of Bryan O'Brien, was deposed by his brother Mahon, who had himself nominated the O'Brien.

Richard, the son of Bermingham, died.

Jordan, the son of John Mac Costello, died.

O'Clumhain (O'Coleman), chief poet to O'Hara, died.

Donogh, son of Siodraidh O'Curneen, a learned historian (in Leitrim); O'Daly of Brefney, that is Hugh, chief poet to O'Reilly; and Conor Mac Egan, chief Brehon of Clanrickard, died.

A. D. 1439.

A lord justice¹, the king of England's viceroy, arrived in Ireland, and was taken prisoner by Cahir, the son of O'Connor Faily; after he had remained some time in confinement he was ransomed by the English of Dublin, who delivered the son of Plunket in his stead to Cahir.

O'Donnell, namely Niall, was conveyed to the Isle of Man, in order that he might be redeemed from the English, and a hundred marks were given to ascertain his ransom; but O'Donnell, that is Niall Garv, died while in captivity in the Isle of Man; he was the most prized hostage in Tirconnell and Tyrone, and of the north in general; the chief subject of conversation of the north of Ireland, in his time; the spoiler and subduer of the English, until at length they were revenged of him for all he had committed against them; a defender and protector of his tribe against the English and Irish who opposed him before and subsequent to his appointment to the lordship; Naghtan O'Donnell, his brother, was appointed his successor.

Mac Guire was taken prisoner by Donal Ballach Mac Guire, in Mac Guire's own town, and Donal also liberated Philip Mac Guire, on the same day; and the chains by which Philip was bound were then put upon Mac Guire, in his own house, by Donal; when Henry O'Neill received intelligence of Mac Guire's imprisonment, he collected his forces, and marched to Port-Abla-Faolain to meet Donal and Philip, who had Mac Guire in confinement; Mac Guire was liberated, and other hostages were received in his stead, namely, Edmond Mac Guire, his son, Mac Guire's wife, the daughter of Mac Geoghegan, and others besides; and the castle of Inis Ceathleann (Enniskillen), was then delivered up to Donal Ballach Mac Guire.

Teige Caoch, son of Hugh, the son of Philip of the Battle-Axe Mac Guire, died.

Feredach, the son of Dun, the son of Cuchonacht Mac Guire, was slain by the people of Oriel.

Henry Roe, the son of Bryan Mac Gilfinnen, chief of Muintir Peodachain (in Fermanagh), died.

More, the daughter of Hugh Mac Gauran, the wife of the son of Bryan Mac Manus, died.

O'Connor of Connaught, namely, Cathal, the king of Connaught, son of Roderick, died on the 19th of March, in consequence of which a war arose through the plain of Connaught (Roscommon), between the Clan Mac Felim (O'Conors Roe), and the clan of Torlogh (O'Conors Don), for Teige, the son of O'Connor Roc, was nominated the O'Connor by the Clan Mac Felim, and Hugh, the son of O'Connor Don, was nominated the O'Connor also by Bryan, son of Donal, the son of Murtogh (O'Connor Sligo), and his kinsmen, and by the Mac Donoghs (of Sligo).

A. D. 1439.

1. The Lord Justice. In 1438, Lionel, lord Wells, was appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland; and in 1439 Richard Talbot, archbishop of Dublin, was lord justice; in 1440 James Butler, earl of Ormond, was appointed lord lieutenant, but it is difficult to say which of these was taken prisoner by O'Connor. The son of Plunket here mentioned was probably the son of sir Christopher Plunket, who had been lord deputy in 1432, under the lord lieutenant, sir Thomas Stanley.

O'Dogherty, that is, John Balb, the son of Conor, chief of Ard Miodhair (in Donegal), died, and his brother Donal succeeded him.

Dermod O'Dowd, the son of the O'Dowd, namely Donal, heir to the lordship of Tireragh, died.

O'Hara Duv, Donogh, the son of John O'Hara, having entered amongst the friars in the monastery of Beann Fhlooda (Banada, in Sligo), resigned his lordship in favour of his brother Cormac, the son of John, who was nominated the O'Hara; and Cormac's place was conferred on John Mac-an-Easpuic O'Hara.

The son of O'Hara of the Plain, namely, Cormac, the son of Teige, and Hugh, the son of Dermod Mac Donogh, died.

The son of Niall Riavach O'Conor was killed by Donal, the son of Murtogh Mac Donnell.

The plague raged most violently in Dublin, of which three thousand of the inhabitants, men, women, and children, died, from the beginning of Spring to the end of May; Donogh, the son of O'Dowd, i. e. Teige; Conor, son of Donal, the son of Cormac Mac Donogh, and his wife, the daughter of Teige Mac Donogh; the vicar of Imleach Iseal (in the parish of Easkey, county of Sligo); Donogh, the son of Tomaltach O'Bolan; and Edmond Burke, the son of Mac William of Clanricard, heir to the lordship of Clanricard, all died of the plague.

Owen O'Flaherty was treacherously killed in his bed by night, by a farmer of his own tenantry.

Donal, son of Roderick, the son of Taichleach O'Dowd, had his eyes put out, and was hanged by Donogh, the son of Murtogh O'Dowd; Cathal, the son of Cormac O'Dowd, and his son, were killed by Teige Roe, the son of Murtogh O'Dowd, on the same day, at the instigation of the forementioned Donogh.

Depredations were committed by O'Conor, i. e. Hugh, the son of O'Conor Don, on Mac Costello Roe.

O'Mithidhein, or O'Meehan, of Bealach², the coarb of St. Molaise, died.

A. D. 1440.

Mac William Burke, namely, Walter, the son of Thomas, the son of sir Edmond Albanach, lord of the English of Connaught, and of many of the Irish, died of the plague a week before the festival of the Cross in Harvest; and Edmond Burke, his brother, was nominated the Mac William in succession.

O'Donnell, i. e. Naghtan, and O'Neill, namely, Owen, made peace with each other.

O'Dogherty, i. e. Donal, the son of Conor, chief of Ard Miodhair, died, and two O'Dogherties were nominated his successors, namely, Edmond, the son of Conor, and Hugh, the son of John.

Magrath, namely, Matthew, the son of Marcus, the coarb of Termon Dabeog (abbot of Lough Dearn, in Donegal), died, and Shane Buidhe was appointed his successor.

Bryan, son of Donal, the son of Murtogh O'Conor, lord of North Connaught (O'Conor Sligo), the star of valour and bravery of the Irish in his time, died two days before the festival of St. John, having been thirty-seven years in the lordship.

Manus Eoganach Mac Guire, the son of Philip, and Catherine, daughter of Don, the son of Cuchonacht Mac Guire, the wife of Manus Mac Guire's son, died.

Ross, son of John Mac Guire, and Felim Roe, son of Donogh Roe Mac Guire, were slain.

Donal O'Breslen, a learned Brehon, and the intended chief professor of Fermanagh, died.

Duibhgen Gruama O'Duigenan (of Roscommon), a learned historian, died.

Manus O'Donal, the son of Donal, was killed at Bunleacaigh, by the Mac Sweenys of Connaught; and Conor, the son of John Easboc, that is, Mac-an-Easpoic the Conallian, and Dermod, the son of Donogh Mac Hugh, the historian of O'Donnell, were slain on the same day; another son of Donal O'Donnell and a number of the Connallians, slew the son of Mac Sweeny, namely Conor Mac Sweeny, in revenge for his kinsman.

Graine, daughter of O'Kelly, the wife of Teige O'Brien, died.

2. Beallach, now Ballaghameehan, a parish in the county of Leitrim, and diocese of Kilmore, part of the ancient Rossinver, where the O'Meehans were the chief clan: hence it got its name from them, and their patron saint was Molaise of Devenish, a celebrated saint in the sixth century; and a curious relic, consisting of a metal box, which contained the gospel of St. Molaise, and was brought by him from Rome, is still in the possession of the family of the O'Meehans, having been preserved among that tribe for a period of more than twelve hundred years.

The castle of O'Boyle's Town (in Donegal) was taken by the son of Donal, the son of O'Donnell, he having obtained an advantageous opportunity, and in it he found much property, money, clothes, and armour; but the castle was retaken by O'Donnell and given to O'Boyle, and the sons of Donal O'Donnell, who were in the castle, were taken by O'Donnell, and imprisoned for their misdeeds.

O'Rourke, that is, Loghlin, the son of Teige, was taken prisoner by the sons of Art O'Rourke, who delivered him to Donogh Ballach Mac Gauran, and his sons, and they handed him over to the sons of Tiarnan O'Rourke, after which a contest arose in Brefney between the sons of Tiarnan O'Rourke and the sons of Teige O'Rourke, so that they disturbed the country between them.

Fionguala, daughter of O'Dogherty and wife of O'Donnell, died.

O'Conor Faily, with his sons and his brother Cahir, having gone into Leix O'Moore (in Queen's county), on a predatory incursion, the earl of Desmond and Mac Gillpatrick overtook them, after they had sent the prey on before them; O'Conor was defeated, and his son Con and sixty of his soldiers were slain.

The castle of O'Dogherty, i.e. the castle of Cuil Macantreoin (in Donegal), was taken by O'Donnell.

Mac Watten, i.e. Thomas, the son of Henry Barrett, lord of Trawley, died on the fifteenth day of July; and the grandson of Barrett was nominated the Mae Watten.

The son of O'Rourke, namely, Hugh, the son of Hugh Buidhe O'Rourke, heir to the lordship of Brefney, was treacherously slain by the son of Dermot Nangamhnach O'Rourke, at Dnuim-daethiar (Dromahaire), together with the wife of Donogh Baeach O'Rourke.

Donal, son of Cormac Mac Donagh, heir to the lordship of Tirerrill; O'Dugan the historian, John, the son of Cormac; and Duibhgen Gruama O'Duigenan, chief historian to Mac Donogh (of Sligo), died.

A.D. 1441.

Thomas O'Kelly, archbishop of Connaught (Tnam), died.

Gillpatrick O'Maoluidhir, abbot of Clogher, died.

Murtogh, son of Cathal More Mac Manus, archdeacon of Clogher, and parson of Aireach Maolain (Aughnamullen in Monaghan), died.

Donal O'Moghan, abbot of the monastery of Boyle, the most distinguished man in the province of Connaught, for wisdom, knowledge, and preaching, died.

Conor, son of Teige Mac Donogh, lord of Tirerrill, the chief patron of the clergy of Ireland in his time, died after having gained the victory over the world and the devil.

Mac Donnell, of Clan Kelly (in Fermanagh), was killed by the sons of Donal, the son of Cuchonacht Mac Guire; and great depredations were committed by Mac Guire, i.e. Thomas, on the sons of Annadh Mac Donnell; and the grandson of Edmond Mac Donnell was slain by him on the same expedition.

Conor Oge Mac Guire died, after having resigned the cares of this world.

O'Maolconry, i.e. Maolin, the son of Tanaidhe, the son of Paidin, chief professor of Siol Murray (Roscommon), the most respected and honoured man in Ireland in his time, died on the thirteenth of February, and was honourably interred in the church of Cloonaffe; and Dermot Roe, the son of Donogh Ban O'Maolconry, died in a month after.

Pierce Cam O'Luinin, a learned historian and genuine poet, erenaeh of Ardes and of Trian Airigh Maolain (probably Ardes in the county of Down, or Ardmagilligan in Derry), a man highly respected and venerated, died.

O'Kennedy Roe, i.e. Roderick, the son of Philip Liath (the grey), lord of Ormond; and Thomas, the son of O'Kennedy Don, died.

The castle of O'Madden, i.e. the castle of Portan-Tulehain on the Shannon (in Galway), was taken by Mac William Oughter, and by the sons of Rickard O'Madden; and O'Madden was taken prisoner in it, with fourteen prisoners, who were in the town; they took besides much valuable property, including armour and arms.

Cormac Mac Gauran committed great depredations on the sons of Donaeh Ballach Mac Gauran.

O'Higgin i.e. Mahon Roe, a genuine poet, died.

A.D. 1442.

MacCarthy Riavach, lord of Hy Eachach (Ivaugh in the county of Cork), in Munster, and the abbot O'Carthy, died.

Ossory, Offaley, and Leix.—In the present article will be given the history and topography of the territories comprised in Kilkenny, King's and Queen's counties, with their chiefs and clans, and the possessions of each in ancient and modern times.

Ancient History.—An account of the ancient history and inhabitants of Leinster has been already given in the note on Hy Kinsellagh and Cualan.

I. Ossory comprised almost the whole of the present county of Kilkenny, with a small part of the south of Tipperary, and also that portion of the Queen's county now called the barony of Upper Ossory; and the name of this ancient principality, which was also called the kingdom of Ossory, is still retained in the diocese of Ossory. Ancient Ossory, according to some accounts, extended from the river Nore to the Suir, and was sometimes subject to the kings of Leinster, but mostly to the kings of Munster; and it is stated by O'Halloran, Mac Geoghegan, and others, that Conaire Mor, or Conary the Great, who was monarch of Ireland at the commencement of the Christian era, having made war on the people of Leinster, to punish them for having killed his father, Ederseol, monarch of Ireland, imposed on them a tribute, of which an account has been given in the note on Hy Kinsellagh; and he separated Ossory from Leinster, and having added it to Munster, gave it to a prince of his own race, named Aongus, and freed it from all dues to the kings of Munster, except the honour of composing their body-guards; hence Aongus was surnamed Amhas-Righ, signifying the king's guard, and from this circumstance, according to O'Halloran, the territory got the name of Amhas-Righ, changed afterwards to Osraighe, and anglicised Ossory. The Mac Gillapadraics, or Fitzpatrick's, of whom an account is hereafter given, were in ancient times princes of Ossory.

Offaley, or Ophaley, in Irish Hy Fúilge, derived its name from Rossa Failge, or Rossa of the Rings, king of Leinster, son of Cahir More, monarch of Ireland towards the end of the second century, of whom an account has been given in the note on Hy Kinsellagh. The extensive territory of Hy Failgia, possessed by the posterity of Rossa Failge, comprised almost the whole of the present King's county, with some adjoining parts of Kildare and Queen's county; and afterwards under the O'Conors, who were the head family of the descendants of Rossa Failge, and styled princes of Offaley, the territory of Offaley appears to have comprised the present baronies of Warrenstown and Coolestown, and the greater part of Philipstown, and part of Geashill, in the King's county, with the barony of Tinehinch, in Queen's county, and those of East and West Offaley, in Kildare, in which the ancient name of this principality is still retained.

Leix.—In the latter end of the first century, the people of Munster made war on Cuchorb, king of Leinster, and conquered that province as far as the hill of Maistean, now Mullaghuast, in the county of Kildare; but Cuchorb having appointed, as commander-in-chief of his forces, Lughaidh Laighis, a famous warrior, who was grandson to the renowned hero, Conall Cearnach, or Conall the Victorious, chief of the Redbranch knights of Ulster, both armies fought two terrific battles about A.D. 90, one at Athiradan, now Athy, in Kildare, and the other at Cainthine, on Magh Riada, now the plain or heath of Maryboro, in the Queen's county, in which, after many thousands had been slain on each side, the men of Leinster were victorious, having routed the Munster troops from the hill of Maistean across the river Bearbha, now the Barrow, and pursued the remnant of their forces as far as Sliabh Dala mountain, or Beallach Mor, in Ossory, near Borris in Ossory, on the borders of Tipperary and Queen's county. Cuchorb being thus reinstated in his kingdom of Leinster, chiefly through the valour of his general, Lughaidh Laighis, in gratitude conferred on him an extensive territory, to which he gave the name of Laoighise, or the seven districts of Laoighis, a name anglicised to Leise or Leix, and still retained in the name of Abbeyleix. This territory was possessed by Lughaidh Laoighis and his posterity, who were styled princes of Leix; they were famous warriors, and held high honors and privileges under the kings of Leinster, being hereditary marshals and treasurers of that province; and it is stated that the chief commander of the king of Leinster's galloglasses was always appointed to collect the tributes of the princes of Leix. The descendants of Lughaidh Laoighis, in after times, took the name O'Mordha, or O'Morra, anglicised O'Moore, held for many centuries their rank as princes of Leix, and furnished many of the most valiant chiefs of Leinster, of whom an account is given in the subsequent part of the present article. The territory of Leix, under the O'Moores, comprised the present baronies of Maryboro, Cullinagh, Ballyadams, Stradbally, and part of Portneehinch, in Queen's county, together with Athy, and the adjoining country in Kildare, now part of the baronies of Narragh and Rheban. The other parts of the Queen's county, as already shewn, formed parts of other principalities: the barony of Upper Ossory belonged to Ossory; Tinehinch to Offaley; part of Portneehinch to O'Dempsey of Clau Maliere, and the barony of Slieveenargy was part of Hy Kinsellagh.

The son of William Barrett, the dean of Killala, died.

The territories of Ossory, Offaley, and Leix are connected with many of the earliest events recorded in Irish history, and there are many memorials of distant ages still existing in Kilkenny, King's and Queen's counties, as extensive remains of Druidical temples, cromleacs, and earas, sepulchral mounds, numerous round towers, raths, ruins of castles, abbeys, and churches, of which accounts may be found in Tighe's Survey of Kilkenny, Sir Charles Coote's Surveys of King's and Queen's counties, Vallancey's Collectanea, and various topographies, as those of Seward, Lewis, &c.

More than a thousand years before the Christian era, according to our ancient annalists, a great battle was fought between the Nemedians and Fomorians, at Sliabh Bladhma, now the Slievebloom mountains, on the borders of King's and Queen's counties. An account of the colonies of Nemedians and Fomorians will be found in the notes on Dalriada, Tirconnell, North Connaught, and Desmond. Heremon and Heber Fionn, sons of Milesius, having contended for the sovereignty of Ireland, fought a great battle at Geisil, now Geashill, in the King's county, in which the forces of Heber were defeated, and he himself slain, and Heremon became the first Milesian monarch of Ireland; he had his chief residence and fortress at Airgidross, near the river Feoir, now the Nore, and this royal residence was also called Rath Beathach, and is now known as Rathbeagh, near Freshford, in the county of Kilkenny. Heremon died at Rathbeagh, and was buried in a sepulchral mound, which still remains; it appears that other kings of Ireland in early times also resided there, for it is recorded that Ruraighe More, who was monarch of Ireland about one hundred and fifty years before the Christian era, died at Airgidross. Conmaol, son of Heber Fionn above-mentioned, was the first monarch of Ireland of the race of Heber, and fought many great battles for the crown with the race of Heremon, particularly a great battle at Geashill, where Palpa, the son of Heremon, was slain.

The Battle of Moylena, celebrated by the Irish bards and historians under the name Cath Muighelena, and Ionnsuighe Muighelena, was fought in the latter end of the second century, A.D. 192, on the heath of Moylena, a plain in the barony of Fearcale, or Eglis, in the King's county. Eogan More, called Mogha Nuadhat, king of Munster, a celebrated warrior, of whom an account has been given in the note on Thomond, having carried on long contests with Con of the Hundred Battles, for the sovereignty of Ireland, was at length overcome, and forced to fly to Spain, where he remained in exile for many years, and married Beara, a Spanish princess, daughter of Heber, king of Castile, and being assisted by his brother-in-law Fraoch, son of the king of Castile, he invaded Ireland, with a force of 2000 Spaniards as auxiliaries, for the recovery of the kingdom, and, joined by his Irish allies in Munster and Leinster, his army amounted to nine Catha, or battalions, of three thousand men each, making in all about 27,000 men. The monarch Con having collected the forces of Meath, Ulster, and Connaught, both armies marched to Moylena, and fought a furious battle, in which many thousands were slain on both sides, but the monarch Con proved victorious, chiefly through the valour of Goll, the son of Morna, a celebrated champion of the Damnonian or Firbolg race, who commanded the Connaught warriors, and slew the heroic Eogan More, in single combat. The place where this battle was fought, as stated in O'Flaherty's Ogygia (Vol. II. p. 212), is the ancient harony of Fearcall, now English, in the King's county, and there are still to be seen two hillocks, or sepulchral mounds, in one of which was buried the body of Eogan More, and in the other that of Fraoeh the Spaniard, who was also slain in that battle. Another great battle, fought at Moylena A.D. 907, in which the army of the monarch Flann Sionna was defeated with great slaughter by the Munster Forces, under Cormac Mac Cullenan, archbishop of Cashel and king of Munster, has been described in the note on Ormond.

The son of Mulroona, the son of Gilcreest Mac Donogh, the dean (probably of Achonry), died.

Several of the ancient kings or princes of Ossory, who were of the Heremonians of Leinster, are mentioned by the annalists. In the sixth century, Aodh Ainmireach or Hugh, the son of Ainmireach, monarch of Ireland, is stated to have imprisoned Scanlan More, king of Ossory, who refused to pay the usual tribute to the monarch; but Scanlan was liberated through the influence of St. Columkille, who was at that time in Ireland, having come from Iona, in Albany or Scotland, to attend the great national council held at Dromecra, in Kianachta of Glengiven in Derry, to adjust the contention between the monarch of Ireland and the haras.

The Battle of Bealach Ele, in Ossory, was fought A. D. 730, between the people of Leinster and Munster, in which the Munster forces were commanded by Cathal, the son of Finguin, king of that province; and it is stated in the Four Masters, that a great number of the Lagenians fell, and that three thousand of the Munster men were slain, together with Ceallach, prince of Ossory, and the two sons of Corinac, son of Rossa, prince of the Desies. Bealach Ele, where this battle was fought, is considered to be Ballyhale, in the parish of Derrynahinch, barony of Knocktopher, county of Kilkenny.

The Battle of Athsenaith or Uchibadh, fought A. D. 738, between Aodh Ollan, monarch of Ireland, and the people of Leinster, in which the Lagenians were defeated, and nine thousand of them slain, has been described in the note on Ily Kinselagh. This battle was fought near Clonmacnois, in the King's county.

The Battle of Rathbeathach or Rathbeagh, near Freshford, in Kilkenny, was fought A. D. 749, in which the Piets of Ulster, who had invaded Leinster with a powerful force, were defeated with great slaughter by the people of Ossory; and Cathasach, king of the Piets, was slain, as mentioned in the note on Ily Kinselagh.

Irish Chiefs and Clans. The following accounts of the Irish chiefs and clans of Ossory, Offaley, and Leix, have been collected from the topographies of O'Heerin, O'Dugan, O'Brien, O'Halloran, and the various other works so often enumerated in the course of these notes:

I. Mac Giolla Padruig or Mac Gillpatrick, anglicised to Fitzpatrick, is thus designated in the topographies of O'Heerin and O'Dugan, in which his territory of Ossory is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"We journey across the Barrow of ancient streams,
After treating of the heroes of Leinster,
To the level plain of the land of my heart,
To the noble hosts of Ossory.

"To Mac Gillpatrick of the fine fortress,
The land of Ossory is by law ordained,
From Bladhma, southward to the sea,
Brave are his battalions in the battles.

"Chieftains who are mighty warriors,
Let us treat of the heroes of Liathdrom,
From the Barrow to the smooth plains of Munster,
To the king of Tara its protection belongs."

O'Dugan describes Ossory and the Mac Gillpatricks as follows:

"A country not excelled in force of cavalry,
Let us now proceed into Ossory,
Which doubtless maintained in every degree
The honour and nobleness of Erin.

Bryan, son of Ardgal Mac Mahon, lord of Oriel (Monaghan), died after a well-spent life.

"There are three tribes who possess it,
The Clan Carroll who are free from opposition,
They are fierce as leopards under their leaders,
Likewise the Clan Donnelladha of the brown shields."

"The third tribe which is recorded,
Are the Mac Gillpatricks of the fair fortress,
Noble and of fine figure are the clan,
Their habitation is the seat of great kings."

It appears from the above passages in the poem, that Ossory extended from Bladhma, or the Slieve Bloom mountains, on the borders of King's and Queen's counties, as far southward as the sea; that is, to the confluence of the rivers Nore, Suir, and Barrow, near the bay of Waterford, to which place the southern extremity of Kilkenny nearly extends; and it is also mentioned, that Ossory extended from the Barrow to the plains of Munster, which corresponds with the extent of Ossory, as explained in the preceding part of this article. Liathdrom, above mentioned, was an ancient name of Tara; and it appears that it is here alluded to, to shew that the chiefs of Ossory, who were of the Heremonians of Leinster, were descended from the ancient kings of Tara. The Mac Gillpatricks took their name from Giolla Padruic, prince of Ossory in the tenth century, one of their celebrated chiefs; and several of the Mac Gillpatricks, styled kings and princes of Ossory, are mentioned in the tenth and eleventh centuries in the Four Masters and Annals of Inisfallen. In the beginning of the eleventh century, Donogh Mac Gillpatrick, prince of Ossory, is mentioned as having opposed the progress of the Dalcassians on their return from the battle of Clontarf; and Donal Mac Gillpatrick, prince of Ossory in the twelfth century, carried on various contests with Dermot Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, and his English allies under Strongbow and others, who had invaded and ravaged his territories; and as stated in Maurice Regan's account of these affairs, given in Harris's Hibernica, the prince of Ossory had a force of five thousand men, and fought many fierce battles with the English and their Irish allies. Several valiant chiefs of the Mac Gillpatricks are mentioned in the course of these Annals, during their contests with the English. In early times, the Mac Gillpatricks, as princes of Ossory, ruled over the entire of the county of Kilkenny, and part of Queen's county; but in after times, were dispossessed of the greater part of their possessions by the Butlers and other English settlers in Kilkenny, and were confined to the harony of Upper Ossory, in the Queen's county. The Fitzpatricks, at different periods from the reign of Henry VIII. to that of George II., were created barons of Castletown, barons of Gowran, and earls of Upper Ossory, of whom accounts may be found in Lodge's Peerage. The Fitzpatricks are still found in the Queen's county, but are much more numerous in the counties of Cavan and Leitrim, to which they were expelled at an early period by the English. II. O'Carbhaill or O'Carroll, and O'Donnelladha or O'Donoghoe, are given by O'Dugan and O'Heerin as ancient chiefs or princes of Ossory, and thus designated:

"O'Carroll of the reddened spears,
O'Donoghoe of the generous aspect,
Slough Liag of the productive land,
They are two princes in the same country.

"Near to the Barrow of productive borders,
Is the chief of the territory you have heard recorded,
A man who is elected over Moy Mail,
He is O'Donoghoe of the fair Gowran.

"From Kilkenny of the marble (lime) stones,
To Sliabh Gaithle of the smooth fertile hill,
Is Cluann Carrol of the fair plain,
The country on the borders of the blue mountains.

The territory possessed by O'Carroll and O'Donoghoe appears to have been the harony of Gowran and Slogh Liag, which is probably the barony of Shillelogher, both in Kilkenny. These O'Carrolls were probably a branch of the O'Carrolls, princes of Ely; and the O'Donoghues, perhaps a branch of the O'Donoghues, princes of Cashel; an account of both these families has been given in the note on Ormond. III. O'Conchobhair or O'Conor, prince of Hy Failge or Offaley, and his territory, are thus designated by O'Dugan and O'Heerin:

John and Donal, the sons of Philip Mac Guire, died.

"Let us westward proceed to Offaley,
To which brave heroes make submission,
Of their laws I make mention,
Of their convention I make remembrance."

"The lord of Offaley, a land of mirth,
Not unknown to the poets,
Is O'Conor the mainstay of the fair plain,
Who rules at the green mound of Cruachan."

The extent of the principality of Offaley, which comprised a great part of King's county, with parts of Kildare and Queen's county, has been explained in the preceding part of this article. The green mound of Cruaghan, mentioned in the above passage of the poem, was Croghan, a beautiful hill situated in the parish of Croghan, within a few miles of Philipstown, on the borders of King's county and Westmeath. The O'Conors were the head chiefs of the Cahirian race, the descendants of Rossa Failge, eldest son of Cahir More, monarch of Ireland in the latter end of the second century, of whom an account has been given in the note on Hy Kinsellagh, and were consequently a branch of the Heremonians of Leinster, and of a different descent from the O'Conors, kings of Connaught. The O'Conors, princes of Offaley, usually denominated O'Conors Failge, took their name from Concobhar or Conor, prince of Hy Failge, who is mentioned in the Annals at A.D. 1014, and were very powerful and warlike chiefs, of whom many are mentioned in the course of these Annals; and they make a remarkable figure in Irish history during their contests with the English for more than three hundred years, whose forces they defeated in numerous battles recorded in the Annals; and they generally fought in conjunction with the Mac Geoghegans, powerful and valiant chiefs in Westmeath, of whom an account has been given in the notes on Meath and Teffa. The O'Conors had their chief fortress at Dangan, now called Philipstown, in King's county, and several castles in other parts of that county and in Kildare, and maintained their independence and large possessions down to the reign of Elizabeth, after which their estates were confiscated. O'Halloran states that one of these O'Conors, under the title of count Ofalia, was captain-general of the coast of Grenada, in Spain, about the year 1770. IV. O'Mordha or O'Moore, prince of Laoighis or Leix, and his territory, are thus designated by O'Heerin:

"After Offaley of the ancient lands
We advance to Leix of Leinster;
The brown-haired heroes in wealth abound,
On their history for some time we dwell.

"The great district of Leix of the keen swords,
It is of Leix of Riada I now treat;
O'Moore the fighter of battles,
Of the one-coloured golden shield."

The extent of the principality of Leix, which comprised the greater part of the Queen's county, and part of Kildare, has been already described in the present article. Laoighis or Leix of Riada, mentioned in the above passage, was also called Magh Riada, and was the ancient name of the great plain or heath of Maryboro, in the Queen's county. The O'Moores, styled princes of Leix, as explained in the preceding part of the present article, were of the Irian race, or Clanna Rory of Ulster, and descended from the renowned hero, Conall Cearnach, who was chief of the Red Branch Knights of Ulster about the commencement of the Christian era;

O'Flaherty, i.e. the Giolla Duv, the son of Bryan, lord of West Connaught (in Galway), died.

and they held the high rank of marshals and treasurers of Leinster. They had their chief fortress at Dunamase, a few miles from Maryboro, erected on a rock situated on a hill; it was a place of almost impregnable strength, of which some massive ruins still remain. The O'Moores, like other independent princes, as the O'Reillys of Brefney, the O'Tooles of Wicklow, &c. coined their own money; and it is stated in Sir Charles Coote's Survey of the Queen's County, that some of the silver coins of the O'Moores are still extant. Many chiefs of the O'Moores are mentioned in the course of these Annals, and they were highly distinguished for their valour during their contests with the English forces for several centuries. Rory O'Moore, a celebrated chieftain in the reigns of Queen Mary and Elizabeth, defeated the English forces in many engagements, and recovered the territory of Leix, possessed by his ancestors, which he held 'till his death, in 1578, when he was killed in a conflict with Fitzpatrick, baron of Ossory, who had joined the English. Amongst the heroic actions of Rory O'Moore, it is mentioned by Mac Geoghegan and others that on one occasion, having been betrayed and surprised at night at his residence in the woods, by Robert Hartpole, at the head of two hundred of the English, the valiant O'Moore alone performed the amazing exploit of cutting his way through their ranks with his sword, and escaped in safety. His son, Owen O'Moore, generally called Owny Mac Rory O'Moore, was a famous commander in the wars against Elizabeth, and defeated the English in many engagements, in one of which, in the year 1599, he cut off a great number of the troops under the Earl of Essex, in a defile on their progress through Leinster, at a place called from that circumstance Bearna Cleitigh, signifying the Pass of Plumes, from the great quantity of plumes left there which were worn by the English knights who were slain. Another of Owen O'Moore's daring exploits is recorded, namely, that at a parley held with him in the year 1600, near Kilkenny, by Sir George Carew, president of Munster, the earl of Thomond, and Thomas Butler, earl of Ormond, O'Moore boldly took the earl of Ormond prisoner, and detained him from the 10th of April to the 12th of June, when he liberated him, on receiving for his ransom three thousand pounds. Roger O'Moore, his descendant, a man of extraordinary abilities and bravery, is celebrated in Irish history as the chief leader who organised the great insurrection of 1641. There are still several highly respectable families of the O'Moores in Kildare, King's and Queen's counties, the heads of which are the O'Moores of Ballyna, in Kildare, and Sir Garrett O'Moore, of Cloghan Castle, in King's county.

V. O'Dionuosaigh, or O'Dempsey, lord of Clann Maoilnghra, or Clannmalieri, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin, with an introduction to the other chiefs of Offaley:

"The clans of the country of extensive plains,
Let us now proceed to treat of their chieftains,
What bosts are more wealthy than they,
Over the territory of Offaley of fair lands?

"Clannmalieri above all tribes,
Noble is the source of their pedigree,
The smooth plains of the land they have defended,
The country is the inheritance of O'Dempsey."

The territory of Clannmalieri possessed by the O'Dempseys contained parts of the baronies of Geashill and Philipstown, in the King's county, with part of Portnevin, in Queen's county, and part of Offaley, in Kildare, including Monasterevan and the adjoining districts; and, according to Sir Charles Coote in his Survey, the O'Dempseys had part of Ballycowen, in the King's county. The O'Dempseys were a branch of the Cahirian race of the same descent as the O'Conors Failge, and were head chiefs of Clannmalieri, and sometimes styled princes and lords of Clannmalieri and Offaley; they were very powerful in former times, and many of them are mentioned in the course of these Annals. In the twelfth century they contended with the English forces under Strongbow, earl of Pembroke, who in the year 1173, together with his son-in-law Robert de Quiney, or de Quincey, constable and standard-bearer of Leinster, marched a powerful force into Kildare and Offaley; but being opposed by the Irish clans, commanded by the O'Dempseys, chiefs of Clannaliere, the English were defeated with great slaughter; and amongst the slain was de Quincy, the standard-bearer; the affair is thus mentioned by Maurice Regan, in Harris's Hibernica: "From thence the earl (Strongbow) went to Kildare, making many incursions into Offaley, upon O'Dempsey, lord of that country, who refused to come unto him, and to deliver hostages; the earl, to subdue him, made a journey in person upon him, Offaley was burned and harassed, the whole prey of the country taken, and the army retired towards Kildare; in the retreat, the earl, with a thousand men, marched in the van-guard, and the reer was commanded by Robert de Quincy; in the pass, when the van-guard was passed, O'Dempsey gave upon the reer, at which charge Robert de Quincy, with many others, were slain, and the banner of Leinster lost; and for his death, as well by the earl as by the whole army, great lamentation was made." The O'Dempseys had their chief castle at Geashill, in the King's county, and many others in that county, also in the barony of Offaley in Kildare, and one at Ballybrittas, in the barony of Portneinch, in the Queen's county. The O'Dempseys were deprived of most of their possessions after the Elizabethian wars, but afterwards got regrants of several thousand acres of their ancient lands, as may be seen in the Inquisitions of Leinster; and sir Torlogh or Terence O'Dempsey was knighted in May, 1599, by Robert Devereux, earl of Essex, lord lieutenant of Ireland; he was afterwards created baron of Philipstown and viscount of Clannaliere, by patent, the eighth of July, 1631, in the reign of Charles I. Lewis O'Dempsey, his grandson, who succeeded as viscount of Clannaliere, died in 1683, and was succeeded by his eldest son Maximilian, who was made lord lieutenant of the Queen's county, by king James II., and sat in his parliament in 1689. His estates were confiscated for his adherence to the house of Stuart, by act of attainder of William III., in 1691. Maximilian O'Dempsey, the last viscount of Clannaliere, died in 1714, and the title is supposed to be extinct. James O'Dempsey was a colonel in the army of James II.; and Terence O'Dempsey, a younger branch of this family, settled in Cheshire, and died in 1769; his grandson, James O'Dempsey, an eminent merchant now living in Liverpool, is one of the chief representatives of this ancient family. VI. O'Duinn, O'Dunn, or O'Dunne, chief of Hy Riagain, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

Mae Guire, namely Thomas Oge, gave up the castle of Enniskillen to Philip Mae Guire, after Edmond and Thomas Oge had been set at liberty.

"Over Hy Regan of the mighty victories,
Are active warriors who conquer in battle,
O'Dunn is chief of the conquering troops,
The mainstay of the battling spears."

The territory of Hy Riagain, possessed by the O'Dunns, now forms the barony of Tinehineh, in the Queen's county. The O'Dunns were chiefs of note in former times, and they are still numerous in Kildare, King's and Queen's counties, and also in Meath there are several respectable families of the name, but many of them have changed the name to Doyme. VII. O'Riagain or O'Regans were, it appears, the ancient chiefs of Hy Riagain, and gave its name to that territory, which is still retained in the parish of Oregan or Rosenallis, in the barony of Tinehineh. Of the ancient clan of the O'Regans was Maurice Regan, secretary to Dermot Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, and who wrote an account of the Anglo-Norman invasion under Strongbow and his followers, which is published in Harris's Hibernica. Sir Teige O'Regan was a distinguished officer in the army of king James the Second. VIII. O'Brogarain, probably O'Brogans, are given by O'Dugan as chiefs on the same territory as O'Dunn and O'Dempsey, and thus mentioned:

"The O'Brogans dwell in their towns,
The Clan Kenny and Clan Coror,
Their lands are well known to support
O'Dunn and O'Dempsey."

Henry, the son of Owen O'Neill, having gone to the English, who supplied him with a very large force, marched to Castlefin (in Donegal), and

IX. O'Haongusa or O'Hennesey, chief of Clar Colgan, and O'Haimirgin, chief of Tuath Geisille, are thus mentioned by O'Dugan and O'Heerin:

"Of the chiefs of the fair fertile plain
Are O'Hennesey and O'Haimirgin;
Strong-voiced are their troops, and great their fame,
And magnanimous are the Clan Murehadhan."

"Another chief who is known to us,
O'Hennesey who rules over Clar Colgan;
His lands are fair beyond those of the Fenians of Fail,
He closely adjoins the borders of Croghan."

"The fair district of Geashill is possessed
By a chief on the borders of Leinster;
His rapid progress is a march of power.
The name of this chief is O'Haimirgin."

The districts of these two chiefs appear by the above passage to have been situated about Geashill and Croghan, in the baronies of Geashill and Philipstown, in the King's county. Another O'Hennesey is mentioned by O'Dugan as chief of Galinga Beag, now the parish of Gallen, in the barony of Garrycastle. X. O'Maolchein, probably O'Milliken, or O'Mulligan, some of whom have changed the name to Molyneux, chief of Tuath Damhuighe, signifying either the land of the oxen, or of the two plains, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin, and the district possessed by him appears to have adjoined that of O'Hennesey:

"Over Tuath Damhuigh of the fair fortress
Is O'Maolchein of the happy heart;
Delightful is the smooth district of the plain,
Its borders resemble the fairy land."

XI. O'Maolmuaidh, or O'Mulloy, prince of Fear Ceall, is thus designated by O'Dugan:

"The prince of Feareall of the ancient swords
Is O'Mulloy of the free-born name;
Full power was granted to him,
And he held his own country uncontroled."

The extensive territory possessed by the O'Mulloys comprised the present baronies of Eglisli or Fearcall, Ballycowan, and Ballyboy in the King's county, and formed originally a part of the ancient kingdom of Meath. The O'Mulloys were of the race of the southern Hy Nialls or Clan Colman, the ancient kings of Meath, and as princes of Fearcall were very powerful, and many chiefs of them are mentioned in the course of these Annals; and when reduced to the subjection of English rule, in the reign of Elizabeth, they had conferred on them, under the crown, the office of royal standard-bearers of Leinster, which they held for a long time; the greater part of their estates were confiscated after the Cromwellian and Williamite wars, but there are still many respectable families of the name in the King's county, and also in Roscommon, of whom copious accounts may be found in the learned D'Alton's Annals of Boyle. XII. The O'Carrolls, princes of Ely O'Carroll, of whom an account has been given in the note on Ormond, possessed the barony of Lower Ormond, in Tipperary, and those of Clonlisk and Ballybritt, in the King's county, and had their chief castle at Birr. XIII. Mac Coghlan or Mac Coghlan, prince of Dealbhna Eathra, and O'Maolnghach, probably O'Mulledy, chief of the Brogha, are thus mentioned by O'Dugan:

"Mac Coghlan is the valorous mainstay,
And prince of delightful Delvin Abra,
The chief of the Brogha of great prosperity,
Is O'Mulledy of the brilliant achievements."

The territory of the Mac Coghlan, lords of Delvin Abra, comprised the present barony of Garrycastle, in the King's county; they were of the race of the Dalcassians, a powerful tribe of the

O'Neill, his father, proceeded to the same place to join Henry and the English, with all his forces;

Munster Milesians, and were chiefs of note in former times, of whom many are mentioned in the course of these Annals. They had their chief castles at Gallen and Garrycastle, near Banagher, and the last representative of note of the family was Thomas Mac Coghlan, M.P. for the borough of Banagher in the Irish parliament, who died in 1790. Brogha, the district of the O'Mulledys above-mentioned, appears to have adjoined Mac Coghlan's territory, and was probably part of the barony of Garrycastle, in King's county, and of Clonlunan, in Westmeath, as there were in former times many families of note of the O'Mulledys in Westmeath, whose estates were confiscated after the war of the Revolution, and of whom accounts may be found in the various Inquisitions. XIV. O'Sionnaigh, lord of Tefia. O'Dugan, in his topography, gives O'Catbarnaigh as head prince of Tefia, whom he thus designates:

"High prince of Tefia who obtained renown
Is O'Caljarney of the battling arms."

This name was rendered O'Kearney, and the ancient chiefs possessed an extensive territory in Tefia, or Westmeath, and there are still many respectable families of the O'Kearneys in Meath and Westmeath; the chief branch of them took the name of Sionnach O'Catharnaigh, and the word Sionnach signifying a fox, the family name became Fox, and the head chief was generally designated an Sionnach, or the Fox. They were of the race of the southern Hy Nialls, and their territory was called Muintir Tadbgain, and comprised an extensive district in Tefia, containing parts of the baronies of Rathconrath and Clonlunan, in Westmeath, with part of the barony of Kilcoursey, in King's county. Several chiefs of them are mentioned in the course of these Annals, and in the reign of Elizabeth they got the title of lords of Kilcoursey; there are still many respectable families of the name of Fox in Meath, Westmeath, Longford, and King's county. XV. Mac Amhalgaidh, Mac Auley, or Magawley, is given by O'Dugan as chief of Calraidhe-an-Chala, and thus designated:

"The fair Mac Auley rules over
The entire of the ports of Calry."

The territory called Calry comprised the present parish of Ballyloughloe, in the barony of Clonlunan, in Westmeath; and the ports alluded to in the above passage were those of the Shannon, to which this parish extends; and according to Mac Geoghegan, the Mac Auleys, lords of Calry, also possessed part of the barony of Kilcoursey, in the King's county; they were chiefs of note in former times, and the present head of this ancient family is the Count Magawley of Temora, near Frankford, in the King's county. XVI. O'Gormain, O'Gorman, or Mac Gorman, is given by O'Dugan and O'Heerin as chief of Crioch mBairce, and thus designated by them:

"The tribe of Eochy of exalted fame
Rule over the clans of Hy Faolain,
Mac Gorman of great valour Rules over the fair Hy Bairce."

"The country of Hy Bairce of the fair fortress,
Of the melodious race of Daire Barach,
O'Gorman took possession of the lands,
A chief who actively rushed to battle."

The territory of the O'Gormans called Hy mBairce, is now the barony of Slievemargue, in the Queen's county; they were chiefs of note in former times, and some of them settled in the county of Clare, and had large possessions, and an account of them has been given in the note on Thomond. XVII. O'Duibh or O'Duff, chief of Hy Criomthain, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"About Dun Masc of the smoothest plains,
O'Duff rules over Hy Criomthain,
Chief of the country of great produce,
A land which yields the finest fruits."

The district of Hy Criomthain, about Dun Masc or Dunamase,

O'Donnell, that is Naghtan, went to oppose them, but made peace with O'Neill on that occasion, as comprised the greater part of the two baronies of Maryboro, in the Queen's county. XVIII. Mac Fliodhbuidhe, Mac Aodhbuidhe, or Mac Evoys, are mentioned in O'Brien's Dictionary, at the word Tuath, as chiefs of Tuath-Fiodhbuidhe, in the Queen's county, and they are thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"The ancient country of Fighlugh of the fair lands
Is a good lordship for a chieftain,
The Clan Mac Evoy are its inheritors,
The yellow-haired host of hospitality."

The territory of the Mac Evoys appears to have been situated in the barony of Stradbally, in the Queen's county. The Mac Evoys were of the Clan Colla of Ulster, and chiefs of note in ancient times; and they also possessed a territory in Tefia, called Hy Mac Uais, now the barony of Moygoish, in Westmeath; and there are still many respectable families of the name in Meath and Westmeath, some of whom have changed the name to Mac Veagh. XIX. O'Ceallaigh or O'Kellys, chiefs of Magh Druchtain and of Gailine, are thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"Over Moy Druchtain of the fair fortress,
Rules O'Kelly over the plain of the salmon;
The smooth aspect of the level country
Is like the fruitful land of promise."

"Gailine of the pleasant rivers,
Is O'Kelly's undisputed right,
Powerful is the tribe in hunting,
Over the sunny lands of Gailine."

These territories of the O'Kellys appear to have been situated in the baronies of Stradbally and Ballyadams, in the Queen's county, along the Barrow, as alluded to in the above passages in the poem, where the districts are mentioned as the plain of the salmon, and of the pleasant rivers. XX. O'Caollaidhe, O'Keeley, or O'Keily, chief of Crioch O'Muighe, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"The country of Omoy of the fair plains,
Along the Barrow of the flowing streams,
To O'Keeley is the pleasant land,
A chief who always ruled in peace."

This district, situated along the Barrow, is now probably the parish of Tullowmoy, in the barony of Ballyadams, Queen's county. XXI. O'Leathlahhair, O'Lawlors, or O'Lalors, took their name from Leathlabhar, prince of Dalaradia or Ulidia, now the county of Down, in the tenth century, who was their ancestor, and they are therefore of the Irian race, or Clanna Rory of Ulster, and of the same descent as the O'Moores, princes of Leix. The O'Lawlors had in ancient times extensive possessions in Leix, chiefly, it appears by inquisitions and other records, in the barony of Stradbally, Queen's county; and there are still several respectable families of the name in Queen's county, Kildare, Kilkenny, and Tipperary. XXII. O'Dubhlaine, or O'Delany, chief of Tuath-an-Toraigh, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"High chief of the productive territory,
From the delightful Coill Oughteragh,
Is O'Dowling the man of hospitality,
From the mountain of the most delightful bay."

The O'Delanys were a clan of note in the barony of Upper Ossory, Queen's county, and also in Kilkenny. XXIII. O'Braonain, or O'Brennan, chief of Hy Duach, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"Idogh of Ossory of the fertile land,
The fair wide plain of the Nore,
Throughout this plain rules most active
Its rightful chief O'Brennan."

The territory of the O'Brennans, chiefs of Idough, now forms the barony of Fassadinin, in Kilkenny, where the name is still numerous. XXIV. Mac Braoin or Mac Breen, and O'Broith, or O'Bree, chief of Magh Seadna, are thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

he had not a sufficient force, and delivered up the castle to O'Neill, together with Kinel Moain, and also the rents of Inisowen; and Henry having left guards in the castle, he and O'Neill returned home after their victory on that occasion.

"Mac Breen of the land of the fortress,
Rules over the clans whom I remember,
A fair, nut-producing country,
O'Bree is chief of the free Moy Sedna."

XXV. O'Caihdeanaich, O'Coveney, or O'Kevenys, chiefs of Magh Airbh and Clar Coill, are thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"Over Moy Arve let us now record
O'Keveney of the woody plain,
Head of each conference was the fair counsellor,
Who resides at Coill O'Cathosaigh."

The plain of Magh Airbh comprised the present barony of Cranagh, in Kilkenny. XXVI. O'Gloiairn, O'Gloran or Mac Gloran, chief of Callainn, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"O'Gloran the flourishing scion
Obtained a territory in a delightful country,
A smooth land about charming Callan,
He inherits a country without reproach."

The name of this territory is still retained in the parish of Callan, barony of Kells, county of Kilkenny. XXVII. O'Caollaidhe or O'Keeley, chief of Hy Bearchon, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"Thereon of the yellow mantles,
Chief of the country is O'Keeley,
The plain of the host of great wealth,
The land of the Barrow of limpid streams."

This territory was Ihercon, an ancient barony, as stated by Seward, now joined to that of Ida, in the county of Kilkenny; and there is a parish called Rosbercon, in the barony of Ida. XXVIII. O'Bruadair, O'Broder, or O'Brody, chief of Hy n-Eire, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"Lord of Iverk of the swift steeds
Is the friendly O'Broder, like a stately tree;
A sandy country from the heavy floods,
A land as delightful as Moenmoy."

This territory is now the barony of Iverk, in the county of Kilkenny. XXIX. The O'Sheas, who changed the name to Shee, were numerous and highly respectable, in former times, in the county of Kilkenny, and were some of the O'Sheas, chiefs of note in Munster, of whom an account has been given in the notes on Thomond and Desmond. XXX. The O'Ryan and O'Felans, ancient families of note in Carlow, Tipperary, and Waterford, of whom accounts have been given in the notes on Ormond, Desies, and Hy Kinsellagh, were also numerous and respectable in Kilkenny. XXXI. The Tighes, of whom there are some respectable families in Kilkenny and other parts of Leinster, are said to be of the ancient Irish clan of the O'Teiges, who were chiefs of note in Wicklow and Wexford, and of whom an account has been given in the notes on Hy Kinsellagh and Cnalan. XXXII. The Floods, of whom there are many respectable families in Kilkenny and other parts of Ireland, are said to be of Irish descent, though supposed to be of English origin; as many of the ancient clans of the Maoltuiles, and of the Mac Thellighs or Mac Tullys, changed the name to Flood, thus translating the name from the Irish Tuille, which signifies a Flood. XXXIII. The Mac Coserys or Cosgraves, ancient clans in Wicklow and Queen's county, changed their name to Lestrange. The O'Mooneys are placed in the Queen's county on the map of Ortelius; and the O'Dowlings and O'Niechals or O'Nieholls, are mentioned by some writers as clans in Queen's county. The O'Beechans or O'Behans were a clan in the King's and Queen's counties, and several learned men and Donal Glas Mac Carthy, lord of Carbery (in Cork), died.

O'Driscoll More, namely, Mac Con, lord of Corco Laoighe (in Cork), died.

Teige, the son of Tomaltach Mac Dermott, was eminent ecclesiastics of the name are mentioned in the course of these Annals.

Kilkenny.—The greater part of Ossory was formed into the county of Kilkenny, in the reign of king John, and so called from its chief town, the name of which, in Irish Cill Chainnigh, signifying the church of Canice or Kenny, was derived from Caimneach, a celebrated saint, who founded the first church there in the latter end of the sixth century.

King's and Queen's counties.—The greater part of the principality of Leix, with parts of Ossory and Offaley, were formed into the Queen's county; and the greater part of the principality of Hy Falgia or Offaley, with parts of Ely O'Carroll and of the ancient kingdom of Meath, was formed into the King's county, both in the sixteenth century, A. D. 1557, by the earl of Sussex, lord deputy in the reign of Philip and Mary; from which circumstance they were called the King's and Queen's counties; and the chief town of King's county got the name of Philipstown, and that of Queen's county Maryboro. Kilkenny, King's and Queen's counties, are amongst the finest in Ireland, and abound in lands of great fertility and beauty; the scenery along the Shannon and Brossna, in King's county, and the Barrow, in Queen's county, and the Nore, Suir, and Barrow, in Kilkenny, is extremely fine; and the extensive and magnificent mountains of Slieve Bloom, on the borders of King's and Queen's counties, with Croghan, a large and beautiful verdant hill in King's county, present much interesting scenery, and have been celebrated in Spenser's Fairy Queen. These counties and Kildare were in former times covered with extensive woods; and in King's and Queen's counties and Kildare are immense tracts of the great bog of Allen, formed of the remains of ancient forests. Kilkenny is famous for its coal mines and marble quarries, and was also celebrated for its woollen manufactures, particularly frieze and blankets; and in Queen's county are also extensive coal mines and potteries, and iron mines were formerly worked.

Anglo-Normans and English in Kilkenny, King's and Queen's counties. As already explained in the note on Hy Kinsellagh, Eva, the daughter of Dermot Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, having been married to Richard de Clare, earl of Pembroke, commonly called Strongbow, the kingdom of Leinster was conferred on Strongbow by king Dermot; and William Marshall, earl of Pembroke, having married Isabella, daughter of Strongbow, by his wife Eva, the inheritance of the kingdom of Leinster passed to the family of the Marshalls, earls of Pembroke, and was possessed by the five sons of William Marshall, who became in succession earls of Pembroke and lords of Leinster; and on the extinction of the male line of the Marshalls the different counties of Leinster were divided amongst the five daughters of William Marshall, earl of Pembroke, and their descendants in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, of which a full account is given in Hanmer's Chronicle, and in Baron Finglas's Breviate of Ireland, in Harris's Hibernica. Joanna, the eldest daughter of William Marshall, earl of Pembroke, had, on the partition of Leinster, Wexford allotted as her portion; and being married to Warren de Montelenssey, an English baron, he, in right of his wife, became lord of Wexford, which afterwards passed, by intermarriage, to the de Valences, earls of Pembroke, and lords of Wexford; and in succession to the family of Hastings, earls of Abergavenny, and to the Talbots, earls of Shrewsbury, Waterford, and Wexford. Matilda or Maud, another daughter of William, earl Marshall, had the county of Carlow allotted to her, and married Hugh Bigod, earl of Norfolk, and that family became lords of Carlow, which title, together with the county of Carlow, afterwards passed in succession, by intermarriages, to the Mowbrays and Howards, earls of Norfolk. Sibilla, another of the earl Marshall's daughters, got the county of Kildare, and was married to William Ferrars, earl of Ferrers and Derby, who became lord slain by the people of Cathal Mac Rannall, on the plain of Kiltathchomarc, with the cast of a dart.

of Kildare, a title which passed, by intermarriage, to the de Veseys. The great family of the Fitzgeralds, afterwards became earls of Kildare. Isabel, another daughter of William Marshall, earl of Pembroke, had for her portion, the county of Kilkenny, and was married to Gilbert de Clare, earl of Gloucester and Hereford; and after his decease, without issue, the county of Kilkenny fell to his three sisters, and passed, by intermarriage, chiefly to the family of de Spencers, barons de Spencer, in England, and afterwards became possessed mostly by the Butlers, earls of Ormond. Eva, the fifth daughter of William Marshall, had Leix, and the manor of Dunamase, or O'Moore's country, comprising the greater part of the present Queen's county; and having married William de Bruce, lord of Gower and Brecknock, in Wales, he became, in right of his wife, lord of Leix; and one of his daughters being married to Roger Mortimer, lord of Wigmore, in Wales, Leix passed to the family of Mortimer, who were earls of March, in England. The King's county, as already stated, was formed out of parts of Offaley, Ely O'Carroll, and the kingdom of Meath; and in the grant of Meath given by Henry II. to Hugh de Lacy, a great part of the present King's county was possessed by de Lacy, who built in that county the castle of Durrow, where he was slain by one of the Irish galloglasses, as narrated in these Annals at the year 1186. The Fitzgeralds, earls of Kildare and barons of Offaley, became possessed of a great part of the King's county; and the family of de Huse or Hussey, had part of Ely O'Carroll, and the country about Birr.

The following have been the chief families of English descent in Kilkenny, King's and Queen's counties:

In Kilkenny, the Butlers, Graces, Walshes, Fitzgeralds, Roths, Archers, Cantwells, Shortalls, Purcells, Powers, Morris, D'Altons, Stapletons, Wandesforde, Lawlesses, Langrishes, Bryans, Ponsonbys, &c. The Butlers became the chief possessors of the county of Kilkenny, as earls of Ormond and Ossory, dukes of Ormond, earls of Kilkenny and Gowran, viscounts of Galmoy, and various other titles derived from their extensive estates in this county and in Tipperary, as already explained in the note on Ormond.

The Graces.—In a note in these Annals at the year 1224, an account has been given of Maurice Fitzgerald, a celebrated Anglo-Norman chief who came over with Strongbow, and was ancestor of the earls of Kildare and Desmond. William Fitzgerald, brother of Maurice, was lord of Carew in Wales, and the descendants of one of his sons took the name of de Carew, and from them are descended the Carews of Ireland, great families in Cork, Wexford, and Carlow. From another of the sons of William Fitzgerald, as shewn in Lodge's Peerage, were descended the Keatings and Gerards, families of note in Ireland. The eldest son of William Fitzgerald, called Raymond Fitzwilliam, got the name of Raymond le Gros from his great size and strength; he was one of the most valiant of the Anglo-Norman commanders, and was married to Basilia de Clare, sister of Strongbow, and held the office of standard bearer of Leinster, and was also for some time chief governor of Ireland; he is thus described by Holingshed and Cambrensis: "Raymond was large-bodied and broad-set, of more than middle stature, his hair yellow and curled, his eyes large, grey and round, his nose somewhat high, and his countenance well coloured; he was pleasant and merry, and though heavy in body yet active; he had special care of his men and soldiers, and watched many whole nights, ranging and walking abroad in the camp; he was wise, modest and wary, nothing delicate in his fare, nor curious in his apparel, could bear all weathers, hot or cold, and endure any toils; was patient and self-commanding as a governor, wise and circumspect, and albeit a very valiant captain and a noble soldier, yet in all martial affairs he passed in wisdom, and excelled in all things appertaining to a valiant captain." Raymond died about A.D. 1184, and was buried in the abbey of Molana, on the island of Darinis, on the river Blackwater, in the bay of Youghal. Maurice, the eldest son of Raymond le Gros, was ancestor of the great family of the Fitzmaurices, earls of Kerry, of whom an account has been given in the note on Desmond. Raymond had another son called Hamon le Gros, and his descendants took the name of le Gros, or le Gras, afterwards changed to Grace. Hamon le Gras got great grants of land in Ossory, now the county of Kilkenny, and several distinguished chiefs, his descendants, are mentioned in Irish history during the wars of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries, as Hamon le Gras, a celebrated warrior, who was slain in the battle of Ascul, near Athy, in 1315, fighting against the forces of Edward Bruce; and in 1385 Sir Almaric, baron Grace, is mentioned as head of the family. Several of the Graces were barons and lords of Parliament, and held the office of seneschals and sheriffs in Kilkenny, Tipperary, and Limerick; and in 1410 sir John Grace was Custos of the county of Kilkenny, and, in conjunction with the Butlers, they were the chief military commanders in Ormond and Ossory; many families of the Graces also settled in the counties of Tipperary, Wexford, and Dublin, and also in the Queen's county, at Ardglass and Gracefield. The Graces were created barons of Courtstown, and held an extensive territory in the county of Kilkenny called Grace's Country, comprising the greater part of the barony of Cranagh, and had a magnificent castle at Courtstown, in the parish of Tullaroan, of which some ruins still remain; they possessed the entire of the parish of Tullaroan, hence they were sometimes styled barons of Tullaroan; and in the old church there, and also in the cathedral of Kilkenny, are still to be seen some of their monuments, amongst others, one to John Grace, baron of Courtstown, who died in 1568. In the wars of the Revolution the Graces lost their hereditary estates, John Grace, the last baron of Courtstown, having forfeited thirty thousand acres of land in Kilkenny for his adherence to King James II. Richard Grace, a very valiant officer, was a colonel in the army of James II., and particularly distinguished for his defence of Athlone; and several of the Grace family were officers of note in the Austrian service. The chief representatives of this ancient family are the Graces of the Queen's county, and those of Mantua, in the county of Roscommon. Accounts of the Graces will be found in the Memoirs of the family by Sheffield Grace, in Phelan's and Ledwiche's Antiquities of Kilkenny, and Lodge's Peerage.

A commotion arose between O'Kane and Mac Quillan, in which Mac Quillan, aided by the sons

The Walshes, called by the Irish Branaghs, from Breatnach, which signifies a Briton, as they originally came from Wales with Strongbow and his followers, got extensive possessions in Waterford, Kilkenny, Wexford, and Carlow, in which counties they are still very numerous. The Walshes were distinguished for their valour and held the office of seneschals of Leinster under the successors of Strongbow; they were very powerful in Kilkenny, and had eighteen castles in the barony of Knoctopher, where an extensive territory has derived its name from them, and is called the Walsh Mountains; they had also parts of the barony of Gowran, and Thomas Fitz Anthony Walsh, seneschal of Leinster in the reign of king John, founded the town of Thomastown, on the river Nore. The Walshes lost most of their possessions in the Williamite wars, but they are still numerous about the Walsh Mountains, where they hold extensive grazing farms, famous for dairies. The Butlers, viscounts of Galmoy, the Graces, Walshes, Roths, and Shees, lost their extensive estates in Kilkenny in the war of the revolution for their adherence to James II., and many members of these families, having entered the Irish brigades, were distinguished officers in the service of France, Spain and Austria. The Burkes, a branch of the Burkes of Connaught, settled in Kilkenny and Tipperary, and some of them in Kilkenny took the name of Gaul, from Gall, signifying an Englishman, and from them Gaulstown got its name. The Purcells were also numerous and respectable in Kilkenny and Tipperary, and in the latter county had the title of barons of Loughmoe.

In Queen's county the following were the chief families of English descent; after Leix had been formed into a county the following seven families were the chief English settlers in the reigns of queen Mary and Elizabeth, and were called the seven tribes, namely, the Cosbys, Barringtons, Bowens, Rushes, Hartpoles, Hetheringtons, and Hovendens; and in the reign of Charles I., Villiers, duke of Buckingham, having got extensive grants in Queen's county, his lands were formed into the manor of Villiers, and passed to the present dukes of Buckingham; and after the Cromwellian wars and of Bryan Oge O'Neill, defeated O'Kane, and slew in the engagement thirty-two of O'Kane's people, and during the same contest many depredations and slaughters were committed by both parties; the son of Mac Quillan was slain by O'Kane, and Mac Quillan plundered Aibne O'Kane.

The English of Dublin and Meath made an incursion into O'Byrne's country (in Wicklow), where they committed great depredations; but they were overtaken by the O'Byrnes and O'Tooles, who defeated the English, and slew four score of them, and took from them immense spoils.

The son of Mac Murrough, lord of Leinster, namely Murtogh Cavenagh, heir to the lordship of Leinster, was slain by the English of the Condae Riavaeh (Wexford), and Mac Murrough, after the death of his son Murtogh, waged war against the English of Wexford and of Leinster, who were obliged to liberate the seven hostages who were taken on the day Murtogh was slain, and to pay the revolution the families of Parnell, Pole, Pigott, Prior, Coote, Cowley, Dawson, Despard, Vessy, Staples, Brown, Johnson, Trench, Weldon, and Walpole, got extensive possessions.

In King's county, the Fitzgeralds, Digbys, Husseys, and Fitzsimons, were the chief families of English descent before the reign of Elizabeth, and some of the Fitzsimons took the Irish name of Mac Ruddery, from the Irish Mac Ridire, which signifies the Son of the Knight. In after times the Armstrongs, Droughts, Burys, Parsons, Molesworths, Lestranges, and Westenras were the chief English settlers.

Nobility.—The following have been the noble families in Kilkenny, King's and Queen's counties, from the reign of king John to the present time:

In Kilkenny.—The Marshalls, earls of Pembroke, the de Clares, earls of Gloucester and Hertford, and the de Spencers, as above mentioned, were all lords of Kilkenny; the Butlers, earls of Ormond and Ossory, and marquesses and dukes of Ormond, earls of Kilkenny, earls of Gowran, earls of Glengall, earls of Carrick, viscounts of Galnoy, viscounts Mountgarrett, and barons of Kells; the Bullens, earls of Ossory; the Fitzpatricks, barons of Gowran and earls of Ossory; the Graces, barons of Courtstown; the Fitzgeralds, barons of Burntchurch; the Wandesfords, earls of Castlecomer; the de Montmorencys, viscounts Mountmorres and viscounts Frankfort; the Flowers, barons of Castle Durrow and viscounts Ashbrook; the Ponsonbys, earls of Besborough, and viscounts Duncannon; the Agars, barons of Calan, viscounts of Clifden and barons of Dover; the Cuffes, viscounts Castlecluffe and barons of Desart; the family of Mathew, earls of Landaff, and of great note in Tipperary, were forgotten to be mentioned in that county.

In Queen's county, the Marshalls, earls of Pembroke; the de Bruces and Mortimers, as above mentioned, were lords of Leix; the Fitzpatricks, barons of Castletown, barons of Gowran, and earls of Upper Ossory; the Butlers, barons of Cloughgrennan; the Cootes, earls of Mountrath; the Molynceuxs, viscounts of Maryborough and earls of Sefton, in England; the Dawsons, earls of Portarlinton; the de Veseys, barons of Knapton and viscounts de Vesity.

In King's county, the Fitzgeralds, barons of Offaley and earls of Kildare; the Digbys, barons of Geashill, and earls Digby, in England; the O'Carrolls, barons of Ely; the O'Sionnaghs or Foxes, barons of Kilkoursey; the O'Dempseys, barons of Philipstown and viscounts of Clannaliere; the Lamberts, barons of Kilkoursey and earls of Cavan; the Blundells, barons of Edenderry; the family of Parsons, at Birr or Parsonstown, are earls of Ross and barons of Oxmantown; the Molesworths, barons of Philipstown; the Moores, barons of Tullamore; the Burys, barons of Tullamore and earls of Charleville; the Tolers, earls of Norbury viscounts Glandine; the Westenras, barons of Rossmore, have extensive estates in Monaghan and King's county.

Ecclesiastical Divisions. The following have been the bishops' sees in Kilkenny, King's and Queen's counties:

The See of Ossory was first founded at Saiger, now the parish of Seir-Kieran, near Birr, in the King's county; and was so called from Kiaran of Saiger, a celebrated saint who founded a church there in the beginning of the fifth century, and who was called St. Kiaran the elder, to distinguish him from Kiaran of Clonmacnois, who lived at a later period. The see of Saiger was afterwards transferred to Achadhboe or Aghaboe, sometimes called Aghavoe, in the barony of Upper Ossory, in the Queen's county, where a celebrated monastery was founded by St. Canice, in the sixth century. The see of Aghaboe continued to be the seat of the diocese of Ossory, to near the end of the twelfth century, when it was removed to Kilkenny, and called the see of Ossory; and the bishops of Ossory were in early times styled bishops of Saiger, and sometimes bishops of Aghavoe. The diocese of Ossory comprehends almost the whole of the county of Kilkenny, with the barony of Upper Ossory, in the Queen's county; and the parish of Seir-Kieran, in the King's county, being nearly co-extensive with the ancient principality of Ossory. Clonenagh, in the Queen's county, had a celebrated monastery founded in the fifth century by St. Fintan, and its abbots were also styled bishops; it was annexed to the see of Leighlin. Birr had a celebrated abbey founded by St. Brendan, in the sixth century, and its abbots were styled bishops; it was annexed to the see of Killaloe.

The See of Clonmacnois, in Irish, Cluan Mac Nois, signifying, according to some accounts, the retreat of the sons of the noble, either from the great numbers of the sons of the Irish nobility who resorted to its college for education, or, from many of the Irish princes having their burial places in its cemetery. An abbey was founded here in the sixth century by St. Kieran the younger, on lands granted by Dermot, the son of Carroll, monarch of Ireland, and it became one of the most celebrated seats of learning and religion in Ireland in the early ages. It was formed into a bishop's see, and the cathedral was erected in the twelfth century by the O'Melaghins, kings of Meath, who conferred most extensive endowments of lands on the abbey and see. A city and college were also founded here, and the place maintained its literary and religious celebrity for many centuries; but having been repeatedly devastated by the Danes, during the ninth, tenth, and eleventh centuries, and frequently ravaged by the English, in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries; and its cathedral and churches having been finally demolished by the barbarian soldiers of the English garrison of Athlone, in the reign of Elizabeth, it has fallen into utter decay; but its ancient greatness is amply demonstrated by the magnificent and venerable ruins of the cathedral and seven churches, and of a castle, together with two beautiful round towers, some splendid stone Crosses, and other antiquities which still remain. It contains one of the most ancient and extensive cemeteries in Ireland, and was the burial place of many of the Irish kings and princes, as the O'Conors, kings of Connaught, of whom Torlogh O'Conor, monarch of Ireland in the twelfth century, together with his son Roderick O'Conor, the last Milesian monarch of Ireland, were buried in its cathedral, and also many of the O'Melaghins, kings of Meath; the O'Kellys, princes of Ily Maine; the Mac Dermotts, princes of Moylurg, and several other ancient and noble Irish families. Clonmacnois, called the Iona of Ireland, is beautifully situated in a lonely retreat on the banks of the Shannon, and though now part of the King's county, the diocese originally formed part of the ancient kingdom of Meath, and was united to the see of Meath in the latter end of the sixteenth century. In the abbey of Clonmacnois was written the celebrated work called the Annals of Tigearnach, by that learned abbot, in the eleventh century; and of this work, together with the Book of Clonmacnois, and various other ancient Irish MSS., an account will be given in a future number on the ancient literature of Leinster.

Mac Murrough eight hundred marks as an eraic (fine), for the death of his son.

A contention arose between Hugh Buidhe O'Neill and Mac Quillan, in which the O'Neill joined Mac Quillan against Hugh Buidhe.

A. D. 1443.

Aongus Mac Gillfinnen, abbot of Lisgoole, died.

Manus Mac Mahon, a worthy heir to the lordship of Oriel (Monaghan), for hospitality and feats of arms, died.

Eiver Mac Mahon was killed by O'Neill, i. e. Owen, the son of Niall Oge.

Fingin and Dermot, the sons of Mac Gillpatrick, lord of Ossory, were treacherously slain in Kilkenny, at the instance of the son of Richard Butler.

Bryan, son of Edmond, son of Thomas, son of Cathal O'Ferrall, was killed and drowned while endeavouring to make his escape from the island of Port-an-goirtin (in Longford), where he had been kept confined for two years and a half by Donal Buighe O'Ferrall.

Mulroona, the son of Teige O'Carroll, lord of Ely, died.

Teige O'Dowd, the son of the lord of Tireragh, was slain by his own kinsmen.

Hugh Buidhe O'Neill committed great depredations on his elder brother, Murtogh Roe O'Neill, who was obliged to pay him his tribute for the plunder, after which they made perfect peace with each other.

O'Flynn of Siol Maoilruain (in Galway), and some of his kinsmen, were slain by the Clan Costello, in the house of O'Killeen.

Mulroona, son of Mulroona O'Dowd, was treacherously slain by his own brother.

Mac Egan of Ormond, namely, Gillananeev, son of Gillananeev, the son of Hugh, chief professor of Brehonism in Munster, a man versed in various arts, and who kept a house of general hospitality, died.

Hugh Mac Egan, son of Fergal, the son of Boetius, died, in the tide of his prosperity; and he was the most learned and eloquent man of the Irish in his time, and chief professor of laws in North Connaught.

A. D. 1444.

Richard, son of the great dean, the son of Donal, son of John Gallda O'Ferrall, the bishop of Ardagh, died.

William O'Hetigen, bishop of Elphin, went to Rome, accompanied by a great number of the clergy of Connaught, where he and the greater part of them died; among them were Teige, the son of Teige Mac Dermott, after having obtained the abbacy of Boyle; William, son of the dean O'Flanagan, prior of Roscommon; the son of Malachy, son of Cormac, son of Cormac Mac Donogh, abbot of Ballysadare, as well as many also of the clergy of Ulster.

Hugh Buigh, the son of Bryan Ballach O'Neill, king presumptive of Ireland, the most famous for hospitality and feats of arms of any of the heirs presumptive in his time; a man who recovered by force most territory from the English, was wounded by the cast of a javelin in Iveagh (in county of Down), of which he lay in the pains of death for twenty-five days, namely, from Spy Wednesday to the second day of summer, when he died, on a Saturday, after having gained the victory over the world and the devil.

O'Neill, namely, Owen, the son of Niall Oge, and the greater portion of the Irish of Ulster, except O'Donnell, marched with a very great force to plunder and dispossess the sons of Hugh Buigh (O'Neill), after his death; Murtogh Roe O'Neill, Henry O'Neill, Mac Quillan, with all their auxiliaries, mustered a large force to oppose them in the Duv Thrian (in Antrim), and they cut a narrow pass through the wood, in the direction in which they expected they would march on them; O'Neill having entered this narrow pass, the other party attacked them, and slew Mac Donnell of the galloglasses, who was in the rear of the army and amongst those that were marching; the army became greatly dispirited on that account, and offered the other party their choice hostages, whom they might select on conditions of permitting them to return out of the narrow pass, which they did with sorrow and disappointment; amongst the hostages they offered, selected by themselves, to the sons of Mac-I-Neill Buidhe, were Hugh, the son of O'Neill; the son of Henry O'Neill; the son of Mac Mahon; the son of O'Mil-lan, and fifteen others along with them.

Owen, the son of Donal, the son of Murtogh O'Connor, lord of Sligo and of the territory of Carbury, was slain with the cast of a dart by the sons of Cormac Mac Donogh; for the son of Malachy, the son of Cormac Mac Donogh, had been killed before that time in a fight by the grandson of John O'Hart, and it was on that account Owen, the son of Donal, was slain.

O'Neill, that is Owen, marched with his forces into the English settlements in Oriel, and plundered and burned many of them; he also plundered Stradbally of Dundalk, and he obtained sixty marks and two tuns of wine for sparing the town from burning.

A great miracle was wrought by the image of the Virgin Mary at Trim, namely, a blind person was restored to sight, a dumb person to his speech, a cripple to the use of his feet, and the use of his hand was given to a person who had it contracted and bound to his side.

O'Neill having attacked the English, plundered a great deal of their property, and received great payments from them on condition of making peace with them for half a year; and after that peaceable agreement with the son of O'Neill, Bryan, son of Donal, the son of Owen O'Neill, marched with a preying party into the English settlements, where Bryan himself was killed by the cast of a stone, and Eiver Mac Mahon was taken prisoner, and many others of his party were slain.

Torlogh, son of Owen, the son of Roderick O'Connor, was killed by the Clan Conmaigh, by the cast of a dart.

John, son of Bryan, the son of Edmond O'Ferrall, and eight others, were slain by John O'Ferrall, and by the sons of Donal Buidhe O'Ferrall, on Slieve Callan of Brileth (in Longford).

Edmond, son of Thomas, the son of Cathal O'Ferrall, died.

Manus Mac Mahon, heir to the lordship of Oriel (Monaghan), died, and was buried at Clones.

Eber, the son of Bryan Mac Mahon, heir to the lordship of Oriel, was killed.

Teige O'Brien, lord of Thomond, died.

Sioda Cam Mac Namara, chief of Clan Cuilein (in Clare), a general entertainer of the men of Ireland, died between the two Christmases (within the twelve days of Christmas).

Duvcovlagh, daughter of Thomas Mac Guire, lord of Fermanagh, the wife of Owen Mac Caghwel, a humane, charitable, and hospitable woman, died.

A. D. 1445.

Thomas O'Lennon, a canon and sacristan of Lisgoole, died.

O'Donnell, Philip Mac Guire, the sons of Hugh Mac Guire, and the sons of Owen O'Connor, marched with a great force to Sligo, and burned it, and slew Mac Donogh, lord of Tirerrill, namely, Tomaltach Mac Donogh, and many others,

William, son of John, the son of Donal O'Ferrall, lord of Annaly, died at an advanced age, after a well spent life; and two chiefs were then nominated for Annaly; namely, Rossa, son of Murtogh Midhiach, the son of Bryan O'Ferrall, was nominated by the entire tribe of Murrough O'Ferrall; and Donal Buidhe, son of Donal, the son of John O'Ferrall, was nominated chief by the clan of Hugh, and the clan of John O'Ferrall, and by all his friends; the country was very much disturbed between them, until at length they made peace by dividing Annaly between them.

Roderick, son of Thomas Mac Guire, the son of the lord of Fermanagh, died.

Mac Gillfinnen, namely, Bryan, chief of Muin-tir Peodachain (in Fermanagh), a man distinguished for hospitality, and for defending his rights against neighbouring enemies, died.

Donogh Ballach Mac Gauran, heir to the chieftaincy of Tullaghaw (in Cavan), died.

Dermot O'Toole, lord of Clan Toole (in Wicklow) was slain while endeavouring to recover a plunder taken from him the same day by the sons of Tomaltach O'Dempsey, being at the time eighty years of age.

Conor, the son of O'Connor Kerry, was slain by Mahon O'Connor, his kinsman, both being in the same boat at the time going to Iniscatha (Scattery Island on the Shannon).

Richard Mac Quillan (in Antrim), was killed.

Thomas Dillon and young Richard Dillon died.

Laighnagh, the son of Hugh Buighe Mac Geoghegan, was slain at Cuill an Connaidh (the wood of Connaidh in Westmeath), by the sons of Murtogh Oge Mac Geoghegan.

Donogh Bacach O'Rourke died, and West

Brefney nominated Donogh, the son of Tiarnan Oge O'Rourke, the O'Rourke, in opposition to Loughlin, the son of Teige O'Rourke.

A. D. 1446.

Owen O'Lennon, prior of the monastery of Lisgoole, died.

Roderick, son of Ardgall More Mac Mahon, lord of Oriell, died; and his son Hugh Roe was appointed his successor by O'Neill.

O'Donnell marched with a great force into Connaught to aid his friends, first to O'Rourke's place, and from thence through Moy Nisse (in Leitrim, near Carrick-on-Shannon), crossed the Shannon into Moylurg through the plain of Connaught, and through Clanconway; and Mac William Burke having come to meet him at Dunamon, took him with him to Conmaicne Cuile Tola (Kilmaine in Mayo).

Peregrine, son of Maine, the son of Niall Sionach (Fox), lord of the men of Teffia, died.

Edmond O'Byrne, lord of Hy Faolain (borders of Wicklow and Kildare), died, and Dunlaing O'Byrne was appointed his successor.

Donogh, son of Art, the son of Dermot (Mac Murrough), lord of Hy Kinsellagh (in Wexford and Carlow), was killed by the O'Byrnes and O'Tooles.

A great contest was carried on between O'Connor Faigy and the English of Meath, a great part of Meath was burned and plundered, and many of the people slain; the predatory parties often advanced as far as Tara, northward, and as far as Cuil Maighe Claraigh¹ eastward; and Bryan, the son of the Calvach O'Connor, was taken prisoner by the English in that war.

A contest arose between the two O'Conors in the plain of Connaught, in which Dermot Roe, the son of Teige O'Connor, was slain by O'Connor Don, aided by the Clan Maurice-na-mbrigh (Clan Morris, in Mayo), and by some of the Clan Felim (O'Conors), in Cuil O'Fionntain (Coolavin in Sligo).

A great commotion took place in Thomond, by which the entire territory was spoiled, and O'Brien himself was taken prisoner; but Mac William of Clanrickard having entered Thomond forcibly, liberated O'Brien, and restored all to order.

The Mac Donoghs, Torlogh Carrach O'Connor, and O'Connor Don, having joined Mac William of Clanrickarde, for the purpose of appointing a Mac Donogh (in Tirerrill, county of Sligo), they finally agreed on electing two Mac Donoghs, giving half of the country to each, namely, John, the son of Conor Mac Donogh, and Teige, the son of Tomaltach More Mac Donogh.

Feilim, the son of John O'Rourke, was killed within the precincts of Fenagh by his own clan, namely, by the sons of Loughlin O'Rourke.

The son of Donal O'Rourke was killed by the sons of Donogh, the son of Tiarnan O'Rourke.

Thomas, the son of Thomas Oge O'Reilly, was slain on great Christmas day by the sons of Redmond, the son of Gillaisa O'Reilly.

Donal O'Coffey, a good military leader, and a learned poet, and his two sons, were slain on Croinis of Lough Annan² of the son of Nemeth, by the sons of Art O'Melaghlin, and the sons of Fiacha Mac Geoghegan.

Tanaidhe, son of Maoilin, the son of Tanaidhe O'Maolconry, died in Clan Feorais, between the two Easters, and was buried in the monastery of Baile-ui-Bhogain.³

Teige Mac Clancy (in Leitrim), was killed by Cormac, the son of O'Flanagan.

Edmond, the son of Mac Maurice Kerry, was slain by Cormac, the son of Owen Mac Carthy.

Bryan O'Dowd was killed by the people of Tyrawley.

Dermot, son of Ir, the son of Cathal Roe Mac Rannall, was slain.

A. D. 1446.

1. Cul Maighe Claraigh, or the district of the level plain, was an extensive tract in the south-eastern part of Meath, situated between Killeck and Dunboyne, and the name is still retained in the parish of Moyglare.

2. Lough Ainninn of the son of Neimid was so called from Ainnian, the son of Neimid, or Nemedius, a Scythian, who planted the colony called Nemedians in Ireland, in the early ages; it is now known as Lough Ennell, near Mullingar, in Westmeath, and Croinis was the name of one of the islands on the lake.

3. *Baile-*ui-Bhogain, a parish in the barony of Upper Moyferagh, county of Meath, where there was an ancient Augustinian abbey. The Clan Feorais, above-mentioned, signifies the Berminghams, as it appears that this district belonged to the Berminghams of Kildare.

A. D. 1447.

The abbot of Fenagh, a man who kept a house of general hospitality, died.

A great plague raged in the summer and harvest of this year, of which the following died: the prior of Ballybogan (in Meath); the prior of Connala (Connell in Kildare); the baron of Calatron (Hussey, baron of Galtrim in Meath); Gerald, the grandson of Waldron, and a great many in Meath, Munster, and Leinster; and some say that seven hundred priests died of it.

The church of Aghalurcher (in Fermanagh), was roofed, and the eastern tower was raised, by Thomas Oge Mac Guire, lord of Fermanagh, in honour of God and SS. Tigearnach and Ronan, for the benefit of his own soul.

Donal Ballach, son of Thomas, the son of Philip Mac Guire, was killed by Donogh, the son of Philip Mac Guire, aided by the sons of Art Mac Guire, and the people of Orgial, and by the sons of O'Daivin; for Donal was in opposition to Mac Guire, and against Philip, the tanist of the country; and it happened, while he was returning from Brefney O'Reilly, on his journey to the town of Henry O'Neill, that he was attacked and slain; and he was buried in the monastery of Lisgoole.

Hugh, son of Thomas Oge Mac Guire, the son of the lord of Fermanagh, died.

Feilim, son of John, the son of Philip O'Reilly, a worthy heir to the lordship of Brefney, for noble deeds and hospitality, having gone to Trim (in Meath), to visit the king of England's viceroy, lord Furnival, was taken prisoner by him, and died of the plague, after having gained the victory of extreme unction and repentance, and was buried in the monastery of Trim.

Fionnguala, daughter of Calvach O'Conor Faily, and of Margaret, the daughter of O'Carroll, who was first the wife of O'Donnell, and afterwards of Hugh Buighe O'Neill, the most distinguished woman in Ireland in her time, except her mother alone, for personal figure and form, in fame and nobility, having exchanged this transitory world for eternal life, entered a religious and devout order in the monastery of Killaghy (in King's county).

Hugh, son of Murtogh Oge Mac Geoghegan, the most active champion of the southern Hy Niall, and heir to the chieftaincy of all Kinel Fiacha (in Westmeath), died of a short sickness.

Edmond, son of Edmond Burke, and Felim, son of Murrough Mac Rannall, died.

Gillananeev, son of Aireachtagh, the son of Solom (Solomon) Mac Egan, chief Brehon and professor of laws in Ireland, died.

William O'Doran, chief Brehon of Leinster, and his wife, died of the plague.

Owen, son of Pedras, the son of Saordalaidh O'Breslen, chief Brehon of Fermanagh, and head erenach of Aireach Maolain (Derryvullen in Fermanagh), died.

Conor, the son of John Mac Branan (in Roscommon), having resigned his lordship, Tomaltach Carrach, son of Con, the son of Hugh, was appointed his successor.

The monastery of Leix (Abbeyleix in Queen's county), in Leinster, in the bishoprick of Leighlin, was founded by O'Moore, in honour of St. Francis; and he selected it as a burying place for the O'Moore and his posterity.

A. D. 1448.

A great plague raged in Meath, of which Conor, the son of Hugh O'Ferrall, Dermot Mac Conway, and Henry Duv Mac Tcheden, three of the friars of Longford O'Ferrall, died.

Conor Mac Faolchudha, bishop of Ros Ailithir (Ross), died.

The abbot of the Trinity on Lough Key died.

James Oge, son of James Gallda, the son of the earl of Ormond, died.

Cathal, the son of O'Conor Faily, was killed by the English of Leinster.

Cuchonaecht, the son of Philip Mac Guire, died after having gained the victory of repentance, and was buried in the church of Aghalurcher. O'Hara Riavach was killed. O'Loughlin, lord of Burren, died.

Niall O'Mulloy was killed by the people of Hy Riagain (in Queen's county).

Conor, son of John, the son of Eachmarcach Mac Branan, lord of Corcachlan (in Roscommon), for thirty six years, died at Dumha Sealga in Moy Aoi, having resigned his lordship the year previous, and was interred at Roseommon.

Cathal, son of Felim, the son of Roderick O'Conor, was killed by the sons of Roderick, the son of Cathal O'Conor, namely, Torlogh and Dermot.

Teige Oge, son of Teige, the son of Gillacollam O'Higgin, chief professor of poetry of Ireland and Scotland, died after repentance, at Kilconla (in Galway), and was buried in the monastery of Ath-leathan (in Mayo).

Dermot, son of Owen, the son of Mahon O'Daly, chief professor of the men of Meath, a learned man and poet, died, and was interred at Durrow of Columkille (in King's county).

A. D. 1449.

Donogh, son of Tiarnan Oge (O'Rourke), lord of West Brefney, being in a consumptive disease of the chest for a year, died, and Tiarnan, the son of Teige O'Rourke, was elected by West Brefney as his successor.

Owen, the son of John (O'Reilly), lord of Muinter Maolmora (county of Cavan), died, and John O'Reilly, his son, was appointed by O'Neill, and by the tribe of John O'Reilly; and Fergal, the son of Thomas More O'Reilly, was elected by the Clan Mahon O'Reillys, and by the English, in consequence of which a great contention and commotion arose between them; the lord justice (Richard Nugent, baron of Delvin) and the earl of Ormond, having gone to aid Fergal O'Reilly, John, with his forces, made an attack on the van of their army, and slew and took prisoners three score of them, with the son of Torlogh, and the son of Donal Bane O'Reilly.

Bryan Oge O'Neill died.

More, daughter of Hugh, the son of Philip Mac Guire of the Battle Axe, the wife of Art, the son of Owen O'Neill, died.

A. D. 1449.

1. Duke of York. Richard Plantagenet, duke of York, earl of March and Rutland, earl of Ulster and Cork, lord of Connaught, Clare, Trün, and Meath, landed at Howth in July, 1449, as lord lieutenant of Ireland, the conditions on which he accepted the appointment being, that he should be the king's lieutenant in Ireland for ten years, and that to support the charge he should receive all the king's revenues without account; and that he should also be supplied with treasure out of England, namely, four thousand marks the first year, and two thousand pounds advanced beforehand, and for the other nine years should receive two thousand pounds per annum; that he might let or farm any of the king's lands, and place or displace all officers at his pleasure; that he might levy what numbers of men he thought fit, and might be at liberty to appoint a deputy, and return at his pleasure. During his administration in Ireland, for a period of eight years, the following Lords Deputies acted under him, namely—in 1450, James Butler, earl of Ormond; in 1452, Richard Nugent, baron of Delvin; in 1453, John Mey, archbishop of Armagh; in 1454, Thomas Fitzgerald, earl of Kildare; in 1455, Edward Fitz Eustace, baron of Manus Buighe, son of Carbury, the son of Dun-Mac Guire, died.

Mac Quillan defeated Murtoogh Roe O'Neill in an engagement, in which the son of Maolmuire Mac Sweeny, the constable of O'Neill's son, and Aongus, the son of Mac Donnell of Scotland, with many others, were slain.

A great commotion arose among the Connallians, by which much damage was done.

O'Felan and Gillcreest Mac Ward, died.

Hugh, son of Loughlin, the son of Geoffrey (O'Flanagan), for a considerable time lord of the Clan of Cahill, the son of Muiredach Muilleathan (king of Connaught in the seventh century), having resigned his lordship for the love of God, and consented to have Dermot, the son of Geoffrey O'Flanagan, appointed in his place, died.

The duke of York¹ having arrived in Ireland with great honour, the earls of Ireland, and the Irish on the borders of Meath, came and submitted to him; and gave him as many oxen as he desired, for the use of his kitchen.

A. D. 1450.

The archbishop of Connaught, namely, the son of the parson, the grandson of John Burke, died in Galway, (according to Ware, John Burke, archbishop of Tuam).

Pierce or Peter Maguire, bishop of Clogher, died at Cleenish, and was interred at Lisgoole.

The bishop O'Gallagher (of Raphoe) died.

Edmond, abbot of Eas Roe (at Ballyshannon), died.

Conor O'Donnell, tanist of Tirconnell, died.

Portlester; and in 1456, Thomas, earl of Kildare, a second time. The duke of York had extensive hereditary estates in Ireland, derived from the de Burgos, earls of Ulster, the Mortimers, earls of March, and Lionel, duke of Clarence, and had many contests with the Irish chiefs, particularly the Mac Geoghegans of Westmeath, of whom he complains in a curious letter, given in Campion's Chronicle, that they had burned one of his chief towns, called Rathmore, in Meath. His administration in Ireland is stated to have been conducted with great equity and moderation, and he became very popular amongst all classes. The duke departed from Ireland in 1460 to assert his claim to the crown of England against King Henry VI., of the house of Lancaster, for as head of the House of York he was heir to the throne; a great number of the Anglo-Irish nobility and gentry of Meath, and other parts of the English pale, accompanied him to England, but were mostly all killed at the battle of Wakefield, A. D. 1460, in which the Lancastrians were victorious, and nearly three thousand of the Yorkists, together with the duke himself, were slain. The duke's son succeeded to the throne of England as King Edward IV.

Nicholas O'Flanagan, parson of Devenish, died at Rome, whither he had gone on a pilgrimage.

Maguire, namely, Thomas, son of Thomas, the son of Philip of the Battle-Axe, went on a pilgrimage to Rome, and in a week after his departure Donogh Dunchadhach, brother of Maguire, namely to Thomas Oge, proceeded to the residence of Cathal, the son of Maguire, and took him prisoner in his house at Cnoenindidh (Knockninny in Fermanagh), and after having plundered his place he brought him to Gort-an-Fheadain, where he slew him, and then proceeded to Tullaghnoloh (in Cavan), to attack Edmond and Donogh Maguire; and some time after Donogh Duncadhach went to hold a conference with Edmond and Donagh at their place, where they made peace with each other; but, however, Edmond at length took Donogh Duncadhach prisoner by surprise, and brought him with him to Aughalurcher, where he cut off one of his hands and feet, in revenge of the death of Cathal.

Murtogh O'Flanagan, chief of Tura (in Fermanagh), having gone to Rome on a pilgrimage, died after having gained the victory of repentance, and his brother Cormac succeeded him.

Henry O'Neill, Art O'Neill, and the son of Owen O'Neill, having collected their forces, marched into *Trian Congaile*¹ to aid Mac Quillan; and Niall, the son of Henry, the son of Owen, went to commit depredations on Murtogh, the son of Niall Buighe, and plundered him; but Owen, the son of Bryan Oge O'Neill, overtook him, defeated his party, and gave Niall two thrusts of his spear, by which he killed him, and he was buried at Armagh with great honours.

John, the son of Owen O'Reilly, and Donal Ban O'Reilly, concluded a peace with each other, and Fergal, the son of Thomas More, (O'Reilly), having resigned the lordship, received pay from John, the son of Owen, who got possession of all Brefney.

Teige, son of Philip, the son of Thomas Maguire, was killed by the sons of Cormac Mac Gaughran, and was buried at Lisgoole.

Andrew, son of Gillcreest O'Droma, a wise and pious man, died after returning from Rome.

O'Cassidy of Cuil (Coole in Fermanagh), namely,

Teige, the son of Joseph, chief physician of Fermanagh, died.

O'Higgin i. e. Tuathal, chief professor of Ireland in poetry, died of a sudden sickness.

Great depredations were committed by the son of Mac Geoghegan on the English, during which he plundered and burned Rathwire, Killucan, (both in Westmeath), Bally Portel, Bally-na-nGall Orgiall (the town of the English of Oriel), and Kilbixy (in Westmeath); and during that commotion he took Carbury, the son of Lisagh, the son of Rossa, (O'Ferrall), prisoner, and slew the two sons of Tobias, the son of Hoberd, and Bryan, the son of Lisagh, the son of Rossa, in the great town of Lough Sendy (in Westmeath), and, in short, spoiled an immense deal during that war. The English of Meath, and the duke of York, with the king's standard, marched to Mullingar; and the son of Mac Geoghegan, with a great force of cavalry in armour, marched on the same day to Benl-athaglas, to meet the English, who came to the resolution of making peace with him; and they forgave him all he had committed on them, on conditions of obtaining peace.

Donogh O'Gallagher, the coarb of Adamnan (abbot of Raphoe), died.

A. D. 1451.

Redmond, son of William Bermingham, died on his journey from Rome, after his appointment to the see of Tuam.

The monastery of Cavan was burned.

Margaret, daughter of O'Carroll, i. e. Teige, the wife of O'Conor Faily, namely, the Calvaeh, the best woman in her time in Ireland, for it was she who gave two general entertainments of hospitality in one year to the poor, died after the victory of extreme unction and repentance, and having gained the victory over the world and the devil.

Felim O'Conor, the son of the Calvaeh, and of the forementioned Margaret, heir to the lordship of Offaley, a man of great fame and nobility, died, after having been in a consumptive disease for a long time; and there was only one night between the death of each.

A. D. 1450.

1. Trian Congail appears to have been a large territory in the southern part of the county of Antrim, of which the O'Neills of Claneboy were lords, as stated in the course of these Annals.

Murrough O'Madden, lord of Siol Anmcha, (in Galway), the most provident man in his own territory, and of the most valiant hand and best government, died.

Roderick, son of Maolmora Riavach O'Conor, died.

Owen, son of Conor Mac Gillfinnen, son of the chief of Muintir Peodachain (in Fermanagh), and Gillpatrick Buighe Mac Gillfinnen, were slain by Cuchonacht, the son of John, the son of Cuchonacht Maguire, on the 6th of the Ides of February.

A great commotion arose amongst the Hy Manians (O'Kellys of Galway), and O'Conor Don marched to the aid of O'Kelly, who gave him his son, along with two other hostages, as security for twenty marks, which the Hymanians had previously received, viz.: fourteen marks in purchase for peace land from Torlogh Oge, which Hugh O'Conor had paid in, and six marks more from Mac Geoghegan in the same contest; and he (O'Conor) defended O'Kelly on that occasion.

The castle of Corra Finne was erected by Mac William of Clanrickard.

Cathal Duv, the son of Tomaltach Oge Mac Donogh, was killed.

Cathal, the son of Bryan Mac Donogh, was killed by Bryan himself, who cast a skean at him while opposing him respecting his protection.

The three sons of Malachy O'Beirne, Teige, William, and Donogh, were slain at Cluain Creamha, (Cloncruff, in Roscommon), in one hour, by the tribe of Malachy Mac Rannall, and by Donal, the son of Bryan O'Beirne.

Felim O'Conor plundered O'Gara, and O'Gara plundered the inhabitants of the great town of O'Flynn (probably Castlereagh, county of Roscommon).

Dermot, son of Teige, the son of Cormac Mac Carthy, was killed; and Dermot, the son of O'Sullivan More (both in the county of Cork), was killed in revenge of him.

Cathal Roe, the son of Cathal Duv O'Conor, died.

Gillpatrick Oge O'Felan, a distinguished poet, died.

A. D. 1452.

Naghtan O'Donnell, the son of Torlogh of the Wine, lord of Tirconnell, Kinel Moain, Inisowen, and the neighbouring territories, a brave defending hero, the capital letter of peace or war of the north, was slain by the sons of Niall O'Donnell, his brother, in the dusk of the night, on the festival of St. Brendan, because he had previously expelled from Tirconnell those sons of Niall, namely, Donal and Hugh Roe; Naghtan was sixty years of age when he was slain.

Great commotions and dissensions arose between Donal, the son of Niall Garv, and Roderick, the son of Naghtan O'Donnell, about the lordship of Tirconnell, so that the country was in confusion between them, each having friends and abettors, in plundering and destroying one another; many were slain and destroyed, and great plunders and depredations were committed on both sides.

O'Neill, i. e. Owen, with his forces, joined by Maguire, marched into Feadha (the woods or Fews in Armagh), to war with the English of the plain of Oriel (Louth); the son of O'Neill, namely, Owen Oge O'Neill, and Maguire's people, proceeded to Cloch-an-Bhodaigh¹ to plunder the English, from whom they carried off a prey to their camp, the English, and the people of Mac Mahon, with their friends, pursued them, to recover the prey, until they came to the camp; O'Neill and Maguire, with their forces, prepared to oppose them, and a conflict ensued, in which Mac Donnell of the galloglasses, namely, Sorley More, and many besides, were slain, and others of their forces (O'Neill's and Mac Guire's forces), taken prisoners. O'Neill returned to his fortress that night, in great wrath, and Henry, his son, on receiving intelligence of this, came to his father's place, and after that Mac Mahon went to O'Neill and his sons, and they made peace with each other, and an eraic (fine) was given to O'Neill as a reparation for the dishonour done him, and also a fine for the death of Mac Donnell.

The earl of Ormond (James Butler) lord justice of Ireland, demolished the castle of Uaithne (Owney, on the borders of Tipperary and Limerick), on Conor O'Mulryan; he took the castle of

A. D. 1452.

1. Cloch-an-bhodaigh, or the Giant's Stone, is a name applied to some huge stones, part of a Druidical monument, or cromleac, which still remains in the parish of Ballymascaulon, near Dundalk.

2 L 2

Leige (the castle of Ley, near Portarlinton), from the O'Dempseys, who suffered him to march to Airem, in order to release the son of Bermingham, who was imprisoned there, after which he burned Airem; from thence he proceeded into Offaley, and O'Conor came, and submitted to him as a surety for releasing the son of Birmingham; from thence he went into Annaly, and O'Ferrall came and submitted to him, and promised him nine score of oxen for obtaining peace; both parties proceeded from thence into Magh Breaghmaine, where they demolished the castle of Barraeh², and destroyed the greater portion of the corn of the country; from that they marched to Fore (in Westmeath), and from thence to Magh Maine, where the O'Reillys (of Cavan), came and submitted to him, and paid him his tribute; from thence he proceeded to the plain of Oriel (in Louth), where the Mae Mahons paid him his tribute, after which he went to the O'Neills (in Tyrone), and compelled Henry O'Neill to put away from him the daughter of Mae William Burke, whom he had as wife after the death of O'Donnell, who had been her husband, and to take back to him again his own married wife, namely, the daughter of Mae Murrough, the earl's own sister (sister-in-law); he then proceeded to Baile-Atha-Firdiadh Mae Damhain³, where he died between the two Lady Days, after having performed all these journeys in one half-quarter (six weeks). The daughter of the earl of Kildare, namely, the countess of Ormond, died three weeks previous to the death of her husband, the forementioned earl.

The peace which was established between the English and Irish became dissolved after the death of the earl, and sir Edward Eustace was appointed lord justice.

More daughter of O'Conor Faily, the wife of Mae William of Clanrickard, died of the plague.

A most surprising occurrence happened this year, some time before the death of the earl, viz.,

the river Liffey was dried up for the space of two miles.

John Mac Donogh, the joint-chief of Tirerrill, died.

Teige, the son of Dermot Roe O'Conor Don, died.

Torlogh Roe, the son of Bryan Ballach O'Conor, Torlogh, son of Teige, the son of Torlogh Roe O'Conor, and Henry Crumthain, the son of William Mae David, were slain on Corrslieve-na-Seag-sa (Curlew mountains, in Roscommon), by the forces of the Mae Donoghs, in the summer of this year.

David O'Moore, the son of the lord of Leix, was killed by a fall.

Cathal, son of William, son of John, the son of Donal O'Ferrall, was killed by the cast of a dart, after the burning of Fore.

Giollananeev, son of Hugh O'Hanley, lord of Kinel Doffa (in Rosecommon), died at Clooneoirpthe, being blind for a considerable time there, after having previously resigned his lordship.

Loghlin Oge O'Hanley, chief of Kinel Doffa, was treacherously slain in the Cranoge (fortress) of Lough Leisi, by Murrough, the son of Giollananeev O'Hanley, and by Mae Uaitne, the son of Giollananeev, after he had been betrayed by his own people, namely, Donal Carrach O'Mulbride, his son, and Thomas, the son of Gillcreest O'Mulbride; and Roderick Buighe, the son of Giollananeev, was appointed chief, who hanged the three guards of his own people for their evil deeds in having betrayed Loghlin.

Teach Munna (Taghmon, county of Westmeath), was plundered and burned by Fergal Mae Geoghegan.

Mae Carty Riagh, lord of Hy Carbury (in Cork), died, and Dermot An Dunaigh was appointed his successor.

Bryan, the son of Calvaeh O'Conor and of Margaret, was killed by a fall.

2. The Castle of Barraeh, that is, the castle of Barry, which was situated in the parish of Tashinny, in the county of Longford, on the borders of Westmeath. Magh Breaghmaine, here mentioned, was the plain of Brawney, from which the barony of Brawney, in the county of Westmeath, took its name. Magh Maine, above-mentioned, signifying the plain of Maine, was so called from Maine, one of the sons of Niall of the Hostages, monarch of Ireland, who got that territory in the fifth century. It comprised the present barony of Demifore in Westmeath, and the name is still retained in the parish of Mayne, near Castlepollard.

3. Ath Firdhia, signifying the Ford of Firdia, now Ardee, in the county of Louth, get its name from Fir Dia, a Damnonian, or Firlbolg warrior, who was slain at the ford on the river there, by the celebrated champion Cuchullain, who was one of the chiefs of the Red Branch Knights of Ulster about the commencement of the Christian era, and resided in his fortress at Dundegal, now Dundalk.

Fergal Roe Oge, son of Fergal Roe, son of Fergal Roe, son of Donogh, the son of Murtogh More Mac Geoghegan, a commander of an army of great fame and renown in his time, was killed by the son of the baron of Delvin (Nugent), and the sons of Pierce D'Alton, at Cruach Aball (Noghaval in Westmeath), and he was beheaded by them, and his head was carried to Trim and to Dublin, at which places it was exhibited, and it was brought back again and buried with his body at Durrow of Columkille (in King's county).

Malachy, the son of Iorard O'Maolconry, died of the cholic, on the festival of St. Michael, which happened to be on Friday.

O'Coffey, i. e. Hugh Mac-an-Chlasaigh, a learned poet and a man of hospitality, died of the plague in Fearsa Tullach (Fertullagh in Westmeath).

Cuchonacht O'Felan and Gillaisa O'Felan, died.

O'Duigenan of Bally Cailleach Foghair, i. e. Manus, the son of Malachy Roe, died.

Hugh, son of Hugh Oge, son of Hugh, the son of Philip of the Battle Axe Maguire, was killed in the castle of O'Rourke, i. e. of Tiarnan, son of Teige, the son of Tiarnan, by Bryan, son of Donogh, the son of Hugh Maguire, on the 6th of the Ides of April.

Conor Mac Gillfinnen, chief of Muintir Peodachain (in Fermanagh), died on the sixth of the Kalends of April.

A. D. 1453.

Mac Mahon, i. e. Hugh Roe, the son of Roderick, a man of great piety and hospitality, learned in the arts, and distinguished for his feats of arms and noble deeds, died on Easter eve, in his own house at Lurgan (Lurgan-Green, in Louth), and was interred at Clones; and Felim, the son of Bryan Mac Mahon, was appointed his successor over the Orgiallans (people of Louth and Monaghan).

Cormac, son of Giolla Duv, son of Hugh, son of Philip, the son of Dun Carrach Maguire, died on the 16th of the Kalends of July.

A. D. 1453.

1. Ardglass.—The battle here mentioned was fought at Ardglass, a sea-port in the county of Down, and the circumstances above narrated were as follows: A fleet of pirates from Wales having carried off some ships from the Bay of Dublin, and having at the same time taken prisoner Michael Tregury, then archbishop of Dublin, and a native of Cornwall, the pirates were pursued by a fleet from Dublin, which overtook them off the coast of Down or Roderick, the son of Hugh O'Conor, was killed by the son of John Burke, in Conmaicne of Dunmore (in Galway).

Roderick, son of Cathal, the son of Roderick O'Conor, died in the castle of Roscommon.

Murtogh, son of Owen, the son of Donal O'Conor, was slain by his own kinsmen, Donal and Cathal.

Owen, son of Donal Ban O'Reilly, and Philip, the son of John O'Reilly, died; and Edmond, the son of Torlogh O'Reilly, was slain by the English.

The O'Neills of Claneboy sustained a great overthrow at Ardglass¹ by the Savadges, and the English of Dublin, who, with a large fleet, pursued as far as the northern sea a Welch fleet, by which the shipping of Dublin had been plundered, and the archbishop of Dublin taken prisoner; and on their return Henry, the son of O'Neill Buighe, met the English at Ardglass; and they took him prisoner, and slew Cu-uladh, the son of Cahwar Magennis, heir to the lordship of Iveagh, Hugh Magennis, Mac Arten, and also fourteen leaders from the Routes (in Antrim), and their entire loss amounted to five hundred and twenty.

Bryan, the son of Conor Mac Donogh, assumed the chieftaincy of Tirerrill; and Teige Mac Donogh was forsaken by his own friends.

A. D. 1454.

Donal, the son of Niall Garv O'Donnell, was appointed to the lordship of Tirconnell, in opposition to O'Donnell, i. e. Roderick, the son of Naghtan; and not long after that, Donal was treacherously taken prisoner by O'Dogherty, in his own house, and was sent by him to be imprisoned in the castle of Inch (on an Island in Lough Swilly, county of Donegal). When Roderick received intelligence of this, he mustered a force, and being joined by the forces of O'Kane and Mac Quillan, they immediately proceeded to demolish the castle in which Donal was imprisoned and Antrim, defeated them, and liberated the bishop; and, according to some accounts, 520 of the pirates were slain; but, according to these Annals, it would appear that 520 of the Irish forces were killed in the battle with the English, and the Savadges, who were a powerful family, of English descent, settled in the county of Down, and carried on frequent contests with the O'Neills of Claneboy, and other Irish chiefs in that county, of whose lands they got possession.

guarded by a few persons under Cathal O'Dooyiar-ma; Roderick and his party set fire to the portal-door and gateway of the castle, and the stairs took fire, and Donal perceiving that he had no longer time to live than the interval of these forces entering the fortress, he entreated, as a man for death would entreat, to be released from his chains, for he considered it treacherous that he should be killed while in confinement and in chains; his request was complied with, and they set him free from his chains, after which he got up on the battlements of the castle to take a view of the forces, and seeing Roderick beneath him, who was waiting for the flames to subside, that he might enter to put Donal to death, Donal took a large flag stone, which he found by his side, and letting it drop directly over Roderick, it exactly fell on the crest of his helmet on the top of his head, which it completely smashed, and instantly killed him; after his death his forces fled, and Donal saved his life and the lordship of Tirconnell by that blow.

Donal, the son of John O'Reilly (of Cavan), died.

John Buighe and Gillpatrick, the sons of Awlave, the son of Dunearrach Maguire, were treacherously killed by Niall, son of Cormac, son of Giolla Duv, the son of Hugh (Maguire), from whom the tribe of Clanawley, son of Awlave, son of Philip, son of Awlave, the son of Dunearrach, &c., derived the name (in the barony of Clanawley, county of Fermanagh).

Bryan Mae Donogh, chief of Tirerrill, died on the Friday before the Kalends of January, and was interred in the monastery of Sligo, after extreme unction and sincere repentance.

Hugh, the son of Niall O'Mulloy, lord of Fercall (in King's county), died, and his son Peregrine succeeded him; and Peregrine with his forces having proceeded to the eastern part of Fercall, against Theobald O'Mulloy, who was endeavouring to obtain the chieftaincy for himself, they seized on much prey, and Theobald having forsaken his fortress and cattle, their forces carried off the booty, and, having left the son of O'Mulloy with a small party in the rere, Theobald and the sons of Hugh Buidhe Mac Geoghegan, and the people of Ily Riagain (Oregon, in Queen's county), pursued the force and overtook the son of O'Mulloy at Ucht Mona (the brow of the bog), where they slew him with several others, and took Teige O'Carroll prisoner, and Theobald, and the grandson of Cosnavach O'Mulloy, were then appointed chiefs in opposition to each other.

O'Donnellan, (of Galway), i.e. Flann (Florence), the son of Cormac, died.

Donogh, the son of Cathal O'Madden (in Galway), was killed by the sons of William O'Kelly.

Sir Edward Eustace, lord justice of Ireland, died; and the son of John Cam, the son of the earl, assumed the earldom of Kildare (Thomas Fitzmaurice Fitzgerald, earl of Kildare), and was appointed lord justice after the death of Sir Edward Eustace.

O'Brien (or O'Byrne), was treacherously killed by his brother's son, on leaving Kilmantan.

Fergal Roe Mae Geoghegan having resigned his lordship, entered the monastery of Durrow, of Columkille (in King's county), having lost his eye-sight, and Niall Mae Geoghegan succeeded in his place.

Torlogh Dall (the blind), the son of Torlogh Oge O'Conor, died of a short sickness.

Torlogh, son of Murtoogh, the son of Hugh O'Conor, was killed by the Clan Ceithernaigh (in Mayo).

A. D. 1455.

Thomas O'Cairnen, prior of Athlone, the most distinguished man in Connaught for wisdom and knowledge in his time, died.

Torlogh Carrach, son of Donal, the son of Murtoogh (O'Conor), lord of Sligo, died.

Cahir, the son of Murrogh O'Conor Faily (in King's county), was slain by the son of the Calvach O'Conor, who also killed Cuilen O'Dempsey on the same day.

Cuvsradh, the son of Conor O'Reilly (of Cavan), died.

A contest arose between Philip, the son of Thomas Maguire, heir to the lordship of Fermanagh and Mac Gauran (of Cavan); Philip having encamped at Ben Eachlabhra,¹ from which the sons of Philip, Bryan, and Torlogh proceeded with

A. D. 1455.

1. Beinn Eachlabhra, now called Benaghlan, is a very large hill adjoining Cuileagh mountain, near Swanlinbar, on the borders of Cavan and Fermanagh, a place famous in fairy legends, and mentioned in one of the tales quoted in Neilson's Irish Grammar.

twelve horsemen and twenty-seven foot, and burned the town of Mac Gauran, and a great portion of his country, and slew Malachy Dun Mac Gauran and many of his people, and returned home victoriously.

Torlogh, the son of Philip Mac Guire, having gone to Loch Melge (Lough Melvin, in Leitrim), took and plundered the Cranoge (the fortress on the lake), of Mac Clancy.

Owen O'Neill was deposed from his lordship by his son, Henry; and the coarb of St. Patrick, together with Maguire, Mac Mahon, O'Kane, and all the O'Neills, accompanied Henry, son of Owen, the son of Niall Oge, to Tullaghoge,² to inaugurate him, and he was nominated the O'Neill, according to the usual custom.

Henry, the son of O'Neill of Claneboy, returned home from his imprisonment with the English.

The castle of Athlone was taken from the English, having been betrayed by a woman who was in it.

Caislean-na-Sraide (in the parish of Street, in Westmeath and Longford), was demolished by O'Ferrall, and the son of Mac Herbert was slain by him in taking the castle.

Mulroona, son of Conor, the son of Cathal Roe Mac Rannall, died.

Geoffrey, son of Murrough Oge, son of Murrough More, the son of Cathal (O'Ferrall), lord of Clan Hugh of the Mountain,³ died.

Owen Mac Dermott Roe, lord of the woods (in Roscommon), was slain by his own clan.

Maine, the son of Malachy Mac Cabe, the intended constable of the two Brefneys (Leitrim and Cavan), of Oriel, and Fermanagh, died.

O'Cassidy, of Cuile (barony of Coole, in Fermanagh), i. e. Dermod Roe, the son of Niall Roe, died.

A. D. 1456.

O'Neill, i. e. Owen, the son of Niall Oge, the son of Niall More, died.

2. Tullaghoge, as already stated in the note on Tir Eogain, was the place of inauguration of the O'Neills as princes of Tyrone. This place is in the parish of Desertreight, near Dungannon, in the county of Tyrone, and the O'Hagans, who were chiefs of the district about Tullaghoge, presided as chief Brehons of Tir Eogain at the inauguration of the O'Neills; and there are still some earthen ramparts and large stones, the remains of the ancient fortress of the O'Hagans at Tullaghoge. There was also a seat of large rude stones in former times at Tullaghoge, which served as the coronation chair of the O'Neills, and was called Leac-na-Riogh, or the

A great contest arose between Donal, the son of Niall Garv (O'Donnell), lord of Tirconnell, and O'Neill, i. e. Henry, after the expulsion by O'Donnell of the sons of Naghtan O'Donnell into Tyrone; O'Neill and Maguire, with the sons of Naghtan, marched into Inisowen, and they did not halt until they encamped in the neighbourhood of Cuil-Mac-an-Treoin (Kilmacrenan in Donegal). When O'Donnell received intelligence of this, he, with Hugh Roe and his brother, and the son of Mac Sweeney, of Fanad, i. e. Maolmuire, quickly repaired on their horses, unaccompanied by any others, and proceeded to Cuil-Mac-an-Treoin to garrison the castle there, to resist the great force led thither at the instance of the sons of Naghtan; on O'Donnell leaving the town with his few attendants, he was discovered by the other party, who pursued them with all possible expedition, and having overtaken them, they did not grant them the chance of man to man, or of single combat, but the host fell on the few, and slew O'Donnell, namely, Donal the son of Niall Garv, there, on the 18th of May, exactly on a Friday; and Hugh Roe and Mac Sweeney's son were taken prisoners; Torlogh Cairbreach, the son of Naghtan, then assumed the lordship of Tirconnell.

Fergal, son of Conor Mac Dermott, tanist of Moylurg, and Lasarina, his daughter, the wife of Carbry O'Conor, died.

A. D. 1457.

Bryan, son of Philip of the Battle Axe Maguire, the son of the lord of Fermanagh, died after having gained the victory of extreme unction and repentance.

A contest arose between Maguire and the sons of Roderick Mac Mahon, and Mac Guire mustered the forces of his territory to march into Oriel (Monaghan and Louth). When the Mac Mahons received this intelligence, they fled with their cattle

Stone of the Kings, as mentioned in these Annals at A. D. 1432; but this memorial of the sovereignty of the O'Neills was barbarously broken by order of the lord deputy, Mountjoy, in the reign of Elizabeth. The coarb of St. Patrick, above-mentioned, who attended at the inauguration of O'Neill, was John Mey, archbishop of Armagh.

3. Clan Hugh of the Mountain, now called the Clanhugh mountains, in the barony and county of Longford, of which a branch of the O'Ferralls were chiefs.

into their fastnesses, viz., into Eoganaigh, and the Mourne Mountains; Mac Guire, and Philip (Mac Guire), proceeded into Dartry of Coininsi (in Monaghan), and finding no prey before them, they burned Dartry, and the town of Owen, the son of Roderick Mac Mahon, viz., Lis-na-Gabhar, and afterwards returned home.

Philip, the son of Thomas Mac Guire, and his sons, marched with a force into Brefney O'Rourke, but O'Rourke sent his cattle from them into the fastnesses of the country, and Philip then proceeded to the town of O'Rourke, which he burned, together with the entire country; O'Rourke overtook Philip, and an engagement ensued, in which Tiarnan, the son of Teige O'Rourke, and Mac Manus, were slain, and the son of Cathal Bodhar O'Rourke, with many others, were put to flight by the men of Fermanagh, on that occasion.

Bryan, the son of Murtoth Oge O'Ferrall, lord of Clan Awlave O'Ferrall (in Longford), died.

A. D. 1458.

The church of Achaidh Beithe (parish of Aghavca, in Fermanagh), was burned, together with a great number of valuable books in it, belonging to the official (vicar or vicar-general), namely, Niall, the son of Mac Craith Mac Mahon.

O'Donnell, i. e. Torlogh Cairbreach, accompanied by O'Neill, namely, Henry, marched their forces into the lower part of Connaught, from whence they proceeded to Brefney, and preyed and burned the country from the mountain westward, and they also burned the town of O'Rourke, that is, Drumahaire; they took the hostages of the of Connaught, and they were delivered to O'Donnell, after which they returned home.

O'Conor Faily, namely, the Calvach More, the son of Murrogh of the victories, lord of Offaley, a man who never refused hospitality to any person, a lord of the Leinster men, who received most tribute from the English and Irish who were opposed to him, died and was buried at Killaghey; and his son Con O'Conor was appointed his successor.

O'Rourke, i. e. Loughlin, the son of Teige Liath (the grey), lord of Brefney, died.

Art O'Neill, son of Owen, the son of Niall Oge, the most hospitable and brave of the men of Tyrone, died.

Mac Gauran, i. e. Thomas, the son of Fergal, died.

Tomaltach, the son of Conor Mac Dermott, lord of Moylurg, Artagh, Tir Tuathail, &c. (in Roscommon), a general entertainer of the learned of Ireland, a great remunerator of military men and retainers, died on the eve of the festival of St. Bartholomew, and his lawful son, Cathal Mac Dermott, having died a fortnight before that time, they were both buried in the monastery of Boyle; Hugh, the son of Conor Mac Dermott, succeeded Tomaltach.

Geoffrey, son of Edmond, the son of Thomas O'Ferrall, was killed by John, son of Doual, the son of John O'Ferrall, and the sons of Conor, namely, Lisagh, &c.

Edmond Burke, lord of the English of Connaught, and of many of the inhabitants, the most distinguished of the English of Ireland in form, in personal figure, symmetry, nobility, hospitality, justice and truth, died in the latter end of this year.

Fergal Roe Mac Geoghegan, lord of Kinel Fiacha, (in Westmeath), died on the 17th of February.

A. D. 1459.

O'Brien, i. e. Torlogh, lord of Thomond, died.

Cumara Mac Namara was treacherously slain.

Connla Mac Geoghegan, lord of Kinel Fiacha, was killed by the son of Art O'Melaghlín.

O'Beirne, i. e. Bryan, chief of Tir Briuin (in Roscommon), died.

Fergal, the son of Thomas O'Reilly (of Cavan), died.

The earl of Kildare (Thomas Fitz Maurice Fitzgerald), gave a great overthrow to O'Conor Faily, namely, Con, the son of Calvach, in which Con himself was taken prisoner, and the grandson of William O'Kelly, with a great many of his people, were slain.

The Kinel Duachain (in Leitrim), were plundered by Bryan, son of Philip, the son of Thomas Maguire.

Moysleacht (Fenagh in Leitrim), was plundered by Maguire, i. e. Thomas Oge, and the town of Mac Gauran (in the barony of Tullaghaw, county of Cavan), was burned by him on that expedition.

Glaisne, the son of Conor O'Reilly (of Cavan), was killed by the sons of Roderick Mac Mahon.

O'Neill, namely, Henry, the son of Owen, led a force of the English to Caislean-na-hOghmaidhe (the castle of Omagh in Tyrone), to wrest it from the clan Art O'Neill, but they concluded a peace with each other.

John Cam, the son of Cu-uladh Mac Ward (in Donegal), died.

O'Curneen, i. e. Manus, chief historian to O'Rourke (of Leitrim), died.

Maolmuire O'Keenan, an intended chief historian and poet (of Fermanagh), died.

Murtogh O'Daly, a learned poet, died.

A. D. 1460.

The monastery of Moyne¹ in Trawley, in the diocese of Killala, in Connaught, was founded by Mac William Burke, at the request of Nehemias O'Donoghoe, the first provincial vicar in Ireland of the Observantine order of St. Francis.

The bishop O'Brien of Killaloe was killed by Bryan of the fleet, the son of Donogh, the son of Mahon O'Brien, at Inis-Cluana-Ramhfhoda.²

Roderick, son of Manus O'Moghan, parish priest of Elphin, died.

Hugh Roe, the son of Niall Garv O'Donnell, and Maolmurry, the son of Mac Sweeney Fanat, were liberated from their imprisonment by O'Neill, i. e. Henry, after they had been four years in confinement with him, for he considered the sons of Naghtan to be more faithful to him than the sons of Niall.

O'Connor Faily, that is, Con, the son of the Calvach, gave the English a great overthrow, in which the baron of Calatrom (Hussey, baron of Galtrim), and many others were slain.

A. D. 1460.

1. Moyne Abbey was beautifully situated on the western side, near the mouth of the river Moy, in the parish of Killala, county of Mayo, and some extensive and interesting ruins of the abbey and church still remain. Nehemias O'Donoghoe, above-mentioned, was the first who introduced into Ireland the Reformed Order of Franciscan Friars, called De Observantia, that is Observantines, or Observants, and provincial chapters of the order were frequently held at the abbey of Moyne, in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries; but in the 37th year of the reign of Elizabeth, a grant of this friary and its possessions were given to Edmond Barrett, at a rent of five shillings annually.

2. Inis Cluana Ramhfhoda, anglicised Clonroad, was the ancient name of the town of Ennis, in the county of Clare, and so called from its insular situation on the river Fergus, and the name Clonroad is still retained in one of the suburbs of Ennis. The bishop above-mentioned was Torlogh, or Terence O'Brien.

3. O'Reilly. An account of this affair is given in Lodge's Peerage on the family of Taaffe, and it appears that the O'Reillys,

The English gave a defeat to O'Reilly,³ namely, John, son of Owen, son of John, son of Philip, son of Gillaisa Roe, in which O'Reilly, and Hugh his brother, together with Owen Cooch, the son of Mahon Mac Cabe, and many others were slain; Cathal (O'Reilly) the son of Owen, succeeded in his place.

Mac Gauran i. e. Owen, died.

Roderick Ballach, the son of Murtogh O'Connor, died.

Thomas, the son of Thomas Burke, who succeeded Edmond Burke as the Mac William, died.

Mac Cabe, i. e. Henry, the son of Gillcreest, having gone into Annaly with O'Ferrall, namely, Donal Buigh, died suddenly at Lisardabla (Lisard in Longford), and his remains were attended by fourteen score (280) galloglasses, with their battle-axes, conveying him to his burial place in Cavan.

Mac Manus of Tir Tuathail (in Roscommon), Roderick, the son of Owen Roe Mac Manus, a full worthy lord of that territory, was killed by Con O'Donnell, i. e. Con, the son of Niall Garv, the son of Torlogh of the Wine, and by Teige, the son of Teige O'Rourke, who were preying the country, and they carried off the booty to Airgead Glen,⁴ and the chiefs of the Mac Manus took the booty from them in that glen, after Mac Manus had been slain.

Donal, the son of Dermot O'Malley, William O'Malley, and John O'Malley (the O'Malleys of Mayo), having gone with their shipping along with the sons of O'Brien to Corca Baiscinn (in Clare), on an expedition against Mac Mahon, the three (O'Malleys) were slain before they reached their ships, Donal O'Brien was taken prisoner, and Mahon O'Brien was wounded going to his ship, and was drowned before he could reach it, and their people were slaughtered on that expedition.

at the head of about 2000 of the men of Brefney, entered Oriol or Louth, and attacked and plundered the English settlements. Sir Robert Taaffe, son of Sir Nicholas Taaffe, who had been high sheriff of Louth, having collected all the English forces of the county, and being joined at Ardee by the mayor of Drogheda, at the head of 500 archers, and 200 men armed with pole-axes, marched against O'Reilly, and a fierce battle was fought at Malpas bridge, in Louth, in which, after a long contest with great loss to the English, the Brefnians were at length defeated, and O'Reilly's son, with his brother Hugh, Mac Cabe, captain of the galloglasses, Mac Brady, and other chiefs, and 400 of their men were slain. For this signal service of the men of Drogheda, King Edward IV. gave the corporation of that town a sword, to be carried before the mayor, and the annual sum of £20 for the maintenance of the same.

4. Airgead Glen, supposed to be the valley of the river Arigna, in the parish of Kilronan, county of Roscommon, near Lough Allen, on the borders of Leitrim.

Bryan O'Malley was killed by his brother Hugh, in a dispute between them; they were the sons of Teige O'Malley.

A monastery was founded on Inis Arcain⁵ in Munster, in the diocese of Ross, for friars of the

5. Inis Arcain, now Inisherkan, anciently Iniskiaran, so called from St. Kiaran, an island situated between Cape Clear and the bay of Baltimore, in the county of Cork, on which some ruins still remain of this ancient abbey, which was founded by Florence O'Driscoll.

6. Inis Corthadh, now Enniscorthy, in the county of Wexford, where the above mentioned Franciscan monastery was founded by Donal Mac Murrough Cavenagh, and of which some ruins still remain; its lands were given by Queen Elizabeth to John Travers, who conveyed them for a term of years to the poet Spenser, who was secretary to the lord deputy, Arthur Grey, in the reign of Elizabeth, and Spenser assigned them to sir Henry Wallop, ancestor of the earls of Portsmouth.

1. Moy Liffey and Bregia.—In this article will be given the history and topography of the territories comprised in the present counties of Dublin and Kildare, together with their chiefs and clans.

Magh Liffe, signifying the Plain of the Liffey, was the name applied in ancient times to the plains on both sides of the river Liffey, comprising a great part of the present county of Kildare, on both sides of the river Liffey, including the Curragh of Kildare, which was called Cuireach Liffe, and also parts of Dublin, along the Liffey.

Bregia, in Irish Magh Breagha, which signifies the fair or magnificent plain, was the name applied to the immense plain comprising the present counties of Meath and Dublin, extending from Dublin to Drogheda, to Dulceek, Slane, Navan, Kells, Trim, Tara, Dunboyne, thence to Dunshaughlin, Cloonee, and Castleknock. In the account of the battle of Clontarf, in the Annals of Innisfallen, it is mentioned that Bryan Boru fell in Bregia, thus the plain of Clontarf was part of Bregia. This extensive territory was divided into North and South Bregia, as frequently mentioned in the Annals. Doctor Charles O'Connor translates Magh Breagha into Campus Brigantium, signifying the plain of the Brigantes, as he considered that it was chiefly possessed in ancient times by the Clanna Breogain, or Irish Brigantes, a branch of the Milesians, of whom an account has been given in the note on Ily Kinsellagh.

Fingall, a name still retained, was applied to a large territory, part of ancient Bregia, extending between Dublin and Drogheda, along the sea coast, and a few miles into the interior, containing the greater part of the present baronies of Coolock, Nethercross, and Balrothery, in the county of Dublin, and got its name, according to various authorities, from a colony of Norwegians who settled there in the tenth century, and were called by the Irish Fionn Ghaill, signifying the Fair-haired Foreigners, and the Danish colony, who are stated to have been partly located south of the river Liffey, near Dublin, were called Dubh Ghaill, signifying Dark-haired Strangers. In the Annals of the Four Masters Fingall is written in the Irish Fine Gall, which signifies a Colony of Foreigners. The territory of Fingall, together with the city of Dublin, was possessed by the Danish and Norwegian colonies for about three centuries, as hereafter explained. All that part of the present county of Dublin north of the river Liffey was, it appears, part of Bregia, and was comprised within the ancient kingdom of Meath, as explained in the note on Meath; and when Hugh de Lacy obtained a grant of the kingdom of Meath from king Henry II., Hugh Tyrrell, one of de Lacy's friends, was made baron of Castleknock, and another of his barons, namely, Adam Feipu, or Phepoe, obtained Skrine, Santriff, or Santry, and Cluntorth, now either Clontarf, near Dublin, or Clontarf. That part of the present county of Dublin north of the river Liffey, being included in the ancient kingdom of Meath, was subject to the kings of Meath; and the part south of the Liffey was subject to the kings of Leinster. A great part of the county of Kildare, as above explained, was included in Moy Liffey, and the rest of Kildare belonged to different other territories, as shewn in the notes on Meath, Ossory, Offaley, and Leix, partly to the kingdom of Meath, which contained parts of the baronies of Ikeath and Carbery; partly to Offaley, which contained the two baronies of Offaley, in the principality of O'Connor Failey, and in part of Clanmaliere, or O'Dempsey's country; partly to Leix, which contained the barony of West Narragh and Rheban, in the principality of O'Moore, and partly to the O'Tooles, princes of Imaile in Wicklow, who possessed, as shewn in the notes on Ily Kinsellagh and Cualan, parts of the baronies of South Naas, Kilcullen, East Narragh, Kilkea, and Moone.

Ancient History.—The territories now forming the counties of Dublin and Kildare are connected with some of the earliest events in Irish history. Partholan, the Scythian, who planted the first colony in Ireland, according to our old annalists, about fifteen centuries before the Christian era, had his residence at Binn Eadair, signifying the Hill of Eadair, now the Hill of Howth, which was also called Dun Eatair, signifying the fortress of Eatair, and derived its name, according to the Book of Dinseanechus, from Eadar, or Eatar, one of the Tuath de Danan queens, who was buried there, and to whose memory a great cairn was raised. This is a more probable derivation for Binn Eadair than that of various writers, who state that it signified the Hill of Oaks. Partholan was cut off at this place by a plague, together with his entire colony, consisting of nine thousand persons, all of whom were buried at Moy nEalta, or the Plain of the Birds, so named from the great numbers of sea fowl that resorted thither, and afterwards called Clontarf. According to O'Brien and others, however, the Partholians were buried at a place called Tamhlachta Muintire Partholain, signifying the burial cairns of Partholan's people, which is now the Hill of Tallaght, near Dublin. Fulman, one of the Milesian chiefs, about one thousand years before the Christian era, is stated to have erected a fortress at a place called Raith-Arda-Suid, now Swords, near Dublin. Conary the Great, who was monarch at the commencement of the Christian era, had a royal residence and fortress on the Hill of Howth, and made many military expeditions into Gaul and Britain. Criomthán Níuair, monarch of Ireland in the first century, also had his chief residence and fortress, called Dun Criomthain, on the Hill of Howth; he was a famous warrior, celebrated for his military expeditions to Gaul and Britain, and brought to Ireland from foreign countries many valuable spoils, amongst other things a gilded war chariot, three tables ornamented with gems, four rich garments, two golden-hilted swords, adorned with precious stones, and shields embossed with silver; two hounds coupled together with a silver chain, valued at three hundred cows; and, according to the Glossary of Cormac Mac Cullenan, this was the first introduction of greyhounds into Ireland. Criomthán brought over various other articles of great value, as mentioned in O'Flaherty's Ogygia, and in the old historians. The ancient Irish chieftains, like their Celtic or Scythian ancestors, and various nations of antiquity, fought in war chariots, in the same manner as the Gauls and Britons described by Cæsar and Tacitus, in their battles with the Romans, and our ancient bards and annalists give copious accounts of the Irish chiefs fighting in their chariots, amongst others the celebrated champion Cuchullin, who was one of the chiefs of the Red Branch Knights of Ulster about the commencement of the Christian era, and had his fortress at Dun Dealgan, now Dundalk; and his contemporary Meava, the famous heroine and queen of Connaught, like the British queen Boadicea, is described as commanding her own forces in person, mounted on a magnificent gilded chariot, and wearing a golden Asion or crown on her head, and attended by a great retinue of chiefs, also in their war-chariots. In the second century, Dublin is mentioned by our old historians un-

A. D. 1461.

EDWARD IV.¹ was proclaimed king of England, on the 4th of March.

Felim, son of Owen, son of Niall Oge O'Neill, died of a sudden fit; and he was a man distinguished for hospitality and feats of der the name of Ath Cliath Dubhlinne, signifying the Ford of the Hurdles on the Black Pool, and so called from a ford over which a passage was constructed by hurdles, on the boggy pool of the Liffey. About the middle of the second century, Mogha Nuadbat, called also Eogan More, a celebrated king of Munster, having long contended for the sovereignty of Ireland with the monarch Con of the Hundred Battles, they at length agreed to divide the island between them by a line, drawn direct from Dublin to Galway, along the river Liffey to Leixlip, thence through Kildare and Offaley, now part of the King's county, to the Shannon at Clonmacnois, and onward to the bay of Galway. This boundary was marked, according to O'Halloran and others, by ramparts, and a chain of fortresses, and was called Eisgir Riada, from Eisgir, which signifies a ridge, and a chain of small hills is still traceable along the line of this ancient boundary. The southern division of Ireland, belonging to the king of Munster, was called Leath Mogha, or Mogha's Half, and comprised the ancient kingdoms of Leinster and Munster, and the northern division, called Leath Cuinn, or Con's Half, comprehended the ancient kingdoms of Meath, Ulster, and Connaught, and these two great divisions of Ireland, in the political contests of various kings, were recognised afterwards for many centuries, as several sovereigns were styled kings of Leath Cuinn, and others kings of Leath Mogha, and these divisions are frequently mentioned in our Annals, even down to the sixteenth century. Amongst the notices of Dublin in those early times, it may be mentioned that Laoghaire, monarch of Ireland in the fifth century, had a royal residence and fortress at a place called from him Dun Laoghaire, afterwards Duncairy, now Kingstown. Many of the most celebrated battles recorded in Irish history in ancient times, have been fought on the great plains of Meath, Dublin, and Kildare; and many of those battles, as those of Cnucha, Maistean, Almhain, Athrodain, and Beallach Mughna, have been described in the notes on Hy Kinsellagh, Ossory, Offaley and Leix.

The Battle of Gaura, called by the Irish writers Cath Gabhra, celebrated in the writings of the ancient annalists and bards, was fought, according to the Four Masters, A. D. 284; but in O'Flaherty's Ogygia it is placed at A. D. 296. In the Four Masters it is called the battle of Gabhra Aichle, a place situated near Tara in Bregia, and considered to be Skreen, in Meath; but, according to others, the place where the battle was fought is supposed to be that now called Gurrystown, in the county of Dublin, on the borders of Meath; and the circumstances which led to this battle were as follows:

The Fenians, called by the Irish writers Fianna Eirionn, signifying the Fenians of Ireland, are mentioned in the Four Masters under the name of Fene, or Feine, which, according to Dr. O'Connor in his notes to the Four Masters, signifies the Phenicians of Ireland, as Feine, according to Dr. O'Brien, in his Dictionary at the word Fearmoigh, signifies Phenicians; and they were probably called so from the tradition that Phenicians came to Ireland in the early ages. They are also called by the Irish writers Clann-Ua-Baoisgine, and so named, according to Keating and others, from Baoisgine, who was chief commander of these warriors, and ances-arms, an entertainer of learned men and strangers, a man who purchased more poems, and possessed a greater collection of poetry, than any other man in his time: he died, after having gained the victory over the world and the devil.

Hugh, son of Torlogh Oge O'Connor, lord of half Connaught in opposition to Teige O'Connor, a worthy representative of a king of the province of Connaught, in form and personal figure, in valour, in warfare, and in patronage of learned men, and of all others who were deserving of it, died at Ballintobber of St. Bridget (in Roscommon), on the Ides of May, after extreme unction and repentance, tor of the famous hero Fionn, the son of Cumhall; but according to O'Connor, in his notes to the Four Masters, they were called Baoisgine, as being descended from the Milesians who came from Basconia, in Spain, now Biscay, in the country anciently called Cantabria. The Fenian warriors were a famous military force, forming the standing national militia, and instituted in Ireland in the early ages, long before the Christian era, but brought to the greatest perfection in the reign of the celebrated Cormac, monarch of Ireland in the third century. None were admitted into this military body but select men of the greatest activity, strength, stature, perfect form, and valour, and, when the force was complete, it consisted of seven Cutha, that is, battalions or legions, each battalion containing three thousand men, according to O'Halloran and various other historians, making 21,000 for each of the five provinces, or about one hundred thousand fighting men in time of war for the entire kingdom. The Ardrigh, or head king of Ireland, had, for the time being, chief controul over these forces, but they often resisted his authority. A commander was appointed over every thousand of these troops, and the entire force was completely armed and admirably disciplined, and each battalion had their bands of musicians and bards to animate them in battle, and celebrate their feats of arms. In the reign of the monarch Cormac, the celebrated Fionn Mac Cumhaill, who was descended from the Heremonian kings of Leinster, was the chief commander of the Fenian warriors, and his great actions, strength, and valour are celebrated in the Ossianic poems, and various other productions of the ancient bards; he is called Fingal in Mac Pherson's Poems of Ossian; but it is to be observed that these are not the real poems of Ossian, but mostly fictions fabricated by Mac Pherson himself, and containing some passages from the ancient poems. Fionn had his chief residence and fortress at Almhain, now either the hill of Allen, near Kildare, or Ailinn, near Old Kilenallen, where a great Rath still remains, which was a residence of the ancient kings of Leinster. The Fenians were the chief troops of Leinster, and were Milesians of the race of Heremon; and their renowned commander Fionn, according to the Four Masters, was slain by the cast of a javelin, or, according to others, by the shot of an arrow, at a place called Ath Brea, on the river Boyne, A. D. 283, the year before the battle of Gaura, by the Lugnians of Tara, a tribe who possessed the territory now called the barony of Lune, near Tara, in Meath; and the place mentioned as Ath Brea, or the Ford of Brea, was situated somewhere on the Boyne, between Trim and Navan.

Clanna Morna, so called from Morna, one of their celebrated chiefs, were the warriors of Connaught and of the Firbolg race, called Fir Domnians or Damnonians, and were afterwards commanded by a famous champion named Goll, the son of Morna.

The Red Branch Knights of Ulster, called Curaidhe-na-Craoibhe Ruaidhe, signifying the Warriors of the Red Branch, were the chief military force of Ulster, principally residing about Emania, where stood the palace of the kings of Ulster, near Armagh, and highly celebrated in the first century under their champions Cuchullain, and Conall Cearnach or Conall the victorious.

in the 63rd year of his age, and was interred at Roscommon.

The sons of Niall Garv O'Donnell, namely,

The Clanna Deaga, or Degadians, in the first, second, and third centuries, were the chief warriors of Munster: they were Heremonians originally from Ulster, but settled in Munster in early times, and an account of them has been given in the notes on Thomond and Desmond.

The Dalcassians, called by the Irish writers Dal-gCais, from Cormac Cas, a famous king of Munster of the race of Heber in the third century, were the chief warriors of Munster from the third to the twelfth century, and formed mostly by the clans of Thomond, now the county of Clare, with parts of Limerick and Tipperary; and they are highly celebrated in Irish history, particularly under Brian Boru, who was himself of the Dalcassian race; an account of them has been given in the notes on Thomond and Desmond.

In the reign of king Cairbre Liffeachair, son of the monarch Cormac, the Fenian forces revolted from the service of Cairbre, and joined the famous Mogh Corb, king of Munster, of the race of the Dalcassians. After the death of Fionn Mac Cumhaill, the Fenians were commanded by his son Oisín or Ossian, the celebrated warrior and bard; and at the time of the battle of Gaura, Osgar, another famous champion, the son of Oisín, commanded the Fenian forces. The army of Munster, commanded by Mogh Corb, a name which signifies the Chief of the Chariot, and by his son Fear Corb, that is, the man or warrior of the chariot, was composed of the Clanna Deagha and Dalcassian troops, joined by the Fenians and their Leinster forces; and it is stated in the Ossianic poems, and in Hammer's Chronicle, from the Book of Howth, that a great body of warriors from North Britain, Denmark, and Norway, came over and fought on the side of the Fenians at Gaura. The army of the monarch Cairbre was composed of the men of Meath and Ulster, together with the Clanna Morna, or Connaught warriors, commanded by Aodh or Hugh, King of Connaught, son of Garadh, grandson of Morna of the Damnonian race. The Munster forces, and Fenians, marched to Meath, where they were met by the combined troops of the monarch Cairbre, and fought one of the most furious battles recorded in Irish history, which continued throughout the whole length of a summer's day. The greatest valour was displayed by the warriors on each side, and it is difficult to say which army were victors or vanquished. The heroic Osgar was slain in single combat by the valiant monarch Cairbre, but Cairbre himself soon afterwards fell by the hand of the champion Simon, the son of Ceirb, of the race of the Fotharts of Leinster. Both armies amounted to about fifty thousand men, the greater part of whom were slain; of the Fenian forces, who consisted of twenty thousand men, it is stated that eighteen thousand fell; and on both sides, thirty thousand warriors were slain. In the following year, Hugh, king of Connaught, according to O'Flaherty's Ogygia, defeated the Munster forces in a battle at Spaltrach, near the mountain Senua, in Muscry, in which he slew Mogh Corb, king of Munster. The tremendous battle of Gaura is considered to have led to the subsequent fall of the Irish monarchy, for after the destruction of the Fenian forces, the Irish kings never were able to muster a national army equal in valour and discipline to those heroes, either to cope with foreign foes, or to reduce to subjection the rebellious provincial kings and princes: hence the monarchy became weak and disorganised, and the ruling powers were unable to maintain their authority or make a sufficient stand against the Danish and Anglo-Norman invaders of after times. The following passages respecting the battle of Gaura, have been literally translated from one of the poems attributed to Oisín on that subject, and supposed to have been written in the third century, though it is to be observed that many of the poems called Ossianic were written long subsequent to that period, as they refer to events which occurred several centuries afterwards, and appear to be additions to the original poems of Oisín. The best collection extant of the Ossianic poems in Irish MS., with translations into English, are in the library of sir William Betham, and if published by that learned antiquary and Irish scholar, would form a valuable contribution towards ancient Irish literature. In the poem, Oisín

Hugh Roe and Owen, having mustered all their forces, marched to Fanat (in Donegal), to the residence of Maolmuire, the son of Mac Sweeney, the bard, the father of Osgar, is introduced as narrating the events of the battle, as follows:

"On our march from Binn Eadair (Howth)
The entire of our numbers were Three hundred Fenian chiefs,
With their respective bands of warriors.

"There were thirty descendants
Of the race of Fionn of the Fenians,
Who always bore shields and spears,
In the time of conflict and slaughter.

"There were the Fenian champions
From Alba (Scotland) and from the king of Britain,
Through their friendship for the Fenians of Albuin,
Who joined us in that great battle.

"From the commander of nine upwards,
There were of the mighty Fenians of Lochlin (Denmark),
Numbers who joined us in that great conflict,
And who also shared in the slaughter.

"In this battle of Gaura of fearful blows,
Fighting against Osgar, my son,
Was the monarch Carbery of the Liffey
With all the forces of Erin.

"There was Hugh, the son of Garadh,
With his ten hundred warriors;
The king of Connaught and his forces
Were against us in that battle.

"There were five battalions from Ulster,
Together with the men of Meath
Who joined against us, with Carbery,
And we were unequal to the number of our foes.

"When my son Osgar had seen
The king of Erin taking the lead,
He vowed, himself, to slay the monarch
And cut him down with his keen sword.

"Then Osgar the Great and Generous Eagerly requested permission
To lead the van of the battle,
At the head of his own battalions.

"And Beine, the son of Breasal,
A hero of great strength and valour,
Said that he and the Fenians of Britain
Would march in the same rank with Osgar.

"The son of Lughaidh the brave,
Who was always victorious in battle,
Said that he, accompanied by Cuiroll,
Should lead the army in the battle of Gaura.

"Then Cuiroll cast his spear
At random with fierce rage,
And drove the unlucky dart
Through the body of the son of Breasal.

"The noble Osgar, in a loud voice,
Then demanded from Cuiroll,
'Why hast thou slain my friend,
Thou son of Fionn, the son of Cumhall?'

"Cuiroll the Fair then made answer
In a violent passion to Osgar—
'If thou be the son of Oisín
I wish that thou hadst fallen in his stead.'

to aid him against O'Donnell, i. e. Torlogh Cairpreach, who was wreaking his vengeance on the son of Mac Sweeney, and on the entire of Fanat, for his having allied himself to the sons of Niall. The sons of Niall, and the sons of Mac Sweeney, held a consultation to determine on what they

"My son was seized with anger
On hearing such utterance,
And, on the instant, demanded
A combat from the champion.

"Then Osgar and Cuiroll
Met each other in conflict,
Whilst I endeavoured to intercede
Along with Faolan and Fiachra.

"With regard to my son, Osgar,
In this contest with Cuiroll,
Two hundred of the Fenians fell
In our efforts to appease their anger.

"We then raised our standards
To commence the battle of Gaura,
We ourselves, and the Fenians of Leinster,
Against Carbry and the Clanna Morna.

"Then Fergus the poet prepared,
The chief bard of the Fenians,
To encourage us on to the fight
In advancing to the battle of Gaura.

"March onward, O! valiant Osgar,
Thou cleaver of the helmets of heroes,
And by thy prosperous standard,
Obtain renown and victory.

"Acquire fresh conquering courage
Against Hugh, the son of Garaidh,
And against the opposing kings,
And completely subdue them by slaughter."

"We advanced closely to the conflict,
And rushed against the king and his forces;
And such a sight as then appeared
Will never again be recorded.

"The Fenians of Britain, who fought on our side,
Against a thousand men of the son of Garaidh,
Were fiercely cut down in that battle;
Oh! unhappy to us was their destruction.

"The Fenians of Leinster were likewise cut down,
And the Fenians of Alba, by the son of Garaidh,
Ten hundred valiant warriors
In that onset were slaughtered.

"My son then rushed onward
On the battalions of Tara,
Like a hawk amongst small birds,
Or like a dashing wave of the ocean.

"He made a fierce charging onset
Against the forces of the men of Erin,
When three hundred chieftains fell,
By Osgar of the powerful strokes.

"Ten hundred, without fear,
Of our determined enemies
Now came on with the son of Garaidh,
Who had not before engaged in the contest.

"The son of Garaidh rushed onward,
After arranging his men for battle,
To meet Osgar of the purple armour.
Brave and terrific were those chiefs.

"Twenty-four wounds were inflicted
On the body of the brave Osgar,
Which he received from the men of Carbry,
Before he advanced against the son of Garaidh.

"On the body of the son of Garaidh,
On retiring from the combat with Osgar,
Were inflicted three score wounds,
And very deep and dangerous were they.

"From the overwhelming blows of Osgar,
And of the descendants of Morna of combats;
You might behold, over the glens,
A flashing fire from the clash of their arms.

"The son of Garaidh was subdued,
And great indeed was the loss,
By Osgar, who was never conquered,
Either in combat or in the battle field.

"A dart was cast by the king of Erin,
Who bore in his hand the poisoned arms,
Which pierced the body of the sharp-sworded Osgar,
And this fatal wound extended to his heart.

"Osgar, my son, fell to the ground,
Who had never before been conquered,
But before he fell his pointed spear
Pierced the body of the monarch Carbry.

"Seven princes in that battle,
Who were eligible to the throne of Erin,
Were slain that day by my son,
Before he encountered Carbry.

"Numerous were the pools of blood,
On the extensive plain of Gaura,
And many heads were strewn there,
Severed from their bodies by the carnage of that battle.

"Of the valiant heroes who fell on that plain
Were two hundred presumptive heirs,
Who were by right entitled
To royal crowns in Erin.

"With undaunted valour we fought
That dreadful battle of Gaura;
Together the Fenians bravely fell
Eighteen of their kings and royal princes.

"Many a polished buckler you might behold,
And standards of chieftains of the finest Srol,
Many lifeless heroes, with their shields,
Strewed in heaps all over the plain.

"We did not collect the precious ornaments
But of heroes famed for victory,
We did not take away from the battle field
But the jewels of kings and exalted chiefs.

"From the day of the battle of Gaura
The Fenians never after raised their voices,
And there passed neither night nor day,
That we did not spend in grief and sighs.

"There has not been found from India in the east
To the very extremities of the world
A king who has not been under our controul,
Until the time of fighting that battle.

"No foreign invading prince ever came To the land of Fodhla (Ireland), in our time,
But was forced to return without conquest,
And retrace his steps by our valour.

"Lastly we raised the heroic Osgar,
Exalted on the shafts of our spears,
We conveyed him to a rising ground,
To warn the Fenians of our sorrowful loss.

should do in defending themselves against the sons of Naghtan O'Donnell and their forces, for they (the Mac Sweeneys) resolved to be revenged of

"We constructed the graves of the heroes,
And buried them with princely honours,
The tombs of the noble and valiant Osgar,
And of the son of Gara, the son of Oisín.

"We buried Osgar the brave
On the north side of the great Gaura,
And likewise Osgar, the son of Glonn,
And Osgar, the son of the king of Lochlin.

"And the hero who was liberal of gold,
The son of Lughaidh, the great champion.
May some delight come over my words,
For great is my sorrow this night."

The Danes in Dublin.—For a period of more than three hundred years, in the ninth, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth centuries, and down to the Anglo-Norman invasion under Strongbow, the Danish and Norwegian colonies were in possession of the city of Dublin and of the territory of Fingall, and Danish kings ruled over Dublin during that time; but they appear to have been occasionally under subjection and tribute mostly to the kings of Leinster, and sometimes to the kings of Meath; and in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, some of the O'Briens, kings of Munster, of the Mac Murroughs, kings of Leinster, and of the O'Conors, kings of Connaught, became kings over the Danes of Dublin. In A. D. 1170, the Anglo-Normans, under Strongbow, Raymond le Gros, and Milo de Cogan, with their Irish allies under Dermot Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, took the city of Dublin, and expelled Asculph Mac Thorkell, the last Danish king of Dublin, who in the year 1171, having collected a great force of Danes and Norwegians from the Orkneys, the Hebrides, and the Isle of Mann, attempted to recover Dublin, but his forces were defeated by the Anglo-Normans under Milo and Richard de Cogan, and Asculph himself was slain. An account of the Danish kings of Dublin will be given in a future number.

Introduction of Christianity.—Some account of the missions of Palladius and St. Patrick, as intimately connected with the diocese of Dublin, will be necessary in this place.

Palladius, a Roman deacon, and considered to have been a native of Britain, was consecrated a bishop by Pope Celestine, who sent him, in the beginning of the fifth century, on a mission to preach the Gospel to the Irish, then called Scoti or Scots, a name which was long afterwards applied to the people of that part of North Britain, now called Scotland. Palladius having departed from Rome, set out on his voyage, accompanied by Sylvester, Solinus, Augustine, Benedict, and other missionaries, and landed in Ireland in the beginning of the year 431, in some harbour either of Wexford or Wicklow, in the territory then called Hy Garchon, which was part of the ancient principality of Hy Kinsellagh, and extended along the sea coast, comprising parts of the present counties of Wexford and Wicklow. Proceeding on his mission, he baptized many persons, and founded a church called Cill Fine, in which he deposited the sacred books, and some relics of SS. Peter and Paul, and other saints, which he had brought from Rome, besides his writing tablets, all of which were long preserved with great veneration. Two other churches were afterwards erected by his companions, one called Teach-na-Romhnaich, signifying the house of the Romans, and the other named Domhanach-arda, that is, the church on the height, from which the parish of Donard, in the county of Wicklow, got its name, and the church was erected on the great mountain now called Slieve Gadoe, on which there are still some ruins of an ancient church with a holy well, much resorted to as a place of pilgrimage in honour of the missionaries Sylvester and Solinus who were buried there, and whose memory has been always held in great veneration by the people. The progress of Palladius in his missionary labours being opposed by Nathi, a Pagan chief, who was the lord of Hy-Garchon, he forced Palladius to fly from the country, but his companions, Sylvester and Solinus, the others for their enmity and their evil deeds. When O'Donnell and the sons of Naghtan received intelligence that the sons of Niall had gone to remained in Ireland. Palladius was not altogether one year in Ireland, being compelled to quit the country in the latter end of A. D. 431, the year of his arrival; and having sailed to North Britain, he died there soon after in the land of the Cruthneans or Picts, at the place now called Fordun, in Mearns or Kincardine, in Scotland; and at Fordun, under the name of St. Paldi, his memory was long revered.

St. Patrick.—There are various contradictory opinions and controversies amongst the most learned ecclesiastical writers as to the birth place of St. Patrick, and the point is extremely difficult to determine. Some contend that he was descended from one of the Roman families in Britain, and a native of North Britain, born at the place now called Kilpatrick, near Dumbarton in Scotland, but many others, particularly the learned Lanigan, have maintained with greater probability that he was a native of Armorica Gaul, and born at the place called Bononia, now Boulogne, on the coast of France, part of the ancient territory of Armorica. His family were respectable Roman citizens of Gaul, and his father's name was Calphurnius, and that of his mother Conchessa, and she is said to have been a sister, niece, or some relative of St. Martin, the celebrated bishop of Tours. A difference of opinion respecting the time of his birth and death exists, as well as concerning the place of his nativity. Usher, Ware, Colgan, the Annals of the Four Masters, and other authorities, place his birth at A. D. 372 or 373, and his death at A. D. 493, in the one hundred and twentieth year of his age; but Lanigan, from accurate chronological computations, places his birth at A. D. 387, and his death in A. D. 465, in the 78th year of his age; they all agree as to the day of his death, the 17th of March, on which his festival has been always celebrated in the church. According to all our Irish historians, the celebrated Niall of the Nine Hostages, monarch of Ireland in the latter end of the fourth century, made many military expeditions into Gaul and Britain, and in one of these brought to Ireland 200 captives, amongst whom was a youth named Patrick, then in the 16th year of his age, and he was sold as a slave to a chief named Milcho, Milcon, or Miliac, who possessed a district in that part of Dalaradia now the southern part of the county of Antrim, where he tended the flocks of his master beside Slieve Mis Mountain. After a captivity of seven years, admonished by a vision, Patrick effected his escape, and returned to his family in Gaul. He studied many years in the monastery of St. Martin at Tours, and also under St. German of Auxerre, and became eminent for his great piety; in A. D. 429 he accompanied St. German and Lupus of Troyes to Britain, in their mission for the purpose of extirpating the Pelagian heresy; and in the year 431 was sent to Rome by St. German, who recommended him to Pope Celestine as a person, for his piety and virtue, fit to be appointed on the mission then preparing for Ireland; and in the year 432, being then in the 45th year of his age, he was consecrated a bishop, and appointed successor to Palladius on the Irish mission. Having embarked in Gaul, he sailed to Britain, where he made no delay, but proceeded to Ireland, where he arrived in A. D. 432, in the first year of the pontificate of Sixtus III. The place of his landing is supposed to have been on some part of the coast of Wicklow or Dublin, but being repulsed by the natives, he sailed northward, and landed at a small island off the coast of Bregia, which island was afterwards called Holm Patrick, or St. Patrick's Isle, and is situated near Skerries, in the county of Dublin; having rested here for some time, he proceeded northwards and landed at Inver Slaince, in Dalaradia, now either Strangford Lough or the Bay of Dundrum, in the district then called Magh Inis, a peninsula which now forms the barony of Lecale, in the county of Down. Here he converted Dicho, chief of that territory, being the first convert he had made to the Christian faith; and in this place St. Patrick erected a church called Sabhal Phadraie, or Patrick's Barn, from which the parish of Saul, near Downpatrick, derived its name; he proceeded thence to the northern part of Dalaradia, the residence of his old master Milcho, in the land of the Cruthneans or Irish Picts, and Fanat, he and his kinsmen, with their forces and the Albanian (Scottish) troops who had joined him, marched and encamped at Ceannmaghair (in Donegal), to meet them, and watch the movements having in vain endeavoured to convert Milcho, who remained an obstinate Pagan, he determined to proceed to Tara, the chief seat of the Irish kings. Having set sail from Dalaradia southward, he landed at Inver Colpa, now the bay or mouth of the river Boyne, near Drogheda, and proceeded onward to Slane, and thence to the royal residence at Tara, where, on Easter Sunday, in the year 433, he preached the Gospel in the presence of the monarch Laoghaire and a great assembly of the chiefs, Druids, and people; he made many converts, and, amongst others, it is stated, of some of the bards and learned men, but at the commencement of his mission he received much opposition from the monarch and his chief Druids. On Easter Monday he preached at Tailten, another royal residence near Tara, and proceeded soon after to Teffia, now Westmeath, and preached at the hill of Usneagh, a celebrated seat of Druidism; he then went to Annaly and Conmaigne, now parts of Longford and Leitrim, and to Magh Sleacht in Brefney, now Fenagh in Leitrim, where he destroyed the idols, and great temple of the Druids, and erected a church on its ruins. Crossing the Shannon, he proceeded onward into Connaught, where he spent seven years in the conversion of that province, and erecting churches, and departing thence about A.D. 440, he crossed the river Droghaio in Brefney, at the place now called Bundroos, in the county of Leitrim; and from thence to Easroe, now Ballyshannon; he crossed the river Erne, and proceeded through Tirconnell or Donegal, converting great numbers and founding churches in all those places; he next went to Dalrieda or the northern part of Antrim; and thence to Dalaradia or Ulidia, which territories now form the southern parts of Antrim and the county of Down; thence to Tir Eogain, now Tyrone; and to Orgiall, now the counties of Armagh, Monaghan, and Louth, and onward to Ardracan and various other parts of the kingdom of Meath. According to Jocelyn the monk, in his Life of St. Patrick, and some other writers, it is stated that St. Patrick crossed the river at Finglas; and in the year 448, converted Alphin, son of Eochaidh, king of Ath Cliath or Dublin, and baptized him in a fountain, near which a church was afterwards erected in the place on which St. Patrick's Cathedral now stands. St. Patrick proceeded to Leinster to the territories of Hy-Garclion and Hy-Kinsellagh, parts of the present counties of Wicklow, Wexford, and Carlow; and also to Leix, now the Queen's county; to Naas and Kilkenny in Kildare; to Ossory, now the county of Kilkenny; to Ormond and other parts of Tipperary; and to Cashel, where he converted and baptized Aongus, king of Cashel; thence to Luimneach or Limerick, where he converted many of the people of Thomond; thence to Desmond, or parts of Cork and Kerry, and spent altogether seven years in Munster, converting kings, princes, and people; returning to Leinster, he crossed the river Brosna, and proceeded into Hy Falgia or Offaley, now the King's county, where it is stated that a chieftain named Failge, an obstinate Pagan, having determined to assassinate the saint, killed by mistake with the thrust of a spear Odran, his charioteer, who sacrificed his own life to save St. Patrick; hence St. Odran has been esteemed the first martyr to the faith in Ireland. St. Patrick having returned through Meath and Orgiall, founded many churches, and having lands granted to him by Daire Dearg, a prince of the race of Clan Colla, who possessed the territory about Eamhain Macha, now Armagh, he erected a church or cathedral on the hill called Ard Macha, A.D. 455, and thus founded the see of Armagh, which became the metropolitan see or seat of the primacy of all Ireland. According to Jocelyn and others, St. Patrick repaired to Rome about A.D. 460, to give an account of his mission in Ireland to Pope Leo the Great, who confirmed all his acts, and approved of the establishment of the metropolitan see at Armagh. Having, during a mission of about thirty-three years, according to Lanigan, but much longer according to others, converted almost the whole of the Irish to the Christian faith, performed many great miracles, consecrated more than three hundred bishops, with vast numbers of priests or presbyters, and founded many hundred churches, he died at Saul, near Downpatrick, as above stated, A.D. 465, in the 78th year of his age, according to Lanigan, but Ussher and others place his death at 493, in his 120th year. St. Patrick, according to Jocelyn's Life, was a man of small stature, but of great energy, and activity of mind and body. On the news of his death, vast numbers of the clergy flocked from all parts of Ireland to attend his funeral obsequies, which were celebrated with great pomp for twelve successive days, and with such a profusion of lights and torches that it is said the nights were rendered as bright as day. He was buried at Dun-da-leath-glas, which was also called Dune, latinised Dunum, and from him called Dun-Patraic, or Downpatrick. Jocelyn says he was buried in a very deep grave, being five cubits in depth, under a great stone, as it was feared an attempt would be made to remove his body, for a great contest arose between the Ulidians, or people of the county of Down, and the Orgiallians, or people of Armagh and Louth, respecting the possession of his remains, but the dispute was amicably arranged, and he was buried at Down. The remains of SS. Bridget and Columkille were removed to Downpatrick, and buried there along with those of St. Patrick, of which an account has been given in a note to these Annals at the year 1293. The memory of St. Patrick was for many ages venerated in Scotland and the Isle of Mann, as much as in Ireland, and many churches were dedicated to him in these countries; and it may be observed that Patrick was a favourite christian name with many of the Scottish nobility, as the Grahams, dukes of Montrose; the Drummonds, earls of Perth; the Lindsays, earls of Crawford; the Lyons, thanes of Glamis; the Homes, earls of Marchmont; the Boyles, earls of Glasgow; the Maules, earls of Panmure; the Gordons, earls of Aberdeen; the Dunbars, earls of March; the Murrays, earls of Elibank; the Hays, earls of Kinnoull; the Crichtons, earls of Dumfries; the Oliphants, lords Oliphant. A great number of the heads of all these families, and others, bore the name of Patrick in former times, as may be seen in the Peerages of Scotland, while it appears strange that scarcely any of the old Irish chiefs bore the name Patrick, though the name of the great patron saint of Ireland. A full account of the numerous lives of St. Patrick will be found in the works of Ware, Usher, Colgan, O'Connor's Rer. Hib. Scrip., and Lanigan, from which the above article has been compiled.

St. Patrick first communicated to the Irish the Roman Alphabet and Latin language, but the Irish had their own Celtic Alphabet, and a written language, many centuries before the arrival of St. Patrick, though it has been absurdly asserted by some shallow antiquarians that the Irish had no use of letters before his time.

Antiquities.—Numerous memorials of the most remote ages still exist in the counties of Dublin and Kildare, as in all other parts of Ireland, of which full accounts may be found in D'Alton's valuable history of the county and of the archbishops of Dublin, in Whitclaw and Walsh's History of Dublin, in Ware's and Grose's Antiquities, Vallancey's Collectanea, the Topographies of Seward and Lewis, Rawson's Survey of Kildare, &c.

Cromleacs.—The name Cromleac, signifies the stone of Crom; and they were so called from being used in the worship of Crom, one of the deities of the Irish Druids, said to represent Fate, or, according to Lanigan and others, the god of fire, or the sun, and sometimes called Crom Dubh, or Black Crom, and Crom Cruach, signifying Crom of the Heaps of stones or Cairns, as quoted by Lanigan from the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick; and the Idol of Crom Cruach, as stated in Lanigan and O'Flaherty's Ogygia, quoting from the Four Masters, and also in the Book of Invasions, by the O'Clerys, was destroyed by St. Patrick at the temple of the Druids, on Magh Sleacht in Brefney, now Fenagh in Leitrim, and the last Sunday of summer is still called Douhach Croim Duibh, or the Sunday of Black Crom, being sacred to St. Patrick as the anniversary commemorating the destruction of the idol. This is the real origin of the name Cromleac, and not from the stones being in a sloping position, as absurdly stated by some writers, and derived from the opinions of the common people. The chief deities of the Druids were the sun, moon, stars, and winds; and woods, wells, fountains, and rivers, were also objects of adoration. The sun was worshipped under the designation of Bel, Beal, or Baal, as by the of the sons of Niall O'Donnell, and of Maolmuire (Mac Sweeney), who accompanied them from his Phenicians and other eastern nations, and also under the name of Grian. The time dedicated to the worship of the moon was called Sanhuin, which was one of their deities; and the wind was worshipped under the name of Gaeth. The sacred fire of Beal was lighted on the evening of the first day of summer, or May eve, at the temple of the Druids on the hill of Usnesgh, situated a few miles from Mullingar in Westmeath; hence that day is still named in the Irish La Beal-Teinne, that is, the day of Beal's fire. The sacred fire of Sanhuin was lighted on the eve of the first day of winter, at Tlachta, in Meath, another chief seat of Druidism, situated at a place now called the Hill of Ward, between Trim and Athboy; and in the Irish La Samhna, or Samhuin's day, is the name applied to the first of November. No fires were permitted to be lighted in Ireland, but those obtained from the Druids at May and November, who delivered their sacred fire to the people with great incantations, and for obtaining it a payment of one screapal, a silver coin equivalent to three pence of modern money was levied on every house or head of a family. Some remnants of the custom originating from the celebration of the sacred fire of the Druids, is still preserved in the May fires lighted in Ireland. The oak was a sacred tree to the Druids, and the rites of Druidism were chiefly celebrated in the oak groves; and the name Druid, in Irish Draoi or Druí, is supposed to be derived from the Irish Dair or Duir, which signifies the oak; or, according to others, it was derived from the Greek word Drus, which also signifies an oak tree, as the ancient Gauls are said to have taken the derivation of Druid from the Greek language, which their learned men spoke in Cæsar's time. According to the Dictionnaire Historique de Cultes Religieuses, the word Druid was derived from Deru, or Deru, which in the Gaulish language signified an oak; and it may be observed, that Drus is the Greek for an oak, a word which resembles the Celtic. By Cæsar, Pliny, and other Roman writers, the Gaulish word for Druids was rendered to Druidæ and Druides, and by modern Latin writers the word Druids has been often translated into Magi. Three of the Tuath De Danan kings of Ireland were named from their peculiar deities; one was called Mac Coill, or the Son of the Wood, as he worshipped the woods; another Mac Ceacht, or the Son of the Plough, his god being that chief emblem of husbandry; and the third Mac Greine, as Grian, or the sun, was the great object of his adoration. Accounts of Irish Druidism will be found in Ware, Toland, Keating, O'Halloran, and Vallancey, and interesting descriptions of the Druids of Gaul and Britain are given in Cæsar's Commentaries.

The cromleacs are generally composed of from three or four, to six or seven huge pillar stones, standing upright and fixed deep in the earth on their smaller ends, and varying from five or six, to eight or ten feet in height, and on the top is placed a prodigious flag, or table stone, in a sloping position, one end being much higher than the other. These table stones are of enormous size, and some of them estimated to weigh from twenty, to forty or fifty tons; and as many of these cromleacs are situated on high hills, or in deep vallies, and other places of difficult access, and in several instances those stones have been conveyed for a distance of many miles, no such stones being found in the neighbourhood, these circumstances have naturally given rise to the popular opinion, that the cromleacs were constructed by giants, and it would appear that a race of men of gigantic strength were alone capable of placing those prodigious stones, or immense fragments of rocks, in their position; for it would be found extremely difficult to convey those huge stones any considerable distance, and place them in their position, even by the great power of modern machinery.

The Druidical Temples were likewise composed of huge stones, standing upright in a circular form, with great top stones placed on them. The most perfect specimen existing of a Druidical temple is the stupendous monument of stones called Stone-Henge, on Salisbury plain, in England; but in France there are Druidical remains far more extensive, though of ruder formation, at Carnac, in Bretagne, consisting of huge stones standing upright, some of them from twelve to fifteen feet in height; and of those own country; when the sons of Niall O'Donnell, and the people of Fanat were informed of this, immense stones it is stated, that four thousand still remain, formed into numerous concentric circles, and covering an area of about half a mile in diameter. In Ireland there are cromleacs, and remains of Druidical circles, or temples of immense stones, to be found in every county; but vast numbers of them have been broken up at various times, by some barbarous persons who have no regard for the venerable remains of antiquity. As Druidism was the religious system of the Celtic nations, Gauls, Britons, Irish, &c., Druidical monuments are found in all the countries possessed by the Celtic race. The cromleacs were Druidical altars, on which they offered up sacrifices, and very often human victims, as the Canaanites did to Moloch; and they were also used as sepulchral monuments, for, on excavating under them, funeral urns, and remains of human bones, have been found; and by the common people in Ireland, the cromleacs are generally called giants' graves. An account has been given in the note on Brehney of the great temple of the Druids at Magh Sleacht, now Fenagh in Leitrim, which was destroyed by St. Patrick. Cromleacs, and other Druidical remains, still exist in the county of Dublin, at Mount Venus, near Tallaght; at Glen Druid, near Cahinteely; at Glen Southwell, or the Little Dargle, and at Larch Hill; and on the Hills of Killiney and Howth. In various parts of Kildare, particularly about Naas and Kilcullen, are huge pillar-stones, considered to be Druidical remains; and, according to Giraldus Cambrensis, there was in former times on the Curragh of Kildare a stupendous Druidical monument, or temple, of a circular form, composed of enormous stones, and exactly resembling Stone-Henge in England, but no traces of it now remain. Geoffrey of Monmouth relates, in a curious legend, that the prodigious stones of the great monument on the plains of Kildare were removed from thence, and fixed upon Salisbury plain, and called Stone-Henge, in the fifth century, either by Aurelius Ambrosius, or Uther Pendragon, kings of the Britons, assisted by the arts and spells of Merlin, the famous magician of Wales. This legend probably signifies, that the model of Stone-Henge was copied from the great monument on the plains of Kildare.

Cairns, so called from the Irish Carn, which signifies a heap or pile of stones, were huge heaps of stones, some of them the size of a large house, and containing many thousands of cart loads of stones usually placed on high hills and mountains, and still existing in many parts of Ireland. According to Toland and others, they were partly erected for Druidical worship, and also as sepulchral monuments over the remains of warriors and kings; and some of these heaps of stones, used as sepulchres, were called by the Irish Leacht, and Tainleacht, which signify sepulchral monuments.

Sepulchral mounds, commonly called mounds in Ireland, and barrows by the English antiquaries, are of a circular, or conical form, having the appearance of hillocks, and of various sizes. The interior is generally composed of a heap of small stones, resembling a cairn, but covered with earth, and, when opened, they are found to contain funeral urns, remains of human bones, military weapons, and various other articles, which prove them to have been places of sepulture for kings, chiefs, and warriors, in the Pagan times; for after the introduction of Christianity these sepulchral mounds were discontinued. This mode of burial was used by various ancient nations, as the Greeks, Gauls, Scythians, Scandinavians, Saxons, &c., and the great sepulchral mounds of Achilles, and others of Homer's heroes, still remain on the shores of the Hellespont; and Byron beautifully says—

“——— I've stood upon Achilles' tomb
And heard Troy doubted—time will doubt of Rome.”

The stupendous earthen mound, resembling a large hill, raised to the memory of Alyattes, king of Lydia, near six centuries before the Christian era, is still to be seen in Asia Minor, and in the Crimea remain some of the sepulchral mounds of the old Scythian kings. In England these sepulchral mounds are very numerous, and of great size, on Salisbury plain, and other places; and in Ireland sepulchral mounds are found almost in every county, particularly in Meath, Louth, Dublin, and Kildare. Along the banks they came to the resolution not to alter their course, or avoid any force however great that might oppose them, and having determined on that resolution the sons of O'Donnell, Maolmuire Mac of the Boyne, between Drogheda and Slane, are many mounds; but the one at Newgrange is the largest in Ireland, covering an area of about two acres, and between eighty and ninety feet in height, having the appearance of a considerable hill; the interior is composed of a huge heap of small stones; but it is covered with several feet of earth; it was much larger than at present, for it was broken into, and several hundred cart-loads of stones carried off by some barbarian road-makers; but these excavations, however, led to an interesting discovery, namely, a long gallery, or passage, covered with huge flag-stones, leading into the interior, and in the centre of the mound was found a large circular chamber, vaulted with a dome; urns and remains of human bones were also found, so that this mound was no doubt the sepulchre of some celebrated Irish king, or warrior; a circle of huge stones standing upright, surrounded the mound at Newgrange, and many of them still remain. It appears, also, that these great mounds were used in ancient times as places where assemblies and great conventions were held for legislative purposes, inauguration of princes, and other great meetings of the people. In the county of Dublin there are sepulchral mounds in various places, and in one of these, at Knocksedan near Swords, it is stated by Ware, that on its being opened in his time, there were found in it the remains of a man of gigantic size, the skeleton measuring, from the ankle-bone to the top of the skull, eight feet four inches; the bones of the skull were very thick, and the teeth of enormous size; the limbs were all very large in proportion, and it appears that this giant, when living, must have been nearly nine feet high. In Kildare, there are many of these mounds on the Curragh, and also at Naas, at Aseul, near Athy, and at Mullaghmast. An account of the Cemeteries of the Pagan kings of Ireland, in Connaught, Meath, &c., has been given at pp. 122-3, in the note on South Connaught.

Raths, so called from the Irish Rath, which signifies a fort or fortress, but commonly called Lios, which also signifies a fortress or habitation. They have been usually called Danish forts, and are circular earthen ramparts, surrounded with a deep fosse, or ditch, some of them composed of a single rampart, others of two, and some having treble ramparts; the usual area in the interior of these raths contains from about half a rood to half an acre, but some of them are much larger, and contain in the interior from an acre to two acres. These raths are mostly situated on hills, and are found in every county; they are extremely numerous in most of the counties of Ulster and Connaught, and there are at least thirty thousand of them still remaining in Ireland, though many of them have been levelled; but as the peasantry and farmers entertain a belief transmitted down by tradition from time immemorial, that it is very unlucky to meddle with them, and always followed by some misfortune, as these places are supposed to be sacred or enchanted ground, and the habitations of fairies, this fear, coupled with a proper feeling of veneration for antiquities, has fortunately preserved from destruction those interesting memorials of remote ages. They are commonly called Danish forts, from some tradition that they were erected as fortresses by the Danes, and the theory of their having been all Danish works, has been absurdly maintained by Ledwich, and other shallow antiquaries. Some of them may have been erected by the Danes, but many thousands of them are found in remote parts, in the interior of the country, where the Danes had no possessions, as those pirates were chiefly located in the towns along the sea-coast, and it is evident that these raths must have formed the fortresses and chief habitations of the ancient Irish, and many of them no doubt erected by the Firbolgs, Danans, and Milesians, more than a thousand years before the Danes arrived in Ireland. In the county of Kildare are some remarkable raths, and very large; the Rath of Mullaghmast contains an area of about two acres, and at Allen, near Old Kilcullen, is another great rath, and there is one of very great size on the Curragh of Kildare. These were no doubt the fortresses of ancient Irish chiefs or kings. In the territory now forming the county of Dublin, the ancient kings, as mentioned in the preceding part of this article, had fortresses at Howth, Swords, and Dunleary; and in Kildare, the kings of Leinster had royal seats and fortresses at Naas and Dun Leamhna, now Dunlavan, on the borders of Kildare, Wicklow, and Dublin. Dun, and also Dinn, were names applied to ancient fortresses.

Round Towers.—So much has been written about these interesting remains of Irish antiquity, that to enumerate the various theories respecting them would far exceed the limits of this article, and the opinions as to the origin, era, and uses of those beautiful but mysterious structures, whose history is hidden in the night of time, are so various, that, as to whether they were built for Pagan or Christian purposes, still remains a subject of antiquarian controversy. In the county of Dublin there are round towers at Lusk, Swords, and Clondalkin, and some remains of one near the old church of Rathmichael, between Killiney and Bray; and there was in former times a round tower situated in Ship-street, not far from the castle of Dublin, but no traces of it now remain. In the county of Kildare there are five round towers still remaining, situated at Kildare, Old Kilcullen, Castledermott, Oughterard, and Taghadee. In the counties of Dublin and Kildare are many interesting ruins, and remains of ancient abbeys, churches, castles, and other antiquities, too numerous to be here mentioned. The remains of antiquity in Ireland are very numerous, and extremely interesting, though much has been destroyed by the silent hand of time, but much more by the ruthless fury of fanaticism and war,—the barbarians of ancient and modern times, like the Vandals of old, having destroyed various works of art. The stones of many Druidical temples and cromleacs have been broken; sepulchral mounds and raths, the ramparts of ancient fortresses, and even walls of Cyclopean architecture, have been levelled; cairns have been scattered, round towers have been barbarously thrown down, or shamefully suffered to fall into dilapidation and ruin; abbeys, churches and castles have been demolished, and their materials have been placed in other buildings; splendid stone crosses, sculptures, and statues, have been broken and mutilated; golden and silver ornaments of massive size and beautiful workmanship, worn by ancient kings, queens, and chieftains, have been carried off to other countries, or sold to goldsmiths, and melted down, and many other interesting remains of ancient art have been destroyed, though all these memorials of remote ages should be watched over with unceasing veneration, and preserved to posterity with the most sacred care.

The note on Moy Liffey and Bregia, will be concluded in the next number.

A. D. 1461.

1. Edward IV. In the year 1461, king Henry VI., of the House of Lancaster, was deposed, and Edward, earl of March, son of the deceased Richard Plantaganet, duke of York, as head of the house of York, was proclaimed king, as Edward IV., on the 4th of March, 1461. The deposed King Henry was confined in the tower of London, but was liberated by his party in 1470, and for a short time restored to the throne; his forces were, however, defeated by those of king Edward in the great battle of Tewksbury, in the year 1471, and he himself being taken prisoner, was sent again to the tower, where he was killed the same year by Richard, duke of Gloucester, afterwards king Richard III.

Lords Lieutenant.—In 1462, George, duke of Clarence, brother to king Edward IV., was appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland for life; he was born in Dublin during the time his father, Richard Plantaganet, duke of York, had been lord lieutenant. The duke of Clarence did not come to Ireland, but appointed various lords deputies to act under him; in 1462, sir Roland Fitz Eustace, baron of Portlester, and viscount of Baltinglass; in 1463, Thomas Fitzgerald, earl of Desmond, who was afterwards beheaded at Drogheda; in 1467, John Tiptoft, earl of Worcester, who was afterwards beheaded in England, A. D. 1470, for his adherence to king Edward IV. against Henry VI.; in 1467, Thomas Fitzmaurice Fitzgerald, earl of Kildare; in 1475, William Sherwood, bishop of Meath and lord chancellor of Ireland; in 1471, sir Roland Fitz Eustace a second time; in 1478, Henry Gray, lord Gray of Ruthin; in 1478, sir Robert Preston, viscount Gormanstown, and Gerald Fitzgerald, earl of Kildare, all acted as lords deputies to the duke of Clarence. In 1478, the duke of Clarence Sweeny, Owen Baeach Mac Sweeney, and all those that joined them, of the people of Fanat, marched to meet and oppose O'Donnell, and the sons of Naghtan, at Ceannmaghair; as soon as the two parties approached they did not hesitate to attack each other, on account of their mutual enmity, hatred, provocations, and dissensions; a fierce and desperate engagement ensued, in which O'Donnell, i. e. Torlogh Cairbreach, and the sons of Naghtan were defeated. Manus, brother to O'Donnell, with many others were slain, and Torlogh Cairbreach O'Donnell himself was taken prisoner and deposed. After this defeat at Ceannmaghair, those chiefs proceeded to Kil-Mac-Nenain (Kilmaerenan), and Hugh Roe (O'Donnell), the son of Niall Garv, was nominated lord (of Tireonnell), according to the established custom, and O'Donnell, that is, Hugh Roe, then nominated Maolmuire Mac Sweeney, the Mac Sweeney of Fanat.

Manus, son of Bryan, son of Donal, the son of Murtogh O'Connor, lord of Carbury (in Sligo), died.

Mae Caghwell, i. e. Bryan, lord of Kinel Feredach (in Tyrone), died, and Owen Mac Caghwell was appointed lord.

Fergal O'Gara, tanist of Coolavin (in Sligo), was killed by Mae Costello.

The dean O'Maoileoin (O'Malone), the most learned man in all Ireland, died at Clonmaenois of the son of Fiodach.

Aongus Magrath, a learned poet (in Thomond), Niall Oge O'Higgin; and Niall, the son of Fergal Oge O'Higgin, died.

Mahon, the son of William O'Ferrall, died.

William O'Flanagan, priest and canon of the chapter of Elphin, died.

Felim Fionn (the Fair) O'Connor was taken prisoner by his own kinsmen, namely, the sons of Bryan Ballach, and Roderick the son of O'Connor Don, in the beginning of this year, on which account disturbances and commotions arose in Siol Murray (Rosecommon,) and Teige O'Connor himself was taken prisoner.

Mae William Burke and his kinsmen marched with a force into the plain of Connaught, to redeem Felim Fionn (O'Connor), from the son of Bryan Ballach, and they gave him his own demand, and the nobles of Connaught went security for him, and Felim was liberated from his chains; Felim took those nobles with him to Carn Fraoich Mae Fiodhach Foltruidg,² and Mae Dermott put his shoe on him after he had redeemed him; they then took the hostages of the race of Ona, the son of Aongus, and of Hy Briuin (O'Rourke's country, or Leitrim), and Mae William returned home, leaving those hostages with the son of Bryan Ballach. When the sons of O'Connor Roe were informed of this, they redeemed Teige O'Connor from O'Connor Don for the half-townland of Clar, and after that they allied themselves to the sons of Conor Mac Branán (a chief in Rosecommon).

A great war was carried on by the English of Meath and Leinster, by which a great portion of Meath was spoiled.

O'Connor Faily, and the son of Richard Butler, marched to Druim Turleime (now Drumhurlin, between Collinstown and Mullingar in Westmeath) with an army of upwards of one thousand horsemen all helmeted, fearless, and undismayed, and sent forth their forces, horsemen and scouring parties, to burn and lay waste Meath in every direction, and in the course of this contest the son being accused of high treason against his brother, king Edward, was condemned; but being allowed the privilege of choosing the manner of death, he requested to be suffocated in a butt of Malmsey wine, which was accordingly done in the tower of London. In 1479, Richard, duke of York, son of king Edward IV., a mere child, being then only four or five years of age, was nominated lord lieutenant of Ireland, and Gerald Fitzgerald, earl of Kildare, acted as lord deputy.

2. Carn Fraoich Mae Fiodhach Foltruidh, signifies the Carn of Fraoch, the son of Fiodhach of the Red Hair, and was so called from Fraoch, an ancient warrior, who was buried there. This place, now called Carnfree, is situated near Tulsk, in the county of Rosecommon, and, as before stated in these notes, was the place of inauguration of the O'Conors, as kings of Connaught; and the Mac Dermotts, princes of Moylurg, holding the office of hereditary marshals of Connaught, presided at the inauguration of the kings of Connaught; the O'Connor inaugurated at this time was O'Connor Don, and the term above used, of putting on his shoe on O'Connor, signifies that he was inaugurated, as the ceremony of putting on a shoe, or ornamented slipper, was used at these inaugurations; and it is stated that when the O'Neills, princes of Tyrone and kings of Ulster, were inaugurated at Tullaghoge, in Tyrone, as already described, that O'Hagan, chief of Tullaghoge, who presided at the inauguration of the O'Neills, put on the foot of the elected prince a golden slipper, or ornamented with gold, which completed the ceremony; and some of these ornamental inauguration slippers, made of leather and other materials, of very elegant workmanship, have been found in bogs and other places, and to be seen in some museums and collections of antiquities. Ona, above-mentioned, the son of Aongus, was king of Connaught in the fifth century, and is stated to have given his palace, called Imleach Ona, as a present to St. Patrick, at which place he founded the see of Elphin.

of Felim, the son of the Calvach O'Connor, was made prisoner by John, the son of Mac Thomas ; O'Connor received great presents from the English for granting them peace, as was always customary with those who held his place.

Mac Geoghegan committed great depredations on the baron of Delvin (Nugent, in Westmeath), and also on the Ledwiches, so that he plundered the country as far as Eithne (the river Inny, on the borders of Westmeath and Longford).

Port Loman (a parish in Westmeath) was plundered by the sons of Irial O'Ferrall.

Malachy, the son of Flann O'Donnellan (in Galway), died.

Theobald O'Mulloy, lord of the half of Fercall (in King's county), was killed by O'Mulloy of the Wood.

A. D. 1462.

A monastery of friars minor (Franciscans) was commenced at Monaghan during the time that Felim, the son of Bryan, the son of Ardgal Mac Mahon, was lord of Oriel.

Bartholomew, the son of Hugh O'Flanagan, prior of Devenish (in Fermanagh), died on Lough Derg.

Bryan, son of Philip Maguire, the most hospitable and generous man of his time in the entire province of Ulster, was killed while in pursuit of his property, which was carried away by force by the sons of Art O'Neill, namely, Roderick and his kinsmen, after having obtained their protection, and being imprisoned by them for some time.

Edmond Roe, the son of John Maguire, was killed by the same Roderick.

Teige, the son of Owen O'Connor, lord of Carbury (in Sligo), died

Teige O'Connor, and his kinsmen, defeated the sons of Bryan Ballach, in which Dermot, son of Donogh, the son of Bryan, and John, son of Teige, the son of Tiarnan of the Corra, were slain ; and the sons of Bryan Ballach were dispossessed of, and expelled from their lands and properties ; the two sons of Bryan fled in terror to Mac Bran's place at Greanchaidh (in Roscommon), but Mac Bran was obliged to forsake them, so that they were proclaimed through every district, and Mac Bran himself was expelled from his country into Annaly, where he was received by O'Ferrall, who gave him lands for his cattle, and possessions in the country for his people.

Mac William of Clanrickard, marched with an army into Hy Cairin (Ikerrin, in Tipperary), where O'Magher, i. e. Teige, with his supporters, met and opposed them ; and William Burke, the son of Mac William, was slain by the son of O'Maher, with the cast of a javelin, by which blow O'Maher was victorious, and the same O'Maher, lord of Ikerrin, after his death, was succeeded by his son.

Mac Bran, i. e. Tomaltach Carrach, the son of Con, the son of Hugh, died at an advanced age.

The young earl of Ormond (John Butler), arrived in Ireland, with a powerful host of Saxons, and a great war arose between the earls of Ormond and of Desmond, in which Gerald, the son of the earl of Desmond, was taken prisoner by the Butlers, who also took possession of Waterford ; both parties finally resolved on giving each other battle, and it was against the will of the earl of Ormond that the son of Richard (Butler), went to fight the battle on that day ; however he was defeated in the engagement, and he himself taken prisoner, and some state that 410 of them (the Butlers), were buried on that day, besides their commander and officers. The Geraldines, after gaining that battle with great slaughter, took Kilkenny, and the great towns of the territory, from the Butlers ; the young earl of Ormond, with his English, were in the town of Dangan (in Kilkenny), which could not be taken from them. Another brother of the earl (of Ormond) arrived in Ireland, and seized on four ships belonging to the earl of Desmond, at sea, with all they contained, through which the Butlers gained great power.

Con O'Melaghlin, with the Dillons, and Lisagh, son of Rossa (O'Ferrall), defeated O'Ferrall at Noghaval (in Westmeath), and Edmond, the son of O'Ferrall, and eleven men of the race of Murtogh Oge O'Ferrall, were taken prisoners ; the loss in prisoners and slain was seventy.

Thomas, son of Cathal, the son of Thomas O'Ferrall, tanist of Annaly, was slain at Bel-athana-pailise (in Longford), by night, while endeavouring to recover his property, carried away by a party of the Dillons, the O'Conors, and the sons of Murtogh ; they carried off his head and his property, he having at the time only a few attendants, which was a rare occurrence with him.

A.D. 1463.

Gillcreest Mac Edigein, vicar of Teampul Patrick, at Elphin, and canon of the chapter, died.

Conor, son of Cathal Roe Mac Rannall, lord of Clan Bibacht (in Leitrim), died.

James, son of Gerald, earl of Desmond, died.

Dermod More, the son of Dermod O'Conor, was killed by the sons of Teige O'Conor, at Easda-conna, on the river Boyle.

Culein O'Dempsey (in the King's county), was slain by the English.

Cormac Ballach, the son of Conor Mac Donogh, the most distinguished chief's son of any in North Connaught for nobleness, hospitality, and feats of arms, and also the most learned and intelligent in the arts, died after having gained the victory of extreme unction and repentance.

William Burke, the son of Richard, made an attack on the castle of Mulin Adam (in Sligo), in retaliation for the loss of his eye; he was pursued to the borders of Ballymote, where he turned on his pursuers, and slew fifteen of them, with the son of Manus, the son of Dermod Mac Donogh, and the sons of O'Neill, who had on a former occasion deprived him of his eye at that castle.

The son of Maju Barrett, lord of Tyrawley, and Siacus Cam, the son of Fergal, lord of the Clan Awlave O'Ferrall, died.

Graine (or Grace), the daughter of Teige O'Rourke, the wife of Mac Donogh, died.

Teige, son of Donal More Mac Donogh, lord of the half of Tirerrill, died.

Henry, son of Felim O'Reilly, was killed by Donogh, the son of Thomas Oge Maguire.

Hugh, the son of Gillpatrick Maguire, died.

The king of England sent presents to O'Neill, i. e. Henry, the son of Owen, viz., forty-eight yards of scarlet cloth, a chain (or collar) of gold, &c.

O'Neill gave pay to the lord of Thomond, i. e. Teige, the son of Torlogh O'Brien.

A.D. 1464.

Fear Sithe Mac Duibhne (or Mac Devine), bishop of the two Brehnias (Kilmore), died.

Dermod Mac Murcadhain, a worthy priest, died.

Teige O'Conor died on the Saturday after first Lady day, and was interred with honours at Roscommon, by the race of Cathal Crovdearg (O'Conor), east and west, and the tribes of Siol Murray (in Rosecommon).

Cedach O'Moore, lord of Leix (in Queen's county), died of the plague.

Donal O'Rourke, John, son of the official (vicar general), the son of Murtogh Oge O'Ferrall, Malachy, son of Bryan, the son of Murtogh Oge O'Ferrall, with his wife, More, daughter of James O'Kennedy, the wife of Mac Geoghegan, with her daughter, and Murtogh, the son of John O'Duigenan, died of the same plague.

Murtogh, son of Art O'Melaghlin, and his wife, the daughter of O'Coffey, together with three others, died in the space of twenty-four hours from the effects of a bite of a horse, which had the same lumps (i. e. the prevailing epidemic).

Redmond, son of the prior, the son of Loughlin O'Ferrall, died of the plague.

Donal Cam, the son of Conor Mac Donogh, died.

Mac Dermott Roe, i. e. Dermod, the son of Malachy, Cathal Bacach, the son of Cormac of Fermoy, and Beannumhan, the daughter of O'Flanagan, died.

Con, son of Niall Garv O'Donnell, and Aongus, the son of Niall O'Donnell, were slain by Eignaghan, the son of Naghtan O'Donnell, at Findruim (in Donegal), on the 8th of May.

O'Neill, and the sons of Naghtan O'Donnell, proceeded with a predatory force into Tirconnell, after the death of Con O'Donnell, and they burned the country as far as Ballyshannon, and carried away many horses and cows; but, however, they did not go with impunity, for they lost the value of what they had taken, namely, Bryan, the son of Conor Oge, the son of Conor Roe Mac Guire, a man distinguished for hospitality and feats of arms, and who kept a house of general hospitality, together with twenty-eight of their forces, who were slain.

Breasal, the son of Donogh O'Kelly, and Malachy, the son of William O'Kelly, who were in contention with each other for the lordship of Hy Maine, died in one week at the end of April, for Breasal had said, when the messenger of Malachy came to visit him on his death-bed sickness, "I accept a meeting with Malachy in a week's time, in the presence of the Lord of us both," and they both attended that call.

A great contest arose between the sons of William O'Kelly and the sons of Donogh O'Kelly, after the deaths of Breasal and of Malachy.

The son of Richard Butler, a man of the most exalted fame and nobility of the English of Ireland in his time, died.

Ir, the son of Cathal Roe Mac Rannall, tanist of his own territory, a man worthy of being a lord in personal figure and in truth, died a week before the festival of St. Michael, and Ir, the son of William Mac Rannall, was slain by Giolla Glan Dillon in the same week, with the single thrust of a spear, he having been at the time in the company of his mother's brother, William D'Alton.

Donal, the son of Murtogh Bacach O'Conor, lord of Carbury of Drumcliff (in Sligo), together with his kinsmen, except a few, were slain by the sons of Owen O'Conor, and Roderick, the son of Bryan O'Conor, was appointed lord in his place.

Felim, son of Donogh, the son of Tiarnan Oge O'Rourke, was taken prisoner by O'Rourke, and Hugh, the son of Teige O'Rourke, was taken prisoner by Tiarnan Oge, the son of Donogh, after that, in retaliation.

Tomaltach Oge O'Gara was killed in a nocturnal attack on Slieve Lughra (in Mayo), by Maurice, the son of Cormac Mac Dermott Gall, and Edmund Mac Costello of the Plain.

Loghlin, the son of Maoilin O'Maolconry, after a long tribulation, and after having gained the victory of repentance, died and was interred at Elphin.

Loghlin, the son of Fircheirtne O'Higgin, died.

Thomas Greannach, and Donal, the sons of Dun Maguire, were killed by their brother Roderick Glas.

The sons of O'Kelly, namely, Colla, the prior of John's church, and Roderick, went on a preying incursion at the instigation of Bryan O'Breen of Breaghmuine (Brawney, in Westmeath), and the sons of Rossa, the son of Murtogh Midheach O'Ferrall; but misfortune however attended them, for they were both killed, together with sixteen of their people.

Bryan O'Breen, with ten of his people, and ten others of the people of the Calladh, with William, the son of Donogh, the son of the prior O'Ferrall, were slain by Mac Awley.

O'Donnell, with Mac William Burke, and many of the Irish and of the English of Ireland along with them, repaired to Ath-Cliath-Duibhlinne (Dublin), to meet Thomas, earl of Desmond, lord justice of Ireland at that time, and they entered into a league of peace and alliance with him.

Tir Tuathail (in Roscommon), was plundered by Hugh Mac Dermott, lord of Moylurg; and Mac Dermott Gall, with the chiefs of Tir Tuathail, went and made their submission for their plundered properties and gave hostages to Hugh, which were retained with the Mac Donoghs since the death of Tomaltach Mac Dermott to that time.

Nine of the lord justice's people were killed in Fine Gall (Fingall near Dublin), at the instigation of the bishop of Meath¹; the lord justice, the bishop, and Preston, proceeded to the king's palace to lodge their complaints against each other.

Thomas, earl of Desmond, returned from the king of England's court with the authority of the king's viceroy in Ireland, and with great presents which he received from the king.

Felim O'Rourke, and Hugh, the son of Teige O'Rourke were liberated on both sides, and peace, was established in Brefnehy.

William, son of Maine, the son of Hugh, lord of the race of Conor Mac Branan (in Roscommon), died.

Donal Cam, the son of Conor Mac Donogh, died.

A monastery for Franciscans was founded at Athdara (Adare), in Munster, in the diocese of Limerick, on the banks of the river Mague, by Thomas, earl of Kildare, and Judith, the daughter of James, earl of Desmond, where they erected a tomb for themselves.

A. D. 1464.

1. The Bishop of Meath at that time was William Sherwood, and this affair is thus mentioned by Ware and Leland, namely, that a great dispute having arisen in the neighbourhood of Dublin or Fingall, in which nine of the earl of Desmond's followers were killed, the bishop of Meath was said to be the instigator of this quarrel, from the great enmity he bore the earl, who was then lord deputy, and a violent altercation having arisen between them, as above-mentioned, both parties sent their agents to England, to lay their complaints before the throne, and the bishop and the earl afterwards repaired to the court of king Edward, to represent the matter to his majesty, and the earl having been received with great honours by the king, he thus triumphed over his enemies.

A. D. 1465.

Thomas, son of Maurice, the son of Matthew, abbot of Lisgoole, died.

Gormley Cavanagh, the daughter of Mae Murrugh, king of Leinster, and wife of O'Neill, died.

Hugh, son of Conor Mac Dermott, lord of Moylurg, died, and Conor Oge, the son of Conor Mac Dermott, was appointed his successor, according to the election of the tribe of Hugh Mac Dermott, both clergy and laity, except alone the sons of Roderick Mac Dermott, which happened to be an unfortunate circumstance to them, as, on the day appointed for holding a conference at Carnfree (in Roscommon), which was attended by O'Conor Don, Donogh O'Kelly, and the sons of Roderick, on the one side, and by Mac Dermott and his people on the other, a conflict ensued, in which Dermott, the son of Roderick Mac Dermott, was slain, whose loss was much lamented in his own country, and Teige, the son of Roderick Buighe, was taken prisoner, and O'Conor Don was overthrown.

John Duv, the son of Donogh, the son of Hugh Maguire, was killed by John, the son of Philip Maguire.

John, son of Alexander, the son of John More Mac Donnell, (in Antrim), was killed by Con, the son of Hugh Buighe O'Neill.

Malachy O'Beirne, chief of Tir Briuin of the Shannon (in Roscommon), and his young son Malachy, named the Giolla Duv, were slain, and their place burned, by their own kinsmen and clan, on the Sunday before November, and his other son, Carbery O'Beirne, was slain with the east of a dart, by the same party, in the Bearnagh Bhalbh, in the same month.

Mac Consnamha¹ and his son were treacherously slain by Donal O'Rourke and his sons, who settled themselves in his country.

Hugh, son of Teige O'Rourke, died.

Cormac Mac Dermott Gall, lord of Airteach (in Roscommon), died.

Hugh, son of Naghtan O'Donnell, died.

The monastery of Kilcrede,² in Munster, in the diocese of Cork, was founded for Franciscan friars by the Mac Carthys, who constructed a splendid tomb as a place of sepulture for their nobility and gentry.

A. D. 1466.

Bryan, the son of Gillpatrick Maguire, abbot of Lisgoole, and Donal O'Lennon, a canon of Lisgoole, died.

Felim, the son of Bryan Mac Mahon, lord of Oriel, died.

Bryan, the son of Awlave Maguire, chief of his own tribe, and lord of Clan Awley (in Fermanagh), died.

Aine, daughter of Mac Geoghegan, the wife of Maguire, died.

Conor, the son of O'Conor Roe, died.

Bryan Duv, the son of Teige O'Conor, died on the 15th day of March.

Richard, son of Edmond Tyrrell, and Thomas Gallda, the son of Edmond Tyrrell, died.

William Burke, the son of Walter Burke, and William Burke, the son of John, the grandson of Walter, died.

O'Duigenan of Kilronan (in Roseommon), i. e. Fergal; Maurice the canon, the son of Conaing the canon O'Maolconry; and Conor, the son of Teige Mae Branan (in Roseommon), died.

Uaithne (Anthony), the son of Fergal O'Reilly (of Cavan), died.

Donogh, the son of Murtoogh O'Daly, died.

Hugh, son of Owen O'Neill, gave the English of the plain of Oriel a signal overthrow.

The English of Meath and Leinster marched with an army into Offaley, and O'Conor Faile, i. e. Con, the son of Calvach, collected his forces to oppose them, and first of all slew John Mac Thomas (Fitzgerald), the best and most renowned general of the English, whose death was an omen of defeat to the English, for on the next day the earl¹ and the English forces were defeated, and he

A. D. 1465.

1. Mac Consnamha, a name anglicised to Ford, were chiefs of a district in Leitrim called Muinir Kenny, now the parish of Inismagrath, along Lough Allen.

2. Kilcrede, now Kilcrea, according to Seward, in the parish of Killonane, in the county of Cork, where this monastery was founded by Cormac Laidir Mac Carthy, lord of Muskerry; it was dedicated to St. Bridget, and some of its extensive ruins still remain, containing several monuments of the Mac Carthys, earls of Clancarthy, and of the Barretts, and other families of note.

A. D. 1466.

1. The Earl here mentioned was Thomas Fitzgerald, earl of Desmond, then lord deputy, and Leland gives the following account of this matter: that the territory of the O'Melaghilins, chiefs in Westmeath, having been attacked by the family of the Petits, himself was taken prisoner and stripped of his arms and armour, and Teige O'Connor, his foster brother, conveyed the earl to castle Carbery, together with a great many of his army who were taken prisoners along with him, among whom were Christopher Plunket, the prior of St. Mary's church at Trim, young William Nugent, Barnwell, and many others. The English of Dublin afterwards proceeded to castle Carbery and rescued those English who were imprisoned there after the defeat, in spite of their enemies, and took them back. For a considerable time after that battle the people of Offaley were in the habit of sending scouring parties as far as Tara northwards, and as far as Naas southwards, and the people of Brefney and Oriel frequently plundered and burned Meath in every direction, without opposition or pursuit, for a long time afterwards.

Teige O'Brien, lord of Thomond, led a very great force southward across the Shannon in the summer; he plundered the Irish of Desmond and of West Munster (Cork and Kerry), and the Irish of Leinster also paid him tribute, and he then returned home, and after having taken possession of the territory of Clan William (in Tipperary), and of the county of Limerick, which were confirmed to him by the earl (of Desmond), for obtaining peace for himself and his country, and after he (O'Brien), had obtained security of sixty marks being paid (him and his heirs) for ever, from the people of Limerick, he died of a disease at his own house, and Conor, the son of Torlogh O'Brien, was appointed his successor.

Rickard, son of Mac William Burke, the son of Rickard Oge, tanist of Clanrickard, died.

O'Dowd and his son were treacherously killed by the sons of Mulroona, the son of Roderick O'Dowd.

The English of Meath gave Mac Mahon (of Monaghan) a great overthrow, in which many were slain, and Hugh Oge Mac Mahon, and the son of Donal of Clan Kelly, were taken prisoners.

Owen and Hugh Duv, the sons of Roderick, the son of Cathal Duv O'Connor, and Teige, the son of Bryan, the son of Cathal, were slain by Dermot, the son of Teige O'Connor, and the sons of Dermot Roe, the son of Teige O'Connor, on Easter Monday, at Cuirech Liathdroma (the marshy plain of Leitrim).

Malachy and John, the sons of Owen Mac Dermott Roe, died both within a fortnight.

Owen, son of John Mac Donogh, and Murtoogh, the son of Cuchonacht O'Daly, died.

The monastery of the Island of the Trinity on Lough Key (in Roscommon), with the images of the Trinity, were burned by a candle.

A. D. 1467.

James O'Ferrall, abbot of Leath-Ratha (Abbey-laragh in Longford), a man distinguished for charity and hospitality, died, Niall, son of Mahon Magrath, the official of Lough Erne (vicar-general of Clogher), and parson of Iniskeen, died.

Owen, son of Roderick Mac Mahon, lord of Oriel, died, and Redmond, the son of Roderick, succeeded him in the lordship.

Torlogh Roe, the son of O'Neill, i. e. Henry; O'Reilly, namely, Cathal, the son of Owen; and Mac Caghwel, i. e. Owen, died.

Hugh, son of Bryan O'Kelly, lord of Hy Maine, died, and was interred at Athlone, and he was succeeded by Hugh of the Wood, the son of William O'Kelly.

Donal Buighe O'Ferrall, head chief of Annaly, and Lisagh, son of Rossa, son of Conor, the son of Cathal O'Ferrall, died.

Irial O'Ferrall succeeded Donal, and John succeeded Irial.

Hugh Duv, son of Donagh, son of Bryan Ballach (O'Connor), Teige, his brother, Teige, the son of Bryan, and Hugh Roe, the son of Dermot More, the son of Dermot O'Connor, were slain in an attack by Dermot O'Connor, aided by the sons of Dermot Roe, the son of Teige O'Connor, and by Cathal, the son of Roderick Oge O'Connor.

Colla, son of Manus Mac Mahon, and eleven of English settlers, who had the title of barons of Mullingar, the O'Melaghlin's made incursions into Petit's possessions, and the earl of Desmond, having collected the English forces, marched against the O'Melaghlin's, who, as stated by Taaffe, being joined by the O'Reillys of East Brefney, or Cavan, they attacked the troops of the earl of Desmond, and defeated them with great slaughter in a severe conflict, in which many of Desmond's most distinguished officers were slain, and he himself taken prisoner by O'Reilly, who, however, soon after generously liberated the earl, without ransom, at the request of his friend, O'Connor Faile.

his people along with him, were slain, in pursuit of their property plundered by the Brehnians.

David Mae Costello (in Mayo), was killed by Thomas Bermingham.

Donogh, son of John, the son of Malachy O'Ferrall, died on the journey to Rome.

John, son of Edmond, the son of Fergal O'Reilly, was slain.

The son of Mae William of Clanrickard died of a sudden sickness, for there is no earthly glory but ends in sorrow.

Christopher Plunket, Pierce, son of James D'Alton, James junior, the son of James D'Alton, and the son of Petit, of Mullingar, i. e. the prior of Mullingar, died of the plague.

John, son of the D'Alton, was slain by his own people.

Torlogh, son of Cathal O'Conor, was killed at Rosecommon by the sons of Donal, the son of Manus Cam O'Kelly.

O'Neill, namely, Henry, marched with his forces into O'Kane's country, and on that expedition Thomas, the son of Philip Maguire, the best man in his territory in his time, was slain.

Mae William of Clanrickard, and the O'Briens, defeated O'Kelly, and the sons of William Burke, in the battle of Croise Croinn (in Galway), in which were slain William Caoch Burke, the son of Mae William, the two sons of O'Kelly, Hugh Buighe, the son of Torlogh Mae Donnell, constable of the galloglasses, ten of the chiefs of Clan Donnell, together with eight score (160) of the galloglasses, and many others besides.

O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, the son of Niall Garv, having marched into Connaught to revenge that defeat, because Mae William and O'Kelly were his friends and allies, compelled the people of Clanrickard to yield to peaceable terms, and he afterwards returned in safety to his home.

The island of Lough Cairgin was taken by O'Conor Don, and the Clan Felim (O'Conors), from the guards who were in its care.

Teige O'Conor, with Mae Geoghegan and Bermingham, committed numerous depredations in the plain of Tefia (in Westmeath), and they plundered the country from Impor (Empor), to Ballymaewilliam (in King's county).

The castle of Collooney (in Sligo) was taken by the sons of Cormac Ballach Mae Donogh, from the tribe of Cormac Mae Donogh.

A Saxon lord justice having arrived in Ireland, Thomas (earl of Desmond), was removed, a circumstance which caused the ruin of Ireland.

A. D. 1468.

Conor O'Melaghlin, bishop of Elphin, died.

Thomas, earl of Desmond,¹ who had been lord justice of Ireland, the son of James, son of Gerald, the most renowned of his race in Ireland in his time for personal figure and form, for hospitality, feats of arms, charity, and humanity to the poor, and the pilgrims of God, in bestowing of precious presents and property on the laity, clergy, and poets, and for suppressing theft and misdeeds, proceeded to Drogheda, to meet the Saxon lord justice, and the English of Meath; they however treated him treacherously, and beheaded him, though innocent, and the greater portion of the men of Ireland were very much grieved at those tidings; his body was afterwards conveyed to Tralee, where he was buried, in the sepulchre of his ancestors, with great honours and veneration.

A. D. 1468.

The earl of Desmond was Thomas Fitzgerald, lord deputy of Ireland, and the circumstances which led to his death are stated, by Cox and Leland, as follows; namely, that the earl, having made some disrespectful remarks on the marriage of king Edward IV. with lady Elizabeth Gray, being so much the king's inferior in rank, and that he called her a tailor's widow, which excited the implacable resentment of the queen, and she gave instructions to the new lord deputy, John Tiptoft, earl of Worcester, who is mentioned above as the Saxon earl, to use his utmost endeavours to make out charges against Desmond, for his destruction. Tiptoft with alacrity complied with the queen's wishes, particularly as he was jealous of the great power of the Geraldines, hence various charges were brought against Desmond, for having formed alliances and fosterage with the Irish, and not having acted with sufficient rigour against the Irish enemies, of exacting the unlawful military tax called Coyne and Livery, &c., and in a parliament held at Drogheda by the deputy Tiptoft, in 1467, Desmond was accused of high treason, condemned, and beheaded at Drogheda, on the 15th of February, 1467; his head was sent to Dublin, and fixed on the castle, and his body was buried, according to some accounts, either in St. Peter's church, or in the Dominican monastery of St. Mary Magdalen, at Drogheda; but, according to these Annals, it appears it was afterwards removed for burial to Tralee. The earl of Desmond was one of the most powerful noblemen in Ireland, and very popular for his munificence, and patronage of arts and literature; he founded the celebrated Collegiate Church of Yonghal, in 1464; and in a parliament convened by him at Drogheda, in 1465, he passed an act for founding a university in that town, with privileges similar to Oxford, but this important institution was never established, not being endowed, in consequence of the earl's death.

 ERRATUM.—At A. D. 1450, p. 258, line 18, 1st col., after "surprise," add "at Gabhail Liun (now Glengervliu, in Cavan)."

O'Rourke, namely, Tiarnan Oge, the son of Teige, the lawful lord of Hy. Briuin (Brefney O'Rourke, or Leitrim), and of the tribe of Hugh Fionn, died, after having gained the victory over the world and the devil; and Donal, the son of Teige O'Rourke, was appointed his successor, by O'Donnell and all his friends.

The tribe of Tiarnan, son of Tiarnan More, the son of Ualgarg (O'Rourke), unjustly opposed the appointment (of Donal), and they themselves, aided by the Carbreans (of Sligo), and the Mac Donoghs, nominated as prince Donogh Losg, the son of Tiarnan More. O'Donnell, on receiving intelligence of this, marched with a very great force from the north, across the Erne, spoiled the northern part of Connaught, and committed great depredations in the eastern part of Tireragh, Cuil-Cnamha, and Coillte-Laighne (all in Sligo), and he carried off the spoils to his own place. Mac William Oughter, i. e. Ulick (Burke), the son of Ulick of the Wine, and O'Conor Don, with their English and Irish forces, marched to the relief of North Connaught; they burned the town of O'Rourke, but effected nothing more, and they returned to their homes without battle or booty.

Roderick, son of Conor Mac Donogh, lord of Tirerrill and of Ballindoon (in Sligo), died, after having gained the palm of victory over the world and the devil.

Torlogh, son of John O'Reilly, was appointed to the lordship of Brefney.

O'Kane (of Derry), i. e. Manus, died.

Cathal Oge, son of Cathal Roe Mac Rannall, sole chief of Muintir Eoluis (in Leitrim), died at his own house, on the first Sunday of Lent, after having gained the victory of extreme unction and repentance; and his son Teige Mac Rannall was appointed chief, and William Mac Rannall was also nominated chief of the tribe of Malachy Mac Rannall.

Art, son of Con O'Melaghlin, lord of Meath, was killed at Cnoc-ui-Chosgraidh (the hill of O'Cosgry, in Westmeath), on Easter Tuesday.

O'Moore (of Leix), and Mac Gillpatrick (of Ossory), died of the plague.

Bean Mumhan, daughter of Owen O'Conor, and wife of O'Kelly, i. e. Hugh, son of Bryan, died.

Edmond Mac Costello, of the plain (in Mayo), was killed by his brother William Mac Costello.

Conor Buighe, son of Cormac Mac Branan (of Roscommon), died.

Anthony, son of Mac Geoghegan (of Westmeath), was killed by the cast of a dart in the castle of Knock O'Cosgry.

Roderick, son of Dermot Roe, son of Teige O'Conor, and his wife, the daughter of Carby O'Conor, died of a sudden sickness.

Teige Mac Tiarnan, an affluent landed proprietor, and his wife Nuala, daughter of Fergal Mac Donogh Riavach, died.

The Giolla Duv, son of Cormac Buighe Mac Donogh, died.

Conor, son of Edmond, son of Malachy O'Hanley, died on Low Saturday.

Torna O'Maolconry, chief professor of Siol Murray (Roscommon), in history and poetry, died, in his own house at Lis Firbain, after the festival of St. Patrick, and after having gained the victory of repentance, and was interred at Elphin. Erard O'Maolconry succeeded him in the chief professorship.

O'Conor Faily, namely, Con, was taken prisoner by the English.

The castle of Bundroos (in Leitrim), which was in possession of O'Donnell, was delivered up by him again to the tribe of Murtogh Baccach (O'Conor).

Rickard Burke, having gone into Moylurg, made peace with Mac Dermott; and both proceeded to meet O'Donnell, who, previous to their arrival, crossed the Erne, and they did not meet on that occasion; Rickard then returned back into the plain of Connaught, where he took hostages from the O'Conors Roe; and he brought with him the Clan Felim (O'Conors), because they did not consent to give him hostages; Clan Conway (in Galway), was spoiled by Edmond Mac William, himself, and his sons, through arrogance and vain glory. Felim Fionn (O'Conor) committed great plunders on O'Conor Don, which he carried off with him into Moylurg; and he also took great preys from Hy Maine, and likewise from the tribe of Felim Cleireach, and from Muintir Beirne (in Roscommon), which he conveyed to Killaraght (in Sligo), to meet Rickard Burke and his forces; and he kept the forces without separating for the space of a week, during which they were supported solely by their own provisions; and he would have prevailed on them to remain longer, had they consented to remain. Felim carried off another great prey from Kiarraidh Mac Kethern (in Mayo); and on the same day he slew the grandson of Hugh Caoch O'Connor; but Felim was encountered at Iomaire Uairain (Oran, in Roscommon), by Edmond Mac William, with sixty galloglasses, sixty retained kerns, and the cavalry of his own country; many were wounded on both sides, and the booty and also his horses were wrested from Felim.

Gerald, son of the earl of Desmond, laid waste a great deal in Meath and in Leinster, in revenge of the death of Thomas, the earl.

The town of O'Reilly² and the monastery of Cavan were burned by the English, and the Saxon who had beheaded the earl of Desmond.

Con, son of Hugh Buighe O'Neill, gave the English of Lecale (in county of Down), a great overthrow at Beinn-Uamha, in which Murtogh Roe O'Neill, lord of Claneboy, was taken prisoner; and Angus, son of Alexander Mac Donnell, the son of Robert Savadge, lord of Lecale, and many of the English and Irish were slain.

Felim Fionn and Mac Dermott, that is, Conor, son of Cormac, committed excessive depredations at Ballintobber; but O'Connor, with all his forces and tribes, and Roderick O'Connor and his forces, with a great number of the Clan Conway, and the entire Clan Felim (O'Conors), on his side, encountered them; the sons of Dermod, son of Roderick Mac Dermott, and the sons of Cormac Oge Mac Dermott, who were encamped at Beola-Coilleadh, also overtook them, but Felim made a fortunate retreat to Scor More, in Clan Cathail Mac Murray; Felim and Mac Dermott afterwards valiantly and victoriously turned on their pursuers, and defeated and dispersed them in all directions. Owen, son of Torlogh Dall, son of Torlogh Oge O'Connor, and Felim, son of Torlogh Roe, son of Bryan Ballach, and many other chiefs along with them, were slain; Felim, after his victory and slaughter, carried away his booty, leaving his enemies in sorrow and discomfiture.

Donogh, the son of Thomas Maguire, made an attack on Philip, son of Cuchonacht Maguire, in Tirkennedy (in Fermanagh), and carried away great spoils; Donogh's people proceeded with their booty into Clankelly, leaving Donogh with a few men in the rear of the preying party, and he was pursued and overtaken by Philip; but Donogh turned on the son of Cuchonacht, and slew himself and his son on that occasion.

Roderick, son of Geoffrey Roe Maguire, and Malachy, son of Donogh Mac Caffrey, died.

A great many of the Clan Caffrey were slain, including Mac Caffrey himself, i. e. Donogh, his son Felim, his brother John, and his son Dermod, with three others, by the sons of Hugh, son of Philip of the Battle-axe Maguire.

A. D. 1469.

John Buighe, son of John More Magrath, the coarb of Termon Dabog (abbot of Lough Derg, in Donegal), died; and Dermod, son of Marcus, son of Maurice Magrath, was appointed his successor as coarb.

Mac Carthy More, lord of Desmond, died.

Hugh, son of William O'Kelly, lord of Ily Maine, the most distinguished man in Ireland for hospitality, and who never refused a favour to any man, was treacherously slain by the tribe of Donogh O'Kelly, namely, the sons of Breasal and Teige, son of Donogh, on Shrove Monday, two days before the festival of St. Berragh; and two O'Kellys were nominated to succeed him, namely, William, son of Hugh, son of Bryan, and Teige Caoch, son of William O'Kelly.

Richard Oge O'Reilly, tanist of Brefney, died.

Donal, son of Bryan, son of Philip, son of Giolla Duv Maguire, and Gillaisa, son of Cormac, son of Gillaisa O'Flanagan, were slain by the sons of Hugh Maguire, and by Muintir Manchain, at Port Achaidh Inver (in Fermanagh), on the ninth of the Kalends of September.

The sons of Philip Maguire, and the sons of Thomas Oge, made an attack on the sons of Hugh Maguire, at Miodhbolg (in Fermanagh, near the river Erne), and carried off great spoils

2. The town of O'Reilly was the town of Cavan, and the Saxon who had beheaded the earl of Desmond, above-mentioned, was John Tiptoft, earl of Worcester, of whom an account has been given in the foregoing note, and whose government in Ireland, according to all accounts, was conducted with great cruelty and rapacity.

on that occasion; and Bryan Maineach, son of Donogh, son of Hugh Maguire, was slain by them.

The sons of the same Philip made another attack on the sons of the forementioned Hugh, in pursuit of Owen, son of Hugh Maguire; and they slew Flaherty, his son, on that expedition.

Torlogh, son of Cathal Oge, son of Manus Maguire, died.

Teige of the Dark Eyes, son of Magrath Maguire, was killed by the sons of Hugh Maguire.

Margaret, daughter of Philip, son of the Giolla Duv Maguire, the wife of Mac Gillfinnen, i. e. Teige, son of Bryan, died.

The son of Savadge, i. e. Young Patrick, was taken prisoner by the family of White (both in the county of Down); and Patrick White assumed the lordship of Lecale by the aid of O'Neill, that is Henry, and of Mac Quillan; and they expelled all the Savadges from the territory.

O'Gara, i. e. Owen, son of Tomaltach Oge, son of Tomaltach More, lord of Coolavin (in Sligo), died between the two Lady Days in harvest, and his lawful son, Owen, died shortly afterwards of a sudden sickness; and Dermot, his other son, succeeded his father in the lordship.

Teige, son of Manus, son of John Mac Branan, lord of Corcachlan (in Roscommon), was treacherously slain by his own brother and his brother's sons, a week after the festival of St. Michael; and was succeeded by two chiefs, namely, Donal, son of Cormac, by whom he had been slain; and William, son of Hugh, who was the grandson of Hugh.

O'Flynn, lord of Siol Maolruain (in Roscommon), and his brother, were slain by Malachy O'Flynn, who afterwards assumed the chieftaincy.

Mac Dougall (of Antrim), i. e. Owen, son of Owen, was treacherously killed in his own house, by the sons of Mac Dougall.

Hugh, son of Anthony O'Hanley, and Teige, son of Murtogh, the grandson of Tomaltach O'Hanley, died, and Teige, son of Bryan, son of Tomaltach, assumed the chieftaincy.

Owen, son of Hugh Buighe Mac Geoghegan, tanist of Kinel Fiacha (in Westmeath), was killed by the Clan Colman (O'Melaghlin of Westmeath).

Richard, son of Thomas Burke, having resigned his lordship, Richard, son of Edmond Burke, was appointed his successor.

O'Donnell, i. e., Hugh Roe, along with the chiefs of Tirconnell, and all those of North Connaught, marched with a very great force, and did not halt until they arrived at the place of Mac William Burke, namely, Rickard, son of Edmond, who came with submission to O'Donnell; the resolution that those chiefs came to was, to march against Mac William of Clanrickard, namely, Ulick, son of Ulick of the Wine, to be revenged on him for his evil deeds, and for the victory previously gained at Crois-Moighe-Croind, by Mac William of Clanrickard, against Mac William Burke; and having agreed to that resolution, they proceeded into Clanrickard, where they first plundered and burned Machaire Riavach, and encamped for a night in the town of Clar, viz., the town of Mac William (in Galway), which they afterwards burned; and they continued for some time spoiling and plundering the country in every direction.

Mac William, i. e., Ulick, mustered all his forces, and invited the sons of O'Brien (of Thomond), to his aid, namely, the Giolla Duv, son of Teige, and Murtogh Garv, son of Teige, who brought to his assistance a great force of the chiefs of the Dalcassians. Mac William, with all those forces and his own, overtook O'Donnell, when departing from the country; the cavalry of Mac William, and of the O'Briens, made their first charge on the rear of O'Donnell's forces, at Ballinduff, but were courageously encountered by O'Donnell's cavalry, commanded by Eigneachan, son of Naghtan O'Donnell, who had charge of the rear of O'Donnell's forces, and who finally defeated the cavalry of Mac William, and of the O'Briens; and in this encounter Donal, son of O'Connor of Corcomroe (in Clare), with many others who are not recorded, were slain. Mac William and the O'Briens, having again collected their forces, and having marshalled them in regular array and order, they with one accord pursued O'Donnell's troops; but this proved of no advantage to them, for O'Donnell's men having turned on their cavalry at the river called Glanoge, they defeated them a second time; they there lost many men and horses, and much property, and the rest of them fled in a confused retreat; and this was called the battle of Glanoge.

A. D. 1470.

Philip, son of Thomas, son of Philip, son of Hugh Roc Maguire, heir to the lordship of Fermagh, the most distinguished chief's son for charity and humanity, and the best warrior in his time; and O'Flanagan, chief of Tura (in Fermagh), i. e., Cormac, son of Gillaisa, died.

O'Neill, i. e., Henry, son of Owen, marched with a great force into Claneboy (in Down and Antrim), to aid Mac Quillan in the Duv Thrian (the Black District), the son of O'Neill Buighe, and the forces of Claneboy, having gone to plunder Mac Quillan, were overtaken by O'Neill and Mac Quillan, and a battle ensued, in which the Claneboy were defeated; Hugh Oge, the son of Hugh Buighe (O'Neill), Mac Sweeney of the Wood, and John Roe Mac Sweeney, were taken prisoners; Art, the son of Donal Caol O'Neill, was made prisoner, and the castle of Sgathdeirge (Scatrick island, in Strangford lake, on which there is a castle), was taken by O'Neill on that expedition, and given in charge to Mac Quillan, to guard it.

Bryan, son of Teige Mac Donogh, lord of Ath-Cliath of Corran (Ballymote in Sligo), was killed by Teige, son of Bryan Mac Donogh, who deprived him of his castle and slew many of his people; and he also slew the son of Mac Donogh of the east in a skirmish on the same day.

Roderick Baeach, son of O'Neill, was killed by the sons of Art O'Neill, and the tribe of Henry Aimhreach (O'Neill); Henry and Bryan, sons of Art O'Neill, i. e., the O'Neill, and four of the tribe of Henry, were slain by Con, son of O'Neill, on the same day, in revenge of him (Roderick Baeach). O'Neill and his sons attacked the castle of the sons of Art, i. e., Caislean-na hOghmhaighe.¹

Owen O'Donnell, and the sons of Naghtan, went and leagued themselves with the sons of Art, against O'Neill.

John, son of Donal Ballach Maguire, was killed by Roderick, son of Bryan, son of Philip Maguire.

Donal and Donogh, sons of Owen, son of O'Connor Roc, were killed by Roderick, son of O'Connor Don, who also took prisoners, Con, son of Teige O'Connor, and Cathal, son of Felim Fionn.

Conla, the son of Hugh Buighe Mac Geoghegan, chief of Kinel Fiacha, was slain at Aehadh Buidhe, at the house of St. Bridget, of the town of Ath-an-urehair (Ardnorcher, in Westmeath), by the son of Art, the son of Con O'Melaghlin, and the Clan Colman, in revenge of the death of his father Art, who had been formerly slain by Mac Geoghegan.

The castle of Sligo was taken by O'Donnell, from Donal, the son of Owen O'Connor, after besieging it for a considerable time, and O'Donnell received his own terms of payment on that occasion, besides submission and tribute-tax from North Connaught; it was on this expedition he received the Leabhar Gearr² and Leabhar-na-Huidhri; also the chairs of Donal Oge, which had been carried westward in the time of John, son of Con, son of Hugh, son of Donal Oge O'Donnell.

O'Donnell and O'Rourke marched with their forces to Cruachain O'Cuprain³ to inaugurate O'Rourke; O'Reilly, with the English and the people of Tullaghonoho proceeded to oppose them to Bel-atha-Conaill, and Edmond, the son of Hugh

A. D. 1470.

1. Caislean-na-hOghmhaighe, that is, the castle of Omagh, in the county of Tyrone; Omagh, which is the name of a town and barony in Tyrone, is derived from the Irish Ogh, which signifies fair or beautiful, and Magh, a plain.

2. Leabhar Gearr and Leabhar-na-Huidhre. The Leabhar Gearr, or Short Book, was an Irish MS. of some note, but now lost; the Leabhar-na-Huidhre, still extant, is an ancient Irish MS. written on vellum, transcribed from an old record in the eleventh century by Maolmure, a learned scribe of the abbey of Clonmacnois. It is considered a very valuable work, and contains, amongst other interesting matters on Irish history and antiquities, a very curious account of the cemeteries and sepulchres of the Pagan kings of Ireland.

3. Cruachan O'Cuprain, now the hill of Croaghan near Killeshandra, in the county of Cavan. Bel-atha-Conaill, where O'Reilly collected his forces, is now called Ballyconnell, which got its name from the circumstance of the celebrated Conall Cearnach, or Conal the Victorious, who was chief of the Red Branch Knights of Ulster, about the commencement of the Christian era, having been slain there by the men of Brefney, who defeated his forces on his return from his expedition to Cruachan, the seat of the kings of Connaught, near Elphin, and after having plundered the palace of Cruachan, and killed Oilioll, king of Connaught, and while returning with his spoils, he was killed in a battle fought with the men of Brefney at the ford on the river at Ballyconnell, which was from that circumstance called Beal-atha-Conaill, signifying the Mouth of Conall's Ford; and it is supposed that he was buried on the hill now called Carn Hill, in the adjoining parish of Kildallon, and the great heap of stones or cairn there, erected over him as a sepulchre. It appears that O'Reilly's forces, joined by the people of Tullaghonoho, that is, the tribe of the Mac Tiarnans, or Mac Kernans, possessors of that barony, opposed the inauguration of O'Rourke, as prince of Brefney at Croaghan, not recognizing his right to that territory. The son of the bishop O'Gallagher, who was slain in this engagement on the side of O'Donnell, was, it appears, the son of Laurence O'Gallagher, bishop of Raphoe, who, according to Ware's Bishops by Harris, was punished for his incontinence, in A. D. 1463, before John Bole, archbishop of Armagh.

O'Reilly, and the son of the bishop O'Gallagher, were slain on either side, and many men and horses were wounded; O'Donnell and his forces were obliged to return, and prevented from proceeding to Cruachan on that occasion.

The Saxon lord justice,⁴ the remnant of the curse of the men of Ireland, by whom Thomas the earl had been beheaded, was quartered by command of the earl of Warwick and the duke of Clarence; and it was in revenge of the death of Thomas that he was treated so ignominiously, and the earl of Kildare was then appointed lord justice.

Felim Fionn O'Conor made peace with the tribe of O'Conor Roe, and with all others in general.

A Franciscan monastery was founded at Lis-laichtnin⁵ in Munster, in the diocese of Ardfert, by O'Conor Kerry, who had selected it for himself.

A. D. 1471.

A monastery was founded by the Franciscan friars at Gallbaile Eatharlach,¹ in the diocese of Emly, in Munster, and it was plundered the year following.

O'Conor of Corcomroe, namely, Conor, the son of Bryan Oge, was slain at Leithinsi (Lahinch, in the parish of Kilmanaheen, county of Clare), by the sons of his own brother, Donogh O'Conor.

Teige, the son of O'Conor Faily, i. e., Calvach, and of Margaret O'Carroll the hospitable, the conqueror of both English and Irish, died of the plague.

Teige Mac Dermott Roe, lord of Coillte Conchubhair (the woods of Conor, in Roscommon), died.

Hugh, son of Donal, son of Murtogh O'Conor, was slain by the forces of Richard Burke, who marched to his place at the instance of Roderick, the son of Bryan O'Conor.

Donal, son of Cormac, son of Manus Mac Bran-nan, was treacherously slain at Lis O'Dubhthaidh (in Roscommon), in opposition to the securities of the lords and chiefs of Siol Murray, by Con, the son of Teige Mac Bran-an, after he had previously made his submission to him; and Edmond, the son of Bryan, son of Manus, was slain along with him.

Dermot, son of Murtogh, son of Hugh O'Conor, was killed by Felim, the son of O'Conor Don.

Hugh, son of Torlogh, son of Roderick Mucaill O'Conor, was treacherously slain by the tribe of Owen, the son of Roderick.

Bryan, the son of Felim O'Reilly, made a hostile incursion into the country of Clankee (in the county of Cavan), to attack Fergal, the son of John O'Reilly, and sent the prey on before them; Fergal however overtook them, and a skirmish ensued, in which Cathal, son of Irial, the son of Felim O'Reilly, was slain, and Fergal was taken prisoner by the other party.

O'Donnell and the sons of Owen O'Conor committed immense depredations on the cattle of Carbury, and on the Mac Donoghs, south of Sligo.

Mac William Burke marched with a great force into North Connaught, to aid Roderick, the son of Bryan O'Conor, and he attacked the castle of Sligo; the sons of Owen O'Conor were at that time along with O'Donnell, and Donal, the son of Owen, entered the castle, but Mac William demolished the gate tower, after which they made peace.

The son of Thomas, the earl (of Desmond), was created earl, and was taken prisoner by the Mac Carthys.

Showers of hailstones fell in the month of May, accompanied with lightning and thunder, which destroyed the blossoms and fruit, and each stone measured from two to three inches, and they inflicted great wounds and sores on those who were struck by them.

O'Donnell marched with his forces into North Connaught, and laid waste by fire and sword that portion of Tireragh which belonged to Cosnamhach O'Dowd.

tine Franciscans, and of which some ruins still remain; the place derived its name from Lachtin, a saint of the seventh century, to whom the church was dedicated.

A. D. 1471.

1. Gallbhaile Eatharlach, that is, Galbally of Aherlow, now the parish of Galbally near the great glen of Aherlow, and the Galtee mountains, in Limerick, on the borders of Tipperary, where this monastery was endowed by the O'Briens of Thomond, and where extensive ruins of ancient churches still remain.

4. The Saxon Lord Justice was John Tiptoft, earl of Worcester, who had been lord deputy of Ireland, as mentioned in the note at p. 273, and who was beheaded after his return to England for his adherence to king Edward IV. against Henry VI., and also for his having put to death at Drogheda, as before stated, Thomas Fitzgerald, earl of Desmond, who is mentioned above as Thomas the earl.

5. Lios Laichtnin, now Lislaghtin, near the Shannon, in the county of Kerry, where this monastery was founded, either by Conor O'Conor or John O'Conor, princes of Kerry, for Observan-

The sons of O'Connor Faile carried off a prey from the Kinel Fiacha (in Westmeath), and slew Anthony, the son of Mac Geoghegan, together with the son of Niall, son of the Sionach (Fox, of Westmeath), and many others.

The castle of Omagh (in Tyrone), was taken by O'Neill, i. e. Henry, the son of Owen; and the manner in which it was taken was as follows:—a conflict having taken place between the sons of O'Neill and the sons of Art (O'Neill), in the beginning of winter, the sons of Art were defeated, and two of them, with many others, were slain, as we have before stated. O'Neill and his sons, having besieged the town, Sile, daughter of O'Donnell, i. e. of Niall Garv, the wife of Niall, the son of Art O'Neill, was in the castle with many others, and Niall himself and his kinsmen had gone to join O'Donnell, and the Connallians; O'Neill remained before the town from the beginning of harvest to the end of spring, when at length the sons of Art came to O'Neill and delivered up the castle to him, which he gave to his own son Con, and after that he returned home.

The entire of Trian Congail (Upper and Lower Claneboy, in the counties of Down and Antrim), was taken by Con, the son of Hugh Buighe (O'Neill), and the chiefs of the territory submitted to him, namely, the son of O'Neill, Mac Quillan, and Henry, the son of Bryan Ballach (O'Neill).

A great contest arose in Offaley, between O'Connor and Teige O'Connor; Teige having gone to the English, obtained a force from them, with which he marched into Offaley, and spoiled the entire country.

The earl of Kildare (Fitzgerald), and the English of Meath having marched with an army into Fearnmaigh (Farney, in Monaghan), committed great depredations on Mae Mahon; and Mae Mahon after that mustered the forces of his country, and committed great plunders, burnings, and slaughters on the English, in revenge for the plunders they had committed.

Roderick, son of Donogh, the son of Hugh Maguire, was slain by Colla, the son of Hugh Maguire, and his sons, at the house of Magrath, at Alt-Ruadhin, in Termon Dabeog;² Donogh Oge, the son of Donogh, the son of Hugh Maguire, pursued Colla, and slew him and his son on the following day in the same place, through the miracles of God and St. Dabeog.

O'Neill marched with a force into Tir Breasail (Clanbrassil, in Armagh), which he burned; and the sons of the chiefs of all Tireconnell, with the sons of Art O'Neill, overtook them, and O'Neill returned home from that expedition.

Maguire, i. e. Thomas Oge, the son of Thomas, resigned his lordship, after having spent the greater portion of his life-time in performing acts of charity, hospitality, and noble deeds; and he conferred the lordship on his son Edmond, appointed his second son tanist, and left his third son Rossa, in the bishopric of Clogher.

Murtoigh, the son of Owen O'Neill, died.

Hugh, son of Bryan, son of Philip of the Battleaxe Maguire, died on the 16th of the Kalends of March.

A. D. 1472.

Mahon, the son of Torlogh O'Brien, tanist of Thomond, died.

O'Kane, i. e. Roderick Ainsheascair, was treacherously slain by Mae Quillan, namely, Semus Cinearrach; Con, son of Hugh Buighe O'Neill, mustered his forces, and Geoffrey O'Kane, the brother of the same Roderick, having proceeded to the Routes (in Antrim), to take revenge on Mae Quillan, for the death of Roderick, a battle ensued, in which Geoffrey O'Kane, a man full of charity, hospitality, and nobleness, was slain by Roderick Mae Quillan, with the east of a dart. On the following day Con (O'Neill) made an attack on the people of the Routes, gave them a complete overthrow, and slew Mae Quillan himself, namely Cormac, after which Roderick was nominated the Mae Quillan, who made peace with Con, the son of Hugh Buighe, and both agreed to hold a conference with the O'Kanes; Mae Quillan having entered a small boat at the mouth of the Bann, to appear before O'Kane, a party of O'Kane's people

2. Termon Dabeog, signifying the sanctuary or church lands of Dabeog, and so called from St. Dabeog, who founded a monastery here in the sixth century, on the island in Lough Dearg, which became a celebrated place of pilgrimage; it is situated in the parish of Templeearne, which is in the diocese of Clogher, partly in the county of Fermanagh, and partly in Donegal, and the ancient church-lands were called Termon Magrath, from being possessed by the clan of the Magraths, as erenachs of those lands.

met him on his arrival at the landing place, and they slew and drowned him in the Bann.

Donogh, the son of Thomas Oge Mac Guire, was taken prisoner by his own brother Edmond, i.e. the Maguire, at his own town, and he exacted a great ransom for his release.

Mac Sweeny of Fanad, i. e., Mulmurry, and Donal, the son of Felim O'Dogherty, were slain in the battle of Tappadan (Tappaghan in Tyrone), by the sons of Naghtan O'Donnell, and O'Neill; his son, Roderick Mac Sweeny, succeeded him.

Bryan, son of Felim, son of Dunn, son of Cuchonacht Maguire, was slain by the sons of Shane Buighe Mac Mahon, and the Mac Donnells of Clan-kelly (in Fermanagh).

O'Driscoll More, i. e., Fingin, the son of Mac Con, son of Mac Con, son of Fingin, son of Donogh Gud, died at his own house, after having performed the pilgrimage of St. James (at Compostella in Spain), and his son Teige died penitently a month after his father's death, after having performed the same pilgrimage.

The sons of Mac Rannall, namely, Conor and Malachy, the two most distinguished chiefs' sons in Connaught for hospitality and nobleness in their time, were slain by the tribe of Malachy Mac Rannall, on the same day, three weeks before Christmas, after they had slain the son of Conmac, son of Soinin, and having put the entire country, as far as Slieve Cairpre (in Sligo), under their subjection, and gained victory in every contest until that day.

Eochy, the son of Conor Mac Dermott, died on the Friday before the festival of St. Bearraigh.

Murtogh, son of Tomaltach, son of Ivar O'Hanley, died.

Dermod, son of John, son of Malachy O'Ferrall, was slain by the sons of John, the son of Donal O'Ferrall.

Tomaltach, son of Conor Mac Dermott, was killed by the sons of Dermod, son of Roderick Mac Dermott, on Passion Sunday, at Bel-atha-Caisil-Bracain.

William, son of Teige Caoch, the son of William O'Kelly, was killed by the son of Teige, the son of Donogh O'Kelly.

O'Kelly made a great attack on Muine Liath (Monilea in Westmeath), but he was overtaken by the English of Westmeath, namely, the Tuites, Petits, Tyrrells, Darcys, and D'Altons; O'Kelly was defeated, Donogh O'Kelly with many others were made prisoners, and a number of their foot soldiers and kerns were slain.

An extraordinary animal (a camel or dromedary), was sent by the king of England to Ireland, of a form resembling a mare, of a yellow colour, having the hoofs of a cow, a long neck, a very large head, an ugly trailing tail, scarce of hair, having a saddle of its own (the hump); wheat and salt were its food, and it would draw a sliding car with the greatest burden by the tail, and go on its knees when entering a door, and in taking a rider on its back.

The young earl of Desmond was set at liberty by the Mac Carthys, and Gerald, the son of the earl, was expelled by him.

Maine Sionach (Fox), lord of Muinter Tadhgain (in Westmeath), was killed, and Teige, the son of Maine, succeeded in his place.

Ualgarg, the son of Cathal Ballach O'Rourke, was slain by the people of Owen, the son of Loughlin O'Rourke.

Mac William Burke marched with an army into Hy Maine, to aid Teige Caoch O'Kelly, and after gaining power over the Hy Manians, from the Suck westward, and taking hostages from them, great punishment was executed against them ultimately, for six-and-twenty soldiers, along with the grandson of Walter Burke, the sons of Mac Maurice, the sons of Mac Jordan, the son of Mac Auveely, and others, having fled from the forces, were taken, and all put to death by the Hy Manians, except alone Mac Jordan, who made his escape, though wounded, through his valour; Mac Willian returned home in sorrow.

Giolla Glas, son of O'Higgin, died in the harvest of this year.

A. D. 1473.

Donogh, son of Hugh, son of Philip Maguire, died at his own house, after having gained the victory over the world and the devil.

Art, the son of Donal Ballach Maguire, died, after the victory of extreme unction and repentance.

Cathal Riavach, the son of Dun Cathanach, son of Manus Maguire, and Roderick, the son of Art O'Neill, died.

Thomas, son of Maguire, i. e. Edmond, the son of Thomas, was treacherously slain by the sons of Cathal Maguire.

Ranal, son of Geoffrey Mac Rannall, heir to the chieftancy of Conmaiene (in Leitrim) died.

Murtogh, son of O'Conor Faily, was killed.

Edward (Nugent), the son of the baron of Delvin, was put to death in Dublin for his misdeeds.

Mac William Burke, i. e. Richard, died, having resigned his lordship sometime previously for the love of God.

Thomas Bermingham, lord of Athenry and of Conmaiene of Dunmore (in Galway), died, after having spent a good long life, and his son Thomas Oge succeeded him; but the son of Richard Bermingham was nominated in opposition to him.

Roderick, son of Hugh, son of Torlogh Oge O'Conor, king presumptive of Connaught, was slain by William, the son of Edmond Mac William (Burke), at Cill Bruigh of the town of Torlogh (in county of Mayo).

Edmond, son of Matthew, son of Cuchonacht O'Ferrall, died.

William Mac Rannall, the joint-chief of Muintir Eoluis, died.

Felim Mac Coghlan, heir to the lordship of Delvin, (in King's county), died.

Mulroona, the son of Fergal Mac Dermott, died.

Mulroona, son of Cathal, son of Tomaltach Mac Dermott, was killed by Cormac, the son of Roderick Mac Dermott, at Bealach-na-Hurbron.

Donogh, son of Fergal, son of Owen, son of Tiarnan More O'Rourke, was killed by his own kindred.

Conor, son of Dermod O'Conor Faily, died.

Edmond, son of Donal Buighe O'Ferrall, died.

A great commotion broke out in Muintir Eoluis (in Leitrim), and much destruction was committed both by burning and slaying; Mac Rannall made an attack on the town of Mac Seanlaoich (Mac Shanley), which he burned, and slew Donogh, son of Donogh Mac Shanley, with several others; the clan of Malachy having collected together on the Tulach, which they burned along with the town, were overtaken by Mac Rannall, Roderick Mac Donogh, the sons of Cormac Ballach, the son of Mac Donogh, Walter Mac Dougall (Mac Dowell), and Donogh the son of Torlogh Mac Dougall, and an engagement ensued between both parties at Doire Bally-na-Cairge (probably Carrigallen in Leitrim) in which the Clan of Malachy were defeated, and the following, namely, Fergal, son of Murrough Mac Rannall, a worthy lord of Conmaiene, Dermod, son of William Mac Rannall, Cathal, son of Anthony, son of Murrough, Bryan, son of Dermod Mac Rannall, Bryan Mac Shanley, Richard Mac Searaidh (Foley), together with many others, were slain.

O'Donnell marched with a force into North Connaught (in Sligo), and exacted tribute from O'Conor himself.

The son of Mac Donnell of Scotland, namely, Giollaespuc Mac Donnell, the son of John of Ile (Islay in the Hebrides), died.

O'Dwyer (of Ormond), i. e., Thomas, son of Conor, son of Thomas, was slain by the O'Kennedys.

O'Higgin, i. e., Gillananeev, the son of Roderick More, died.

Bryan, son of Robert Mac Egan, chief professor to O'Conor Don and to O'Hanley, died.

The town of Galway was burned on the second day of the month of June, being on a Friday, and much was destroyed there.

O'Ferrall, i. e. Irial, was blinded.

A. D. 1474.

The monastery of Donegal was founded by Hugh Roe, i. e., the O'Donnell, the son of Niall Gary, and his wife, Fiongualla, the daughter of O'Brien (of Thomond), namely, Conor-na-Srona, and was by them dedicated to God, and the friars of St. Francis, for the benefit of their souls, and for the purpose of forming a burying-place for themselves and their posterity; and that was not the only benefit they conferred on them (the Franciscans), but they gave them many other grants besides.

Nicholas (Nicholas Weston), the bishop of Derry, died.

O'Conor Faily, i. e. Con, the son of Calvach, died in the harvest, and his son Cahir was appointed his successor.

Mac Geoghegan, i. e. Peregrine, the son of Niall, lord of Kinel Fiacha, was killed by Hugh the son of Fergal Mac Geoghegan, and O'Conor Faily spoiled the country, demolished the castle of Ballynee (in Westmeath), and expelled the race of Fergal Roe.

Mac Mahon, i. e., Roderick Oge, died after having gained the victory over the devil and the world.

Don Roe, the son of Cuchonacht Maguire, was killed by the son of Richard Mac Caghwel.

Flaherty, son of Thomas Oge Maguire, died at his own house, after the victory of repentance.

Fergal, son of John O'Reilly, died.

O'Donnell committed great depredations on O'Neill's people, viz., on Hugh Ballach, the son of Donal.

A great contest arose between O'Neill, O'Donnell, and the O'Neills of Claneboy; O'Neill marched with his forces into Tirconnell, burned Tir Hugh, and returned home safe. O'Neill made an attack on the son of Hugh Buighe, and on the sons of Art O'Neill, in the north, and drove before him a great prey; the entire of the people of Trian Congaile overtook him, but O'Neill carried off the prey, and returned safe to his home.

A day was appointed for holding a conference by O'Conor Don, i. e., Felim, the son of Torlogh, and by O'Kelly, and having met at that conference, they disputed, and a battle ensued, in which O'Conor was defeated, he himself wounded, his son Owen Caoch taken prisoner, together with Torlogh Caoch Mac Sweeney; and Owen Caoch Mac Sweeney, and the son of Duv gall Gruama Mac Sweeney, were slain; the constable of Mac Donogh was taken prisoner, and all the galloglasses were either slain or taken prisoners; O'Conor afterwards died of his wounds, and two lords were nominated his successors, namely, Donogh Dubhshuileach (the Dark-Eyed), and Teige, the son of Owen O'Conor.

The son of O'Brien, i. e., Teige, the son of Conon, and Dermot, the son of the bishop O'Brien (of Killaloe), having encountered each other, on account of a dispute they had about land, Teige endeavoured to make Dermot prisoner, but Dermot gave Teige a stroke of his sword on the crown of the head, and let out his brains; but Teige's people having taken him prisoner, spared his life; Teige died on the spot, and Dermot was afterwards hanged by O'Brien for having killed his son.

The Gilla Duv O'Hara, i. e., the son of O'Hara, was killed by his brother Owen.

Teige O'Brien, lord of Arra (in Tipperary), died.

Laighneach, the son of Niall Mac Geoghegan, died.

Malachy, son of Hugh Mac Branan, and Edward Plunket, the best Englishman of the English of Meath, died.

Donogh, son of Murtoth, son of Hugh O'Connor, the last of the race of the Clan Murtoth Muinach (O'Conors), died at Tobar Oilbhe, in Moy Ai (in Roscommon).

John, son of Malachy O'Ferrall, and Dermot Gall, the son of Mac Dermott Gall, died.

Dermot, son of Conon, son of Geoffrey (O'Flanagan), chief of Clan Cathail (in Roscommon), died on the Friday before the festival of St. Michael.

Carbry, son of Hugh, son of Roderick, son of Bryan Ballach, was killed by the tribe of Teige O'Conor.

Giollaíonn Mac Egan, the chief professor (Brethon), to O'Conor Faily, and Thomas, the son of Donal O'Coffey, died.

O'Daly of Meath, i. e., Carbry, died.

John O'Ferrall assumed the chieftaincy of Annaly, conjointly with his brother, who was blind.

A. D. 1475.

Donogh, the son of Hugh Mac Sweeney, prior of Derry, died.

Hugh, son of Owen, son of Niall Oge O'Neill, a man full of hospitality, generosity, nobleness, and good actions, the prince presumptive of Tyrone, died at his own house, after the victory of extreme unction and repentance.

Hugh, son of Naghtan O'Donnell, was drowned in a boat, at the mouth of the Bann.

Conon, son of Bryan Mac Donogh, died in the month of January.

Donal, son of John O'Ferrall, was killed by the sons of Cathal, the son of William O'Ferrall, and they themselves were expelled among the English.

Murrough, the son of Owen O'Madden, lord of Siol Anmcha (in Galway), and Dermot, the son of Bryan O'Beirne, died.

John O'Ferrall, chief of Annaly, died at Granard, after having given his inauguration banquet before he received any of its benefit, and was buried in the monastery of Abbeylaragh.

Roderick, son of Rossa, son of Murtoth Midheach, the son of Bryan O'Ferrall, died, near the time he was about assuming the chieftaincy of Annaly, and Roderick, son of Cathal, the son of Thomas, was nominated chief, in opposition to the tribe of John, the son of Donal O'Ferrall.

Sionach (Fox) the chief of Muintir Tadhgain (in Westmeath), was killed by Murrogh, the son of Art O'Melaghlin.

Edmond, the son of Malachy O'Hanley, a worthy chief of the three districts (in Roscommon), died, four days after the festival of St. Michael, being on a Thursday.

A great contention arose between Mac Mahon, i. e. Redmond, the son of Roderick, and the sons of Hugh Roe Mac Mahon; the sons of Hugh Roe forcibly entered into Farney (in Monaghan), and an English force marched to meet and assist them. Mac Mahon entered Eoganaidh, from whence he proceeded into Farney, at which time the sons of Hugh put themselves under the protection of the English; and Mac Mahon, with his forces, made an attack upon the English; the sons of Hugh Roe, and the English of the plain of Oriel (in Louth), overtook and defeated him, and took himself, and Bryan, the son of Roderick Mac Mahon, prisoners, and many others of his people were either slain or taken prisoners on that occasion.

O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, the son of Niall Garv, made a circuitous march with his forces, and was accompanied by Maguire, O'Rourke, and the chiefs of North Connaught; they first proceeded to Beal-atha-Conaill (Ballyconnell, in county Cavan), to confer with Bryan, the son of Felim O'Reilly, who was a friend and ally to O'Donnell, and to make peace between O'Reilly and O'Rourke; O'Reilly came to O'Donnell at Ballyconnell, and O'Donnell concluded a peace between him and O'Rourke, and also for Bryan, the son of Felim; and Philip O'Reilly was delivered into the hands of O'Donnell as a security for loyalty to him, and for the fulfilment of their compact, together with his, (O'Donnell's) own demand; after that he (O'Donnell) proceeded to Feanagh of Moyrein (in Leitrim), where Mac Rannall waited on him, and from thence he marched into Annaly to aid the sons of Irial O'Ferrall, who were his friends, and he spoiled and burned the entire of Annaly, except that portion of it which belonged to the sons of Irial, whom he left in sway and power; he afterwards marched into Westmeath, burned the towns of Castle Delvin, and the surrounding country, and encamped for a night in Cuirene of Meath (Kilkenny West, in Westmeath); the Dillons and D'Altons came and submitted to him, and made peace with him; from that he proceeded into Offaley (King's county), at the request of O'Conor Faily, i. e. Cahir, son of Con, son of the Calvach, who was a kinsman of his, to take revenge for the death of his father, Niall Garv, on the English, and he remained for some time in Offaley, preying and plundering Meath in all directions; he demolished and burned Castle Carbury (in Kildare), and the town of Myler (Birmingham), and he also burned and plundered Tir Briuin and Fir-Tulach (Fertullagh in Westmeath), and received presents from the people of Mullingar, for sparing their town from plunder; after having spoiled the country in every direction, he afterwards marched to Coilte-an-Ruba (the Woods of Ruba), at the invitation of Colman O'Melaghlin, and commenced plundering Clan Coleman (in Westmeath), viz., the estate of O'Melaghlin; he burned the castle of Moy Tamhnach, and the castle of Moy Heille, and on that expedition O'Donnell gained the battle of Garbh Eisgreach against O'Melaghlin, with all his forces, and this was also called the Battle of Bealagh-nageorgad (Bally Corkey, near Mullingar), from the snares made of withes, which the people of that country used to cast about the necks of some of the soldiers, which they effected by the narrowness of that pass. On the same day O'Donnell gained the battle of Bally-Lough-Luath (Ballyloughloe, in Westmeath), in which the son of Mac Awley, with many others, fell; O'Donnell after this remained encamped for the night at that place, and on the next day he marched with his forces to the Shannon. The party of the O'Kellys who accompanied O'Donnell's forces collected all the boats they could find in the neighbourhood, by which O'Donnell and his men crossed the Shannon into Hy Maine, where he remained until his forces rested and recruited after their long campaign; after that he proceeded into Clanrickard (in Galway), Conmaicne Cuile, and into Clan Costello (both in Mayo), and returned through the plain of Connaught to his own country, after having received his tribute, and gaining victory and sway in every place through which he marched.

Hugh, son of Owen, son of Cathal O'Conor; William, son of Teige O'Kelly; Hoberd, son of Roderick, son of Rossa O'Ferrall; and the baron of Delvin, died.

The two sons of Art O'Melaghlin were killed by Colman, the son of Art O'Melaghlin.

Caislean-an-Chalaidh (or the castle of the Port), was taken by Mac William of Clanrickard, and was given by him to the son of Malachy O'Kelly, his own daughter's son.

Cormac O'Curneen (of Leitrim), chief professor of Ireland in literature, died.

Gillananeev, the son of Malachy O'Higgin, died.

Felim, the grandson of O'Neill, and the son of Savadge (of the county of Down), were taken prisoners by Con, the son of Hugh Buighe (O'Neill), but the son of Savadge made his escape from him afterwards.

A. D. 1476.

The bishop Mac Gauran (bishop of Ardagh), died and was succeeded by John the son of Bryan.

Geoffrey, the son of Siacus, prior of the monastery of Deirg, died.

Anthony, grandson of Cathal O'Connor, the light of Ireland in wisdom, and head master in the arts, died.

Maguire, i. e. Teige, son of Edmond, son of Thomas, was treacherously killed by his brother Roderick.

Donagh, son of Thomas, son of Thomas, son of Philip Maguire, heir to the lordship of Fermanagh, a man distinguished for his benevolence, hospitality and nobleness, died after the victory of repentance.

Tuathal, the son of O'Neill, was killed by the English of the plain of Oriel.

Teige Oge, son of Teige, son of Tiarnan O'Rourke, tanist of Brefney, died.

Hugh, the son of O'Kelly, i. e. William, was killed by his own brother Teige, at Athlone.

O'Hara Riavach of the West, i. e. William, died.

Teige, son of Owen, the son of Roderick O'Connor, was treacherously slain by three of his own people, namely, the son of Roderick Roe, son of Owen, son of Cathal, and Cahir, the son of Mac-anabadh O'Connor, and the son of Donogh O'Teige, and they took the castle of Roscommon, but it was immediately after retaken from them.

Edina, daughter of Donal, son of Murtogh, the wife of O'Conor Don, died.

Dearvorgail, daughter of Felim Fionn O'Conor, the wife of O'Conor Don, died.

Bryan, son of Fergal Roe O'Higgin, the chief of his own tribe, and chief professor of the schools of Ireland and Scotland in poetry, died on Maunday Thursday, and was buried at Athleathan (in Mayo).

Donal Riavach, the son of Gerald Cavanagh, lord of Leinster, died.

O'Neill made an attack on Oriel, and the sons of Mac Mahon, i. e. the sons of Redmond and Bryan, the son of Roderick, and all the Orgiallians from Eoghanach inwards, fled westward into Machaire Tulcha; O'Neill carried off preys and booty from the same plain, and from the borders of Brefney, and returned with victory and triumph.

O'Neill marched with a great force against the son of Hugh Buighe O'Neill, attacked the castle of Bealfeste (Belfast), which he took and demolished, and afterwards returned home.

John, son of O'Hanlon, was killed by his brother.

Mac William Burke marched with a great force into the lower part of Connaught, and O'Donnell marched with another force to oppose him; O'Donnell proceeded as far as Cuil Cnamha, and Mac William as far as Coillte Luighne (near Ballysadare); Mac Dermott came to the aid of Mac William and Mac Donogh to assist O'Donnell; O'Donnell marched across Fearsaid-na-Fionntragh (the ford of the white strand near Ballysadare), and lost some of his horses and people going into Carbury; Mac William pursued him across, and both parties remained for some time in view of each other, until at last they made peace, and divided North Connaught into two portions between them, viz. O'Dowd's country, and Lieney, and the half of Carbury was allotted to Mac William, and the other half to O'Donnell.

A great army of the English of Meath marched into Magh Breaghmaine (Brawney in Westmeath), and they demolished Rath Riabhach,¹ plundered the chief residence, burned the monastery of Sruthair, destroyed the crops and corn of the country, and departed without making peace.

Mac Rannall entered Brawney and destroyed all

A. D. 1476.

1. Raith Riabhach, now Rathreagh, a parish in Longford, adjoining the river Inney, on the borders of Westmeath. Sruthra, above-mentioned, is Abbeyshrule in the county of Longford.

the corn which remained unspoiled by the English forces.

A great war arose between the English of Meath and of Leinster, in which the son of John, son of Mac Thomas (Fitzgerald), was slain; his three brothers, the son of Art, son of Con O'Mclaghlin, and the son of Maurice, son of Mac Pierce, were taken prisoners by O'Conor Faily.

11. Moy-Liffey and Bregia.—In this article is continued from p. 273, the history and topography of the ancient territories which now form the counties of Dublin and Kildare, together with an account of the kings and principal chiefs of Meath, a subject which has been partly but not sufficiently explained at p. 5, in the note on Meath. At p. 266, in the note on Bregia, the printer has omitted three words, which the reader will please to correct, and instead of "Bregia was the name applied to the immense plain comprising the present counties of Meath and Dublin," read, "Bregia was the name applied to the immense plain comprising the greater part of the present counties of Meath and Dublin."

The monarchs of Ireland and Kings of Meath.—Meath was for many ages the seat of the Irish monarchy, the chief royal residence being at Teamhair or Tara, hence called Teamhair-na-Ríogh, or Tara of the Kings, being the chief seat of the Ard-Rígh, that is, the high king or monarch who presided over the five provincial kings and kingdoms of Meath, Ulster, Connaught, Leinster and Munster, forming the Irish Pentarchy. It appears from the old historians, that the Firbolg, Tuath de Danan, and Milesian kings resided chiefly at Tara, and the monarchs also had royal seats at Tailtean, now Teltown, between Navan and Kells, near the river Blackwater, and at Tlachtgha, now supposed to be the Hill of Ward, between Trim and Athboy, in Meath, and at the Hill of Uisneach, a few miles from Mullingar, in Westmeath; Tlachtgha and Uisneach were likewise two of the chief seats of Druidism in Ireland.

The Pagan Kings.—The Irish historians reckon one hundred and thirty-six Pagan kings, who were supreme monarchs of Ireland from the earliest ages to the middle of the fifth century, and of these kings nine were of the Firbolg race, and nine of the Tuath de Danan, and the remaining one hundred and eighteen monarchs were Milesians from Heremon to Dathi. The Milesian colony from Spain, of whom accounts have been given in various other notes, having arrived in Ireland about one thousand years before the Christian era, according to our ancient annalists, conquered the Danans in a great battle at Tailtean, in Meath, and became masters of Ireland. The posterity of the three sons of Milesius were divided into three great branches, namely, the Heremonians or race of Heremon, the Heberians or descendants of Heber, and the Irians or posterity of Ir.

The Heremonians became the most powerful race, and ruled as kings over Meath and Leinster, and many of them also over Ulster, Connaught, and Munster, and sixty of the Heremonians were supreme monarchs of Ireland; all these were of the Heremonians of Meath and Leinster, with the exception of four, who were of the Heremonians of Ulster, and three who were of the Clanna Deagha, or Heremonians of Munster.

The Heberians or race of Heber, chiefly ruled as kings of Munster, and twenty-nine of them became monarchs of Ireland.

The Irians, who were also called Clanna Ruadhraidhe or Clanna Rory, anglicised Rudricinns, and were so named from Rudhraidhe Mor, or Rory the Great, one of that race who was king of Ulster, and monarch of Ireland about one hundred and fifty years before the Christian era, ruled as kings of Ulster, and twenty-four of them were monarchs of Ireland, together with one supreme queen of that race called Macha Mongruaidh, or Macha of the Red Tresses, so designated from the colour of her hair; her reign is placed about four centuries before the Christian era, and it is remarkable that she was the only supreme queen that ever reigned in Ireland. The Irians ruled as kings of Ulster for more than a thousand years but were deprived of the sovereignty of that province in the fourth and fifth centuries, by the Heremonians of the race of Clan Colla and Ily Niall, as explained in the notes on Orgiall and Tir Eogain.

The Ithians or race of Ith, called Clanna Breogain, who may be considered as a branch of the Milesians, and of whom accounts have been given in the notes on Thomond, Desmond, and Hy Kin- sellagh, were, many of them, kings of Munster, and three of them were monarchs of Ireland.

Firbolg Kings.—In the second century, one of the monarchs who usurped the throne, namely, Cairbre Ceancait, was of Firbolg descent; but since the Milesian conquest, no other Firbolg was monarch of Ireland, but some of them were kings of Leinster, and they were for many centuries kings of Connaught, and they continued to rule over that province down to the third century.

Christian Kings.—Laoghaire, son of Niall of the Nine Hostages, who became monarch of Ireland about the middle of the fifth century, is considered the first Christian king, and was at least cotemporary with St. Patrick, though it is doubted if he was converted to Christianity. From the middle of the fifth to the latter end of the twelfth century, fifty-five Milesian monarchs ruled over Ireland; they were mostly all Heremonians, and forty-eight were of the Ily Niall race. The race of Ily Niall took their name from their ancestor, the celebrated Niall of the Hostages, of the race of Heremon, and monarch of Ireland in the latter end of the fourth and beginning of the fifth century. The Ily Niall were divided into two great branches, namely, the Northern and Southern. The Northern Ily Niall were also divided into two branches, namely, the O'Neills, princes of Tyrone and kings of Ulster, and the O'Donnells, princes of Tírconnell or Donegal, as explained in the notes on Tir Eogain, Tir Conaill, and Meath. The Northern Ily Niall were the kings and chief rulers of Ulster, and many of them became monarchs of Ireland, namely, sixteen of the race of the O'Neills called Kinel Eogain or Eugenians, as descendants of Eogan, one of the sons of Niall of the Hostages; and nine of the race of the O'Donnells, called Kinel Conaill or Conallians, as descendants of Conall Gulban, another of the sons of Niall of the Hostages. The Southern Ily Niall, called also Clan Colman, from Colman, one of their princes, a descendant of Niall of the Hostages, and of whom an account has been given in the note on Meath, were kings of Meath for many centuries, and twenty-three of them became monarchs of Ireland. The Southern Ily Niall or Clan Colman, took the name of O'Melaghlin from Mnolscaehlain or Malachy I., king of Meath and monarch of Ireland in the ninth century. The race of Ily Niall furnished altogether forty-eight monarchs, and they exclusively reigned over Ireland for a period of about six hundred years, namely, from the fifth to the eleventh century, when Malachy II., monarch of Ireland, was deposed A. D. 1002, by Brian Boroinhe, king of Munster, head of the Dalcassians of the race of Heber, who became monarch of Ireland. In the eleventh century, three of the O'Briens, descendants of Brian Boru, were kings of Leath Mogha, or Leinster and Munster, and generally acknowledged as titular monarchs of Ireland, namely, Donogh O'Brien, the son of Brian Boru, Torlogh O'Brien, his grandson, and Murtogh O'Brien, the son of Torlogh, who died in the beginning of the twelfth century, A. D. 1118. Diarmaid Mae Maol-na-mbo, a celebrated king of Leinster, of the Cahirian race, or Heremonians of Leinster, was from his great power also acknowledged as titular monarch of Ireland for many years, in the eleventh century, and died A. D. 1072.

In the twelfth century Donal Mac Loghlin O'Neill and Murtogh Mac Loghlin O'Neill, two powerful princes of the northern Ily Niall race, were generally acknowledged as kings of Leath Cuimn, and monarchs of Ireland. In the twelfth century also, Torlogh O'Conor, and his son Roderick, kings of Connaught, of the Ily Briane race, or Heremonians of Connaught, became monarchs of Ireland; and Roderick O'Conor, the last Milesian monarch of Ireland, having abdicated the throne in A. D. 1184, in consequence of the English invasion, died A. D. 1198, in the 82nd year of his age, at the monastery of Cong, in Mayo, and was buried in the cathedral of St. Kieran, at Cloumacnois.

Cormac's Palace at Tara.—An account of the palace of the celebrated Cormac, monarch of Ireland in the third century, is

A.D. 1477.

ERALD, the son of the earl of Desmond, was slain and eighteen of the Geraldines were put to death after that.

Bryan, son of Maurice Mac Dermott, was killed by his own tribe.

Ailbe, the daughter of Hugh Maguire, who gave herself and her property a year before her death to God and the monastery of Lisgoole, died.

Hugh, son of Donogh, son of Thomas Maguire, and Bryan, the son of Conor Oge Maguire, died.

Roderick, son of Edmond Maguire, was treacherously killed by Cuchonacht, the son of Redmond Riavach, son of Don, son of Cuchonacht Maguire.

Don, son of Owen, son of Hugh Maguire, was killed by Donogh Oge, son of Donogh, the son of Hugh.

Matthew O'Leinnin, erenach of Ardes (in the county of Down), a learned historian, died.

Dissensions and strife arose between O'Donnell and the sons of Naghtan O'Donnell, and Niall, the son of Donal O'Donnell, and Felim, the son of Torlogh O'Donnell, were killed by the sons of Naghtan on that occasion, and much damage was done among them; O'Neill marched with his forces into Tir Hugh, at the invitation of the sons of Naghtan, and having plundered and burned Tir Hugh, he returned home victoriously.

Cormac, the grandson of Donogh, son of Mac given by various historians. It was called Teach Míodhchuarta, signifying either the House of Banquets or the House of Conventions; also Teach-na-Laech, which meant the House of the Heroes, and it was the place in which were held the great Féis Teamhrach or Conventions of Tara, hereafter described, and in its halls the monarchs gave their great banquets, and entertained the provincial kings, princes, and chiefs. It is stated that the length of the structure was 300 feet, the breadth 50 cubits or about 80 feet, and the height 30 cubits or nearly 50 feet; it contained numerous apartments besides the royal bed chamber, and had on it 14 doors; and it is stated that there were seven other great habitations adjoining the palace. Cormac was the son of Art, son of Con of the Hundred Battles, monarchs of Ireland, of the race of Heremon, and he was one of the most celebrated of the Irish kings for munificence, learning, wisdom, and valour; and the glories of his palace at Tara were, for many ages, the theme of the Irish bards. Amongst other splendid articles it is mentioned that he had at the royal banquets 150 massive goblets of pure gold. Cormac's palace was situated on the Hill of Tara, and a great part of the circular earthen ramparts, together with a large mound in the centre, still remain. The palace is considered to have been built chiefly of wood from the oak forests, in ancient times so abundant in Ireland, and was probably in part formed of stone-work, or a fortress of cyclopean architecture, composed of great stones without cement, and though few of those stones now remain, they may have been removed in the course of ages, and placed in other buildings, particularly as the hill of Tara was easily accessible, and though this royal residence could not be compared with the elegant stone buildings of more modern times, yet it was distinguished for all the rude magnificence peculiar to those early ages. On the Hill of Tara were also erected several other raths or fortresses and mounds, as mentioned by various ancient historians, amongst others Cathair Crofinn, that is, the fortress, city, or seat of Crofinn, so called from Crofinn, one of the Tuath De Danan queens, and this building was also named Tur-Trean-Teamhrach, signifying the Strong Tower of Tara, and as the term Cathair was applied only to stone buildings, this was probably a fortress of Cyclopean architecture, the stones of which may have been removed in the course of time; and the Danans are stated by the old writers to have built fortresses in other parts of Ireland, particularly that called Aileach Neid in Tyrconnell, situated on a great hill near Lough Swilly, in Donegal; and of this Cyclopean fortress some ruins still remain. At Tara was also the building called Mur-

Ollamham, or the house of the learned, in which resided the bards, brehons, and other learned men; and likewise Rath-na-Seanadh, which signifies either the Fort of the Conventions or of the Synods, and said to be so called from great meetings held there at different times by St. Patrick, St. Adamnan, St. Brendan, and St. Ruadban; also Rath-na-Riogh, or the Fortress of the Kings, Dumha-na-nGiall, or the Mound of the Hostages, where there was a fortress in which the hostages were kept, and Dumha-na-mBan-amus, signifying the Mound of the Warlike Women, which was probably either a habitation or burial place of those ancient heroines; there was likewise a habitation called Cluan Feart, or the Sacred Retreat, which was the residence of the vestal virgins or Druidesses, according to Dr. O'Connor and others. At Tara were also habitations for the warriors, Druids, Brehons, and bards, and also for the provincial kings, princes, and chiefs who attended at the great national conventions, and therefore the place was considered as a city in those ancient times. There are many remains of the mounds, raths, and other antiquities, still remaining at Tara, but many of those mounds and ramparts have been levelled in the course of ages. According to the ancient historians, many of the kings, queens, and warriors of the early ages were buried at Tara, and several sepulchral mounds were raised there to their memory. In one of the earthen ramparts at Tara were discovered, in the year 1810, two of the ornaments called torques, a sort of golden collar of spiral or twisted workmanship, and of a circular form, open at one side, worn on the necks of ancient kings and chiefs, and similar to those which were worn by the ancient kings and chiefs of Gaul, and were called torc in the Celtic language. One of the torques discovered at Tara is five feet seven inches in length, and something more than twenty-seven ounces in weight, and all formed of the purest gold; the other torque is beyond twelve ounces in weight, and they form some of the most interesting remains of ancient Irish art.

Tara had various names in ancient times. It was first founded as a royal residence by Slainge, one of the Firbolg kings, and was afterwards called Liath Druim, or the Hill of Liath; the Tuath De Danan kings afterwards resided there, and it was, as above mentioned, called Cathair Crofinn, or the Fortress of Crofinn, from one of the Danan queens; by the Milesian kings it got the name Teamur, or Teamhair, anglicised Temor and Tara, and Latinised Temora or Temoria. In the celebrated work called Dinseanchus, which gives an account of the origin of the names

Carthy Riavach (in Desmond), was taken prisoner by Cormac, son of Teige, son of Cormac, the grandson of Dermot Ravar, of Muskerry, and by the sons of Dermot-an-Dunaidh, i. e. his uncle's of remarkable places in ancient Ireland, and was composed by Amergin, chief bard to Dermot, monarch of Ireland, in the sixth century, the origin of the name of Teamur is thus given:—Tephi or Teph, a daughter of Bachtir, king of Spain, having been married to Canthon, king of Britain, died there, but her body was brought back to Spain, and a mur or mound was erected to her memory, and called Tephi-mur, or the Mound of Teph. Tea, daughter of Lughaidh, son of Ith, and queen of Heremon, the first Milesian monarch of Ireland, having seen the mound of Teph while in Spain, she caused a similar mound to be constructed when she came to Ireland, as a sepulchral monument for herself; and, being hurried there, it was called Tea-mur, signifying Tea's mound, and hence was derived the name of Tara. In after times it was called Teamhair na Riogh, Rath Cormaic, that is, Tara of the Kings, the Fortress of Cormac. It is also mentioned by old writers under the names of Druim Aiobhin and Tulach Aiobhin, signifying the beautiful or delightful hill. An account of raths has been given in the first part of this article, and the term Lios has also been explained, both of which names were applied to the circular earthen ramparts of ancient fortresses. The names Dun and Dinn were also applied to ancient fortresses, and the term Dun it appears was applied to earthen ramparts and also to stone fortresses, as, for instance, the great stone fortress, of Cyclopean architecture, called Dun Aonguis, situated on the Island of Arran, off the coast of Galway, of which an account has been given in the note on South Connaught. The names of a vast number of places in Ireland commence with Rath, Lis, and Dun, which shews the great number of those fortresses in ancient times. The term Aileach or Oileach, derived from Ail, a rock or stone, was also applied to stone fortresses, as, for instance, Aileach in Donegal, a Cyclopean fortress, and residence of the ancient kings of Ulster. Caisiol and Caislean were the names applied in more modern times to stone fortresses and castles. An account of the ancient names, and of other curious matters connected with Tara, is given in a poem from the ancient Irish composition called Dinseanchus, which has been copied from the Books of Leacan and Ballymote. This poem was composed by the above-mentioned Amergin, chief bard to Dermot, monarch of Ireland, in the sixth century, from information communicated to him by an old sage called Fintan. The following verses are a literal translation of this poem:—

"Temor of Bregia, whence so called,
Relate to me, O learned sages?
When was it distinguished from the Brugh?
When was the place called Temor?"

"Was it in the time of Partholan of battles?
Or at the first arrival of Ceasair?
Or in the time of Nemed famed for valour?
Or with Cioical of the bent knees?"

"Was it with the Firbolg of great achievements?
Or with the race of fairy elves?
Tell me in which of those invasions
Did the place obtain the name of Temor?"

"O Tuan! O generous Finnladh!
O Bran! O active Cu-alladh!
O Dubhan! ye venerable five,
Whence was acquired the name of Temor?"

"Once it was a beauteous hazel wood,
In the time of the famed son of Olean,
Until that dense wood was felled
By Liath, the son of Laighne, the large and blooming.

"From thence it was called the Hill of Liath,
And it was fertile in crops of corn,
Until the coming of Cain the prosperous,
The son of Fiacha Ceannfionan.

"From thenceforth it was called Druim Cain.
This hill, where the great assembled,
Until the coming of Crofinn the fair,
Daughter of the far-famed Alloid.

"The fortress of Crofinn, well applied
Was its name among the Tuath De Danan,
Until the coming of the agreeable Tea,
The wife of Heremon of noble aspect.

"A rampart was raised around her house
For Tea, the daughter of Lughaidh,
She was buried outside in her mound;
And from her it was named Teamur.

"The seat of the kings it was called,
The princes, descendants of the Milesians.
Five names it had ere that time,
That is, from Fordruin to Temor.

"I am Fintan, the bard,
The historian of many tribes;
In latter times I have passed my days
At the earthen fort above Temor."

The following poem on Tara, literally translated from the Irish, was composed by Cuan O'Loelhaín, a celebrated bard who died in the beginning of the eleventh century, A.D. 1024. He was the chief bard and historian of Ireland in his time, and for his great abilities and virtues was appointed during an interregnum Regent of Ireland:—

"It gave great happiness to the women
When Temor the strong was erected,
And the daughter of Lughaidh obtained
A hill on the plain, deserved by a lover.

"The dowry which the wife of Geide requested
Of her husband, as I have learned,
Was a delightful fortress for noble dwellers,
Which she soon with skill selected.

"A dwelling, which was a stronghold and fortress;
The best of mounds, which could not be demolished;
Where after her death was Tea's monument,
Which event perpetuated her fame.

"The gentle Heremon here maintained
His lady, secured in the fortress;
And she received from him all favours she desired,
And all his promises to her he fulfilled.

"Bregia of Tea was a delightful abode;
It is recorded as a place of renown,
And contains the grave of the great Mergech,
A sepulchre which was not violated.

"The daughter of Pharaoh of many champions,
Tephi, the most beautiful that traversed the plain,
Here formed a fortress circular and strong,
Which she described with her breast-pin and wand.

"She gave a name to her fair fortress,
This royal lady of agreeable aspect;
The fortress of Teph, where met the assembly,
Where every proceeding was conducted with propriety.

"It may be related without reserve
That a mound was raised over Teph as recorded,
And she lies beneath this unequalled tomb,
Which mighty queens had formed there.

"The length and breadth of the tomb of Teph,
Accurately measured by the sages,
Was sixty feet of exact measure,
As prophets and Druids have related.

sons; and a commotion arose over all Munster through that death, and the southern half was

"Spain, the powerful, has heard
Of the mild, fair, and comely daughter
Of Cino Bachtir, son of Buirrech,
Whom Canthon, the mild hero, married.

"Tephi was her name; she excelled all virgins,
And unhappy for him who should entomb her.
Sixty feet of correct admeasurement
Were marked as a sepulchre to enshrine her.

"The mourning king of Brigantia ceased not his efforts,
Though they defeated the intentions of Canthon,
Until she should be restored to her native place
By the far-famed king of the Britons.

"The mournful death of Tephi, who had come to the north,
Was not for a moment concealed.
Canthon launched his ship with speed
On the waves of the rough briny waters.

"The idol-god of Canthon was not concealed.
Etherun, in whom they placed their faith,
And the host of the bright blue eyes,
Had been pledged for the restoration of the mighty Tephi.

"The chief of Britain hailed them from the shore,
That he was there for the idol Etherun,
And that a meeting should be held to select a sepulchre
In the south, as a tomb for the beloved Tephi.

"It was in that place, according to arrangement,
They nobly constructed the first model
For that of Temor, of unrivalled form
And of delightful and elegant aspect.

"The term Temor is applied to every eminence
On which stands a well-fortified residence,
And to every hill of a level summit;
And it exceeds all places except Emania.

"It was the habitation of great chiefs and warriors,
Who often engaged in fierce contests.
Temor, the impregnable, of lasting resources,
Which conferred on the women high renown."

It appears from the foregoing poem that Tephi, therein mentioned, daughter of Cino Bachtir, king of Brigantia in Spain, was married to Canthon, king of Britain, and as a guarantee that her body should be restored for burial in Spain, the chief idol of the Britons, called Etherun or Taran, was left as a pledge with the king of Spain; and Canthon, king of Britain, having restored the body of Tephi, she was buried in a sepulchral mound, from which was taken the model of queen Tea's tomb, called Tea-Mur, from which was derived the name of Temor or Tara.

Cuan O'Lochan, in another of his poems, contained in the Book of Ballymote, gives a long description of Tara, from which the following few passages have been translated:—

"Temor, the most beautiful of hills,
Under which Erin is warlike.
The chief city of Cormac, the son of Art,
Son of valiant Con of the Hundred Battles.

"Cormac in worth excelled,
Was a warrior, poet, and sage;
A true Brehon, of the Fenian men
He was a good friend and companion.

"Cormac conquered in fifty battles,
And compiled the Psalter of Tara.
In that Psalter is contained
The full substance of history."

completely spoiled between both English and Irish.

After an account of the monarchs, the provincial kings, and their territories, the poem proceeds thus—

"In each province there are Seven score of chief fortresses.
It is known that Cormac, the king,
Thrice made a visitation of Erin.

"He brought the hostages of every fortress,
Which he exhibited at Temor;
And the Mound of the Hostages, of pure hands,
Cormac on those hostages conferred.

"Let us likewise mention the House of the Heroes,
Which was called the Bark of the Vain Women.
A strong fortress was the House of the Heroes,
Which was entered by fourteen doors.

"Between the fortress and The Heroes' Well,
To the east of the road, is The Stone of the Fenians;
Contiguous to the Rath of the Conventions,
The Rath of the Synods of great victories.

"In this rath was held the Synod of Patrick,
And the Synods of Brendan and of Ruadan,
And afterwards the Synod of Adamnan.

"South of the Rath of the Kings remain
The Rath of Laoghlaire, and his fort,
And his monument in the middle of the fort.

"There is also the house of Muirisc the famous,
Who was the prime beauty of Erin.
The house is near the well of Neamhnach.
From this habitation over Meath
Extend the houses of Temor.

"Temor, from which is named Temor of Bregia,
Was the mound of Tea, wife of the son of Milesius.
Neamhnach, to the east, pours its stream into the glen,
On which the first mill was erected by Cormac.

"Between the cairns of the two youths
Is Desies of Temor, south of Crinna;
And north of the great hill
Is the Rath of Colman, the brown-haired Damnonian."

Kineth O'Hartigan, a celebrated bard of the tenth century, also wrote a poem on Tara, contained in the Book of Ballymote, from which have been translated the following passages:—

"O, world of deceitful beauty,
The agreeable drinking feast of a hundred heroes;
False are its attractions, numerous to mention,
Except the adoration of the King of all.

"Every law recorded has passed away,
Every right under the sun has been destroyed,
And Temor to-day though a wilderness,
Was once the meeting place of heroes.

"Fair was its many-sided tower,
Where assembled heroes famed in story;
Many were the tribes to which it was inheritance,
Though to-day but a green grassy land.

"It was a famous fortress of wisdom;
It was ennobled with warlike chiefs;
To be viewed it was a splendid hill,
During the time of Cormac O'Cuinn.

The son of Anthony O'Moore was killed at Ballydaithi (Ballydavy near Maryboro, Queen's county), by the son of Pierce Butler, and by Art O'Conor.

"When Cormac was in his grandeur,
Brilliant and conspicuous was his course;
No fortress was found equal to Temor,
It was the secret of the road of life.

"Strong was the power of hosts
Of that king who obtained Temor;
It is better for us to record the many tribes
And the numerous families of his household.

"Nine ramparts or rough strong trenches,
With nine surrounding mounds,
With groves of fair trees,
And it was a strong and famous fortress.

"His great house of a thousand heroes,
With tribes it was delightful,
A fair bright fortress of fine men;
Three hundred feet was its measure.

"Its circuit was well arranged,
Nor was it narrow by a faulty construction,
Nor too small for separate apartments,
Six times five cubits was its height.

"A fit habitation for a king of Erin,
In which was distributed sparkling wine;
It was a fortress, a rampart, and a stronghold;
In it were three times fifty couches.

"There were in it fifty warriors with swords,
Who were the guards of this fortress,
Which truly was a noble residence,
And there were two couches in each apartment.

"Grand was the host which attended there,
And their weapons were glittering with gold;
There were three times fifty splendid apartments,
And each apartment held fifty persons.

"Seven cubits of exact measure,
Were the dimensions of the fire-place,
Before which the active attendants
Lighted up the brilliant lamps.

"There were seven splendid chandeliers of brass,
Of bright and beautiful appearance.
In that fair and sunny palace
Of feasts and ornamental goblets.

"Pleasingly brilliant was its light,
And twice seven in number were its doors.
It was a law ordained by the king,
That he should first drink to his guests.

"And very great were his guests in number,
Three hundred partook of each festive drinking;
Fifty were noble and learned lawgivers
In company with the exalted upright prince.

"Fifty were festive pleasing companions,
With fifty great and famous heroes,
And fifty warriors standing around,
To attend as guards on the warlike king.

"Three hundred cup-bearers handed around
Three times fifty splendid goblets,
To each of the numerous parties there,
Which cups were of gold or silver all

"Ornamented with pure and precious stones.
Thirty hundred were entertained
By the son of Art on each day

"Enlightened was his train of hards,
Who kept their records in careful order,
And what they said was respected by the professors in each art.

"The household of the hosts let us enumerate,
Who were in the house of Temor of the tribes,
This is the exact enumeration,
Fifty above a thousand of warriors.

"When Cormac resided at Temor,
His fame was heard by all the exalted,
And a king like the son of Art Aenfear,
There came not of the men of the world."

Tara Deserted.—The Hill of Tara is large, verdant, level at the top, and extremely beautiful; and, though not very high, commands extensive and most magnificent prospects over the great and fertile plains of Meath. Tara became deserted as a royal residence in the sixth century, and, as already observed, some earthen ramparts and mounds are all that now remain of its ancient magnificence. The circumstances which caused its abandonment by the kings were as follows:—Dermot, monarch of Ireland, who was called Mac Carroll, having taken prisoner and punished a brother or relative of St. Ruadhan, who was abbot of Lothra, now Lorrha, in the county of Tipperary, St. Ruadhan laid a curse on Tara; and after the death of the monarch Dermot, in A.D. 565, no other king resided at Tara; and this circumstance is mentioned by one of the ancient bards in some verses, from which the following passage has been translated:—

"From the reign of the brown-haired Dermot,
Son of Fergus, son of Carroll,
From the judgment of Ruadhan on his house,
There was no king at Temor."

Though several of the kings were afterwards styled kings of Tara, they did not reside there, but took their title from it, as the ancient residence of the monarchs. In subsequent times some of the monarchs, it appears, resided at Tailtean; and it is mentioned that Flann Sionna, monarch of Ireland, died at Tailtean, A.D. 916. Some of the ancient monarchs resided at the palace of Cruachan, in Connaught; and some of the kings of Ulster, when monarchs, resided at Emania, now Armagh. The kings of Ulster of the Hy Niall race, when monarchs of Ireland, had their chief residence at the fortress of Aileach, in Donegal: and Brian Boru, when monarch of Ireland, resided at his palace of Kincora, in Thomond, on the banks of the Shannon, near Killaloe, in the county of Clare. The southern Hy Niall race, who were kings of Meath, had their chief residence, called Dun-na-Sciath, signifying the fortress of the shields, on the banks of Lough Ainnin, now Lough Ennell, near Mullingar, in Westmeath, where Malachy II., monarch of Ireland, died, A.D. 1022; and the kings of Meath also had a fortress where they resided, situated on a high hill, about a mile from Castlepollard, and within about two miles of the Ben or Great Hill of Fore. This fortress was very strong, with a rock on one side, and the rest composed of earthen ramparts; and it is called by the common people Dun-Dorgais or Dun-Torgais, which signifies the fortress of Torgis or Turgisius, as that celebrated Danish king is traditionally said to have had his chief residence there.

Cemeteries of the Pagan Kings.—An account of the great cemetery of the Pagan kings at Cruachan, in Connaught, near Elphin, has been given in the note on South Connaught, and an account of sepulchral mounds, the burial places of kings and warriors in the Pagan times, will be found in the first part of the note on Moy Liffey and Bregia. There were two great cemeteries in Meath, one at Tailtean, and the other at Brugh-na-Boine; the latter place signifying the town or fortress of the Boyne, is supposed by some to have been situated near Trim, and by others near the place now called Stackallen, between Navan and Slane.

A great wind happened on the night of the festival of St. John the Baptist, in this year, which destroyed an immense deal of stone and wooden buildings, of Cranoges (fortresses on lakes), and corn stacks.

The Tuath De Danan kings and queens were buried chiefly at Cruachan in Connaught, and at Brugh-na-Boine, but some of them also at Tailtean; and the Firbolg kings and queens were buried, some of them at Cruachan, some at Brugh, and some at Tailtean. The Milesian kings and queens in the Pagan times, were also buried in those three great cemeteries, and, according to Dorban, an ancient poet of Connaught, there were fifty sepulchral mounds at each of the royal cemeteries of Cruachan, Tailtean, and Brugh, in each of which mounds were buried fifty kings, queens, warriors, and bards. Cormac, monarch of Ireland, is considered to have become a convert to the Christian faith, and he gave directions that he should not be buried at Brugh-na-Boine with the Pagan kings, but at Ros-na-riogh, with his face turned towards the rising sun or the east, in reference to the birth-place of Christ; this place is now known as Rosnaree, between Drogheda and Slane, in Meath. Amongst the celebrated persons buried at Tara were the monarch Laoghlaire, in the fifth century, who gave directions that his body should be placed upright in the sepulchral mound, with his spear in his hand, and his face turned towards the south, as in defiance of his enemies the people of Leinster; and the head of the celebrated hero Cuchulain, chief of the Redbranch knights of Ulster, was buried at Tara, and a sepulchral mound raised to his memory.

The Stone of Destiny.—When the Tuath De Danan colony came to Ireland, they brought with them, according to our ancient writers, a remarkable stone called Lia-Fail, signifying the Stone of Fate or of Destiny, and from this circumstance Ireland obtained the name Inis Fail, or the Island of Destiny. This stone was also called Cloch-na-Cineadhna, or the Stone of Fate. The Lia Fail was held in the highest veneration, and sitting on it the ancient monarchs of Ireland, both in the Pagan and Christian times, were for many ages inaugurated at Tara, and it is stated that whenever a legitimate king of the Milesian race was inaugurated, the stone emitted a peculiar sound, an effect produced, it is supposed, by some contrivance of the Druids. In Dr. O'Connor's account of the Irish MSS. at Stowe, it is stated that the Lia Fail was at a remote period removed from the royal Rath at Tara, to the residence of the kings at Cruachan in Connaught, but ceased to emit its usual sound called Ges, which signifies a spell or charm, from the time it was profaned by Cuchulain, who resented its silence when his friend Fiacha Fionn was appointed monarch of Ireland in the beginning of the first century, and the stone did not resume its accustomed sound until the inauguration of Con of the Hundred Battles, in the second century, he being a legitimate monarch. In the beginning of the sixth century Fergus Mac Earca, who was brother to the then reigning monarch of Ireland, Murtogh Mac Earca, having become king of the Irish colonies, settled in Dalriada in Albany, afterwards called Scotland, requested the Irish monarch to send over the Lia Fail to be used at his inauguration, in order to give security to his throne, in accordance with the old traditions; but O'Flaherty, in his Ogygia, is of opinion, that the Stone of Destiny was not brought to Albany or Scotland until the ninth century, when Aodh Finliath, monarch of Ireland, sent it to his father-in-law Kenneth Mac Alpin, who was crowned king of Scotland. The Stone of Destiny is mentioned by Hector Bœtius, and other Scottish historians, and the following Irish verse respecting it is quoted by Keating and Charles O'Connor:—

"Cineadh Seuit, saor an fhine,
Mun budh breag an fhaidsine,
Mar a fhuighid an Liagh Fail
Dlighid faitheas do ghabhail."

thus rendered into Latin by Hector Bœtius:—

"Ni fallat fatum, Scoti, quocunque locatum, Invenit lapidem hunc, regnare tenentur ibidem."

thus translated:—

"If fate's decrees be not announced in vain,
Where e'er this stone is found the Scots shall reign."

This stone was considered by the Scots as the palladium of their kingdom from an ancient prophecy that the Scotie or Milesian race would continue to rule as long as it was in their possession, and it was preserved with great care for many centuries in Scotland, first in the monastery of St. Columkille, at Iona in the Hebrides, afterwards at Dunstaffnage in Argyleshire, the first royal seat of the Scottish kings of Irish race, and it was removed from thence in the ninth century by Kenneth Mac Alpin, king of Scotland, and conqueror of the Picts, who placed it at Scone, near Perth, where it was preserved in the ancient abbey until the year 1296, when Edward I., king of England, having overran Scotland, took away the Stone of Destiny from the cathedral of Scone, carried it off as a trophy of victory, and placed it under the coronation chair in Westminster Abbey, where it still remains. It is sometimes called by English writers Jacob's Stone, from some tradition that it is part of the stone called Jacob's Pillow at Bethel, as mentioned in the Book of Genesis, hence some have considered that it was first brought to Ireland by the Danais from the land of Canaan. It has been asserted in some modern publications on Irish antiquities, that the large stone standing upright on one of the mounds at Tara is the Stone of Destiny, but this assertion is altogether improbable, and opposed to the statements of Keating, O'Flaherty, Ware, Dr. O'Connor, Charles O'Connor, and all other learned Irish antiquarians, together with the accounts of the Scottish historians, and it is probable that the huge stone standing on the mound at Tara, which is six feet above the ground, as well as many feet under it, and of immense weight, is the stone mentioned by many of the old Irish writers under the name of Lia-na-bh-Fian, that is the Stone of the Fians or Fenians, as connected with the accounts of some of the Fenian warriors.

The Conventions of Tara.—The great conventions or legislative assemblies of Tara were instituted by the celebrated Ollamh Fodhla, a king whose reign is placed by our annalists and chronologists about seven centuries before the Christian era. This Ollamh Fodhla was of the Irian race, and was king of Ulster, and monarch of Ireland; and his name, pronounced Ollav Fola, signifies the Sage of Ireland, derived from Ollamh, a sage or learned man, and Fodhla, which was one of the ancient names of Ireland. Ollav Fola is celebrated in ancient history as a sage and legislator, eminent for learning, wisdom, and excellent institutions; and his historic fame has been recognised by placing his medallion in bas-relievo with those of Moses, and other great legislators, on the interior of the dome in the Four Courts of Dublin. The convention of Tara, called Feis Teamrach, from Feis, which signifies a convention or assembly, was ordained by Ollav Fola to be held every third year in the royal residence at Tara, and was attended by the provincial kings, princes, and chiefs—the Druids or Pagan priests, the Brehons or judges, and the bards in the Pagan times; and, after the introduction of Christianity, by the bishops, abbots, and superior clergy; and great numbers of the people also attended at those assemblies, which were held every third year, in the month of November. The ancient records and chronicles of the kingdom were ordered to be written and carefully preserved at Tara by Ollav Fola, and these formed the basis of the ancient history of Ireland, called the Psalter of Tara, which was brought to complete accuracy in the reign of the monarch Cormac, in the third century; and from the Psalter of Tara, and other records, was compiled, in the latter end of the ninth century, by Cormac Mac Cullenan, archbishop of Cashel and king of Munster, the celebrated work called the Psalter of Cashel, of which a full account will be found at page 204, in the note on Ormond. The monarch Cormac, of whom an account has been already given, was celebrated as a legislator; and at the conventions held in his palace at Tara, the provincial kings are stated to have sat in the following order—the monarch himself sitting on a throne in the middle of the assembly hall, the king of Ulster sitting on his right hand, the kings of the two Munsters on his left, the king of Leinster in front, and the king of Connaught behind the throne; the

A.D. 1478.

O'Higgin, bishop of Mayo of the Saxons, died.
Thomas Duv O'Carbry, vicar of Aghalurcher
(in Fermanagh), a man of wisdom and piety, died.

The earl of Kildare died, and his son Gerald succeeded him.

Richard, son of Edmond, son of Richard Butler, was killed by Fingin Roe (Mac Gillpatrick) of the Ossorians, the son of Fingin, in the door of the church of Kilkenny. Cormac, the son of Donogh Mac Carthy, was blinded by his kinsmen, after being imprisoned by them for some time.

Donogh, son of Bryan Ballach O'Connor, and Torlogh, son of Torlogh Roc O'Connor, died.

The Gilla Duv, son of Bryan, son of Felim
O'Reilly, died.

Thomas, son of Pierce Butler, was killed.

Thomas O'Concannon, lord of Hy Diarmada (in Roscommon), was killed by his own nephew.

A great plague was imported by a ship which entered the port of Ballyshannon, and this pestilence spread through Fermanagh, Tirconnell, and throughout the province (of Ulster) in general;

Mac Ward, i. e. Geoffrey of Tireconnell, died of it, and it did much destruction throughout the entire province.

Mac Rithbeartaigh (Mac Raverty), i. e. Ciothruadh, chief poet to Maguire (of Fermanagh); Teige Fionn O'Luinin, a learned physician and historian; O'Breslein, i. e. Teige, the son of Owen, chief Brehon to Maguire; and O'Coffey, i. e. Mur-togh Bacach, died.

Young Hugh Mac Mahon and his household made an attack upon Bryan, the son of Redmond Mac Mahon, and they committed great depredations on him, and took Bryan himself prisoner, while in pursuit of his plundered property.

Malachy, son of Hugh Buighe Mac Geoghegan, lord of Kinel Fiacha, was killed while asleep by two of his own people, at the castle of Leathratha princes, chiefs, Druids, Brehons, and bards, arranged in due order. These triennial legislative assemblies at Tara, which were the parliaments of ancient Ireland, were held there for many centuries, and continued down to about the middle of the sixth century, the last convention of the states at Tara, according to the annals of Tigernach, being held, A.D. 560, in the reign of the monarch Dermot Mac Caroll. Conventions of the states or legislative assemblies were also held at the Hill of Uisneach (situated a few miles from Mullingar, in Westmeath), which was a celebrated seat of Druidism. These assemblies were convened in the month of May, and, after the abandonment of Tara, this was probably one of the chief places for legislative meetings; and it may be remarked, that a great synod or national convention of bishops, clergy, chiefs, and people, was held at Uisneach, or Fiodh Mac Aengasa, A.D. 1111, according to the Annals of the Four Masters, which was attended by Celsus, archbishop of Armagh, and Maolmuire O'Danain, archbishop of Cashel, together with fifty other bishops, three hundred priests, and three thousand persons of the clerical order, and also by Murtogh O'Brien, king of Munster, and various princes and chiefs from different parts of the kingdom, to make laws and regulations both for clergy and people. In the year 1152, a great national synod or council was convened at Cennanus, or Kells, in Meath, at which presided Cardinal John Paparo, as legate of Pope Eugene III., having been sent to Ireland to confer the pallium on the four archbishops of Ireland; and this synod was attended by the archbishops, bishops, abbots, and other clergy of Ireland, in great numbers. Great conventions or legislative assemblies, similar to those at Tara, were held in ancient times in the other provinces. The states of Connaught assembled at Crachan, near Elphin; the states of Ulster at Emania, or Armagh; the states of Leinster at Naas, in Kildare; and the states of Munster at Cashel. The last great national convention mentioned in Irish history was that of the states of Leath Cuinn, or Meath, Ulster and Connaught, convened at Athboy, in Meath, A.D. 1167, by king Roderick O'Connor, to make laws and regulations for the church and state; at which assembly, according to the Annals of the Four Masters and other authorities, there attended a vast number of the princes, chiefs, clergy, and people of Ulster, Connaught, and Meath, together with the Danes of Dublin, who were then under subjection to king Roderick. Amongst the clergy who attended were Gelasius, archbishop of Armagh, Cadhla O'Daif, archbishop of Taam, and Laarence O'Toole, archbishop of Dublin or Leinster, together with great numbers of other bishops, abbots, and clergy. In the whole assembly there were thirteen thousand horsemen, namely, six thousand Connaughtmen, under the O'Conors, Mac Dermotts, O'Kellys, O'Dowds, and other princes and chiefs; four thousand of the men of Brefuey, now the counties of Cavan and Leitrim, with Tiernan O'Roarke, prince of West Brefuey or Leitrim, and O'Reilly, prince of East Brefuey or Cavan; four thousand men with Donogh O'Carroll, prince of Orgiall, from Loath, Monaghan, and Armagh, and with Mac Dunslevy O'Heochy, prince of Ulidia, in the counties of Down and Antrim; two thousand men with Dermot O'Melaghlin, king of Meath; and one thousand with Reginald, lord of the Danes of Dublin; Donogh, the son of Felan, a prince whose territory is not mentioned, brought two thousand men. It does not appear that those powerful northern princes, O'Neill and O'Donnell, who ruled over Tyrone, Derry, and Donegal, attended this assembly; and they probably did not acknowledge the authority of king Roderick O'Connor, actuated by that refractory spirit which so generally prevailed amongst the Irish princes.

The Assemblies of Tailtean, called Aonach Tailtean, from Aonach, which signifies a large assembly or fair, were held on the plains of Tailtean, now Teltown, situated along the river Blackwater, between Navan and Kells, in Meath. Tailtean got its name from Tailte, daughter of Maghmuir, king of Spain, and wife of Eochy, the last Firbolg king. Tailte was buried at this place, and Lughaidh, surnamed Lamhfada, or the Long-handed, one of the Tuath De Danan kings, having been in his youth fostered and educated by Tailte, he, in honour to the memory of that queen, instituted the assemblies at Tailtean, which were held annually at the beginning of Autumn, and were continued for fifteen days; and it is said that from this Lughaidh, the First of August, or Lammas, is in the Irish called La Lughnasa to the present time. The assemblies of Tailtean were attended by vast numbers from all parts of Ireland, and are said to have resembled the Olympic games of Greece, in the practice of various athletic exercises, feats of strength and activity, such as running, leaping, wrestling, throwing the stone, bar, &c., foot-ball, dancing, together with horse and chariot racing; and those assemblies were also remarkable for the arrangement of matrimonial alliances, or match-making, and the ratification of marriage contracts. A remarkable occurrence at the assembly of Tailtean, in the ninth century, is Abbeylaragh, in Longford), and they were burned (for their crime.

Edmond, son of Conor Mac Rannall, died.

William, son of John O'Ferrall, was killed with a blow of a pole by one of his own people.

A great plague raged throughout Ireland, of which the baron of Delvin (Nugent), and Maurice Airig, died.

Fachtna O'Ferrall was killed by the son of Edmond, son of Hoberd D'Alton.

Art, son of Colman O'Melaghlin, and Mac Gauran, i. e. Cathal, the son of Donogh Ballagh, died.

The son of Fergal O'Gara, and Manus Mac David, were killed by the tribe of Roderick Mac Dermott.

Edmond, son of Teige, son of Loghlin O'Hanley, was killed by his own tribe.

The castle of Sligo was taken by Mac William Burke from the guards of O'Donnell, and he gave it to the son of Bryan O'Conor; Mac William Burke afterwards entered Moylurg, and spoiled the portion of it which belonged to Roderick Mac Dermott; Roderick proceeded to Croaghan to take revenge for those acts on Conor Mac Dermott, who was then the Mac Dermott, and an ally to Mac William, and he then besieged the Rock (of Loughkea), and he received a mechanical war-engine, which was sent to him from Fermanagh, and by the cast of a dart from it the only son of Mac Dermott was slain. The Rock was taken through the means of that shot, and Roderick assumed the lordship of all Moylurg, and expelled Conor.

An awful commotion arose throughout the plain of Connaught, between Felim Fionn (O'Conor), and O'Conor Don on the one side, and the sons of Teige O'Conor, the sons of Felim, and the sons of Conor Roe on the other; the entire plain, both churches and country, was completely spoiled mentioned in the Four Masters as having taken place in A.D. 806, namely, that in consequence of the violation of some of the Temon or church lands of the monastery of Tallaght, near Dublin, by the Hy Niall kings of Meath, the monks of Tallaght seized on the chariot horses of Aodh Oirdnidhe, monarch of Ireland, at the celebration of the games of Tailtean, and retained the horses until ample reparation was made to the monastery, and its lands restored, together with additional grants made by the king. These assemblies were held for many ages, but were frequently interrupted during the disastrous period of the Danish wars; they were renewed at intervals by various kings, and some of them are mentioned as late as the twelfth century; and it is stated that, in July A.D. 1126, the great assembly of Tailtean was revived, after it had been discontinued for a century; but it appears that the meetings of Tailtean were entirely discontinued after the English invasion.

The Fortress of Fionn Mac Cumhaill at Allen.—An account of the celebrated hero, Fionn, the son of Cumhall, commander of the Fenian warriors in the third century, has been given at page 267, in the note on Moy Liffey, and he had his chief residence or fortress at Ahnluin, now the Hill of Allen, in Kildare, and this fortress appears to have been of great extent, and surrounded with many other habitations, as the residence of the Fenian troops under his command; and the place is highly celebrated in the Ossianic poems, and other productions of the ancient bards; and from one of these, called Buille Oisin, the following passage has been translated:—

"When I banquetted in the halls of Finn,
At each banquet there have I seen
A thousand costly goblets at the board,
And bound on their rims with golden wreaths.

"Twelve great habitations were there,
Filled with the mighty battalions
Commanded by the son of the daughter of Teige,
At fair Allen of the noble Fenians.

"Twelve constant fires flamed
In each of the princely habitations,
And sitting around by each of those fires
Were an hundred of the Fenian heroes."

The destruction of the fortress of Ahnluin, which it appears was burned in the third century by a champion named Garaidh, son of Morna, who was chief of the Firholg or Damnonian warriors of Connaught, forms the subject of one of the Ossianic poems, from which have been literally translated the following passages:—

"Mournful art thou to me, O ruined pile!
Thou monument that records a great disaster.
Deep beneath thee are heroes entombed;
Their sad fate I well remember.

"Mournful is thy destruction to me,
Thou memorable pile of exalted appearance.
The Clanna Morna are laid low in their monuments;
They were the heroes of combats, this is one of their mounds.

"In the fortress were consumed the steeds of Finn,
And his two highly-ornamented chariots;
And great was the loss of his noble mansion
To Finn of the Fenians, the king of Allen.

"In it were consumed an hundred strong shields,
And an hundred pieces of armour of incomparable value;
Two hundred coats of mail and two hundred swords,
Two hundred breast-plates and two hundred helmets.

"One hundred war-steeds were consumed in the fortress,
Together with the steeds of our chief commander,
With their fair and brilliant coverings,
And their polished and gilded bridles.

"Three hundred hunting hounds were consumed,
Which were deemed to be an excessive loss;
The beautiful hounds of Finn, the son of Cumhal,
By Garaidh the Rough, within this fortress.

"Three hundred treasure-chests were consumed,
Which contained much of silver and gold;
And also, it is stated with truth,
Three hundred goblets and three hundred cups."

The note on Moy Liffey and Bregia will be concluded in the next number.

between them, and Torlugh Roe, the son of Roderick, son of Felim O'Connor, a worthy prince, was slain in that contest.

Teige, son of Dermod Roe O'Connor, was treacherously killed by the tribe of Bryan Ballach.

An awful wind occurred on Christmas night which proved a destructive night to many, from the number of persons and cattle that perished, and the trees and buildings (and ships) that were destroyed both by land and water throughout Ireland.

A. D. 1479.

The monastery of Meelick, (in Galway) was founded by O'Madden, on the banks of the Shannon, in the diocese of Clonfert, for Franciscan friars, in which he selected his own burial place.

Pierce, son of Nicholas O'Flanagan, who was a

A. D. 1479.

1. The Culdees.—The name Culdee, in Irish Ceile De, is derived from Ceile, a servant, and De of God, and therefore signified a servant of God, or holy man. By the Latin writers they were called Colidei, Culdei, and Kelidei, and sometimes Deicole. The Colidei or Culdees are mentioned by Candrensis and various other ancient writers, and by several Scotch historians they are mentioned as monks in Scotland as early as the fourth and fifth centuries; but the statements of John of Fordun, Hector Boetius, and others, are entirely contradicted by the learned Lanigan; Smith, in his Life of St. Columbkille, and Jamieson, in his history of the Culdees, have maintained that they were Columbian monks, or members of that order instituted by St. Columbkille, at Iona, in the Hebrides, and also in various parts of Ireland; and they have represented these Culdees as a very strict and religious order in those early times, from the sixth to the twelfth century; but Lanigan shows that these statements are erroneous, and that the Culdees were not mentioned by the venerable Bede, or any other ancient ecclesiastical writer, as Columbian monks, nor in the works of Osher or Ware, or in the five Lives of Columbkille published by Colgan. Lanigan considers that the Culdees were first instituted in Ireland in the eighth or ninth century; and Aongus, surnamed Ceile De, a celebrated Irish ecclesiastical writer of the eighth century, author of Lives of Irish Saints, &c., is supposed to have been a Culdee. The Culdees are mentioned in the Annals of the Four Masters, and of Ulster, at A. D. 920, in which it is recorded that Godfrey, king of the Danes of Dublin, plundered Armagh, but he spared the churches and Colidei. It appears from Lanigan and other authorities, that the Culdees were not, strictly speaking, monks, neither were they members of the parochial clergy, but were a description of secular priests called secular canons, and attached to cathedrals or collegiate churches, called prebendaries; and although bound by rules peculiar to themselves, they belonged to the secular clergy, and are to be distinguished from the canons regular, or communities of monks who sprung up at a much later period, and officiated in the chapters of cathedral churches. The Culdees officiated as secular clergymen in the cathedrals, sang in the choir, lived in community, and had a superior called prior of the Culdees, who acted as precentor, or chief chanter. The principal institution of the Culdees was at Armagh, and according to Osher and others, there were Culdees in all the chief churches of Ulster, and some of them continued at Armagh down to the middle of the seventeenth century. The Culdees had priories and lands in various parts of Ireland, particularly at Devenish Island, in Fermanagh, canon of the chapter of Clogher, a parson and a prior of the Ceile De (Culdees),¹ a sacristan of Devinish, and an official of Lough Erne (vicar-general of Clogher), a man distinguished for his benevolence, piety, great hospitality, and humanity, died after having gained the victory over the world and the devil.

A great contest arose between the Tirconnellians and Tyronians, for the sons of Art O'Neill went into Tirconnell to war against O'Neill, and much damage was committed between them.

O'Neill made a hostile incursion into Tirconnell, and carried away great booty from the sons of Art and from the Connallians on that expedition.

Bryan, son of Felim O'Neill, was taken prisoner by O'Neill, but he afterwards set him at liberty on receiving a great ransom for him, and on getting his two sons as hostages in his place, and Bryan joined O'Donnell again to war against O'Neill.

and at Clones, in Monaghan, both in the diocese of Clogher; also at Ardbraccem, in Meath; and Girddus Cambrensis gives an account of the Colidei who lived on an island in a lake in North Munster, which island was called by the Irish Inis-in-mbeo, or the Island of the Living, from a tradition that no person ever died on it; it was afterwards called Mona Incha, and was situated about three miles from Roscrea, in the bog of Moncla, in Tipperary. In the time of Cambrensis, this island was a celebrated place of pilgrimage, and their residence was afterwards removed to Corbilly, a place near the lake, where the Culdees became canons regular of St. Augustine. Though the Irish Culdees were generally clergymen, yet some pious unmarried laymen joined their communities. There were also Culdees in Britain, particularly in the north of England, in the city of York, where they had a great establishment called the Hospital of St. Leonard, and were secular canons of St. Peter's cathedral, as mentioned in Dugdale's Monasticon, and got some grants of lands in A. D. 936, in the reign of Athelstan, and continued at York at least down to the time of Pope Adrian IV., who confirmed them in their possessions. In Wales there were Culdees, as mentioned by Cambrensis, in the Island of Bardsey, off that coast. In Scotland, the Culdees were more celebrated than in Ireland, had numerous establishments, and continued there from the ninth century to the reformation; and according to Chalmers, in his Calcdoun, the Culdees of Scotland are not mentioned in history till about the commencement of the ninth century, in the year 800 or 815, and their first establishment was at Dunkeld, under the bishop of that see, and they were afterwards placed about A. D. 850, at St. Andrew's, where they had their chief establishment for many centuries; and it is stated by Buchanan, that Constantine III., king of Scotland, who died in 943, spent the last five years of his life in religious retirement amongst the Culdees of that city. Chalmers states, that before the introduction of the canons regular at St. Andrew's, in the twelfth century, the Culdees alone acted as secular canons in cathedrals, and as dean and chapter in the election of bishops, and that thenceforth both orders were joined in that right, until A. D. 1272, when it was usurped by the canons regular; and he also says, that the Culdees of Brechin continued for many ages to act as dean and chapter of that diocese; and according to Jamieson, the Culdees of St. Andrew's elected the bishops of that see down to the election of William Wishart, in 1271, when the power was abrogated, but in those early times it appears that the bishops of many sees in Scotland were of the order of Culdees.

A. D. 1480.

Maguire, i. e. Thomas Oge, son of Thomas More, son of Philip, son of Hugh Roe, the most distinguished in his time for alms-doing, piety, and hospitality, a man who defended his territory against invading foes, a founder of monasteries and churches, and a donor of chalices, a man who was at Rome, and twice visited the city of St. James (of Compostella in Spain), on his pilgrimage, died, and was interred in the monastery of Cavan, having selected that as his burying place.

The son of Manus Maguire, i. e. Cathal Oge, son of Cathal More, son of Gillpatrick, son of Manus, a worthy landed proprietor, died after the victory of extreme unction and repentance.

Manus Roe O'Donnell was killed by the sons of Felim Riavach O'Donnell.

O'Neill entered Tirconnell in a hostile manner, and burned and did much damage there.

O'Donnell made a hostile incursion into Tyrone, and was accompanied by the sons of Art O'Neill and the sons of Felim O'Neill; he committed great depredations on Mac Caghwell, in Kinel Fireadaidh, and they slew Bryan, son of Torlogh Roe, the son of Henry O'Neill, and James, the son of Mac Caghwell. O'Neill, with his sons, happened to be at the time in their neighbourhood, and they and Mac Caghwell pursued the prey, and slew Owen, the son of Art O'Neill, who was along with O'Donnell, and was a distinguished commander; O'Donnell, however, carried away the spoils, and returned home victoriously with great booty.

Owen O'Donnell, i. e. the son of Niall Garv, was slain by the sons of Naghtan O'Donnell at Cluain Laogh (in Donegal), on the 29th of September, and Owen Caoch, the son of Manus O'Connor, was slain along with him, and the son of Torlogh Carrach O'Connor was taken prisoner on the same occasion.

Roderick, son of Roderick, son of Naghtan O'Donnell, was killed by the sons of Niall O'Donnell.

O'Donnell held a conference with the sons of Naghtan, and with Con O'Neill respectively, at Castlefin (in Donegal), and they made peace with each other, and the tanistship of Tirconnell was conferred on Eignachan O'Donnell.

Redmond Riavach, the son of Dun, son of Cuchonacht Maguire, and Mac Gillfinnen, i. e. Teige, the son of Bryan, a chief who kept the best house of hospitality in his neighbourhood, died.

O'Heodhasa (O'Hosey), i. e. Aongus, son of John, a learned poet, and Fergal Mac Keogh, another good poet, died.

Cormac, the grandson of Art Maguire of Coole, and Philip Riavach, the son of Awlave Maguire, died.

Art, son of Roderick Mac Mahon, was slain in the rere of a prey which he carried off by night in the Fews (in Armagh), in the territory of Culadh, the son of Hugh O'Neill.

A contest arose between the sons of Hugh Roe Mac Mahon, and the sons of Redmond Mac Mahon, and great depredations were committed on the sons of Redmond, and the preys were sent into Brefney O'Reilly.

A fierce engagement was fought between the sons of Edmond Burke, and the sons of Rickard Burke, in which the sons of Edmond were defeated, and Colla, the son of Mac Dugald of Scotland, was slain there by the cast of a dart, together with many others at the same time.

John Mac Gillfinnen (of Fermanagh), the son of Bryan, and thirteen of the party of the sons of Bryan, son of Philip Maguire, were slain at Ballach-ui-Mithidhain (Ballaghameehan in Rossinver, county of Leitrim), by the sons of O'Rourke, namely, Tiarnan and Bryan Roe, the sons of Tiarnan, son of Teige, the son of Tiarnan.

The English forces marched into Tyrone with Con O'Neill, to take the castle of John Buighe O'Neill; the English of Meath were commanded by the earl of Kildare, the king of England's deputy in Ireland, and John Buighe himself was in the castle, and he kept and maintained the castle despite of the forces, who were obliged to return, and John Buighe afterwards made peace with O'Neill.

A. D. 1481.

Bryan, the son of Felim O'Reilly, a patron of learned men, who entertained all travellers, and who kept a house of general hospitality, died.

Torlogh, son of Philip, son of Thomas Maguire, was treacherously killed on the 5th of October, in his own castle, by Donogh Oge, son of Donogh, the son of Hugh Maguire; he (Torlogh), was a man highly distinguished for general hospitality, generosity and noble deeds, and he was interred in the monastery of Donegal, having selected that for his burial place.

O'Hanlon (of Armagh), i. e. Felim, a distinguished chief for nobleness and good deeds, was slain.

Cahir Cavanagh, the son of Mac Murrough, was killed by the people of the county of Wexford.

The son of Savadge, i. e. Patrick, was taken prisoner by Con, son of Hugh Buighe (O'Neill), who put out his eyes.

Slaine, daughter of O'Brien, the wife of Mac William of Clanrickard, a vessel full of charity and hospitality, one of the most accomplished women in her time, died after having gained the victory over the world and the devil.

Cuchonaecht, son of John, son of Cuchonaecht Maguire, and Felim, son of Dunn, son of Cuchonaecht, son of Philip, son of Hugh Roe Maguire, died.

A great contention arose in Tyrone, between O'Neill and Shane Buighe O'Neill; the sons of Art O'Neill, and the sons of Felim O'Neill, were opposed to O'Neill in that contest, and the sons of Art committed a depredation on the sons of O'Neill, and the sons of O'Neill committed one or two plunders on John Buighe; the sons of Shane Buighe pursued them, and slew Hugh, son of Cathal, son of Felim O'Connor, and the son of Gillpatrick Mac Caghwel, with many others who are not recorded.

Con, son of O'Neill, i. e. Henry, was taken prisoner by the sons of Hugh Buighe O'Neill, and was delivered by them as a hostage to O'Donnell.

James, son of Myler Mac Herbert, was killed by Gerald, the son of Edmond Geaneach Mac Herbert.

A. D. 1482.

The image of the holy cross of Christ having been removed and left on the banks of the lake of Ballineulin, wrought great works and miracles.

Gillereest O'Fiaich (O'Fea), vicar of Aire Broscaidh (Derrybrusk in Fermanagh), a learned ecclesiastic, and a man who kept a house of general hospitality for the space of a year, died.

Con, son of Hugh Buighe O'Neill, a fountain of hospitality, and a general patron of the clergy of Ireland and of Scotland, the chief commander in war, and defender of the rights of his people, and king presumptive of the province (of Ulster), died after the victory of repentance.

Henry, son of Cu-uladh, son of Hugh, the son of Owen O'Neill, was slain by the English.

Art, son of Donogh Maguire, died.

Maolmora, son of Cathal O'Reilly, was slain by the sons of Hugh O'Reilly, and the sons of Hugh having returned to the country on terms of peace, were attacked by the sons of Cathal, who stormed their house, and the two sons of Hugh, and the two sons of Felim, the son of Hugh, with many others were slain.

Bryan, son of Felim O'Neill, was killed by the son of Con, the son of Hugh Buighe, and by the tribe of Henry Ainhreidh (O'Neill), and Bryan was a man distinguished for hospitality and generosity, and for purchasing poems and other compositions.

Donogh Oge, the son of Donogh Maguire, by whom Torlogh, the son of Philip Maguire had been slain, was killed himself by the east of a dart.

Murrough, son of Teige, the son of Cathal Oge Mac Rannall, was killed by the tribe of Art O'Rourke.

Dermot, the son of Loghlin Oge O'Hanley, heir to the chieftaincy of Kinel Doffa, was, along with his kinsmen, treacherously slain by the tribe of Gillananceev O'Hanley, in violation of the oath taken on the relick of Connaught, and the sureties of some of the chiefs of that province.

Roderick Buighe O'Hanley, chief of Kinel Doffa, died after having spent a good long life, and Teige, his brother, succeeded him.

Roderick Mac Dermott, lord of Moylurg (in Roscommon), and Teige Mac Rannall, lord of Connaicene Moyrein (in Leitrim), marched with a hostile force into Kinel Doffa (against the O'Hanleys), for having violated their compact, and they burned the house of O'Hanley, and Donogh, son of Siaeus Carrach, and the son of Conor, the grandson of Cormac, but they were however routed and pursued by the people of the country as far as Ballinafad, where Felim Fionn O'Connor came up, and prevented their flight.

Bryan Oge, son of Bryan, son of Cathal Duv

O'Conor, was slain by the tribe of Teige O'Conor, at Cuireach-an-aragail.

Art O'Conor gave Oliver Plunket a defeat at Ath-na-gceanaidh, in which he slew many of his people, and took Oliver himself prisoner.

Donal, the son of Roderick O'Conor, lord of Corcomroe of Ninas (in Clare), died, and was succeeded by his brother Dermot.

Felim, son of Felim O'Conor of Corcomroe, was treacherously killed by the sons of Conor O'Conor.

Carbry, the son of O'Conor Roe (of Roscommon), a brave and warlike man, heir to the lordship of the tribe of O'Conor Roe, died.

Erard O'Maolconry, chief professor of history and poetry in Siol Murray (Roscommon), a man learned in the Latin and Irish, died, after having gained the victory over the world and the devil, and was interred at Elphin; he was succeeded in the office by Siodhraidh O'Maolconry.

Murtogh Mac Clancy, the intended chief professor (Brehon) of Thomond, and Cosnamhach, the son of Conor Oge Mac Clancy, died.

Hugh, son of Carbry O'Conor, was killed by a party of his own people.

A. D. 1483.

Rossa, the son of Thomas Oge Maguire, bishop of Clogher, a man distinguished for wisdom and piety, and who kept a general house of hospitality for all persons, died, and was interred in the church of Aghalurcher (in Fermanagh), according to his own selection.

Malon O'Griobhtha (O'Griffa), bishop of Killybeg, a fountain of hospitality and of wisdom, died, and was interred in the monastery of the canons at Corcobaisene (in Clare) with due honours.

Donogh, son of O'Kelly, and O'Ferrall, i. e. Cumara, died.

Con O'Neill was ransomed by his father and kinsmen from O'Donnell and from the Claneboy (O'Neills), and the same Con was afterwards inaugurated lord of Tyrone by the consent of his father, and of the people of Tyrone in general.

A great contest arose between O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, and O'Neill. Con O'Donnell collected the forces of Tirconnell and of North Connaught, and Hugh Oge, the son of Hugh Buighe O'Neill, marched with all his forces and joined him; they then proceeded along in battle array, in defiance of all enemies, on their way until they arrived at Traighbally of Dundalk, which they plundered and burned, and also the surrounding country. The lord justice, i. e. Gerald (Fitzgerald), son of Thomas, earl of Kildare, went in pursuit of them with a great army of the English, and overtook them; but, however, they bravely opposed that great pursuing force, and defeated them, and a great many of the English were slain. On their own side, Mac Quillan, and the son of Torlogh Carrach O'Conor, were killed. O'Donnell after that marched with his forces to the town of Louth, which he burned, and he received presents and payment from the inhabitants for protecting and sparing their town. O'Donnell returned back, and parted Hugh Oge, the son of Hugh Buighe, who proceeded to Glenree (near Newry), to attack Trian Congail (in Down); he himself (O'Donnell) on his return through Tyrone, spoiled and burned the country in every direction through which he passed, until he arrived at Avonmore (the great river, probably the Blackwater). His forces cut and cleared their way through very dense and impassable woods, which were along the banks of Avonmore, so as to make a free and easy pass for his forces through the woods; he then commanded his men to construct strong wooden bridges (or passes) across the river, by which the whole of his forces, both foot and horse, crossed the stream, without either a man or horse being drowned; after which they let the bridge down the stream, and their enemies could do nothing but behold them from the opposite side, and O'Donnell then returned home with triumph and victory.

O'Donnell marched with another force against John, the son of Philip Maguire, and carried off great preys and booty, and Donal O'Neill, on the following day, committed another depredation on the same John.

Art, son of Con, son of Calvach O'Conor (O'Connor Faily), defeated Con, son of Art, the son of Con O'Melaghlin, in which the two sons of Roderick Carrach O'Carroll, and many others, were slain.

O'Cianain (O'Keenan), i. e. Roderick, chief historian to Maguire, died.

Conor Oge Mac Clancy, chief professor of Thomond, a highly accomplished man in literature and poetry, died, and was succeeded by Hugh Mac Claney.

Conor Mac Brehon (or the son of the Brehon), the intended chief professor of Muintir Maolruain, died, after a long suffering.

Edward V.¹ was proclaimed king of England on the 19th of April, and he reigned two months and eighteen days.

Richard III. was proclaimed king of England on the 22nd of June.

A. D. 1484.

Nicholas Weston, bishop of Derry, died (see A.D. 1474).

John O'Fairceallaidh (O'Farrelly), one of the canons of the people of Dromleathan (Dromlane, in the county of Cavan), and Bryan O'Farrelly, the priest who commenced erecting a Cloch Ang-coire (a stone cell for anchorites or a hermitage), at the great church of Dromlane, died.

Niall, the son of the coarb Mac Mahon (of Clones, in Monaghan), died, on his returning from Rome.

Redmond Mac Mahon, lord of Oriel, died while imprisoned at Drogheda.

James, the son of Redmond Tyrrell, lord of Fertulach (in Westmeath), died.

Donogh O'Kelly, tanist of Ily Maine, died after a long suffering.

The son of O'Conor Faily, i. e. Murrough, son of Cahir, son of Con, son of the Calvach, was slain with the cast of a javelin by the sons of Edmond Darcy, in Crioch-na-gceadach (in Westmeath).

Teige, son of William, son of Hugh, son of Bryan O'Kelly, was slain by Bryan O'Kelly, his own brother, and by William O'Murray, his foster-brother, who were hanged by O'Kelly for their crimes.

A. D. 1483.

1. Edward V. and Richard III.—King Edward IV. died at Westminster on the 9th of April, A.D. 1483, in the 42nd year of his age, and was succeeded by his son Edward, prince of Wales, as King Edward V. Edward on the death of his father was only in the 12th year of his age, and his uncle Richard, duke of Gloucester, was appointed Protector of the kingdom, but, aspiring to the crown, he had the young king, together with his brother Richard, duke of York, then only in the fifth year of his age, conveyed to the Tower, where he had them put to death. King Edward V. reigned but two months and sixteen days, being killed on the 20th of June, 1483. On the murder of his two nephews, Richard, duke of Gloucester, had himself proclaimed king, as Richard III., on the 26th of June, 1483, according to Sir Harris

Hugh, son of Bryan, the son of Bryan Ballach O'Conor, was slain by the tribe of Teige O'Conor.

Donal Mac Gorman (of Clare), a relative of O'Brien, a man who kept a house of general hospitality, the most wealthy possessor of live stock (grazier), died.

Hugh, son of Bryan O'Brien, and his wife Sabina, the daughter of Teige O'Conor, died.

Roderick Oge, the son of Roderick Buighe O'Hanley, died.

Malachy, the son of Conor O'Gormley, and Conor, his brother, were killed by the sons of Owen, the son of Niall O'Donnell.

Bryan Roe, the son of Cathal, son of Owen, son of John O'Reilly, died.

A great contest arose between O'Neill, i. e. Con, the son of Henry, and O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, and much damage was done by both parties.

Gillpatrick, the son of Maguire, i. e. Edmond, the son of Thomas Oge, was treacherously killed by his five brothers, Don, John, Edmond, Art Carrach, and Hugh, at the altar of the church of Aghalurcher. It was on that account two Maguires were nominated, namely, John, son of Philip, the son of Thomas More Maguire, and Thomas, son of Thomas Oge, the son of Thomas More. John proceeded with a force against the sons of Donogh, the sons of Thomas Maguire, namely, Philip and Felim, and Gillpatrick, son of Thomas, son of Donogh, and the son of Felim, son of Donogh Maguire, with many others, were slain by him; Mac Giollaruaidh (Mac Gilroy), namely, Bryan, the son of Donal, the two sons of Mac Donnell of Clankelly, namely, Cormac and Art, and many others, were taken prisoners. On a Friday, being the 13th of the Kalends of September, that affair took place, and Maguire, i. e. John, returned that day with victory and booty.

Nicholas's chronology; but the usurper's reign was very short, his forces being defeated, and himself slain at the battle of Bosworth, on Monday, 22nd of August, 1485, by Henry, earl of Richmond, who became king, as Henry VII.

Lords Lieutenant.—Gerald Fitzgerald, earl of Kildare, acted as lord deputy in the reign of Edward V., and on the death of Edward, King Richard III. nominated his own son Edward, prince of Wales, then only in the 10th year of his age, as lord lieutenant of Ireland, and the earl of Kildare was continued to act as lord deputy. On the death of Edward, son of King Richard, in 1484, John de la Pole, earl of Lincoln, nephew of King Edward IV., was appointed lord lieutenant, but did not come to Ireland, and the earl of Kildare still continued as lord deputy.

Flaherty, son of Thomas, son of Philip Maguire, was killed by Thomas Oge, son of Thomas Oge, the son of Thomas More, by the cast of a dart, at the port of Airidh Broscaidh (Derrybrusk, in Fermanagh).

The battle of Mona Ladhraidhe (in Fermanagh), was gained by the sons of Edmond Maguire, against the sons of Bryan, the son of Philip Maguire, in which were slain the three sons of Bryan, namely, Cathal, Cuchonacht, and Edmond, and also Hugh, son of Art, the son of Owen O'Neill; Owen, son of Torlogh, son of Philip of the Battle-axe Maguire, along with his son Torlogh; Redmond, son of Gilbert, the son of Cormac O'Flanagan, and many others; and the following were taken prisoners, Philip, son of Torlogh, the son of Philip Maguire; Philip, son of Bryan, the son of Philip Maguire; and Gillpatrick, son of Cathal Oge, the son of Manus Maguire, &c.; the total loss was twenty slain, and ten made prisoners.

A. D. 1485.

Nicholas O'Grady, the coarb of Tuaim Greine (abbot of Tomgraney in Clare), a man of charity and hospitality, and the twelfth freeman of Limerick, died.

Donogh Mac Cullen, erenach of Berach, a man who kept a house of general hospitality, died.

Owen Caoch, i. e., O'Conor Don, the son of Felim O'Conor, a man of prosperity and valour, died, after a long suffering; and Hugh, the son of Hugh O'Conor, was nominated lord as his successor.

Ulick Burke, lord of Clanrickard, heir to the earl of Ulster, a general entertainer of the learned of Ireland, died, and his son Ulick succeeded him; and he marched with a force into the plain of Connaught, and into Hy Maine, where he spoiled and burned the corn and towns, and demolished the castle of Tulsk, and the prison.

Roderick, the son of Bryan Ballach O'Conor, was killed by the tribe of Teige O'Conor.

Sile, daughter of Mac Jordan, the wife of Rickard Burke, the most exalted woman in Connaught, died.

Hugh Oge, son of Hugh Buighe, son of Bryan Ballach O'Neill, lord of Trian Congail (Upper and Lower Claneboy, in Down and Antrim), having gone on a predatory incursion into Lecale, was overtaken by the English, and slain by the cast of a dart, (or shot of an arrow).

O'Sullivan Beara (of the county of Cork), i. e., Donal; O'Conor of Corcomroe; and O'Conor Kerry and his wife, died.

O'Boyle, i. e., Torlogh (of Donegal), having resigned his lordship, was succeeded by his son Niall.

A great commotion arose between the Tirconnellians and Tyronians. The clan of Art O'Neill, i. e. Niall, and his kinsmen, joined O'Donnell, and the clan of Naghtan O'Donnell, i. e., Eignaghan, with his kinsmen, joined O'Neill. O'Donnell marched with his forces into Muintir Luinidh (the Munterloney mountains, in Tyrone), for the cattle and people of Naghtan were there: O'Neill, i. e. Con, was encamped in Munterloney, and the clan of Naghtan were with him, protecting the country and the people; they did not, however, perceive O'Donnell, until he had committed great depredations and plunders, and he marched by the camp of O'Neill, and of the clan of Naghtan, and carried away the prey to his own country without sustaining the least injury.

Hugh Oge, son of Hugh Roe, son of Roderick, son of Ardgall Mac Mahon, was appointed lord of Oriel.

The town of Cu-uladh, the son of Hugh O'Neill, was burned by Bryan of the Wood, the son of Owen O'Neill; and the land and town of the same Bryan were burned on the following day, in retaliation, by Cu-uladh, aided by the sons of Redmond, the son of Roderick Mac Mahon, namely, Glaisne and Bryan, and by the son of Mac Mahon Oge, namely Gillpatrick.

The clan of Maolmora, of the Mullagh (parish of Mullagh, county of Cavan), were expelled from their estate, and the sons of Glaisne O'Reilly settled in their country after them, and erected a castle there; they (the tribe of Maolmora), obtained the aid of the earl of Kildare, namely, Gerald, the son of Thomas (then the lord deputy of Ireland), against the sons of Glaisne; and they took from them fifteen folds of cows as a prey; and Gillaisa, the son of Glaisne, was made prisoner on that occasion.

Felim, son of Glaisne, the son of Conor O'Reilly, died of the plague.

O'Reilly, i. e. Torlogh, the son of John, son of Owen, entered Tullaghaw (in the county of Cavan), and burned the town of Mac Gauran, namely, Felim, and also the town of Donogh, his brother; Mac Gauran and his kinsmen went in pursuit of their forces on the following day, and they slew and made prisoners sixteen of them, and took two hundred horses from them.

Mac Donnell (of Antrim), i. e. Colla, the constable of the galloglasses of O'Neill, died.

Redmond, son of Glaisne, son of Redmond Mac Mahon, entered the English settlements of the plain of Oriel (in Louth), and slew John, the son of Taaffe; Con, the son of Manus O'Condalaidh (O'Connolly), the son of Cormac O'Connolly, and the son of Mac Ardgal (Mac Ardall), were slain on his side, and he and his people lost upwards of twenty horses; Cahir, son of Irial, the son of Philip, and Owen, son of James, the son of Eochy More Mac Mahon, were taken prisoners; but Owen afterwards made his escape.

Art-an-Bhogain, the son of O'Conor Faily, i. e. Con, was killed by his brother Caltir, son of Con, the son of Calvach, with the cast of a dart.

The young sons of Edmond Maguire, namely, Hugh, Art, and Gillaisa, and the sons of Torlogh Maguire, namely, Teige, Philip, and the Gilla Duv, committed depredations on Donal, son of Gillpatrick, son of Edmond Maguire; Donal himself was slain, in pursuit of the prey, by Malachy Mac Geibleanaigh (Mac Gevanny), and the same Malachy was immediately after slain in that place.

Maguire, i. e. John, committed depredations in Miodhbolg (near the Erne river, in Fermanagh), on the sons of Donogh, the son of Hugh Maguire, and on the Clan Mac Ualgarg, on two different occasions in one week.

Gillpatrick O'Higgin (of Westmeath), son of Bryan, son of Malaely, a man who kept a general house of hospitality both for rich and poor, died.

O'Cuirnin (of Leitrim), namely, Athairne, died.

Henry VII.¹ was proclaimed king of England, on the 22nd of August.

A. D. 1486.

The monastery of friars minor, de observantia,

A. D. 1485.

1. King Henry VII. On the death of Richard III., as already mentioned, at the battle of Bosworth, Henry Tudor, earl of Richmond, was proclaimed king, as Henry VII., on the 22nd of August, 1485. Richard was the last king of the House of York, and Henry was maternally descended from the House of Lancaster through John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, and paternally from Sir Owen Tudor, or ap Theodore, a Welsh nobleman, who was a descendant of the ancient British princes of Wales. Sir Owen Tudor was married to queen Catherine, relict of king Henry V. of England, and daughter of king Charles VI. of France, and from him were descended the sovereigns of the House of Tudor, the first of whom was Henry VII., and the others were his son Henry VIII., and his children Edward VI., Mary, and Elizabeth. Henry VII. married Elizabeth, daughter of king Edward IV., and thus united the white and red roses, or rival Houses of York and Lancaster, who had so long contended for the crown.

Lords Lieutenant.—In 1485, John de la Pole, earl of Lincoln, was continued as lord lieutenant, but did not come to Ireland; and Gerald Fitzgerald, earl of Kildare, still acted as lord deputy. In 1491, Jasper Tudor, earl of Pembroke and duke of Bedford, uncle of king Henry VII., was appointed lord lieutenant, but did not come to Ireland, and the earl of Kildare was continued lord deputy. In 1492, Walter Fitzsimon, archbishop of Dublin, and chancellor of Ireland, was appointed lord deputy, and in 1493 Robert Preston, viscount Gormanstown, and his son, William Preston, were appointed lords deputies to the duke of Bedford. In 1494, sir Edward Poynings was appointed lord deputy to the duke of Bedford, and held a parliament at Drogheda, wherein was passed the Act called Poynings' Act, which took away the independence of the Irish parliaments, making all their acts subordinate to the parliament of England. In 1495 Poynings departed from Ireland, and Henry Dean, bishop of Bangor in Wales, and chancellor of Ireland, was appointed lord justice. In 1496 Gerald Fitzgerald, earl of Kildare, was appointed lord lieutenant, and in 1498 and 1501, Henry, duke of York, afterwards king Henry VIII., was nominated lord lieutenant, but he did not come to Ireland, and the earl of Kildare acted as lord deputy; and in 1503 Walter Fitzsimon, archbishop of Dublin, was again lord deputy. In 1504, Gerald Fitzgerald, earl of Kildare, was appointed lord lieutenant, which office he held till his death in 1513. The above accounts have been collected from Ware, from Borlase's Reduction of Ireland, from Lodge's Peerage, and other authorities.

Pretenders to the Crown.—The attempts made by the mock princes, Lambert Simnel, and Perkin Warbeck, who were set up as claimants to the crown of England in the reign of Henry VII., are curious events connected with Irish history. The adherents of the House of York, and Margaret duchess of Burgundy, who was sister of king Edward IV., set up a youth about sixteen years of age, named Lambert Simnel, who was the son of a baker or shoemaker, but of very handsome person and elegant accomplishments, and was educated at Oxford; he personated Edward, earl of Warwick, son of George, the deceased duke of Clarence, and brother of Edward IV.; and to support the claims of this pretender to the crown of England against Henry VII., the duchess of Burgundy, and her adherents, sent over to Ireland, along with Simnel, 2000 Germans, or Belgians, according to some accounts, commanded by Martin Swart, which forces landed in Dublin in the month of May, A. D. 1486. The earl of Kildare, then lord deputy, and the greater part of the English nobility in Ireland, countenanced the claims of Simnel to the crown, believing him to be the earl of Warwick, and had him crowned in Christ Church, Dublin, with all possible honours, as king Edward VI., the crown used for that purpose being a diadem taken from the statue of the Virgin Mary, in the church of St. Mary les Dames, in Dublin, still preserved in the Carmelite chapel in Whitefriar-street; the coronation sermon was preached by John Payne, bishop of Meath, and Simnel, being proclaimed king, was carried through the streets from Christ Church to the Castle, on the shoulders of Darcy of Platten, in Meath, a man of gigantic stature. The adherents of Simnel having collected their forces in England to oppose king Henry, and Martin Swart, with his two thousand Germans or Belgians, joined by six thousand of the Irish, under the lords Thomas and Maurice Fitzgerald, proceeded to England to assist them, but Simnel's combined forces were defeated in a great battle at Stoke, near Newark in Nottingham, on the banks of the river Trent, in the month of June, 1487, by the English army, commanded by king Henry in person, and after a fierce engagement, in which the Irish at Kilcullen, (in Kildare,) was founded on the banks of the river Liffey, by Roland, the son of sir Edward Eustace.

The prior of Maothla (Mohill, in Leitrim), namely, Fergal, son of Robert Mac Rannall, died.

Philip, son of the coarb Mac Mahon, i. e. James, son of Roderick, son of Ardgall, a canon of the chapter of Clogher, abbot of Clones, parson of Dartry, &c., died.

A general chapter (or synod) of the province of (Ulster), was held in the beginning of July, at Droichead-Atha (Drogheda), by the archbishop of Armagh, namely, Octavianus Italicus,¹ which was attended by all the bishops and clergy of the north of Ireland.

Roderick Mac Dermott, i. e. the son of Roderick Caoch, lord of Moylurg, Airteach, and Tir Tuathail (in Roscommon), died of a short sickness in the church of Lough-na-ngasasan, in Clan Cahil Mac Murray; and Conor, son of Cormac, son of Tomaltach the Hospitable, was inaugurated his successor.

Cumara Mac Namara was boastfully killed by the sons of Donogh Mac Namara.

Teige, son of Cathal Oge Mac Rannall, the full chief of Muintir Eoluis, an accomplished man, distinguished for hospitality and feats of arms, died, after gaining the victory over the world and the devil, and was buried in Fenagh.

Teige O'Mulvey, the heir to the chieftaincy of Muintir Carrolan (in Leitrim), was killed by the sons of Malachy Mac Rannall, and by the sons of Maolroona Mac Rannall.

Owen, son of Ir, was taken prisoner by the sons of Maolroona Mac Rannall, and the sons of Teige O'Mulvey were slain, and also the son of William Mac Manus, with many others.

Malachy and Roderick, the sons of Mac Donogh of Tirerrill, namely, Teige, son of Bryan, each of whom was a lawful representative of the chieftaincy of Tirerrill, were killed by the sons of Donal Cam, and the sons of Roderick Mac Donogh.

O'Donnell marched with an immense force into Connaught, and Mac William of Clanrickard, with another great force to oppose him; and after they had met, they made peace and mutual agreement. Felim Fionn O'Connor joined those forces, and made his submission to O'Donnell on behalf of his territories and chieftains; the peace of Siol Murray (Roscommon), was confirmed on that occasion, and the son of Felim Fionn was taken as a hostage for himself by O'Donnell; and he took him with him into Tirconnell, by the advice of Mac William of Clanrickard.

The people of Mac Rannall gained a victory at Moin Lesg (in Leitrim), against the sons of O'Rourke and the tribe of Cathal Roe, in which Malachy Oge, the son of Malachy Mac Cabe, was slain, a man who bore the greatest name as a commander of galloglasses of his age in Leath Cuinn (the northern half of Ireland).

The sons of John, the son of the prior, were plundered; and one of the sons, namely, Gillcreest, was slain by the tribe of Malachy Mac Rannall.

Neide O'Maolconry, the patron of the churches of Ireland, died, a man who had made the estimable asseveration, that he would constantly supply all visitors with bread and butter.

O'Donnell marched with his forces into Tyrawforces and Germans fought with great bravery for a long time, they were at length overcome by the superior numbers of the English, and four thousand of them slain, and in the battle also fell Martin Swart, and the lords Thomas and Maurice Fitzgerald, with many other commanders. Simnel was taken prisoner, and, in derision, made a turnspit in the royal kitchen, but was afterwards promoted to the office of falconer to the king.

Perkin, or Peter Warbeck, the son of a converted Jew, of Tournay, in Flanders, but long a resident in London, was, in the year 1493, also set up by the duchess of Burgundy and her adherents, as another claimant to the crown, and instructed to personate Richard, duke of York, son of king Edward IV., who it was said had escaped from the tower, though he had been put to death there by king Richard III. The mock prince Perkin was, however, believed by many of the nobility to be the duke of York, and they supported his claims to the crown; he came to Ireland, and landed at Cork in 1493, under the name of Richard Plantagenet, and being a young man of very prepossessing person and accomplishments, he and his retinue were well received, and he was believed to be a legiti-mate heir to the crown of England. Warbeck was shortly after invited to the court of France, and received there with great honours; he came to Ireland a second time in 1495, and landed at Cork, but soon after proceeded to Scotland, where he was well received by king James IV., who gave him in marriage his relative Catherine Gordon, a lady of remarkable beauty, and daughter of the earl of Huntley. Warbeck came a third time to Ireland in the year 1497, accompanied by his consort, and landed at Cork, where he was joined by Maurice Fitzgerald, earl of Desmond, at the head of 2400 men, and they laid siege to Waterford, but their forces being defeated, Warbeck went to England, where he was joined by some adherents; and having been at length taken prisoner, in 1499, he was confined in the Tower, but attempting to escape, he was tried for high treason, and, together with his friend John Waters, mayor of Cork, hanged at Tyburn.

A. D. 1480.

1. Octavianus Italicus, or Octavian the Italian, was Octavian de Palatio, by birth a Florentine, then archbishop of Armagh.

ley, and Mac William Eighter went to oppose him ; a battle ensued, in which upwards of one hundred of Mac William's party were slain, and John Mac Jordan, Ulick, son of Rickard Burke, son of Thomas, and many others were taken prisoners.

John, the son of the prior Mac Rannall (of Mo-hill), died.

The Barry More (of Cork), i. e. John, the most worthy young man of the English of Ireland, was killed on Christmas day, by Donogh Oge Mac Carthy, lord of Ealla (Duhallowin Cork), he having gone to plunder him.

Gerald, the son of the earl of Desmond, died.

Felim, son of Carbry O'Connor, and Anthony, the son of John Carrach Mac Brannan, died. Donogh, son of Cormac, son of Matthew, and Hugh, the son of Roderick Duv, son of Matthew, were killed by the sons of Malachy Mac Rannall.

Teige Caoch, the son of William O'Kelly, the second lord over Hy Maine, died in the habit of the third order (of Franciscans).

Sile, daughter of Hugh, the son of William O'Kelly, the wife of O'Madden, died.

Loghlin, son of Giolla Claon O'Hanley ; Teige, son of Hugh, son of Bryan O'Beirne ; and Malachy, son of Dermot Mac Rannall, died.

Owen, son of Loghlin O'Rourke, the expectant lord of Brefney, died.

James, the grandson of Richard Butler, the earl of Ormond's representative, died.

Breasal and Dermot, the sons of Murtogh O'Madden, were treacherously killed by Cobhthach O'Madden, their own brother.

Raghnailt, the daughter of John Mac Namara, the wife of Torlogh, son of Teige O'Brien, lord of East Thomond, died.

Gillanacev (O'Ferrall), the son of Donal, son of Murtogh Midheach, lord of Calaidh of Annally, died at an advanced age.

Teige Mac Egan, chief professor of the people of Annaly, was disgracefully slain by the tribe of Irial O'Ferrall.

Flann, the son of Flann O'Donnellan, died.

Bryan, son of Roderick, son of Ardgall Mac Mahon, lord of Dartry (in Monaghan), was killed by the English of the plain of Oriel.

Donal Oge, the son of Mac Artan (in the county of Down), a man distinguished for his hospitality, died.

John Buighe, the son of Owen, son of Niall O'Neill, died.

Donogh, son of Thomas, son of Fergal Mac Gauran, died.

Twenty-eight towns belonging to the English of the plain of Oriel (county of Louth), were burned by Mac Mahon, namely, Hugh Oge, son of Hugh Roe, the son of Roderick.

O'Neill, i. e. Con, the son of Henry, marched with a force before Samhain (November), into the plain of Oriel, and burned and spoiled a great deal.

Bryan, son of Edmond, son of Roderick Mac Mahon, committed great depredations on Edmond, the son of Thomas Oge, and his sons, at Cuil-na-noirer ; and Edmond Oge, the son of Edmond, was slain by him at Doire Ceanainn (in Monaghan).

Edmond, the son of Thomas Greannagh, son of Dunn, son of Philip of the Battle-axe Maguire died ; and his other brother Owen, the son of Thomas Greannagh, Manus, son of Muldoon, and Roderick, son of Conor, son of Dunn Maguire, were slain at Bally-an-Oireacht (in Fermanagh), by Felim, the son of Donogh Maguire, in a nocturnal attack.

Caitilin (Catherine), daughter of O'Ferrall, namely, Donal Buighe, son of Donal, son of John, the wife of the son of Manus Maguire, i. e. Cathal Oge, the son of Cathal More, died.

Art Roe, son of Gillpatrick, son of Edmond Maguire, was killed with the cast of a dart by the sons of Torlogh, son of Philip Maguire.

Hugh, son of Niall, son of Hugh, son of Owen O'Neill, died.

Edmond Oge, the son of Edmond, son of Cuuladh O'Neill, and Cormac, son of Art Carrach, the son of Malachy O'Neill, died.

The sons of Maguire, i. e. Edmond, namely, Hugh and Art Carrach, were ransomed ; and their father resigned his lordship on the same day, in favour of John, the son of Philip Maguire.

Donn Maguire, the son of Edmond, son of Thomas Oge, was treacherously killed in the doorway of the church of Aghahureher, by the sons of Thomas Oge Maguire, namely, Thomas, Conor, and Roderick, aided by the sons of Flaherty, the son of Thomas Oge, namely, Gillpatrick, Cucho-nacht, and Bryan Crosach.

A. D. 1487.

Malachy, the son of Murrough O'Flanagan, dean of Elphin, died, and was succeeded by Thomas O'Heidigein.

Teige, son of Bryan, son of Awlave Maguire, who was first a parson of Botha (Bohoe in Fermanagh), and vicar of Cillaisre (parish of Killesher, county of Fermanagh), died.

Bryan O'Corcran, vicar of Cleenish, and Dennis Mac Gillcoisgly, erenach and vicar of Derrybrusk (both in Fermanagh), died.

O'Melaghlin, i. e. Laigneach, the son of Curc, lord of Clan Colman (in Westmeath) was killed by Con, son of Art, son of Con, son of Cormac Ballach O'Melaghlin.

O'Reilly, i. e. Torlogh, son of John, son of Owen, died of a sudden fit, in his own castle at Tullach Mongain (Tullymongan, over the town of Cavan), on the first day of September; and his son, John, was nominated the O'Reilly.

Bryan, son of Bryan Ballach, the son of Hugh, son of Felim O'Conor, a legitimate representative of the king of Connaught, died.

Hugh, son of Roderick, son of Bryan O'Conor, died.

Siodhraidh O'Maolconry, chief professor of Siol Murray (Roscommon), the most learned and agreeable of the men of Ireland, died; and two chiefs of the tribe were appointed his successors, namely, Donal, and Maolconry, the son of Torna.

Maurice, the son of Loghlin O'Maolconry, chief professor of his own art, died in Tirconnell, after a long suffering, and after the victory of repentance, and was interred at Donegal.

Donal O'Dugan, and his wife, the daughter of O'Maolconry, died.

O'Maolfalaidh (O'Mulally), the most eminent man for wisdom in Hy Maine, died.

The earl of Desmond (James Fitzgerald), was treacherously killed by his own people at Rath Gaola (Rathkeale, county of Limerick), at the instigation of his brother John; but John and all the murderers were expelled by Maurice, the son of the earl.

William, son of Hugh, son of Bryan O'Kelly, lord of Hy Maine, was treacherously taken prisoner by his own kinsmen, and died in his chains:

and two lords were nominated to succeed him, namely, Malachy, son of Hugh, son of Bryan, and Donogh, the son of Breasal O'Kelly.

Hugh, son of Donogh O'Kelly, was killed by Malachy, the son of William O'Kelly.

Conor, son of Teige Caoch O'Kelly, was treacherously taken prisoner by Teige, the son of Malachy O'Kelly.

Cathal Duv, the son of Donal, son of Owen O'Conor, was killed by the Costelloes, he having gone to plunder them; and his other brother, Calvach Caoch, triumphantly carried off the prey.

Donal O'Conor went on a hostile incursion into Leitir Mac Philip (in Mayo), but a party of his people were defeated, and two sons of Donal, son of Bryan Mac Donogh, and many of their chiefs and people, were slain.

Bryan Roe, son of Tiarnan, son of Teige, son of Tiarnan O'Rourke, tanist of Brefney, was slain with the cast of a dart by the son of O'Rourke, namely, Owen, the son of Felim, son of Donogh, son of Tiernan Oge. O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, having, in consequence of his death, marched into Brefney, encamped before the town of O'Rourke, i. e. the castle of Cairthe (castle of Glencar), which he took, and slew three of O'Rourke's people; and Bryan, the son of Cathal, son of Tiarnan O'Rourke, was also killed by Geoffrey, the son of Hugh Gallda O'Donnell, by the shot of a ball.¹ O'Donnell then demolished the castle, and he expelled O'Rourke, i. e. Felim, out of his territory into Fermanagh; O'Donnell afterwards permitted O'Rourke to return to his estate, restored peace among the men of Brefney, and compelled the country to rebuild the castle.

Maolroona, the son of Teige Mac Dermott, was treacherously taken prisoner on the island of the Trinity (at Boyle) by Tomaltach, the son of Roderick Mac Dermott, and the son of Bryan Mac Dermott was slain there.

Alexander (Mac Donnell), the son of Colla, son of Torlogh, and a number of the chiefs of his galloglasses, were slain by the sons of Roderick Mac Dermott.

A. D. 1487

1. The shot of a ball. This appears to have been a shot by fire-arms, and is the first time they are mentioned in these Annals. According to the Annals of Dublin, in Pettigrew and Oulton's Directory, compiled from the most accurate authorities, the first muskets, or fire-arms, seen in Ireland, were brought to Dublin from Germany, in the year 1489, and presented to Gerald Fitzgerald, earl of Kildare, then lord deputy; and he put those muskets into the hands of his guards, as they stood sentinels before his house in Thomas-street, Dublin.

John, son of the erenach, chief of his own tribe, a man who kept a house of general hospitality; and the erenach of St. Patrick, at Elphin, died.

Hugh, son of Philip Roe Mae Namara, (of Clare), a brave and warlike man, died.

John Duv Mae Costello, lord of Slieve Lugha (in Mayo), died, and two lords were nominated to succeed him, namely, William, son of Edmond of the Plain, his own brother, and Jordan, the son of Philip Mae Costello.

John, son of Conor Mae Egan, chief professor of Clanrickard, and Hugh, son of Bryan, son of Fergal Roe O'Higgin, died.

Cahir Mae Coghlan was treacherously killed by his brother's son, Fingin Roe.

Edmond, son of Rickard Burke, was treacherously taken prisoner by the Barretts, but was fortunately rescued by his own kinsmen.

O'Donnell marched with a force into Brefney O'Rourke, and the motive of his marching thither was, that O'Rourke, namely, Felim, the son of Donogh, son of Tiarnan, and his town, were treacherously taken by his own kinsmen. O'Donnell, on entering Brefney, encamped before the town, i. e. the castle of Cairthe (Glencar, in Leitrim), which he ultimately took, after besieging it for a considerable time; and Tiarnan Duv, son of Donogh, son of Tiarnan Oge, was slain by O'Donnell on that occasion; and he kept O'Rourke, namely, Felim, in possession of the castle of Glencar, and established peace among the men of Brefney; and O'Rourke instituted a defensive tribute for O'Donnell, and his successors in Brefney.

Tiarnan Oge O'Rourke, tanist of Brefney, was slain by the sons of Maolroona Mae Rannall, and the sons of Roderick Mae Dermott, at Ueht-na-Nengadh. Hugh Roe O'Donnell marched with his forces into Moylurg, where he destroyed corn, and burned many castle towns; he burned and demolished the castle of the sons of Roderick Mac Dermott, i. e. Bally-na-Huamha (in Roscommon). O'Donnell himself, with a chosen party of his men, proceeded from his camp privately on that night, and committed great depredations at Doire Chua. Felim Fionn O'Conor, i. e. the son of Teige, son of Torlogh Roe, joined O'Donnell on that occasion, and concluded a lasting peace with him. Roderick of the Doire (Oak Wood), the son of Maurice, son of Hugh Mae Dermott, who was with O'Donnell's forces on that expedition, violated the church of Ceallbhraighe Uallaighe (probably Kilbrine, in Rosecommon), and carried away much valuable property out of it; but O'Donnell afterwards made ample restitution to the priests of that church for its violation.

Mac William of Clanrickard, i. e. Ulick, the son of Ulick of the Wine, marched with a force into Hy Maine, where he demolished the Badhbhdhun (Bawn, or Fortress), of Athliag Maonagáin (Athleague, in Rosecommon, on the river Suck), and spoiled much corn and towns in Hy Maine, and in the plain of Connaught; Rossa, the son of Felim Fionn (O'Conor), was killed by some of his forces with the east of a dart; the sons of Felim Fionn (O'Conor), namely, Hugh, Torlogh, and Con, passed by them to the town of Tobar Brighde (Ballintobber of St. Bridget), which they plundered and burned; Dermot, son of Donal, son of Torlogh Dall O'Conor, who was in pursuit of their forces, was slain by them at Rosecommon, from which place they still pursued the party into Clan Conway, where they took some horses from them; and it was at the invitation of O'Conor Don, i. e. Hugh, the son of Hugh, son of Torlogh Dun, that force was collected. Peace was concluded by the people of Siol Murray (Roscommon), themselves, after having refused the intercession of their friends.

Roderick O'Conor committed treacherous depredations on Felim Fionn O'Conor; and Felim Fionn, in retaliation, committed awful depredations on the tribe of Teige Oge.

The peace of Siol Murray was again confirmed, and the lordship of the tribe of Cormac, son of O'Beirne, the half of the town of Clar, and the five townlands of Kincora, of the portion of Torlogh Oge, were restored to his tribe by Felim O'Conor; and a small portion of Clan Cahil Mae Murray, which had been in the possession of Clan Maolruain for a considerable time, was given up to Felim Fionn O'Conor.

Tiarnan Carraeh, the son of Tiarnan, son of Teige, son of Tiarnan O'Rourke; Feradhaeh, son of John, son of Torlogh Maguire; and Donal, son of Dun, son of Donal, son of Art Maguire, were slain in Muintir Eoluis (in Leitrim), by the sons of Roderick Mac Dermott, and the son of Mac Dermott Roe ; and Donal Bearnach Mac Gauran was killed on the same occasion.

O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh, marched into Moylurg (barony of Boyle, county of Roscommon), in the harvest, and burned many houses and much corn ; and the church of Drum Conaille was burned at the same time by Fergal Carrach, the son of Donal, son of Teige O'Rourke, without the permission of O'Donnell ; and when O'Donnell did not overtake Fergal Carrach, to be revenged of him for that misdeed, the grandson of Tiarnan delivered the booty he had gained to the clergy of the church, as a compensation for that burning.

A. D. 1488.

The abbot of Trim died.

A great plague raged in Machaire Chonacht (the plain of Connaught), of which the following died : Cathal Mac Eidigein, vicar of Templepatrick, and a canon of the chapter of Elphin ; Aongus O'Reachtadhain, the coarb of St. Finen, at Cluain Creamha (Clooncraff, Roscommon) ; Dermot Concagaidh, a worthy priest, and the deaf vicar O'Colla. Cathal Roe, the son of Roderick, son of Bryan Ballach O'Connor, died of the same plague. Donal, son of Bryan O'Beirne ; Dermot, son of Donal, son of Bryan ; Donal, son of Fergal, and Cormac, son of Donal Cananach O'Beirne, also died of it.

Donal, son of Donal, son of Niall Garv O'Donnell, was taken prisoner by the sons of Hugh Gallda, the son of Niall Garv, and was executed on the following day, as his evil deeds deserved.

O'Kelly, i. e. Malachy, the son of Hugh, son of Bryan, died in six weeks' time after assuming the lordship, and was succeeded by Conor, his kinsman.

Magennis, i. e. Bryan, the son of Art, died, and his brother Hugh was appointed his successor.

Edmond, son of Thomas Maguire, who had been lord of Fermanagh, died.

Don, son of Donal Ballach Maguire, died.

O'Flanagan of Tura (in Fermanagh), i. e. Torlogh, the son of Gillaisa, died.

O'Toole, i. e. Edmond, was treacherously slain by the sons of Teige O'Byrne.

The son of O'Murphy, lord of Hy Felimidh (in Wexford), i. e. Mahon, the son of Teige, was treacherously killed by Donogh, the son of the lord of Hy Kinsellagh, namely, the son of Art, son of Donogh (Mac Murrough).

Dermot, son of John of Lurg, the son of Torlogh of the Wine O'Donnell, died.

Bryan, son of Hugh Buighe, the son of Bryan Ballach O'Neill, died of the Galar Breac (small pox).

Teige, son of Malachy, son of Tiarnan O'Rourke, and Mac Rannall, i. e. the son of Murrough, of the tribe of Malachy, died ; and Malachy, the son of William, of the same tribe, was appointed the Mac Rannall in his place.

O'Neill, i. e. Con, the son of Henry, and Maguire, namely, John, son of Philip, son of Thomas, went to O'Donnell's house, and O'Neill and O'Donnell made a friendly and amicable peace with each other.

O'Neill and the sons of John Buighe O'Neill made peace, after they were released from their imprisonment.

Donal, son of Niall O'Neill, was killed at Fionn Tamhnach (Fintona, in Tyrone), by Roderick, the son of Art, and by the sons of Niall, the son of Art O'Neill.

Cormac, the son of John, the son of Donal, was nominated the O'Ferrall, in opposition to Roderick, the son of Cathal O'Ferrall.

Malachy, the son of Mac Clancy (chief of Dартry, in Leitrim), was killed by the sons of Teige, son of Cathal, son of Tiarnan Oge O'Rourke.

Owen, the son of Ir Mac Rannall, was killed by his own brother William, aided by his son, and by Manus, the son of Ir.

Torlogh, son of Teige Mac Mahon (of Clare), a man full of prosperity, and endowed with great wisdom from the Holy Spirit, a donor of precious gifts and property, died, after having gained the victory over the world and the devil.

Roderick, the son of O'Conor Don, died

Cu-uladh, son of John Buighe O'Neill, was killed by Art, son of Henry, son of Owen.

Art, son of Niall Carrach, son of Murrough Oge O'Neill, was slain by the sons of Henry, son of Henry, son of Owen O'Neill, in a nightly attack.

Owen, son of O'Rourke, i. e. Felim, son of Donogh, son of Tiarnan Oge, son of Tiarnan More, was killed during a truce by another Owen, the son of O'Rourke, i. e. the son of Tiarnan, son of Teige, son of Tiarnan More.

Owen, son of Maolmora O'Reilly, lord of Mullach Laoighill (parish of Mullagh, county of Cavan), died.

Donogh Duvshuilcach (the Dark-Eyed), O'Connor, i. e. O'Connor Roe, died at an advanced age, after a well spent life; and Felim Fionn O'Connor was inaugurated his successor by O'Donnell, Mac William, and Mac Dermott, i. e. Conor, as firmly as any lord who had been appointed for a long time before, and his shoe (of inauguration) was put on him by Mac Dermott.

O'Donnell made peace with Mac William Burke, and O'Connor and Mac Dermott became the guarantees and securities between them.

O'Donnell and Mac Dermott, namely, Conor, made an attack on the Rock of Lough Kea, (at Boyle, in Roscommon), which was in the possession of the sons of Roderick Mac Dermott, and they spoiled and consumed the corn of the country; O'Donnell departed after failing to get to the Rock, and his own galloglasses took possession of Mac Dermott's fortress, which he had left under their protection, and they brought all the boats of the lake to the rock.

William, the son of Hugh Mac Branán, chief of Corcachlan (in Roscommon), died about the beginning of February, after the victory of repentance, and was buried at Elphin.

John Mantach, the principal agent in the death of the earl of Desmond, was put to death by Maurice, the son of the earl, and Maurice, the son of the earl, was nominated earl.

A wonderful child was born in Dublin, who had his teeth at his birth, and he grew to such an enormous size that so large a child was not heard of since the time of the heroes.

A blast of wind passed through a number of persons working at turf at Tuaim Mo, which killed one of them, and the faces of the rest became swelled; there were four others killed by the same wind in Machaire Chonacht.¹

Edmond, son of Rickard Burke, the most worthy young man of the English of Connaught, died.

John Oge O'Hara and his son were treacherously killed by the sons of O'Hara, namely, Roderick and Hugh, the sons of his own brother, on Sunday, in the monastery of Banada (in Sligo).

Donogh Mac Mahon, lord of Corcabaiscín (in Clare), died; and two Mac Mahons were nominated his successors, namely, Bryan, his own son, and Teige Roc, the son of Torlogh Mac Mahon.

Fergal Mac-an-Ruagaire (the son of the Hunter), died; and this Fergal consumed his food like all other persons for twenty years, but did not strip off his clothes during that time.

Roderick O'Connor, the son of Felim, a man who, it was expected by many, would become the successor of his father, died at Ballintobber of St. Bridget, in the month of August.

The earl of Kildare marched with a predatory force into Kinel Fiacha Mac Neill (in Westmeath), where he demolished the castle of Bile Ratha on the sons of Murtogh Mac Geoghegan, after having conveyed some ordnance (cannon) thither.

Malachy, son of Roderick Mac Dermott, and Maurice, son of Hugh Mac Dermott, died.

Teige, son of Hugh, son of Torlogh O'Connor, the most worthy young man of the tribe of Bryan Luighneach, died exactly on Easter night.

Dermot, son of Teige O'Connor, the tanist lord of his tribe, a man by whose hand more of his enemies fell than by any other person in Ireland in his time, died of the Galar Fuail (gravel or urinary disease), after a long suffering.

Conor, son of Duvthach O'Duigenan, was drowned in Lough Bradan, in Muintir Eoluis (in Leitrim).

Maolconry, the son of Torna O'Maolconry, died of a short sickness at Cluain-na-Hoidche.

Mulmurry, the son of Teige Oge O'Higgin, chief poet of Ireland, and Mac Ward of Oriel, died.

A. D. 1488.

1. Machaire Chonacht, or the Plain of Connaught, anciently called Magh Aoi, comprised the greater part of the baronies of Roscommon and Ballintobber, with part of the barony of Boyle, in the county of Rosecommon. This ancient territory extended between the towns of Rosecommon and Elphin, and to the parish of Killuken, eastward to Strokestown, and westward to Castlereagh; this tract of country is still called by the natives the Magharee. Tuam Mo, above-mentioned, is now Tumna or Toemonia, a parish in the barony of Boyle, county of Rosecommon. The remarkable circumstance mentioned in the text of five persons having been killed, and several others dangerously affected by a blast of wind, appears to have been something similar to the effects produced by the wind called the Sirocco in Italy, and other southern countries of Europe, or to the pestilential blasts called the Simoon, which often prove fatal to numbers of persons travelling over the sandy deserts of Egypt and Arabia.

A.D. 1489.

ICHOLAS O'Casey vicar of Devinish, on Lough Erne; Teige O'Maithgen, one of the monks of Boyle; O'Neill, i. e. Henry, the son of Owen, son of Niall Oge; Mac Gillpatrick, i. e. Geoffrey, lord of Ossory; O'Carroll, i. e. John, lord of Ely, (in King's county and Tipperary); O'Boyle, i. e.

Torlogh (of Donegal); Manus, son of Hugh Roe, son of Roderick Mac Mahon, (of Monaghan); and Conor, son of Glaisne O'Reilly, (of Cavan), died.

III. Moy-Liffey and Bregia. In this article is continued, from page 299, the history and topography of the ancient territories now forming the counties of Dublin and Kildare, with their chiefs and clans; and also of some of the chiefs of Meath, of whom a full account has not been given in the note on Meath, compiled from the various works enumerated in previous annotations.

Ancient Inhabitants.—The first inhabitants of the territories now forming the counties of Dublin and Kildare, as in other parts of Ireland, were the Fir Bolg or Belgians, the Tuath De Danan, and the Milesians, of whom accounts have been already given in various notes; and an account of the Belgians, Brigantes, and Caucians, who possessed a great part of ancient Leinster, has been given in the notes on Hy Kinsellagh and Cualan.

The Cauici or Caucians, considered to be a Belgian or German tribe, are placed by Ware and others in Wicklow and Kildare; and on the Map of Ancient Ireland, by the Greek geographer Ptolemy, in the second century, as given by Ware and others, the Eblanoi or Eblani are placed on the territory which now forms the great plains of Dublin, and part of Meath or ancient Bregia, and the chief city of the Eblanians is called by Ptolemy Eblana, a name probably derived from the Irish word Dubl-Linn, the ancient name of Dublin, which might have been changed by the Greek writer into Dublana or Eblana. As already explained, the word Dubl-Linn signifies the black or dark pool, and is considered to have originated from the black or boggy marshes of the Liffey, near which the city was founded; and it was also called Baile-Ath-Cliath, signifying the town of the ford of hurdles, from a passage being formed over the river by hurdles in very remote ages, according to the Book of Dinseanchus; and the place was frequently mentioned simply as Ath-Cliath, which St. Adamnan in the seventh century translates into Latin Vadum Cliad, and in a Life of St. Kevin of Glendalough, which is considered to have been written in the eighth century, and of which the translator of these Annals has made a copy from an ancient MS., Dublin is mentioned as follows in a Latin translation of the work: "Civitas Ath-Cliath est in aquilonari Lageniensium plaga, super fretum maris posita, et Scotice dicitur Dubh-Linn, quod sonat Latine Nigra Therma, et ipsa civitas potens et bellicosa est, in qua semper habitant viri asperissimi in preliis, et peritissimi in classibus." "The city of Ath-Cliath is situated in the northern region of

A great plague raged this year, of which great numbers died, and it was so virulent that many persons were left unburied throughout Ireland.

Redmond, son of Anthony, son of Fergal, son of Thomas, son of Mahon, son of Gillaisa Roe O'Reilly, (of Cavan), died of this plague, and also the following persons, namely, Felim Oge, the son of Felim, son of Fergal, son of Thomas, son of Mahon, son of Gillaisa Roe O'Reilly; Donal, the son of Torna O'Maolconry, the intended chief professor of Siol Murray; Donal Cananach, the son of Teige O'Beirne; Cormac O'Conalladh, chief of the galloglasses of the rere-guard of O'Conor's forces; the Dark-haired daughter of O'Conor, i. e. of Donogh of the Dark-Eyes; Hugh Buighe, and Donal Caoch, the sons of O'Hanley; Roderick Glas, the son of Roderick Mac Hugh; Mac Donogh Riavach, i. e. Hugh; and Fionnguala, the daughter of Mac Dermott Roe, all died of the plague.

Malachy, son of Murtoth, son of Owen O'Neill,

Leinster, upon a strait of the sea; it is called in the Irish language, Dubl-linn, which signifies the Black Pool, and this city is powerful and warlike, always inhabited by men most brave in battles and expert in fleets." By the Britons or Welsh Dublin was called Dinas Dulinn, signifying the fortress or city of Dublin; by the Danes it was named Dyflin, Duflin, and Dyflinar, as may be seen on the coins of the Danish kings of Dublin, and in the Saga of the Icelandic historians, in Johnstone's Celto-Scandinavian Antiquities; by the English the city was named Divelin, Duvelin, and lastly Dublin, all of which names were derived from the Irish Dubl-linn, and Latinised Dublinium, and sometimes Dublinia and Eblana.

The river Liffey, according to the Book of Ballymote, derived its name from the circumstance of a battle having been fought near it by the Milesians against the Tuath De Danans and Fomorians; and the horse of the Milesian monarch Heremon, which was named Gabhar Liffe, signifying the steed Liffe, having been killed there, the river was called Liffe or Liffey. In Irish it was called Amhain Liffe, signifying the river Liffey, which was anglicised Avon Liffey, and changed in modern times to Anna Liffey.

Raiba, now Rheban, near Athly, in Kildare, is mentioned on Ptolemy's Map as one of the celebrated cities of Ireland in the second century; and it is said by some antiquaries to have derived its name from Riogh-ban, signifying the habitation or fortress of the kings. Limni or Lamni, now the island of Lambay, off the coast of Dublin, is also placed on Ptolemy's Map; and Tacitus, in his Life of Agricola, in the first century, states that the ports of Ireland were better known to commerce than those of Britain, and from these ancient authorities it appears that the harbours and cities of Ireland were well known to traders and mariners two thousand years ago.

The Danes and Norwegians, as already stated in the preceding part of these notes, having settled in Dublin and the adjoining parts from the ninth to the twelfth century, many of the inhabitants of Dublin and Meath are of Danish descent, but mixed by intermarriages with the old natives of the Milesian race. The Fingallians, or people inhabiting the territory called Fingall, along the coast between Dublin and Drogheda, are considered to be chiefly of Danish and Norwegian origin, and many families of note in Ireland are mentioned in O'Brien's Dictionary and other works to be of Danish descent, as the Plunketts, Betaghs, Cruises, was slain by the sons of Bryan of the Wood, the son of Owen O'Neill.

Dowdalls, Dromgooles, Sweetmans or Swedemans, and Palmers in Dublin, Meath, and Louth; and the Goulds, Coppingers, Skiddys, Terrys, and Trants, in Cork. Many of the Danish settlers are considered to have taken Irish surnames, and prefixed Mae to their names, as did many of the Anglo-Norman and English families in early times; but it does not appear that any of those settlers adopted the prefix O, as that was confined chiefly to the Milesian families of the highest rank. The following Anglo-Norman or English families adopted Irish surnames:—the de Burgos or Burkes of Connaught, took the name of Mae William, and some of them that of Mac Philip; the de Angulos or Nangles of Meath and Mayo, changed the name to Mae Costello; the de Exeters of Mayo, to Mae Jordan; the Barretts of Mayo, to Mae Wattin; the Stauntons of Mayo, to Mae Aveeley, in Irish Mae-an-Mhílidh, signifying the son of the Knight; the de Berminghams of Connaught and other places, to Mae Feorais or Peorais, signifying the son of Pierce, from one of their chiefs; the Fitzsimons of the King's county, to Mae Ruddery, signifying the son of the Knight, from Rídire, a knight; the Poers of Kilkenny and Waterford, to Mae Shere; the Butlers, to Mae Pierce; the Fitzgeralds, to Mae Thomas and Mae Maurice; the de Conreys of Cork, to Mae Patriek; the Barrys of Cork, to Mae Adam; and many others in like manner. Many of the Milesian Irish, on the other hand, anglicised their names, of which numerous instances have been given in the course of these topographical notes, and many of them have so translated and twisted their surnames, that it is extremely difficult to determine whether those families are of Irish or English extraction, hence several of them of Irish origin are considered to be of English descent. In the reigns of the Henrys and Edwards many penal acts of parliament were passed, compelling the ancient Irish to adopt English surnames, and the English language, dress, manners, and customs, and no doubt many of the Milesian Irish took English surnames in those times, to protect their lives and properties, as otherwise they forfeited their goods and were liable to be punished as Irish enemies. In modern times, many of the old Irish families omit the O and Mae in their surnames, an absurd practice, as such names lose much of their euphonious sound by the omission, and such names are neither English nor Irish; and it may be observed that none of the Scotch Maes omit that national designation, or metamorphose their names as the Irish have done. Without O and Mae, the Irish have no names according to the old verse.

"Per O, atque Mae, veros cognoscis Hibernos
His dubus demptis, nullus Hibernus adest."

"By Mae and O, you'll always know
True Irishmen, they say;
But if they lack both O and Mae,
No Irishmen are they."

Irish Chiefs and Clans.—The following accounts of the ancient chiefs of the territories now forming the counties of Dublin and Kildare, together with some of the princes and chiefs of Meath, of whom a full account has not been given in the note on Meath, have been collected from the topographies of O'Dugan, O'Heerin, the Annals of the Four Masters, O'Brien, O'Halloran, Mac Geoghegan, Ware, O'Flaherty, Charles O'Connor, Seward, and various other sources. In the notes on Cualan, Leix, and Offaley, accounts have been given of various chiefs who possessed parts of the present counties of Kildare and Dublin, as the O'Conors, princes of Offaley, the O'Moores, princes of Leix, the O'Dempseys, lords of Clan Maliere, all of whom possessed parts of Kildare. The O'Tooles, princes of Imaile, in Wicklow, also possessed some of the southern parts of Kildare; and the O'Tooles, together with the O'Byrnes, extended their power over the southern parts of Dublin, comprising the districts in the Dublin mountains.

O'Dugan's Topography, of which an account has been given in the introduction to these Annals, and which describes the territories possessed by the Irish chiefs, in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, commences with a description of the territories possessed by the princes and chiefs of Meath, from which the following passages are literally translated from the Irish:

Roderick, son of David O'Moore, tanist of Leix (in the Queen's county), died.

"Let us travel around Fodhla (Ireland),
Let men proceed to proclaim these tidings;
From the lands where we now are,
The five provinces we shall investigate.

"Let us first advance to Tara,
To the plain of the well-formed fortress;
This timely invitation let no man neglect,
Let all come forward to meet us there.

"Let all the chiefs of the men of Erin come
To Tara of the heroes of mighty deeds,
No journey shall farther extend,
No man shall be without his estate.

"There the free-born host shall say,
Proclaim to us our nobles on all sides,
Of the prosperous hosts of each existing tribe
Let the chief of each territory be recorded.

"We give the pre-eminence to Tara,
Before all the melodious, mirthful Gael;
To all its chieftains and its tribes,
And to its just and rightful laws.

It is not unjust to mention O'Melaghlin
More than over Meath alone;
A warlike race, rewarding the clans,
The noble Ardriagh (high king) of Erin."

I. O'Maoilseachlain, O'Maoileachlain, or O'Melaghlin. The O'Melaghlinns were the head family of the southern Hy Niall race, called Clan Colman, and, as already stated in the note on Bregia, at p. 292, took their name from Maoilseachlain, or Malachy I., king of Meath, and monarch of Ireland in the ninth century; and they were for many centuries kings of Meath, and several of them monarchs of Ireland, or supreme sovereigns. Many of them were also styled kings of Tara, princes of Bregia, and lords of Clan Colman; the territory called Clan Colman was situated in ancient Tethia, and comprised the middle and southern parts of the present county of Westmeath, and was afterwards possessed by the Anglo-Norman families of the de Laeys, lords of Meath; the Petits, who became barons of Mullingar; the Tuites, barons of Moyashell; the D'Altons, lords of Rathconrath; the Dillons, barons of Kilkenny West, and others. The O'Melaghlinns, as kings of Meath, had their chief residence at Dun-na-Sciath, or the Fortress of the Shields, situated on the banks of Lough Ainnin, now Lough Ennell, near Mullingar, and Murtogh O'Melaghlin was king of Meath at the time of the Anglo-Norman invasion; his kingdom was transferred to Hugh de Laey by a grant from Henry II. as hereafter explained, and he was the last independent king of Meath; but the O'Melaghlinns, for many centuries afterwards, amidst incessant and fierce contests with the English settlers, maintained their position and considerable possessions in Westmeath, with their titles of kings and princes of Meath and lords of Clan Colman, down to the reign of Elizabeth; and many distinguished chiefs of the O'Melaghlinns are mentioned in the course of these Annals from the tenth to the sixteenth century. Some chiefs of them are also mentioned during the Cromwellian and Williamite wars, but after those periods all their estates were confiscated, and in modern times scarcely any of the O'Melaghlinns are to be found, and it is said that the name has been changed to Mae Loughlin. It is remarkable, that of the five royal Milesian families, all of whom were eligible to the monarchy, none have become so utterly decayed as the O'Melaghlinns, for of the others, namely, the O'Neills, kings of Ulster; the O'Conors, kings of Connaught, and the O'Briens, kings of Munster, many high families still exist, and the Mae Murroghs, kings of Leinster, are represented by the O'Cavenaghs of Carlow.

Ross, the son of Anthony O'Moore, was killed by Cahir, the son of Laiseach, son of Cahir O'Dempsey.

II. Mac Eochagáin, or Mac Geoghegan, chief of Cenel Fiachaidh, is thus mentioned by O'Dugan:

"Precedence be given to the heroic clan,
The noble tribe of Mac Geoghegan;
The host of the delightful verdant lands,
Their rule over the warlike Kinel Fiacha."

The Mac Geoghegans took their name from Eochagan, one of their ancient chiefs, and were a branch of the southern Hy Niall, or Clan Colman, and held the territory of Kinel Fiacha, which was so called from being possessed by the descendants of Fiachaidh, one of the sons of Niall of the Hostages, monarch of Ireland in the fifth century. The territory of Kinel Fiacha comprised, according to Mac Geoghegan in his History of Ireland, the barony of Moycashel, with parts of Moyashel, Rathconrath, and Fertullagh, and the districts about Mullingar, in Westmeath. The Mac Geoghegans were styled princes of Kinel Fiacha, and lords of Moycashel, and many celebrated and valiant chiefs of them, who defeated the English forces in several battles, have been already mentioned in these Annals, and Richard Mac Geoghegan, a distinguished commander in the war against Elizabeth, was particularly celebrated for his defence of the castle of Dunboy, in the county of Cork. The Mac Geoghegans held their rank, and considerable possessions, in Westmeath, down to the Cromwellian wars and revolution, after which their estates were confiscated.

III. O'Hairt or O'Hart, O'Riagain or O'Regan, O'Ceallaigh or O'Kelly, and O'Conghalaigh, or O'Connolly, are mentioned by O'Dugan as princes of Tara, and thus designated:

"The princes of Tara I here record,
The royal O'Hart, and likewise O'Regan,
The host who purchased the harbours
Were the O'Kellys and O'Connollys."

These princes of Tara were also styled princes of Bregia, and appear to have possessed the territories about Tara in Meath, and also parts of the present county of Dublin. The O'Kellys, princes of Bregia, possessed a large territory, comprising a part of Fingall, and were a branch of the southern Hy Niall, and therefore of a different race from the O'Kellys, princes of Hy Maine, in Galway. The O'Regans, princes of Bregia, are mentioned by the annalists in the 10th and 11th centuries, during the wars with the Danes; and according to Ware, and the Annals of Ulster, in the year 1029, Mahon O'Regan prince of Bregia, defeated and took prisoner Aulaf, son of Sitric, king of the Danes of Dublin, and compelled him to redeem himself by a ransom of three ounces of gold, together with the celebrated sword of Carolus, two hundred cows, and eighty British steeds.

IV. O'Flanagan, Mac Flanagan, or the son of Flanagan, prince of Bregia, and Mac Fogarty, or the son of Fogarty, prince of South Bregia, are mentioned in the Annals of the Four Masters, in the tenth century, in some battles with the Danes, but it is difficult to say whether these names were then established as surnames.

V. O'Ruaidhri, or O'Rory, a name anglicised to Rogers, is mentioned by O'Dugan as prince of Fionnfochla, and thus designated:

"Of the men of Bregia an experienced chief Is O'Rory, prince of Fionnfochla."

VI. O'Ciardha, O'Carey, or O'Keary, chief of Cairbre O'Ciardha, is thus mentioned by O'Dugan and O'Heerin:

"O'Carey rules over Carberry of bards,
He is of the tribe of Niall of the Nine Hostages.
There are none but themselves there,
Of the clans of Niall over Leinster."

"Over Carberry of Leinster of the sloping grounds
Rules O'Carey of the red-handled swords;
The hero of Allen, whose aid is indispensable,
By whom battalions were marshalled about Croghan."

O'Neill, i. e. Con, the son of Henry, entered O'Kane's country, where he committed great depredations, and took with him their hostages.

These O'Carneys were chiefs of note, often mentioned in the course of the Annals, and possessed the territory which now forms the barony of Carberry, in the county of Kildare, and there are still many families of the name in the counties of Meath, Westmeath, and Kildare.

VII. O'Murcain, chief of Fidhgaibhle, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"Over Liffey's plain of the fertile slopes, O'Murcain is chief of the district of green Fidhgabhla."

VIII. O'Bracain, or Brackens, are mentioned by O'Brien as chiefs of Moy Liffey. The O'Murcains and O'Brackens appear to have possessed the districts along the Liffey, near Dublin.

IX. O'Callaidh, or O'Kelly, chief of Tuath Leighe, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"Delightful is the district, its fame has spread,
Tuath Leghe of the shining slopes;
O'Kelly of Leighe, from the eastern strand,
Is chief of the pleasant country of yews."

These O'Kellys possessed a territory near the river Barrow, parts of the baronies of West Narragh and Kilkea, in the county of Kildare; and they were sometimes called Mac Kellys, and, according to Rawson, in his Survey of Kildare, they had their chief residence and castle at Rathascul, or the Moat of Ascul, near Athly, and they also had the district about Naas.

X. O'Gealbroin, chief of Clar Liffe, is thus mentioned by O'Heerin:

"The plain of Liffey of the Black Ships,
A verdant country of the finest produce,
Westward of Tara of the house of Conn,
O'Gealbroin is the stately chief of the fair lands."

From the description of this territory of Clar Liffey, or the Plain of the Liffey, westward of Tara, it appears to have been situated on the plains of the Liffey, on the borders of Dublin and Kildare.

XI. O'Fiachra or O'Fiachry, chief of Hy Ineacbruis at Almhúin; and O'Haodha, O'Hugh, or O'Hea, chief of Hy Deadhaidh, are mentioned as follows by O'Heerin:

"Over the entire of Hy Ineacbruis
Ruled O'Fiachry, chief of Allen;
O'Hugh over Hy Deadhaidh of learned men,
To whom tribes bow in submission."

These territories were situated in Kildare, Allen being mentioned as the residence of one of those chiefs, and they probably comprised parts of the baronies of Connell and Clane, or perhaps parts of Oughteranny and Ikeath.

XII. O'Muirthe, or O'Muiridhe, probably O'Murry, chief of Cinnel Flaithreamhuin, and O'Fintighearn, chief of Hy Mealla, are thus designated by O'Heerin:

"O'Murry of great eloquence
Is chief of fair Kinel Flahavan;
Over Hy Mealla of the fast-sailing ships,
Firmly settled is the chief O'Fintierney."

The territories of those chiefs were situated in Kildare, and the parish of Dunmurry, in the barony of East Ophaley, was probably part of O'Murry's possessions. O'Fintierney's district appears to have adjoined it, and was probably in West Ophaley, near the Barrow, from the mention made of ships in the poem.

XIII. The O'Cullens are mentioned by Mac Geoghegan, in his account of the chiefs of Leinster, to have possessed a territory called Coille Culluín, or the Woods of Cullen, on the borders of Kildare and Wicklow, which now forms the barony of Kilcullen, in Kildare, and there are still respectable families of that name there, and in other parts of the county.

O'Donnell, i.e. Hugh Roe, the son of Niall Gary, marched with a force into Trian Congail, in harvest, and committed great depredations, and took immense plunder, in the Routes (in Antrim), on Mac Quillan, without sustaining any injury, except that, his son Con received a wound; he, after that,

XIV. The O'Colgans were ancient chiefs in Kildare, and there are still many respectable families of the name in that county. The Mac Donnells were also numerous and respectable in Kildare. The O'Dempseys and O'Dunns, of whom accounts have been given in the notes on Offaley and Leix, were chiefs of note in the King's and Queen's counties, and also in Kildare, where there are still many respectable families of those names.

XV. O'Dubhthaigh or O'Duffy.—The O'Duffys were one of the Leinster clans of the Cahirian race, and of the same descent as the Mac Murroughs, kings of Leinster, and the O'Tooles and O'Byrnes, chiefs of Wicklow. They were originally located in Leinster, in the counties of Kildare and Curlew, and afterwards in Dublin and Meath; and in modern times are chiefly found in Louth, Monaghan, and Cavan, and they also appear to have been of considerable note in former times in Connaught, in the counties of Galway and Roscommon, and many of them were eminent ecclesiastics, of whom accounts are given in the Four Masters, Ware's Bishops, and other works, from which the following notices have been collected. Donal O'Duffy, archbishop of Connaught, that is, of Tuam, and also bishop of Elphin and Clonmacnois, died at Clonfert, A.D. 1136, and was buried there on St. Patrick's day. Muiredach O'Duffy, archbishop of Tuam, died A.D. 1150, in the 75th year of his age, and was buried in the abbey of Cong; he is praised by the annalists as the most eminent prelate in Ireland of his time, for wisdom and hospitality; in the year 1143, according to the Annals of Inisfallen, he convened a synod of twelve bishops and five hundred priests, to consider of the means of ransoming Roderick, son of Torlogh O'Connor, king of Connaught, who had been taken prisoner by Tiarnan O'Rourke, prince of Brefney, and kept in confinement by his father Torlogh. Cadhla or Catholcus O'Duffy, a prelate eminent for learning and wisdom, was archbishop of Tuam for a period of forty years, in the latter end of the twelfth century, and died A.D. 1201, at a very advanced age, in the abbey of Cong; he was one of the ambassadors who, in A.D. 1175, concluded a treaty of peace at Oxford, between king Henry II. and king Roderick O'Connor; and in 1179 he was one of the Irish prelates who attended at the council of Lateran. Flanachan O'Duffy, bishop of Elphin, died A.D. 1168; and William O'Duffy, a Franciscan friar, bishop of Clonmacnois, died A.D. 1297. Several abbots of the name are mentioned in the annalists; amongst others, Flanachan O'Duffy, abbot of Roscommon, and prelector of Tuam, who died A.D. 1097. Muiredach O'Duffy established the abbey of Boyle in Roscommon, A.D. 1161, and another Muiredach O'Duffy, abbot of Roscommon, died A.D. 1174, at an advanced age.

XVI. The Fagans, some of whom have been called O'Fagans and Mac Fagans, are considered by some to be of Irish origin, but according to others they were of English descent, and the name is still numerous in the counties of Meath, Westmeath, and Dublin. In former times the Fagans of Feltrim, near Dublin, and other parts of that county, were highly respectable, and held extensive possessions, and an account of many of them in the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries, who were high-sheriffs in Meath and Dublin, and held other important offices, is given in D'Alton's History of the county of Dublin; and in modern times many of them were distinguished military commanders in the British and French service.

XVII. The O'Connollys were in former times numerous and respectable in the counties of Meath, Dublin, and Kildare. The Right Hon. William Connolly, about a century ago, held the extensive estates of Rathfarnham, and other adjoining districts in the county of Dublin; and the Right Hon. Thomas Connolly, the celebrated speaker of the Irish House of Commons, had one of the most magnificent mansions in Ireland, near Leixlip, in Kildare. These Connollys were probably of Irish descent, though stated to have been English by sir Jonah Barrington in his Rise and Fall of the Irish Nation; and it may be observed, that, as above shown in this article, the O'Connollys are mentioned by O'Dugan as one of the princes of Tara.

XVIII. The O'Murphys, chiefs in Wexford, of whom an account has been given in the note on Ily Kinsellagh, were, in former times, and are also at the present day numerous in the counties of Dublin and Meath, and there are many respectable families of the name.

XIX. The O'Mullens are one of the Leinster clans, and were numerous in Meath, Dublin, and Kildare.

XX. Mac Giollamocholmog and O'Dunchadha or O'Donoghoe, are mentioned in O'Dugan as lords or princes of Fine Gall, that is, of Fingall near Dublin; and it may be observed, that there was another Mac Giollamocholmog, lord of a territory on the borders of Wicklow, and mentioned in the note on Cualan.

XXI. O'Muircheartaigh or O'Murtogh, chief of the tribe or territory of O'Maine; and O'Modarn, chief of Kinel Eochuain, are mentioned in O'Dugan as chiefs over the Britons or Welsh, and appear to have been located near Duhlin.

XXII. Mac Muireagain, prince of East Liffey, is mentioned in the Annals in some battles with the Danes in the tenth century.

The O'Melaghlin, kings of Meath and princes of Bregia, and the other princes of Bregia mentioned in the preceding part of this article, ruled over all those parts of the present county of Dublin, north of the river Liffey; and the Danish kings of Dublin in the ninth, tenth, eleventh, and part of the twelfth century, as already explained, ruled over that part of the county of Dublin called Fingall.

Grant of the Kingdom of Meath to Hugh de Laey.—In A.D. 1172, Hugh de Laey, an Anglo-Norman nobleman, descended from the de Lacys, earls of Lincoln, in England, and of whom an account has been given in a note at page 18 in these Annals, got a grant from king Henry II., for the service of fifty knights, of the ancient kingdom of Meath, which comprised, as already stated, the present counties of Meath and Westmeath, part of Longford, with the greater part of the county of Dublin, and parts of Kildare and King's county; de Laey was made Lord Palatine of Meath, having all the power and privileges of an independent prince, to hold that great territory with all the authority by which it had been held by Murtogh O'Melaghlin, then king of Meath, according to the following document conferring the grant, dated at Wexford, A.D. 1172, and thus given by Ware, translated from the original Latin.—“Henry, by the grace of God, king of England, duke of Normandy and Aquitaine, and earl of Anjou, to the archbishops, bishops, abbots, earls, barons, justices, and to all his ministers, and faithful subjects, French, English, and Irish, of all his dominions, greeting: know ye that I have given and granted, and by this my charter confirmed unto Hugh de Laey, in consideration of his services, the land of Meath, with the appurtenances, to have and to hold of me and my heirs, to him and his heirs, by the service of fifty knights in as full and ample manner as Murchard Hu Melaghlin held it, or any other person before him or after him; and as an addition I give to him all fees, which he owes or shall owe to me about Duvelin (Dublin), while he is my bailiff, to do me service in my city of Duvelin. Wherefore I will and strictly command, that the said Hugh and his heirs, shall enjoy the said land, with all liberties which I have therein, or can grant or confirm to him by this my charter. Witness, earl Richard (Strongbow), son of Gilbert; William de Brosa, and many others, at Weisford.” King John confirmed this grant to Walter de Laey, lord of Meath, the son of Hugh, in the ninth year of his reign, by the services before-mentioned, and gave him besides his fees in proceeded to Belfast, where he took and demolished the castle, and returned home safe, with immense booty.

Fingall, in the vale of Dublin, by the services of seven knights, to hold to him and his heirs for ever. De Lacy reserved to himself a great part of this extensive territory, and had his chief residence at Trim, where he erected a large and strong castle, of which some magnificent ruins still remain; he also built many other castles in Meath and Westmeath, but was killed A.D. 1186, as recorded in these Annals, by an Irish galloglass, with the blow of a battle-axe, which cut off his head, at Durrow, in the King's county, where he was superintending the erection of a castle. The de Lacys, his descendants, were for a long time very powerful as lords of Meath, and earls of Ulster, in which titles they were succeeded by the great families of the de Genevilles, lords of Meath; and the Mortimers, lords of Meath, and earls of Ulster, and earls of March, in England. Hugh de Lacy conferred extensive grants in various parts of the kingdom of Meath, on several Anglo-Norman chiefs who were styled de Lacy's barons, and of whom an account has been given in the note on Meath; amongst others the de Nogents or Nugents, who became barons of Delvin, and earls of Westmeath; the Flemings, barons of Slane; the Tyrrells, barons of Castleknock, near Dublin; the Petits, barons of Mullingar; the Tuites, barons of Moyashell in Westmeath; the Nangles, barons of Navan; the Husseys, barons of Galtrim in Meath; the Phepoe and Marwards, barons of Skreen in Meath, and of Santry in Dublin, &c. Almost the whole of Ireland was in like manner granted by Henry II., and other kings of England, to various great Anglo-Norman families, of whom full accounts have been given in the course of these topographical annotations, as, for instance, various counties of Leinster, to the descendants of Strongbow, and to the Marshalls, earls of Pembroke; Kildare, to the de Vesey and Fitzgeralds, earls of Kildare; Cork and Kerry to the Fitzgeralds, earls of Desmond, and the Fitzmaurices, earls of Kerry, the de Cogan, Carews, Barrys, Roches, and others; Kilkenny and Tipperary to the Butlers, earls of Ormond, and others; Waterford to the le Poers; Clare and Limerick to the de Clares, &c.; Connaught to the de Burgos or Burkes, lords of Connaught, and earls of Ulster, the de Bermingham, barons of Athenry, and many others; and Ulster to John de Courcy and his followers; but as stated in the historical relations of sir John Davies, none of the Irish lords got a grant of his country for the space of three hundred years after the arrival of the English in Ireland, except O'Brien, king of Thomond, who got a grant of part of his own country, but only during the minority of king Henry III., and Roderick O'Connor, king of Connaught, to whom king Henry II. granted the privilege of holding in subjection to him his kingdom of Connaught.

The Counties of Dublin and Kildare.—Parts of the territories of Moy Liffey and Bregia, with a portion of Cualan, were formed into the county of Duhlin, A.D. 1210, in the reign of king John, and according to D'Alton's History of Dublin, page 39, the county of Dublin, in the sixteenth century, extended from Balrothery to Arklow, thus comprising a great part of the present county of Wicklow.

In the reign of king John, parts of the territories of Moy Liffey, Offaley, Leix, and Cualan, were formed into the county of Kildare, but it was only a liberty dependant on the jurisdiction of the sheriffs of Dublin until A.D. 1296, in the reign of Edward I., when Kildare was constituted a distinct county. It was called Coill-Dara, signifying the Wood of Oaks, as oak forests abounded there in ancient times, or, according to others, Cill-Dara, which meant the Church of the Oaks, as it is said the first church founded at the now town of Kildare was built amidst oaks, hence Kildare may signify either the Wood of Oaks, or the Church of Oaks.

The county of Dublin abounds in scenery of great magnificence and beauty along its mountains, sea-coast, and the vale of the Liffey, and its rich and cultivated plains present a vast number of fine demesnes and splendid seats of the nobility and gentry. The territory of ancient Bregia, comprising a great part of the present

O'Reilly, i. e. John, the son of Torlogh, son of John, and O'Ferrall, i. e. Cormac, the son of John, son of Donal, plundered the plain of Brawney, (in counties of Meath and Dublin, and containing about half a million of acres of the finest lands in Ireland, presents vast plains of unbounded fertility.

The Curragh of Kildare, celebrated as a race-course, is an extensive tract about six miles in length, and two in breadth, containing about five thousand acres; it is a level or gently undulating plain of surpassing beauty, covered with the most exquisite verdure, and forms a more delightful lawn than the hand of art has ever made.

The Bog of Allen is chiefly situated in Kildare, but also extends into the King's and Queen's counties, and partly into Westmeath, and is estimated to contain about three hundred thousand acres; it is, like the other bogs of Ireland, composed chiefly of the remains of ancient forests of oak, pine, yew, hazel, birch, alder, mountain-ash, and poplar, and the vast quantity of bogs in Ireland shews the great extent of the forests in former times, and hence one of the ancient names of Ireland was Fiodh-Inis, signifying the Woody-Island.

Gold Mines.—In the reign of Tigearmas, one of the Milesian monarchs, about nine centuries before the Christian era, according to our old annalists, a gold mine was discovered near the river Liffey, and the gold was worked by an artificer skilled in metals, named Uachadan, of the men of Cualan, a territory which, as already explained, comprised the county of Wicklow, with some of the southern part of Dublin; this Uachadan is supposed to have been one of the Tuath De Danan, who were famous for their skill in the arts, and after they had been conquered by the Milesians, continued to be the chief artificers of the kingdom, as workers in metals, builders, mechanics, &c. In an ancient Irish poem on the Tuath De Danan, by the celebrated Flann, abbot of Monaster Boyce in Louth, in the eleventh century, as contained in the Book of Ballymote, an account is given of the gold mine discovered near the Liffey, which is thus mentioned in the following passage translated from the poem:—

"It was Tigearmas first established in Ireland
The art of dyeing cloth of purple and other colours,
And the ornamenting of drinking cups, and goblets,
And breast pins, for mantles, of gold and silver.

"And by his directions Uachadan of Cualan
Was the first man of his tribe, as I record,
Who ingeniously introduced the operation
Of refining gold in this kingdom of Erin."

In modern times Wicklow has become celebrated for its gold mines, discovered in the mountain of Croghan Kinshella, near Arklow, in the year 1796, by one of the country people, who found a small piece of pure gold in a rivulet running from the mountain, and the fame of this having soon spread, vast numbers of the peasantry assembled to make further searches, and collected in a few months of this alluvial gold washed down by the mountain streams, about three thousand ounces, which sold for about ten thousand pounds sterling; some of the pieces found were very large, and one solid lump of nearly pure gold weighed twenty-three ounces, another eighteen, others ten and seven ounces, and so on to pieces of one ounce, half ounce, quarter ounce, &c. This native gold was of a beautiful rich yellow, and very fine, being only alloyed with minute portions of silver, copper, or iron. The government took the mines into their possession, and worked them for about two years, but then abandoned them, as not sufficiently productive. According to Cox, in his Hibernia Anglicana, John, duke of Bedford, regent of France, and brother to king Henry V., obtained, in the reign of Henry VI. A.D. 1426, a patent for all the mines of gold and silver in England and Ireland, rendering to the church a tenth part, to the king the fifteenth part, and a twentieth part to the owner of the soil; from this it might be inferred that there were mines of gold and silver in Ireland at that time. From the vast quantities of massive ornaments of very remote antiquity, made of pure gold, as torques, or golden collars, bracelets, gorgets, large rings, crescents, balls, &c., found buried in bogs and in the earth in various parts of Ireland, it is considered that there were gold mines extensively worked in ancient times, of which there are now no records to be found; and it is difficult to account for the origin of so much gold, unless it might have been brought to Ireland by traders from Spain, or other countries with which the Irish had intercourse in those early ages. The Danes are said to have worked gold and silver mines in different parts of Ireland, and they established mints in Dublin and other places, and many of the silver coins of Sitrick, and other Danish kings of Dublin, still remain in museums in Ireland, of which accounts may be found in Simon's work on Irish coins; and in Fraser's Survey of Wexford it is stated, that in the tenth century the Danes worked silver mines at Clonmines, near Wexford, and had a mint, and coined money in that city. In Wicklow are extensive copper and lead mines, and in various parts of Dublin are lead mines, many of which contain silver, as mentioned in Archer's and Dutton's Surveys of Dublin. A full account of various valuable mines, in different counties, will be found in that admirable work, Kane's Industrial Resources of Ireland. Numerous remains of cromleacs, sepulchral mounds, raths, round towers, and other antiquities, as mentioned in the preceding parts of the notes on Moy Liffey, together with ruins of castles, abbeys, churches, &c., exist in various parts of Dublin and Kildare, of which accounts may be found in the Antiquities of Ware and Grose, in the Topographies of Seward and Lewis, and Rawson's Survey of Kildare; on the county of Dublin, D'Alton's valuable history will afford ample information.

Westmeath), and Donogh, son of Bryan Caoch, son of Donal Buighc O'Ferrall, was slain on that expedition.

The English Pale.—The term Pale, signifying a fence or inclosure, was applied to those English settlements in Ireland within which their laws and authority prevailed, and the designation Pale appears to have been first applied to the English territory about the beginning of the fourteenth century. Spenser in his View of Ireland, written in the reign of Elizabeth, speaking of the invasion of Edward Bruce, in the year 1316, says, "he burned and spoiled all the old English Pale." The extent of the Pale varied much at different periods, and Spenser says again of Bruce's forces, "they marched forth into the English Pale, which then was chiefly in the North, from the point of Dunluce (county of Antrim), and beyond into Dublin, having in the midst Knockfergus (Carrickfergus), Belfast, Armagh, and Carlingford, which are now the most out-bounds and abandoned places in the English Pale, and indeed not counted of the English Pale at all, for it stretcheth now no further than Dundalk towards the North." According as the English power extended, so did the Pale, and it was considered to comprise at some periods the counties of Antrim, Down, part of Armagh, Louth, Meath, Westmeath, Dublin, Kildare, King's and Queen's Counties, Carlow, Kilkenny, Tipperary, Waterford, Wexford, and part of Wicklow; but in general the name of the Pale was confined to the counties of Dublin, Louth, Meath, and Kildare. Cuypion in his Chronicle says, "An old distinction there is of Ireland into Irish and English Pales, for when the Irish had raised continual tumults against the English planted here with the conquest, at last they coursed them into a narrow circuit of certain shires in Leinster, which the English did choose as the fattest soil, most defensible, their proper right, and most open to receive help from England; hereupon it was termed their Pale, as whereout they durst not peep; but now, both within this Pale uncivil Irish and some rebels do dwell, and without it countries and cities English are well governed." It appears that the Irish who dwelt within the Pale, and acknowledged English authority, were considered as subjects, and had to a certain extent the protection of English laws; but all the Irish outside the Pale were styled Irish enemies, not being recognised as subjects; while the Anglo-Irish, or Irish of English descent, who resisted the government, were termed English rebels, being accounted as subjects. The native Irish, according to Sir John Davies, being reputed as aliens, or rather enemies, it was adjudged no felony to kill a mere Irishman in time of peace; and it appears that if an Englishman killed one of the mere Irish, he was only fined a mark. Various penal laws against the native Irish were passed in the parliaments of the Pale, particularly the Statute of Kilkenny, A.D. 1367, in the reign of Edward III., which prohibited, under the penalty of high treason, any intermarriages, fosterage, or similar connections, between the families of English descent and the native Irish; and imprisonment, fines, and forfeiture of lands and goods, were inflicted on such English as permitted the Irish to pasture or graze their cattle on their lands; and similar penalties, prohibiting the appointment or promotion of any of the native Irish to bishops' sees, abbacies, church livings, or any ecclesiastical preferments; and that any person of English race speaking the Irish language, or adopting Irish names, dress, customs, or manners, should forfeit all their goods, lands, and tenements. In the reigns of the Henrys and Edwards, various other penal laws were passed against the native Irish, to compel them to change their names and take English surnames; to give up the use of the Irish language, and speak only English; to adopt the English dress, manners, and customs; to cut off their glibs, or flowing locks, and shave their upper lips at least once in a fortnight, otherwise to be punished as Irish enemies. The Irish resisted the relinquishment of their ancient customs, as they were extremely partial to wearing long flowing hair and beards on their upper lips, and notwithstanding these penal enactments, the Irish continued for centuries to use only their own language, manners, and customs.

Tomaltach, son of Bryan Mac Donogh, was killed by Hugh, the son of Donal Cam Mac Donogh, and his sons.

The Knights of St. George.—In the reign of Edward IV., the Knights or Brotherhood of St. George, so called from their captain or chief commander being elected annually on St. George's day, was instituted for the defence of the English Pale; and their force consisted of two hundred armed men, namely, 120 archers on horseback, with 40 other horsemen, and 40 pages. This fraternity of men-at-arms, as stated by Sir John Davies, Cox, and others, was instituted A.D. 1475, and consisted of thirteen of the most noble and worthy persons in the four counties of the Pale; and on its first formation the persons appointed were Thomas Fitzgerald, earl of Kildare, Sir Roland FitzEustace, baron of Portlester, and Sir Robert Eustace, for the county of Kildare; Robert St. Lawrence, baron of Howth, Sir Robert Dowdall, and the Mayor of Dublin, for the county of Dublin; Robert Preston, viscount Gormanstown, Edward Plunkett, seneschal of Meath, Alexander Plunkett, and Barnaby Barnwall, for the county of Meath; and for the county of Louth, Sir Laurence Taaffe, Richard Bellew, and the Mayor of Drogheda. This military society continued for about twenty years, but in A.D. 1495, in the reign of Henry VII., was suppressed, the taxes levied for its support becoming obnoxious, and the body not having accomplished the objects of its institution.

The Parliaments.—An account of the great national conventions held at Tara and other places, the parliaments of ancient Ireland, has been given at page 297, in the note on Bregia. After the Anglo-Norman invasion, the Anglo-Irish barons and chief governors held many great councils, sometimes called parliaments, in the reigns of Henry II., King John, Henry III., and Edward I., but according to Lord Mountnorres, in his history of the Irish parliament, the first parliament regularly assembled in Ireland was in the beginning of the fourteenth century, A.D. 1316, in the reign of Edward II., and convened in consequence of the invasion of Ireland by Edward Bruce. Numerous parliaments were held during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, particularly the celebrated parliament at Kilkenny, convened by the lord lieutenant, Lionel, duke of Clarence, A.D. 1367, in the reign of Edward III., in which was passed the act called the Statute of Kilkenny, enacting several penal laws against the Irish, as above stated in the account of the English Pale; and the no less celebrated parliament held at Drogheda, A.D. 1494, in the reign of Henry VII., by the lord deputy, Sir Edward Poynning, in which was passed the Hugh, i. e. the O'Connor, the son of Felim Fionn, was taken prisoner by the sons of O'Kelly.

Torlogh, the son of Felim Fionn O'Connor, the best lord's son of his age that lived of his tribe for a long time, was slain by the sons of Roderick, son of Felim (O'Connor), aided by the son of Mac act called Poyning's Law, which rendered the Irish parliament completely subordinate to the parliament of England, and no act could be passed in Ireland without the assent of the privy council and parliament of England. The Irish, or rather Anglo-Irish, parliaments were convened chiefly in Dublin, but often also at various other cities and towns, as Drogheda, Trim, Kildare, Naas, Castledermot, Carlow, Kilkenny, Cashel, Limerick, Waterford, and Wexford. These parliaments, it appears, were confined to Leinster, Munster, and Meath, and chiefly to those counties constituting the English Pale, namely, Dublin, Louth, Meath, and Kildare, as in those times the English authority was not sufficiently established in Ulster and Connaught, those provinces not being all formed into counties, or sheriffs regularly appointed at that period. During the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, the Irish princes and chiefs did not acknowledge the English authority, nor attend the parliaments, which were composed of the English or Anglo-Irish barons, bishops, and officers of state; but in the sixteenth century, in the reigns of Henry VIII., Edward VI., Mary, and Elizabeth, many of the Irish chiefs having made their submission, and some of them having received peerages, several of them attended the parliaments, and appear to have first attended at a parliament held in Dublin, A.D. 1525, in the reign of Henry VIII., by the lord deputy, Gerald Fitzgerald, earl of Kildare, of which an account is given in those Annals at that year, where it is stated that O'Neill, O'Donnell, and other chiefs, were present. In 1541, a great parliament was assembled in Dublin, by the lord deputy, Anthony St. Leger, which conferred on Henry VIII. the title of King of Ireland, the kings of England being until that time only styled Lords of Ireland; and at this parliament, amongst other Irish princes and chiefs, as mentioned in the despatches of St. Leger, and in the state papers at that period, attended Bryan Mac Gillpatrick, or Fitzpatrick, who had been created baron of Upper Ossory; O'Moore, lord of Leix; O'Cavanagh, of Carlow; and the great O'Reilly, lord of East Breffney or Cavan, who appeared in a splendid dress, which had been sent to him as a present by his Majesty. In 1568, in the reign of Elizabeth, a great parliament was held in Dublin by the lord deputy, Sir Henry Sydney, in which rules were established for the regulation of the Irish parliament, similar to those of the parliament of England, and many of the Irish chiefs attended. It appears that in early times the barons, bishops, knights, citizens, and burgesses, or representatives both of the nobility and commons, sat all together in one assembly; but either in the reign of Henry VIII. or Elizabeth, they were separated into two houses, or lords and commons, the nobility and bishops in the house of peers, and the knights, citizens, and burgesses, or representatives of counties, cities, and boroughs, or corporate towns, in the house of commons; and a third place of meeting was also appointed for the clergy, called the house of convocation, where met the archbishops, and bishops, and also the mitred abbots, who sat likewise as spiritual peers or lords of parliament, and the archdeacons, deans, and proctors, also attended parliament. In 1585, in the reign of Elizabeth, a great parliament was convened in Dublin by the lord deputy, Sir John Perrott, and a full account of it is given in these Annals at that year. In Perrott's parliament a far greater number of the Irish chiefs attended than ever had before. In A.D. 1613, in the reign of James I., a great parliament was held in Dublin by the lord deputy, Sir Arthur Chichester, at which attended a great many of the representatives of the chief Milesian families. Down to this time the old Irish regulated their affairs according to their ancient institutions, called Brehon laws, but in the reign of James I. the laws of Brehonism and Tanistry were abolished by act of parliament. The Irish parliaments were to a great extent independent of the parliaments of England until the passing of Poyning's law in 1494, which rendered the Irish parliament subordinate to that of England, and continued in force for a period of 288 years, namely, to 1782, when the independence of the Irish parliament was obtained by the Irish Volunteers, under the earl of Charlemont, the duke of Leinster, Grattan, Flood, and other eminent men; but after a period of eighteen years, the Irish parliament was extinguished, and became merged in that of Great Britain, in the year 1800, by the Act of Union.

Anglo-Norman and English Possessors.—In the account of the grant of the kingdom of Meath to Hugh de Lacey by king Henry II., as explained in the preceding part of this article, de Lacey and his barons became possessed of the greater part of the present county of Dublin. Hugh Tyrrell got the territory about Castleknock, which was long held by his descendants as barons of Castleknock; the Phepoes got Santry and Clontarf, and, according to Mac Geoghegan, Vivian de Cursun got the district of Ratheney, near Dublin, which belonged to Gillacalm, or Giollamocholmog.

In the County and City of Dublin, the following have been the principal families of Anglo-Norman and English descent from the twelfth to the eighteenth century:—The Talbotts, Tyrrells, Plunketts, Prestons, Barnwalls, St. Lawrences, Taylors, Cruises, Cusacks, Cogans, Whites, Walshes, Walls, Warrens, Wogans, Woodlocks, Dareys, Netheravilles, Marwards, Phepoes, Fitzwilliams, Fitzsimons, Flemmings, Archbalds, Archers, Allens, Aylmers, Balls, Bagots, De Bathes, Butlers, Barrys, Barrets, Berminghams, Bretts, Bellews, Blakes, Brabazons, Finglases, Sweetmans, Hollywoods, Howths, Husseys, Burnells, Dowdalls, Dillons, Segraves, Sarsfields, Stanihurts, Lawlesses, Cadells, Evanses, Drakes, Graces, Palmers, Eustaces, Fyans, Fosters, Goughs, Berrills, Bennetts, Browns, Duffs, Nangles, Woders, Tuites, Tews, Trants, Peppards, Luttrells, Rawsons, Vernons, Delahoydes, Ushers, Garnetts, Hamiltons, Domvilles, Coghills, Cohls, Grattans, Molesworths, Latouches, Putlands, Beresfords, Shaws, Smiths, &c. Accounts of all those families, and others, will be found in D'Alton's Histories of Dublin and Drogheda.

In the County of Kildare, the following have been the chief families of Anglo-Norman and English descent: Earl Strongbow, having become heir to the kingdom of Leinster, as son-in-law of Dermot Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, whose daughter Eva he had married, gave grants of various parts of Leinster to his followers, of which accounts are given in Ware, by Maurice Regan, in Harris's Hibernica, and in the chronicles of Hammer and Campion. Amongst other grants, Strongbow gave in Kildare, to Maurice Fitzgerald, Naas, Offelan, which had been O'Kelly's country; to Myler Fitzhenry he gave Carberry; to Robert de Bermingham, Offaley, part of O'Connor's country; to Adam and Richard de Hereford, a large territory about Leixlip, and the district De Saltu Salmonis, or the Salmon Leap, from which the barony of Salt derived its name; and to Robert Fitz Richard he gave the barony of Narragh. The family of de Riddlesford, in the reign of king John, got the district of Castledermot, which was part of the territory of O'Toole, prince of Imaile, in Wicklow, and Richard de St. Michael got from king John the district of Rheban, near Athy, part of O'Moore's country, and from the St. Michaels, lords of Rheban, the manors of Rheban and Woodstock, in Kildare, with Dunamase in the Queen's county, passed to the Fitzgeralds, barons of Offaley, in the year 1424, by the marriage of Thomas Fitzgerald with Dorothea, daughter of Anthony O'Moore, prince of Leix. In the beginning of the thirteenth century, as already explained at p. 250, in the notes on Ossory, Offaley, and Leix, the county of Kildare became the inheritance of Sibilla, one of the daughters of William Marshall, earl of Pembroke, by Isabella, daughter of Strongbow, and grand daughter of Dermot Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, and Sibilla, having married William Ferrars, earl of Derby, he became, in right of his wife, lord of Kildare, which title passed, by intermarriage of his daughter Agnes to William de Vesey, an Anglo-Norman nobleman of the de Vesey family, barons of Knapton in Yorkshire, and this William de Vesey was appointed by king Edward I. lord justice of Ireland, and was lord of Kildare and Rathangan; but having some contests with John Fitz Thomas Fitzgerald, baron of Offaley, who charged him with high treason, it was awarded to decide their disputes by single combat, but de Vesey, having declined the combat, and fled to France, was attainted, and his possessions and titles were conferred on Fitzgerald, who, in A. D. 1316, was created, by king Edward II., earl of Kildare, a title which his descendants still hold, and in modern times were created dukes of Leinster. The Fitzgeralds, descended from the Anglo-Norman baron, Maurice Fitzgerald, who came over with Strongbow, and of whom an account has been given at p. 42, in one of the notes to these Annals, became one of the most powerful families in Ireland, as earls of Kildare and earls of Desmond, and for a period of more than five hundred years the earls of Kildare have held their rank and great possessions, and many of them have been lords lieutenant and chief governors of Ireland at various times during the thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries. The other chief families of English descent in Kildare have been the Aylmers, Archbalds, Bagots, Burghs or Burkes, Butlers, Breretons, Burroughs, Boyces, Dungans, Keatings, Eustaces or Fitz Eustaces, Prestons, Lawlesses, Wogans, Warrens, Whites, Woulfes, Pensonbys, Nangles, Horts, &c. Some of the Aylmers of Kildare became barons of Balrath in Meath, and Arthur Woulfe, chief justice of the King's Bench, who was created viscount Kildarden, was of the Woulfes of Kildare.

Dermott, by the tribe of O'Conor Roe, and by the son of Hugh, son of Roderick, at Caislean Riabhach (Castlereagh, in Roscommon).

Nobility—The following have been the noble families in Dublin and Kildare from the reign of king John to the present time.

In Dublin the de Lacys were lords of Meath, and of a great part of Dublin. In the year 1384, Robert de Vere, earl of Oxford, lord lieutenant of Ireland, was created marquess of Dublin, and duke of Ireland, and in the royal family some of the dukes of Cumberland were earls of Dublin; the Talbotts, a branch of the Talbotts, earls of Shrewsbury, Waterford, and Wexford, have been celebrated families in Dublin and Meath, chiefly at Malahide and Belgard in Dublin, and were created barons of Malahide, and barons Furnival, and of these was Richard Talbot, the celebrated duke of Tyrconnell, lord lieutenant of Ireland, under king James II.; the Plunketts, great families in Dublin, Meath, and Louth, are said to be of Danish descent, and were created barons of Killeen, and earls of Fingall, and branches of them barons of Dunsany in Meath, and barons of Louth; William Conyngham Plunkett, late lord chancellor of Ireland, was created baron Plunkett; the Prestons, viscounts of Gormanstown, and some of them viscounts of Tara; the St. Lawrences, earls of Howth; the Barnwalls, viscounts of Kingsland, and barons of Turvey, and also barons of Trimblestown in Meath; the de Conreys, barons of Kilbarrock; the Fitzwilliams, viscounts of Merriem; the Rawsons, viscounts of Clontarf; the Beaumonts, viscounts of Swords, and the Molesworths, viscounts of Swords; the Temples, viscounts Palmerstown; the Tracys, viscounts of Rathcoole; Patrick Sarsfield, the celebrated commander of the Irish forces under king James II., was created earl of Lucan; and the Binghamms are now earls of Lucan; the marquess of Wharton, lord lieutenant of Ireland, was created earl of Rathfarnham; and the family of Loftus, viscounts of Ely, were earls of Rathfarnham; the Luttrells, earls of Carhampton; the Lecons, earls of Milltown; the Harmanms, viscounts of Oxmantown, the name of an ancient district in the vicinity of Dublin; and the family of Parsons, earls of Rosse, in the king's county, are barons of Oxmantown; the Wenmans, barons of Kilmainham; and the Barrys, barons of Santry; the Caulfields, earls of Charlemont, reside at Clontarf; and the Brabazons, earls of Meath, have extensive possessions in Wicklow and Dublin.

In Kildare the following have been the noble families, the Fitzgeralds, barons of Offaly, earls and marquesses of Kildare, and dukes of Leinster; the title of earl of Leinster was borne by the family of Cholmondeley, in 1659, and the title of duke of Leinster was held by a descendant of duke Schouberg in 1719; the de Veseys, lords of Kildare and Rathangan; the de Lounders, barons of Naas, and the Prestons, barons of Naas; the St. Michaels, barons of Rhehan; the Fitz Eustaces, barons of Kil-

A combined commotion arose against O'Conor, by Roderick, the son of Felim, by the tribe of Teige Oge, and of Teige Roe, and by the tribe of cullen in Kildare, of Portlester in Meath, and viscounts of Ballyglass in Wicklow; the Burkes, barons of Naas, and earls of Mayo; the Berminghams, barons of Carberry; the Wellesleys, barons of Narragh; the Allens, viscounts of Allen in Kildare, and barons of Stillorgan in Dublin; the Burghs barons Down; the Pomeroyes, barons Harberton, and viscounts of Carberry; the Agars, barons of Somerton, and earls of Normanton; the Lawlesses, barons of Cloncurry; and the barons de Robeck; the Moores, marquesses and earls of Drogheda, and barons of Mellifont in Louth, reside at Monastereven in Kildare; the Scotts, earls of Clonmel, and also the family of Clements, earls of Leitrim, have seats in Kildare.

Ecclesiastical Divisions.—The following have been the bishops' sees at various periods in the territories now forming the counties of Dublin and Kildare, of which these accounts have been collected from the works of Ware, Usher, Colgan, Lanigan, Archdall, and various other sources.

St. Bridget.—The three great tutelar saints of Ireland were Patrick, Bridget, and Columkille, of each of whom numerous lives have been collected and published by the learned John Colgan, an Irish Franciscan of the monastery of Louvain, in the Netherlands, in the seventeenth century, in his great work styled Trias Thaumaturga, or the wonder-working Triad, so called in allusion to those three illustrious Irish saints. St. Bridget was of the race of the Heremonians of Leinster, the daughter of a prince named Dubhthach, who was of the same descent as the celebrated Con of the Hundred Battles, monarch of Ireland in the latter end of the second century. Bridget was born, according to Usher, Colgan, Lanigan, and others, in the middle of the fifth century, about A. D. 453, and, according to Lanigan, was only about twelve years old at the time of St. Patrick's death, therefore he considers those accounts erroneous which make her cotemporary with St. Patrick; her birth-place was Fochart, in the district of Muirthemline, in Orgiall, now Faughart, near Dundalk, in the county of Louth, and St. Bernard, in his Life of St. Malachy, archbishop of Armagh, says in a passage quoted by Usher:—"venerunt aliquando tres episcopi in villam Fochart quem dicunt locum nativitatis Brigide virginis," and in one of her lives by Colgan, it is mentioned—"villa in qua sancta Brigida nata est, Fochart Muirthemne vocatur, quæ est in provincia Ulteriorum." Bridget, having received a superior education, became remarkable for extraordinary piety and wisdom, and, embracing a life of celibacy, she received the veil from St. Macaille, who was bishop of Usneach in Westmeath, about A. D. 470, in the sixteenth or seventeenth year of her age, and about A. D. 480, according to Ware, or 487, according to Lanigan, St. Bridget founded the famous monastery at Kildare, where a great number of nuns resided with her, and the institution was amply endowed with lands by the kings of Leinster; the place, according to one of the lives given by Colgan, was in Irish called Cill-dara, signifying the Church of the Oak, from a great oak tree near which it was erected, "illa jam Cella Scotice dicitur Killdara, Latine vero sonat Cella quercus, enim quercus altissima ibi erat." St. Bridget travelled over all parts of Ireland, and founded numerous nunneries, which were filled with Bridgine nuns, an order she had established, and which became celebrated in Ireland for many ages. St. Bridget was renowned for her wisdom, sanctity, and many virtues, and so highly esteemed by the bishops and clergy, not only of Ireland, but of Britain, that they frequently consulted her on the regulation of various religious matters: after a long life spent in the practice of piety, charity, and every virtue, and having performed many miracles, she died at her monastery of Kildare, about the 70th year of her age, A. D. 525, on the 1st of February, on which day her festival has been always celebrated, and her death is recorded in that year in the Annals of the Four Masters, and an eloquent eulogium passed on her memory. She was buried at Kildare, near the great altar, and her monument ornamented with gold, silver, and precious stones, but Kildare having been devastated by the Danes, the remains of St. Bridget, and the rich shrine in which they were cou-

Roderick Mac Dermott, and with their combined forces they proceeded to Ard Anchoilin to attack him; they dismounted and defeated the son of Cathal Roe O'Connor, but his own cavalry happily rescued him; O'Connor himself, with his cavalry and galloglasses, overtook them, and recovered a portion of the cattle-prey which they had seized; he pursued them from thence to Tulsk, where Donogh Cleireach, the son of Teige Mac Dermott, was slain by O'Connor. It happened, however, tained, were removed for security in the ninth century to Downpatrick, and interred there in the same sepulchre with those of SS. Patrick and Columkille, as explained at p. 96, in a note in these Annals. The memory of St. Bridget has been always held in the highest veneration, not only in Ireland, but in Britain, particularly in Scotland, and even in many countries of the Continent. In Ireland numerous churches were dedicated in honour of St. Bridget, and hence many parishes and other places in Ireland are called Killbride, signifying the Church of Bridget, or St. Bride, and in Scotland many places have been also named from her Killbride; a vast number of holy wells in honour of St. Bridget, are also to be found in various parts of Ireland, and St. Bridget, with SS. Patrick and Columkille, have been always associated as the three great patron saints of Ireland. The holy fire of St. Bridget at Kildare has been mentioned by Giraldus Cambrensis, Ware, and others, but Lanigan and others consider these accounts as referable to the sacred fire kept by the vestal virgins there, in the times of Druidism; it is stated by Ware, Archdall, and others, that the nuns of St. Bridget at Kildare preserved for many ages a perpetual sacred fire, but that in the year 1220, it was extinguished by order of Henry de Loundres, archbishop of Dublin, and that it was re-lighted, and continued to burn till the Reformation, and it is also said that some ruins of the fire-house still remain.

The See of Kildare.—The monastery of St. Bridget was the first religious foundation at Kildare, and the place became celebrated as a seat of learning and religion; a great town or city grew up there, and an episcopal see was founded in it, in the latter end of the fifth century, St. Conlaeth being appointed its first bishop; his successors were styled bishops and abbots of Kildare, and some of them designated bishops of Leinster, for, as explained in a note at p. 226, the see of Ferns was in the seventh and eighth centuries the chief see of Leinster, but in the ninth, tenth, and eleventh centuries, Kildare became the metropolitan see of Leinster, after which Dublin was constituted the archiepiscopal see of Leinster. Kildare was long celebrated as a seat of learning and sanctity, but in the ninth and tenth centuries, from the repeated devastations of the Danes, the place fell to decay; and much more destructive were the wars of later times, but the magnificent ruins of the ancient cathedral, with a most beautiful round tower, and some fragments of splendid stone crosses which still remain, amply demonstrate its former greatness. At Kileullen in Kildare, an abbey was founded by St. Iserninus, in the fifth century, and its abbots were styled bishops down to the twelfth century, at which time it was annexed to the see of Kildare.

The Diocese of Kildare comprises the greater part of the county of Kildare, with a great part of the King's county, and a considerable portion of the Queen's county.

In the Diocese of Dublin were the following ancient sees:—At Cluan-Dolcain, now Clondalkin, near Dublin, St. Cronan Mochua in the seventh century founded an abbey, which was of note for many centuries, and its abbots were styled bishops. At Tamhlacht, or Tallaght, near Dublin, a monastery was founded about the sixth century, and St. Maolruan is mentioned as its first bishop in the eighth century. It was celebrated as a seat of learning and religion, and its abbots down to the twelfth century were styled bishops. At Finglas, near Dublin, a monastery was founded in the sixth century by St. Caineach, or Kenny, from whom Kilkenny derived its name, and the abbots of Finglas were to the eleventh century styled bishops. At Swords, near Dublin, an abbey was founded in the sixth century by St. Columkille, which was long celebrated, and its abbots were styled bishops down to the twelfth century. At Lusk, in the county of Dublin, an abbey was founded in the fifth century by St. Maculind, and he and his successors to the twelfth century were denominated abbots and bishops of Lusk. All the above-mentioned small sees were annexed to the see of Dublin in the twelfth century.

The See of Dublin.—St. Livinus is mentioned by Colgan, in his Trias Thaumaturga, as the first bishop of Dublin, in the beginning of the seventh century; and he states, that having gone on a mission to preach the Gospel in Flanders, he suffered martyrdom there. Accounts of several other bishops of Dublin, from the seventh to the eleventh century, are given in Ware and Colgan; and in the eleventh century, from A.D. 1038 to 1084, Donatus and Patrick, both Ostmen, or Danes, were bishops of Dublin. These, and some other bishops and archbishops of Dublin in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, received their consecration from the archbishops of Canterbury, and were in canonical obedience bound to the metropolitan see of England; but in A.D. 1162, Laurence O'Toole, the celebrated archbishop of Dublin, was consecrated by Gelasius, archbishop of Armagh, and the custom ceased of the archbishops of Dublin going for consecration to Canterbury. Gregory, who was consecrated in A.D. 1121, was in A.D. 1152, the first who got the title of archbishop of Dublin, from Cardinal John Paparo, the Pope's legate at the council of Kells, those prelates being until the twelfth century only styled bishops of Dublin. The see of Ferns, as explained in a note at page 226, was in the seventh and eighth centuries the chief see of Leinster; but during the ninth, tenth, and eleventh centuries, Kildare was made the metropolitan see of that province; and hence the bishops of Ferns and of Kildare were in those times styled by the Irish writers bishops or archbishops of Leinster; but in the twelfth century, Dublin was constituted the metropolitan see of Leinster, and the bishops styled archbishops of Dublin, and sometimes archbishops of Leinster. The small ancient sees of Clondalkin, Tallaght, Finglas, Swords, and Lusk, as above stated, were annexed to Dublin in the twelfth century; and in the beginning of the thirteenth century, A.D. 1214, under Henry de Loundres, archbishop of Dublin, the ancient see of Glendalough, of which an account has been given at page 226, was united to Dublin; but the archbishops of Dublin being all English, their authority was not acknowledged by the Irish, who had for many centuries afterwards their own recognised bishops of Glendalough, and the union of the two sees was not peaceably and fully established until the latter end of the fifteenth century. From the twelfth to the eighteenth century remarkable contests and controversies were carried on between the archbishops of Armagh and of Dublin respecting the primacy, each of the archbishops claiming precedence; but the claims of Armagh to the primacy were finally conceded, both in the Roman Catholic and Protestant churches, the archbishops of Dublin being styled primates of Ireland, and the archbishops of Armagh primates of all Ireland. The ablest arguments on the subject, demonstrating the superior authority of Armagh, and its right to the primacy, are contained in the Jus Armacanum, published in 1728, a most learned work written in Latin by Hugh Mac Mahon, R. C. archbishop of Armagh. Another remarkable circumstance connected with the diocese of Dublin may be mentioned, namely, that from the eleventh century to the present time it contains two cathedrals, those of St. Patrick and Christ Church, of which it is said only another instance is to be found in any see, namely, at Saragossa, in Spain. Accounts of those controversies respecting the primacy, and of the archbishops, will be found in Ware's Bishops, in D'Alton's Archbishops of Dublin, Brennan's Ecclesiastical History, and Stuart's Armagh.

The Diocese of Dublin and Glendalough comprises the greater part of the county of Dublin, together with a great part of Wicklow, and parts of Wexford, Kildare, and Queen's County: and the sees of Kildare, Ossory, Ferns, and Leighlin, in the ecclesiastical province of Leinster, are subject to the jurisdiction of the archiepiscopal see of Dublin.

that his own galloglasses deceived and turned against O'Conor, defeated him, and slew the son of Connor Buighe, the son of Cormac, of his party, with many others, and also took a small portion of the cattle-herd from him; O'Conor, however, happily escaped from his rebellious troops, and took his cattle with him into Hy Maine.

Owen, son of Felim O'Conor, i.e. Felim, the son of Owen, son of Donal, son of Murtogh, son of the lord of Carbury (in Sligo), and the two sons of Murtogh, son of Owen, namely, Murtogh Oge, and John, were treacherously slain by Calvaeh Caoch, son of Donal, son of Owen; and O'Donnell, who was the security between them, preyed and spoiled Carbury, in revenge of this crime, and the violation of their compact.

Colman, son of Art, son of Cormac Ballaeh O'Melaghlin, was killed by Con, the son of Art, son of Con, son of Cormac Ballaeh O'Melaglin.

The Calvaeh, son of Hugh, son of Hugh Roe, the son of Niall Garv O'Donnell, died.

Murrough, son of Roderick Mac Sweeny, was killed by the earl of Desmond, namely, Maurice, the son of Thomas, in Ely O'Carroll; and his brother, Maolmurry Mac Sweeny, was moreover taken prisoner by him.

The son of Mac Carthy, i.e. Dermot, son of Teige, son of Donal Oge, was killed by the same earl.

Thomas Butler, the son of Richard, was killed by John, the son of Richard Butler.

Richard, son of Felim, son of Fergal O'Reilly, was killed by the son of John Oge Plunkett.

Patriek, the son of the Knight of Kerry, was killed by Mac Carthy More, namely, Teige the son of Donal Oge.

Niall and Art, the sons of Con, son of Hugh Buighe, son of Bryan Ballaeh O'Neill, committed depredations on Henry, the son of Henry, son of Owen O'Neill; and Cahir O'Conor was slain on that occasion.

Mac Quillan, i.e. Seinicin Roe, the son of Richard, was treacherously killed by Walter, son of Cormac, son of Seinicin Mac Quillan.

Mac-an-Bhulbaidh (the son of Boulby), lord of Crioeh Bulbaeh, along the Barrow, died.

O'Gobhan (O'Gowan or Smith), i.e. Mahon, the son of Torlogh, died.

Dermot, son of Bryan Duv O'Connor, was slain by Hugh, the son of Con, and by the sons of Roderick Mac Dermott, at Ath-Leime-na-Girre; but Hugh was greatly wounded by Dermot, and Bryan, son of Con, the son of O'Conor Roe, a learned tanist, was killed in retaliation for him, by Teige Buighe, the son of Cathal Roe O'Conor, in Moy Murehadha.

Con, son of Torlogh Roe O'Conor, died.

A great contest arose between the two O'Conors, and O'Conor Roe marched with his forces to Baintobber of St. Bridget, and demolished the Bawn of the town; the chiefs of the tribe of Teige Oge came and submitted to him, namely O'Flynn, Mac Ceithearny, and O'Mulbrenan. O'Conor marched with a force to Beol Coilleadh,¹ cleared the way, and the people of Airteach gave him hostages.

The sons of O'Conor were defeated at Seaghais (in Rosecommon), by the sons of Roderick Mac Dermott.

O'Conor marched with his forces against the sons of William O'Kelly (of Hy Maine, in Galway), on which occasion he burned and cut the passage of Cluainin, and also cut and destroyed much corn. The sons of William O'Kelly did great damage to O'Maoleonry and his kinsmen, in retaliation.

Hugh, son of O'Conor, and Owen, were treacherously taken prisoners by the sons of O'Kelly; and Duvthach O'Maoleonry was taken along with them and imprisoned.

Conor Mac Dermott was taken prisoner by Torlogh O'Conor.

A great commotion arose amongst the people of Annally, and many depredations and evils were committed by them on each other, until the lord justice made peace between them, and settled the chieftainship between the son of John, and the son of Cathal (O'Ferrall).

Cluan Tuaiscirt of the Shannon (Clontuskert, in Galway), was plundered by the tribe of Lisagh,

A. D. 1489.

1. Beol Coilleadh. Signifies the entrance of the wood, and appears to have been situated in Airteach, a district which was part of Mac Dermott's country, in the barony of Boyle, county of Roscommon, towards the borders of Mayo and Galway; and at this passage of Sir William Betham's copy of the Four Masters, is a note in the hand-writing of the celebrated Charles O'Conor of Belenagar, the author of Dissertations on the History of Ireland, &c., in which he says, as follows: "Beol Coilleadh is my residence, in which I am reading this book this night, on the 13th November, 1775."

the son of Rossa (O'Ferrall); and another successful depredation was committed in retaliation in Tirlicin (Tinnelick, in Longford), by the O'Hanleys, on the clan of Lisagh.

The peace (which had been made by the lord justice), between the two O'Ferralls, was dissolved; and the son of John committed a great depredation on the son of Cathal, the son of Thomas.

John Mac Branan (of Roscommon), was nominated the Mac Branan, by O'Conor and by Mac Dermott; and on that day he forgave half a mark on Ballinalaigh to the O'Maolconrys, which had been charged by his predecessors for a long period.

Malachy, son of Loughlin O'Maolconry, died on his professional visitation in Munster.

Sile (or Julia), the daughter of Dermot Andunaidh Mac Carthy, the wife of Torlogh O'Brien, a worthy representative of a queen of Cashel, died.

The sheep of Meath along the sea coast from Dublin to Drogheda ran into the sea in despite of their shepherds, and never returned.

O'Felan died.

A. D. 1490.

Matthew Mac Conaing (or Gunning), vicar of Lethratha (Abbeylara, in Longford); Fergus, son of John, son of Matthew, the Anchorite of Iniskeen (in Louth); the canon Mac Tiarnan, of Seanad of Dromlane (in county of Cavan); Gillcreest, the son of the Lecturer, a young priest who was at Cluain-Lis-Floinn-Abraid, died.

O'Conor committed a depredation in Hy Maine, on Roderick, the son of Torlogh, at Turlogh-nambruigheol.

O'Conor committed another depredation on the sons of Roderick Buighe, in Muine Fraochnat, at Druim Tarlach, and at Cluain Gamhnach. The sons of Roderick, Mac Dermott, and all that were opposed to him (O'Conor), with their galloglasses, were ready to meet him on Moy-na-Cruachna (the plain of Croachan). A fierce and desperate engagement ensued, in which both parties remembered their old and recent animosities for each other, for on either side were persons by whom their fathers and kinsmen had been respectively slain. O'Conor, however, defeated them, and Tomaltach, the son of Mac Dermott, tanist of Moylurg, and Cormac, the son of Teige, son of Roderick Buighe, were slain; and Donogh, the son of Torlogh Mac Dugald, and many of their galloglasses and kerns, were taken prisoners.

O'Conor, i.e. Felim Fionn, the son of Teige, son of Torlogh Roe O'Conor, a brave and warlike man, who spread terror in every country about him, and a man whom the Siol Murray (people of Roscommon), expected would unite all Connaught, died on Easter Monday, in the house of Mac Oiraghty (Mac Geraghty), and was interred in the tomb of his ancestors at Roscommon.

Torlogh, the son of Torlogh O'Boyle, was pitched from his horse while running a race on Iomaire Murbhaigh (in Donegal), of which he died.

O'Gormley, i.e. Murtoigh, the son of Henry, son of Conor, and Conor Roe, the son of Gillpatrick Maguire, died.

Roderick, son of Philip, son of Cuchonacht, was killed by the sons of Bryan, the son of Conor Oge Maguire, aided by the clan of Conor.

O'Kane, i.e. John, the son of Aibhne, son of Dermot, was taken prisoner by the crew of a ship which came from Inbher Air (Inverary, in Scotland).

Hugh, son of Maolmora, son of John O'Reilly, was taken prisoner by the sons of Glaisne, the son of Conor O'Reilly, after he had plundered the town of Thomas, the son of Glaisne.

Young James Savadge was killed by the sons of the Seneschal Savadge.

Colla, son of Roderick, son of Ardgall Mac Mahon, was killed by the clan of Cu-uladh, the son of Niall More O'Neill.

Felim, son of Roderick, son of Seinicin Mac Quillan, was killed at Aendruim (Antrim), by the sons of Bryan, son of Hugh.

The castle of Edan-Dubh-Cairge (Edenduffcarrig, in the county of Antrim), i.e. the castle of Niall, son of Con, son of Hugh Buighe (O'Neill), was taken and demolished by Felim, the grandson of O'Neill of Claneboy, who also committed great depredations on the sons of Con, the son of Hugh Buighe, and slew Geoffrey Mulcreevy.

Hugh Oge, the son of Hugh Roe O'Donnell, preyed and plundered the sons of Donogh, son of Hugh Maguire, and carried away the prey to Ballyshannon, where he slaughtered all the oxen, being four hundred in number; the guards of the town, namely, the sons of Hugh Gallda O'Donnell delivered the castle of Ballyshannon to Hugh Oge, without consulting O'Donnell.

O'Donnell and O'Neill were deadly enemies to each other, from the 1st of November to Christmas; O'Donnell at Drombo, and O'Neill at the Cairgin; and they made neither peace nor truce, nor gave either battle or skirmish, during that period.

O'Daly of Brefney (county of Cavan), i. e. John, the son of William, son of Hugh, a learned poet, died.

Roderick and Hugh Magrath, the sons of Donal, son of Hugh Oge, the two chief professors of Clan Magrath, and Thomas O'Lorean (O'Larkin), the intended chief professor to O'Madden; Fionn O'Hanghluinn, chief minstrel of Ireland; O'Higgin, i. e. John, the son of Fergal Oge, the chief poet of Ireland; O'Cassidy of Coole (in Fermanagh); and Catherine, daughter of Conor, the son of Cathal Mac Rannall, the wife of Teige, son of Torlogh Maguire, all died.

Donogh, son of Malachy Caoch O'Beirne, and his two sons, one of them only in his seventh year, were treacherously slain by the other portion of the clan of Cormac O'Beirne; and Cathal, the son of Donogh, son of Hugh, was killed by Con Ciotach, son of Hugh, son of Owen, and the people of Conor Mac Dermott, in Tir Briuin of the Shannon.

The clan of Teige O'Conor proceeded with their cattle-prey from Hy Maine, halted before Clar, and took Teige Roe, the son of Carbry O'Conor, prisoner; the son of Roderick Mac Dermott attacked their predatory band that night, and Roderick, the son of Cormac Mac Dermott, was slain in that attack.

Roderick, the son of Felim O'Conor, was inaugurated the successor of Felim Fionn.

O'Donnell proceeded with the tribe of Teige O'Conor to Tulsk, but was refused admittance into the castle.

The clan of Teige O'Conor committed depredations on O'Conor, and on the sons of Roderick Mac Dermott, at Bothar Liathbaislee, (Basliek, in Rosecommon).

The clan of Teige O'Conor, and Teige Roe (O'Conor), proceeded with their predatory troops into Moylurg, where they cut down all the corn, converted it to their own use, and expelled the inhabitants therefrom.

The clan of Teige O'Conor, and Mac William Burke, marched with a force against the clan of Bryan Ballach O'Conor, took their castle, and expelled themselves from their possessions.

Fergus, son of Edmond, son of Lisagh (O'Ferrall), plundered Fergus, the son of Cathal, son of Thomas, and the sons of Awlave; and he also plundered O'Melaghlin, and committed another depredation on the sons of Gillananev, the son of Donal, in the Cuirrin Conachtaeh.

Edmond Duv, the son of Rossa, lord of the port of Annaly, died, and was succeeded by Felim, the son of Gillananev, son of Donal (O'Ferrall).

Dermot Buighe, the son of O'Hanley, was killed by Fergus, the son of Edmond, at Coille-na-Cloiche (in Rosecommon), and O'Hanley, his father, i. e. Teige, the son of Gillananev, lost his sight through grief for him. Murtoth, the son of Anthony O'Hanley, was nominated the O'Hanley in his place.

Judith, daughter of Murrogh, son of Teige Glai, the wife of Donal Mac Cornan, died.

Malachy, son of William O'Kelly, was treacherously taken prisoner by Teige, the son of Donogh O'Kelly; and the son of O'Mannin, one of his people, was slain in his presence, after which Malachy was set at liberty.

Edmond Dillon, lord of Machaire Cuirene (Kilkenny West, in Westmeath), died.

Bryan, i. e. the Mac Rannall, the son of Teige, son of Cathal Oge Mac Rannall, was treacherously slain at Leitrim by the descendants of his grandfather, i. e. Teige, the son of Conor, and the two sons of Malachy, who were foster-brothers of his father. The castle of Leitrim was taken by Hoberd, the son of Teige Mac Rannall, and by the tribe of Tomaltach Mac Dermott; and Cathal, the son of Malachy Mac Rannall, was slain in the castle of Hoberd, in revenge of his brother's death, and the castle of Leitrim was taken after that by Owen O'Rourke.

The castle of Athlone was taken by the Dillon.

Gerald, the son of Dunlaing O'Byrne, lord of Branach (O'Byrne's country, in Wicklow), died, and was succeeded by Cahir O'Byrne.

Young John, the son of John More from Iley (in Scotland), was treacherously killed by a harper of Ulster, a friend of his own, namely, Dermot, the son of Carbry, who was quartered for his crime.

Fionguala, daughter of Roderick Mac Namara, the wife of Torlogh, son of Murrogh O'Brien, died.

Con, son of Donal O'Connor of Corcomroe (in Clare), was killed by Cathal, the son of Cathal O'Connor.

An eruption of the earth¹ took place on Sliabh Gamh, by which one hundred persons perished, along with the son of Manus Crosach O'Hara; many horses and cows were also destroyed, and a large quantity of putrid fish was cast up by the eruption, and Lough-na-ngabhar-Iask since remains in that place.

A. D. 1491.

Owen, son of Murtoth, son of Niall Oge O'Neill; Murtoth, son of Art, son of Owen O'Neill; and John Roe, the son of Roderick Maguire, died.

O'Kane, i. e. John, the son of Aibhne, son of Dermot, was set at liberty from his imprisonment, and he recovered his cattle from the sons of Manus O'Kane, before his liberation was known to any one in his own country.

Felim, son of Hugh, son of Owen O'Neill, was killed by Bryan, the son of Roderick, son of Edmond Mac Mahon, and Art O'Neill; Felim's brother, in revenge of him plundered and burned Tealach Gealagain (Tullygillan, in Monaghan), and slew many persons.

An awful contest arose between O'Neill, i. e. Con, the son of Henry, and O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, the son of Niall Garv, and they could not be pacified until they both proceeded before the lord justice, the earl of Kildare, and they returned back again without peace or truce. Bryan, the son of Hugh Gallda, the son of Niall O'Donnell, was slain in that contest by Henry, the son of Henry O'Neill, and the same Henry governed and protected the country while O'Neill had been at the seat of the English.

Eachmilidh (or Emilius), the son of Magennis, i. e. of Hugh, the son of Art, was slain in his own house, in a nocturnal attack, by the sons of Malachy, the son of Murtoth, son of Owen O'Neill.

A. D. 1490.

1. Eruption of the Earth. This eruption seems to have been somewhat similar to an earthquake. Sliabh Gamh is now called the Ox Mountains, in Sligo, in the baronies of Tireragh and Lieney; and Lough-na-ngabhar-Iask, above-mentioned, is now called Lough Easkey, situated at the northern side of the mountains, and O'Reilly, i. e. John, son of Torlogh, son of John, a youthful chieftain, eminent for entertainments, benevolence, and great hospitality, died in the height of his prosperity, and was interred in the monastery of Cavan; and John, the son of Cathal, son of Owen, was nominated the O'Reilly.

Cathal, son of Torlogh O'Reilly, having induced the earl of Kildare to march on young O'Reilly and his kinsmen, great destruction was committed on the corn, cattle, and flocks of the country, by the English forces; and the grandson of Balronta (Waldron), was taken prisoner from the English party by the sons of Cathal; and the son of Edmond, son of Thomas, son of Felim O'Reilly, was slain by that force. The earl, namely, Janies, the son of Thomas (Fitzgerald), committed great depredations on the sons of Glaisne, the son of Conor O'Reilly.

Roderick, son of Dermot, son of Marcus, was appointed the Magrath of Termon (Termonmagrath, in Fermanagh).

Hugh and Roderick, the sons of Donal, son of Hugh Oge, son of Hugh, son of Rannall, son of Donogh Alaiinn Magrath, and Murrogh, the son of Owen Magrath, died.

Henry, son of Hoberd, son of James Dillon, slew his own father, Hoberd, by the cast of a dagger, and he himself went to Rome on account of the deed.

Very wet stormy weather happened in the summer and following harvest of this year, which resembled a deluge, and all the corn crops of Ireland failed.

A. D. 1492.

The official O'Dwyer, i. e. Hugh, died.

Roderick, i. e. the O'Connor Roe, son of Felim O'Connor, an affable man in peace, and a valiant man in war, died after a long and well-spent life, and was interred at Tulsk.

O'Hanley, i. e. Giollananeev, the son of Donal, chief of Kinel Doffa, was killed by his own tribe.

A great and awful commotion arose between abounds in fish; this circumstance is mentioned in the third part of O'Flaherty's Ogygia, and it is to be observed that the ancient annalists have recorded, at very remote periods, eruptions of Lough Neagh, Lough Erne, and various other great lakes throughout Ireland.

young O'Reilly, i. e. John, the son of Cathal, son of Owen, and Cathal, the son of Torlogh, son of John, son of Owen, and great depredations were committed by Cathal on O'Gobhan (O'Gowan or Smith), and O'Gowan pursued them, but died before he returned.

A peace and truce were concluded between O'Donnell and O'Neill, until May.

Con, son of Art, son of Con O'Conor, was killed by the people of the earl of Kildare, in consequence of his having, in playfulness, made a east of a pole at the earl.

Con, the son of O'Donnell, was confined in chains by his father.

John, son of Carbry O'Neill, was killed by the sons of O'Hanlon, and the sons of Redmond O'Hanlon, at Traghally of Dundalk.

Felim, son of Torlogh, son of Hugh O'Neill, was killed by Henry, the son of Bryan-na-coilleadh (of the Wood), O'Neill.

Cormac, son of Hugh, son of Philip Maguire, died.

Colla, son of Donogh Mac Donnell (of Antrim), was killed in his own house by a flash of lightning, which also burned the house, and three or four persons who were in it were nearly killed by the same lightning.

Bryan, son of Edmond Mac Donnell, and his son, were slain by the sons of Mac Mahon, and the sons of John Buighe Mac Mahon.

Aibhne, the son of Aibhne O'Kane; Geoffrey and John Gallda, the sons of O'Kane, i. e. John, the son of Aibhne, son of Dermot, were slain by Walter Mac Quillan, aided by John Cathanaeh, the son of John, son of Donal Ballach, and by Thomas O'Kane, their father's brother, at whose instigation they had come to perpetrate that murder.

Mac Gillfinnen, i. e. Torlogh, the son of Bryan, son of Henry Cosach, and Felim Roe, the son of Donogh Mac Gilfinnen (of Fermanagh), died.

Magrath, the coarb of Temple Dabeog (at Lough Dearg, in Donegal), namely Dermot, the son of Marcus, son of Maurice, son of Nicholas, son of Andrew, died.

Philip, son of William Maguire, was killed by O'Cathalan, in the town of Richard, the son of Bell the Knight.

Torlogh Ballach, the son of O'Conor Failey, i. e. the son of Con, son of Calvach, and Mae Namara, i. e. Cumcada, the son of John Mae Namara, died.

Calvach, the son of O'Conor Failey, i. e. the son of Cahir, son of Con, son of Calvach, was killed by a party of the people of the earl of Ormond's son, i. e. James, the son of John, son of James Butler, namely, by Master Gart, and Master Gart was immediately after taken prisoner by the earl of Kildare.

Great depredations were committed by Cathal, the son of Torlogh O'Reilly, aided by the sons of Mae Mahon, i. e. of Redmond, namely, Glaisne and Bryan, and by Gillpatrick, the son of Hugh Oge Mac Mahon, at the instigation of Cathal O'Reilly, on O'Reilly, i. e. John, the son of Cathal, son of Owen, and also on his kinsmen. Other great depredations were committed by O'Reilly, on the sons of Glaisne O'Reilly; and the son of John Buighe Mac Mahon, i. e. Owen, was slain by the sons of Glaisne while in pursuit of that prey, and Gerald, son of Edmond, son of Thomas, son of Felim O'Reilly, was taken prisoner on the same pursuit.

John Buighe, the son of Owen, son of Roderick, son of Ardgall Mac Mahon, died, on the festival of St. Tigearnach.

Donal, son of Henry, son of Owen, and Gillpatrick Mac Caghwell (of Tyrone), were taken prisoners, and Mac Caghwell, i. e. Edmond, was slain by the sons of Redmond Mac Mahon, namely, Glaisne and Bryan, and many others besides were either slain or taken prisoners on that occasion; Donal, however, made his escape from Monaghan castle, in a week after his capture.

O'Clery, i. e. Teige Cam, chief professor to O'Donnell (of Donegal), in literature, poetry, and history, a man who kept a house of general hospitality both for the rich and poor, died after having gained the victory over the world and the devil.

An uncommon plague¹ raged in Meath, which

A. D. 1492.

1. The plague here mentioned appears to have been that called the Sweating Sickness, the Ephmera Sudatoria of Mason Good, and mentioned by Armstrong, and various other medical writers, as the Sudor Anglicus, or the English Sweat, as it was stated that none but the English were subject to it. The disease is supposed by Willan to have been produced by the use of unsound wheat, in consequence of bad seasons, and it is said that the natives of Wales, Scotland, and Ireland were free from this epidemic, and that it affected only the English, or persons of English descent, who were in those countries. In Ireland the disease was very prevalent amongst the English colonists, or Anglo-Irish, and even in was known by the appellation of the plague of twenty-four hours, because every person seized with it who passed that period recovered, and neither children nor infants took it.

The son of the earl of Ormond arrived in Ireland after having spent a long time in England, and he, with O'Brien and his kinsmen, and Mac William of Clanrickard, marched with a force into Butler's country (in Kilkenny) and compelled the Butlers to make submission to the earl's son; some of the Irish of Leinster were taken prisoners, and Meath was spoiled by these forces.

The Street of the Sheep,² in Dublin, was burned by the lord justice (Fitzgerald), and after that a peace was made between him and the lord justice (Fitzsimon) on the following terms: that each should hold his father's office, and that the king's deputy-ship in Ireland, i. e. the sword (of state), and all the privileges appertaining to it, should be given up into the hands of the archbishop of Dublin, until the king should settle their disputes and arrange matters between them. The cause for which the earl of Kildare resigned his office of lord justice and withdrew himself from the English of Meath was, because they had not assisted him against the son of the earl of Ormond; the English sustained many evils in consequence of that, for they were plundered, and the country burned by the Irish in every direction, after they had been forsaken by the earl.

Hoberd, son of Mulroona Mac Rannall, heir to the chieftaincy of Conmaicne Rein of the Fomorians (in Leitrim), and sixteen others along with him, were slain at the church of Kiltrenan, on the banks of the Shannon, which was burned by the tribe of Cathal Oge Mac Rannall, and by Muintir Carolan.

Owen O'Rourke committed depredations in Hy Briuin of the Shannon, on which occasion the son of O'Beirne, Cathal, the son of Murtogh, son of Teige, son of Cormac, was slain.

Conor Mac Dermott, lord of Moylurg, took forcible possession of the Rock of Lough Kea, and O'Donnell compelled him to abandon it on peaceable terms.

The castle of Baile-na-Huamhadh (in Roscommon) was built by the tribe of Hugh Mac Dermott.

Conor Oge, the son of Conor, son of Cathal Oge Mac Rannall, was killed by the tribe of Malachy Mac Rannall.

O'Donnell, O'Rourke, and Owen O'Rourke, marched with a force into Muintir Eoluis (in Leitrim), to compel the sons of Malachy (Mac Rannall) to acknowledge the lordship of O'Rourke, which was resisted, and the corn and dwellings of the country were destroyed; they nominated William, the son of Ir, the Mac Rannall, in opposition to Malachy, the son of William, who was alone in possession of the chieftaincy for a considerable time.

Murtogh, the son of Mahon O'Brien, died in Thomond of the wounds he had received in the fore-mentioned forces of the earl of Ormond.

Anluan, son of Mahon O'Brien, was slain by the tribe of Donogh O'Brien.

Hugh Mac Clancy, chief professor of history and of the Brehon laws in Thomond, died.

Teige, son of John, son of Teige Mac Donogh, and Cormac, son of Conor, son of Donal Cam, fell by each other's hands at Geevagh; and others of the party, who were not killed, wounded each other.

Bryan, son of Niall Gallda (O'Neill), and Eiver,

France, and other foreign countries, the English residents were the only persons affected. The symptoms of the sweating sickness, according to lord Bacon and Polydore Virgil, in their histories of the reign of Henry VII., were violent pains in the head, intense and incessant thirst, burning heat of the body, and profuse sweating of a disagreeable odour; great drowsiness also attended, and if at the commencement of the attack the tendency to sleep was not resisted, the disease always proved fatal. This disease ran a rapid course, and terminated in death or recovery in the course of twenty-four hours; it attacked mostly young and middle-aged men, but amongst old men, women, and children, it was not near so frequent or fatal. In Ware's Annals of the reign of Henry VII. in Cox and other writers, accounts are given of violent tempests, and torrents of rain, which deluged the land, tore up forest trees by the roots, and prostrated the houses and churches, chiefly in the province of Ulster, in the month of March, 1486, and in the year 1491; the lauds of Ireland, during the summer and harvest seasons, were so deluged with rain, that it was impossible to save the corn, and a dreadful dearth ensued; in the month of December, a blazing star or comet appeared, and continued many months, and a pestilential disease soon afterwards followed. In the summer of 1492 a continued drought was so excessive, that many rivers, and most of the springs of Ireland were so completely dried up, that immense multitudes of the cattle perished for want of water, and a famine and pestilence broke out amongst the Irish natives, as well as amongst the English settlers, and dreadful plagues or epidemics also prevailed in the years 1523 and 1525, and in 1528 the sweating sickness again visited Ireland.

2. The Street of the Sheep is now Ship-street, near Dublin Castle, and it appears to have been burned by Gerald Fitzgerald, earl of Kildare, in consequence of disputes between him and Walter Fitzsimon, who was then archbishop of Dublin, and lord justice; but they afterwards agreed that they should alternately hold the office of lord justice or lord deputy, which had been held by the earl's father a few years before that time.

his son, were treacherously taken prisoners by the English of Carriekfergus, and were delivered into the hands of the sons of Con, the son of Hugh Buighe.

The son of Roderick Mac Quillan, and a great number of foot soldiers along with him, were slain by O'Kane.

A. D. 1493.

The official O'Lucairen, i. e. Owen, a learned cleric, died.

O'Neill, i. e. Con, the son of Henry, son of Owen, the bountiful bestower of valuable presents and property, and a brave and warlike man, was treacherously killed by his own brother, Henry Oge.

O'Donnell went into Tyrone, at the instigation of Donal, the son of Henry, son of Owen, and nominated Donal the O'Neill, and took with him the hostages of the country, except those of O'Kane and O'Mellan; and Henry Oge was nominated as another O'Neill, in opposition to Donal, by O'Kane and O'Mellan; but that was not lawful, because Donal was the senior.

Donal, the son of Owen, son of Niall Oge O'Neill, was killed by a party of the people of Art, the son of Con, son of Henry O'Neill.

O'Moore, i. e. Conal, son of David, was slain at the castle of Bally-na-mBachlach, in Crioich Bulbach (in Leix), by some of the earl of Kildare's people, namely, by Gerald, the son of Thomas, and O'Moore; and Niall, the son of Donal, was appointed the O'Moore.

O'Hanlon, i. e. Edmond Roe, the son of Murrough, was killed by the sons of Hugh, the son of Owen O'Neill.

Mac Cartan, i. e. Patrick, the son of Hugh Roe, died.

Fionnguala, daughter of O'Conor Faily, i. e. the Calvaeh, the son of Murrough, the wife of O'Donnell, i. e. Niall Garry, the son of Torlogh of the Wine, and who was afterwards the wife of Hugh Buighe, son of Bryan Ballach, a woman who maintained her widowhood, after the death of those good men, for the period of forty-nine years, in a chaste, honourable, pious, and devout manner, died on the 25th of July.

Catharine, daughter of Hugh Roe Mac Mahon, the wife of O'Reilly, i. e. Torlogh, son of John, son of Owen, died.

Niall, son of John Buighe O'Neill, died in his imprisonment.

The two O'Neills, namely, the two sons of Henry, the son of Owen, viz., Donal and Henry Oge, fought a battle against each other at Glas Dromain (in Tyrone), in which Donal and his people were defeated, and the following, namely, Mac Donnell, i. e. Randal, constable of O'Neill's galloglasses, with his three sons, Sorley, Roderick, and Tuathal; Edmond, the son of Mac Donnell More, i. e. the son of Colla, son of Torlogh, son of Gillespick, son of Roderick, son of Hugh Ballach Mac Donnell; Dugald, and Donogh Oge, the sons of Donogh Mac Donnell; Edmond, the son of John Buighe O'Neill; Hugh Breifneach, the son of John, son of Art; O'Hugh, i. e. Fear Dorcha, the son of Anballach O'Hugh, and many others, were slain; and the following were taken prisoners, namely, Niall, son of John Buighe O'Neill, Hugh, son of Donal, son of Henry O'Neill, and Donogh Mac Caghwell, with many others.

O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, and his sons Con and Hugh, mustered a great force, and was joined by the chiefs of North Connaught, together with O'Rourke, i. e. Felim, the son of Donogh, son of Tiarnan Oge; Owen, the son of Tiarnan, son of Teige, the heir to the lordship of Brefnecy at that time; and Donal, the son of Owen O'Conor, lord of North Connaught. After they had collected their forces together at an appointed place, O'Donnell directed his course eastward, into the province of Ulster, until he arrived at Trian Congail; from thence he proceeded to Lecale, and to Iveagh (in the county of Down), and from thence into Orior (in Armagh); and he preyed and plundered Lecale on that occasion, and every territory through which he passed, whose people were opposed to him. While thus engaged on the expedition, O'Neill, i. e. Henry Oge, the son of Henry, son of Owen, collected his forces, joined by Mac Mahon, i. e. Hugh Oge, the son of Hugh Roe, son of Roderick, together with Magennis, Hugh, the son of Art, son of Hugh, with all his men, and a very numerous force besides. This numerous army overtook O'Donnell at Benboirhe (now part of the Mourne Mountains, in the county of Down), and encompassed him front and rear; and this attack was met, and resisted by O'Donnell, promptly and undauntedly, until he collected all his forces together from that dangerous position; and after the commanders of both parties had arranged their men on each side in order, both forces confronting each other, a fierce and desperate conflict and violent battle was fought between them, each party remembering their old animosities, and more recent injuries against each other; but at length O'Neill and his forces were defeated by O'Donnell, and John Roe, the son of Donogh Mac Mahon, with many others, were slain; but the darkness of the evening, and the approaching night, did not permit O'Donnell's forces to follow up the victory as they would desire, and they came to the resolution of encamping for the night on the place where they gained the battle of Benboirche, and on the following day they returned to their homes, after having gained victory and sway in every country through which they passed.

O'Connor Faily, i. e. Cahir, the son of Con, son of Calvach, was defeated by Mac Geoghegan; James, the son of Conla, son of Hugh Buighe, and Teige, the son of O'Connor, the son of Torlogh Ballach O'Connor, the son of Art O'Connor, and the two sons of Hugh O'Maonaigh, were made prisoners, and eighty horses were taken from them.

Torlogh, son of Teige O'Connor, and Cathal, the son of Murtoogh, son of Felim O'Connor, were hanged by O'Connor Faily, i. e. Cahir, the son of Con, &c.

Cormac, the son of Dermot Mac Dermott, tannist of Moylurg, was slain by the sons of Roderick Mac Dermott.

The sons of Roderick Mac Dermott plundered the tribe of Teige O'Connor, and Con, the son of Felim Fionn O'Connor, and Tomaltach Oge, the son of Tomaltach the Hospitable Mac Dermott, were slain by them.

Mac Conmidhe (Mac Conway), i. e. Teige, the son of Conor Roe, son of Eachmarcach, a learned poet and literary man, was killed by a peasant of his own people, namely, by the son of O'Clumhain (O'Coleman).

Conor, the son of O'Daly, of Brefney, died.

The county of Kildare, and Kildare itself, were burned by the son of the earl of Ormond.

James Mac Geoghegan, chief of Kinel Fiacha Mac Neill (in Westmeath), died, and was succeeded by his brother Laighneach.

A. D. 1494.

The dark-haired daughter of O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, the wife of Niall, son of Con, son of Hugh Buighe O'Neill; Cu-uladh, son of Hugh, son of Owen, son of Niall Oge O'Neill; Owen, son of Donal Ballach Maguire; and Bryan, son of Dermot O'Dowd, died.

O'Ferrall, Conmac, the son of John, son of Donal, son of John, son of Donal, one of the two chiefs who governed Annaly at that time, died.

Gillpatrick, the grandson of Manus Maguire, died, and was interred at Donegal on the third day following.

Donal, the son of Owen O'Connor, lord of Sligo, a prosperous and courageous man, who had the country from the Curlew (mountains), to Bunduff, and abounded in prosperity and wealth, was treacherously slain and burned in an attack within the bawn of the castle at Bunfinn, by the sons of Roderick, son of Torlogh Carrach, namely, John and Bryan; and Roderick, the son of Torlogh Carrach, assumed his place.

Tuathal, son of Torlogh-na-Mart (of the oxen) O'Neill, along with thirteen men of his people, and Murrough O'Lorcan, were slain by the Clan Cana (Mac Cans of Armagh), and the sons of Bryan of the Wood, son of Owen O'Neill.

Torlogh, son of Donogh, son of Thomas Mac Gauran, was killed by the sons of Owen, son of Thomas; and Fergal, son of Thomas, the son of Thomas Mac Gauran, was killed by the cast of a dart.

John Bearnach, the son of Maolmuire Mac Sweeney, with many of his galloglasses, were slain by Teige, the son of Con, son of Donal, son of Owen O'Neill, and by Hugh Roe, the son of Glaisne, son of Redmond, son of Roderick Mac Mahon, and they were buried at Armagh.

The English were defeated in an engagement by Mac Mahon (of Monaghan), namely, Hugh Oge, the son of Hugh Roe, and by O'Reilly (of Cavan), i. e. John, the son of Cathal, son of Owen, son of John, in which three score of the English officers were slain, and many were taken prisoners.

James, the grandson of Manus, was killed with the cast of a dart by the sons of Cormac Mac

Gauran, and Edmond, the son of Cormac, son of Manus, was the person who cast the dart.

The tribe of Owen, son of Donal, son of Murtogh (O'Connor), took possession of the castle of Sligo.

The earl of Kildare was taken prisoner by the English in Dublin, and sent over to England.

Donal, son of Malachy Mac Rannall, heir to the lordship of his own country, was killed with the cast of a dart, by the sons of Felim, the son of Gillananceev, son of Donal, son of Murtogh Midh-each, at Ballinacarra.

James, brother of the earl of Kildare, spoiled Meath while the earl had been at the king's palace.

The earl of Kildare, i. e. Gerald, the son of Thomas, and the son of the earl of Ormond, i. e. James, the son of James Butler, returned from the king of England's palace, after peace had been made between them; and Edward Poynings, a Saxon knight, came along with them as lord justice of Ireland.

O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, with his forces, besieged the castle of Sligo, and remained encamped at it for a considerable portion of this year; many of his people were killed on that occasion, among whom were the son of Mac William Burke, i. e. William, the son of Rickard, son of Edmond, son of Thomas; William, the son of O'Gallagher, i. e. Edmond, the son of Donogh, son of Loughlin; Owen, the son of Cormac Carrach O'Gallagher, and Donal Aranach, a Scotch commander who was along with O'Donnell, and many more besides, were also killed by the guards of the castle, who were commanded by Bryan Caoch, the son of Teige, son of Owen (O'Connor), by Calvach Caoch, the son of Donal, son of Owen (O'Connor), and by Muintir Airt; and these transactions occurred in the summer.

Alexander, the son of Gillespy Mac Donnell, the representative of the Mac Donnells, was killed by John Cathanach, the son of John Mac Donnell Ballach, on the first of the Ides of October.

John, son of Owen O'Donnell, was hanged by Con, the son of Hugh Roe O'Donnell.

A. D. 1495.

John Maguire, the son of Pierce, son of Maurice, the parson of Derryvullen, and erenach of Clec-nish (in Fermanagh), a man who kept a house of general hospitality, and the parson, Patrick O'Hugh, died.

Roderick, son of Torlogh Carrach O'Connor, lord of Carbury of Drumcliffe (in Sligo), died.

A dispute arose between the descendants of Donal about the lordship of the country, viz.: between Felim, the son of Manus, son of Bryan, and Roderick Oge, the son of Roderick Ballach; Murtogh Caoch, the son of Manus O'Connor, Roderick Oge, and Torlogh, the son of Roderick, son of Bryan, fell by each other's hands at Drumcliffe, in the conflict, after which the country remained in Felim's possession.

Cormac, i. e. the Mac Carthy, the son of Teige, son of Cormac, lord of Muskerry (in Cork), was killed by his own brother Owen, the son of Teige, aided by his sons; he was a man who promoted and revered the church, and was the first founder of the monastery of Kilcreedhe (Kilcrea, a Franciscan monastery in Cork, see at A. D. 1465), a man who ordained that the Sabbath should be kept holy in his own territory as it ought to be, and he was succeeded by Owen, the son of Teige.

Manus, the son of Owen Roe Mac Manus, lord of Tir Tuathail Maolgarbh, and Murtogh, the son of Anthony O'Hanley, chief of Kinel Doffa Mac Aongusa, (both in Roscommon), died; and Donal, the son of Roderick Buighe, succeeded him in the chieftaincy.

Tomaltach, son of Cormac Ballach Mac Donogh, died.

O'Donnell went to see the king of Scotland (James IV.), and they entered into a compact of aiding and supporting each other on all occasions of necessity which might happen to them.

Con, son of Hugh Roe (O'Donnell), with his forces, came to Sligo, and laid siege to the town for some time. The tribe of Owen (O'Connor), collected an immense great force to relieve Sligo, which consisted of the clan of Roderick Mac Dermott, of the people of Tireragh of the Moy (O'Dowds), the Mac Donoghs, and those of Coolavin, and all marched towards the town to relieve it. Con having received intelligence of those forces marching on him, he mustered his small party, and accompanied by Owen O'Rourke, tanist of Brefney, and the tribe of Donal Cam, the son of Mac Donogh, marched forth from their tents briskly and courageously to meet and oppose those forces at Beul-an-droichid (near Ballysadare), and they came within the distance of casting their darts at each other, and neither party halted, but each attacked the other immediately. It happened, however, at the very time they commenced to fight and use their arms, that O'Donnell himself came up to them, having just arrived from Scotland, and only remaining one night in his fortress at Donegal; he proceeded to relieve his son on learning the predicament in which he was placed. As soon as O'Donnell advanced into the centre of his people, both sides engaged in a fierce and desperate battle; but, however, the northern forces with O'Donnell became victorious, as he was accustomed to compel his enemies to turn their backs. In that battle were slain Teige, the son of Bryan Mac Donogh, lord of Tirerrill (in Sligo); Owen Caoch, the son of Roderick O'Dowd, lord of Tireragh of the Moy; Bryan Caoch, the son of Teige, son of Owen; Teige, son of Donal, son of Owen, and Cian, son of Bryan O'Gara; and O'Gara himself, i. e. Dermot, the son of Owen, was taken prisoner. Besides these, many of the Conacian chiefs and common soldiers were slain, drowned, or taken prisoners in that defeat of Belandroichid; the son of O'Boyle, i. e. Teige, the son of Niall, son of Torlogh, was slain in the thick of the fight. O'Donnell preyed and plundered all his enemies throughout the country in general, until they made their submission.

Teige, the son of Donal Cam (Mac Donogh) assumed the chieftaincy of Tirerrill.

Mac William of Clanrickard, i. e. Rickard Oge, marched into North Connaught, and spoiled all that part of the country which was left unspoiled by O'Donnell.

O'Neill, i. e. Donal, committed a depredation on the other O'Neill, namely, Henry, and many were slain between them.

O'Neill, i. e. Henry; Magennis, namely Hugh, the son of Art, son of Hugh; O'Hanlon, i. e. Malachy, the son of Felim; and the son of Mac Mahon, i. e. Gillpatrick, the son of Hugh Oge, son of Hugh Roe, marched with a force into Fermanagh, and completely burned the town of Mac Gillroy; from thence they proceeded to attack Maguire, and threatened, that unless they obtained peace from him, they would spoil all his country as far as O'Flanagan's town. It happened, however, otherwise with them, for they remained two nights on the eastern side of the lake, at Drum Ralan (Dromralla, near Lough Erne, in Fermanagh), and did not attempt to proceed farther into Maguire's territory, and some of their party were slain; and O'Neill, i. e. Henry Oge, at length granted to Maguire his own terms of peace on that occasion.

The two sons of O'Hanlon, i. e. of Felim, namely, Murrough Roe and Gillpatrick, were slain by the sons of Hugh, son of Owen O'Neill, aided by the sons of Carbry, son of Hugh O'Neill.

Mac Gauran, i. e. Felim, the son of Thomas, son of Fergal, son of Thomas, son of Bryan Breaghach, chief of Tullaghaw (in the county of Cavan,) was drowned in Lough Crannoige of Coill-an-Mhuillinn (the Wood of the Mill), and was succeeded by Donal Bearnach, his brother.

Mac Guire, i. e. Gillpatrick, the son of Gillpatrick, died.

Manus Maol, the son of Redmond Riavach, the son of Dun, son of Cuchonacht Maguire, was killed by Philip, the son of Edmond Maguire, and by the Giolla Ballach, the son of Cuchonacht Mac Caffrey.

O'Duigenan of Kilronan, i. e. Dubhthach, the son of Malachy, son of Matthew Glas, chief professor to Muintir Maolruain (tribe of the Mac Dermotts), a learned historian, a man who kept an open house of general hospitality, the most wealthy professor in Ireland in cattle and herds, died in his own house at Kilronan, after a long and well-spent life, and after having gained the palm of victory over the world and the devil.

Donal O'Maolconry, the son of Fergus, chief professor of Siol Murray, died, and two O'Maolconrys were appointed his successors, namely, John, the son of Torna, and Donogh, the son of Aithirne.

Mac Ward of Tirconnell, i. e. Hugh; O'Breslin, i. e. Owen, the son of Owen, son of Petrus, chief professor in Brehonism to Maguire; Bryan, the son of Sorley Mac Cabe; and Tiarnan O'Devlin, died.

Con, the son of Hugh Roe O'Donnell, with his small powerful force—and the reason Con's force was called the small powerful force was, because he was always in the habit of mustering a force which did not exceed twelve score of well-equipped and experienced battle-axe men, and sixty chosen, active horsemen, fit for battle—marched with the forementioned force to the residence of Mac John of the Glyns (in the county of Antrim), for Con had been informed that Mac John had in his possession the finest woman, steed, and hound of any other person in his neighbourhood. He sent a messenger for the steed before that time, and was refused, although Con had, at the same time, promised it to one of his own people. Con did not delay, and got over every difficult pass with his small powerful force, without battle or obstruction, until he arrived in the night at the house of Mac John, whom he in the first place took prisoner; and his wife, steed, and hound, and all his property, were under Con's controul, for he found the same steed, with sixteen others, in the town on that occasion. All the Glyns were plundered on the following day by Con's people, but he afterwards, however, made perfect restitution of all her property, to whomsoever it belonged, to Mac John's wife, and he set her husband free to her after he had passed the Bann westward; he brought with him the steed, and great booty and spoils into Tirhugh, and ordered the cattle-prey to be let out on the pasturage. Con, immediately after his return, again mustered his own faithful forces, and all those he could command, who were under the power of his father, O'Donnell, with which he marched without delay until he crossed the Shannon, and afterwards into Munster, and he completely plundered Magli O'gCoinchind (Magonihy in Kerry), in Mac Carthy's territory, after which he returned with his spoils, booty, and much prey, and victoriously crossed the Erne, into Donegal. He then distributed, in one day, the spoils he had taken from Mac Carthy's country in Munster, and also the spoils he had brought from Mac John of the Glyns, in the east of Ulster, at Ard-na-tineadh-aol; all of which was accomplished in fifteen weeks and one day by Con, son of Hugh Roe O'Donnell.

—
A. D. 1496.

Glaisne, son of Redmond, son of Roderick Mac Mahon, was killed in his own house at Monaghan, by Gillpatrick Mac Mahon, and his brother Roderick, who were the sons of Mac Mahon, i. e. Hugh Oge, the son of Hugh Roe, son of Roderick; they had only sixteen farmers along with them committing that murder, and they took Rossa, the son of Manus, son of Hugh Roe Mac Mahon, prisoner in the same house. Bryan, son of Redmond Mac Mahon, and the son of Glaisne, son of Redmond Mac Mahon, went to plunder Mac Mahon, i. e. Hugh Oge, and his sons, in a week after the death of Glaisne, and they carried off the prey with them, and several were killed on both sides; the town of Mac Mahon, i. e. Hugh Oge, was burned after that by Bryan, the son of Redmond, son of Roderick.

Gillpatrick, the son of Mac Mahon, i. e. Hugh Oge, the son of Hugh Roe, the son of Roderick, was treacherously killed by O'Hanlon, namely, Malachy, the son of Felim, aided by his brother Ardgall, and his brother Eiver was taken prisoner the same day.

Mac Mahon, and the sons of Manus Mac Mahon, conveyed away their cattle, and joined O'Reilly and the English, after that murder. Bryan, son of Redmond, and the sons of Glaisne, the son of Redmond (Mac Mahon), went with their cattle into Farney, into the country of Mac Mahon, and of Gillpatrick (Mac Mahon).

O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, the son of Niall Garv, marched into Oriel to aid Bryan, the son of Redmond Mac Mahon, from which place he followed Mac Mahon into Brefney O'Reilly, and he burned all the country through which they passed as far as Cavan, and O'Reilly's portion of (the town of) Cavan itself. O'Donnell on that occasion plundered, preyed, destroyed, and carried away much booty from the English settlements of the plain of Oriel (in Louth), and also from Mac Mahon's portion of Oriel (in Monaghan), on his return.

Mac Mahon, i. e. Hugh Oge, the son of Hugh Roe, died, having been blind for some years previous, and was succeeded by Bryan, the son of Redmond Mac Mahon.

O'Brien, lord of Thomond, i. e. Conor, the son of Torlogh, died, and his brother, Gilla Duv, was appointed his successor.

O'Mahony, i. e. Fingin, of the Western territory (in Kerry), the most humane and hospitable man of West Munster, and a learned scholar in the Latin and English tongues, died.

O'Dogherty, i. e. Bryan, the son of Donal, died, and John O'Dogherty was nominated lord, as his successor, by O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe.

Mac Sweeney, of Tir Boghaine (barony of Banagh, in Donegal), i. e. Maolmuire, died, and was interred at Donegal.

O'Dowd, i. e. William (of the county of Sligo), the son of Donal Ballach, died; and Bryan Oge, the son of Bryan O'Dowd, was nominated the O'Dowd, as his successor.

O'Flanagan of Tura (in Fermanagh), i. e. Gilbert, the son of Cormac, son of Gillaisa, died.

Eiver, son of Bryan, son of Niall Gallda O'Neill, was treacherously killed, and his other brother Owen was maimed, by their own brothers, Con Roe and Felim.

Tiarnan, son of Covhach, son of Art O'Rourke, was treacherously slain by Fergal, the son of Cathal Ballach, and by the sons of Anthony, the son of Cathal Ballach O'Rourke.

The castle of Ballyshannon was taken from the guards of O'Donnell, by Hugh, the son of O'Donnell.

O'Donnell restored peace among the people of Carbury, and appointed Felim, son of Manus, son of Bryan, to the lordship over them, but reserved the castle of Sligo for Calvach Caoch, son of Donal, son of Owen O'Connor.

Con, the son of O'Donnell, laid siege to the castle of Ballyshannon, and Maguire, i. e. John, son of Philip, son of Thomas, marched at the request of Hugh, the son of O'Donnell, to drive Con from before the town, which he (Maguire) compelled him to do; Hugh and Maguire then pursued him to Donegal, and burned a portion of the town in the early part of the day. Con, with the forces of Tirconnell, Inisowen, and Dartree of Mac Clancy (in Leitrim), turned on his pursuers, namely, Hugh and Maguire, and followed them to Termon Dabeog (at Lough Dearg, in Donegal). Magrath, i. e. Roderick, the son of Dermod, son of Marcus, the coarb of the same Termon, came and warned Con and the Connallians against violating his own protection, or that of the Termon, in behalf of Maguire. They, however, did not regard that, but pursued Maguire, who was endeavouring to make his escape by force of arms, and Con with his forces took possession of the common road against them, and they were obliged to betake themselves to the bogs and thickets which lay before them, where they lost one hundred and ten horses; and in the engagement Maguire's party were defeated, himself taken prisoner, and twelve of his chiefs, with many others, including Bryan Maguire, the son of Bryan, son of Philip, were slain.

O'Ferrall, i. e. Roderick, the son of Cathal, died.

Mac Gauran, i. e. Donal Bearnach, chief of Tullaghaw, was treacherously killed at the altar of Teampull-an-Phuirt (Templeport, in the county of Cavan), by Teige, the son of Hugh, son of Owen Mac Gauran; and the traces of the blows made at him are perceptible on the corners of the altar.

Maguire, i. e. John, was set at liberty by Con (O'Donnell), after the Termonachs (the heads of the Termons, or church lands), of the province had waited on him, and requested to have him liberated.

O'Cuirnin, i. e. Roderick, and Owen Oge, the son of Hugh O'Daly, died.

John, the son of Owen O'Donnell, was put to death by Con, the son of Hugh Roe (O'Donnell).

A. D. 1497.

The monastery of the Friars at Carrickfergus was founded, by consent from Rome, at the request of Niall, the son of Con, son of Hugh Buighe O'Neill, for the use of Friars minor de observantia (Franciscans), and sixteen Friars of the confraternity of Donegal, with a superior, took possession of it on the Vigil of the Festival of first Lady-day in harvest.

Conor, the son of Cormac, son of Tomaltach (MacDermott), lord of Moylurg, was treacherously killed by the sons of Rodcrick Mac Dermott, namely, Conor and Teige; and Teige, the son of Roderick, assumed his place without opposition.

Eigneachan, the son of Naghtan, son of Torlogh of the Wine O'Donnell, was killed in the fortress of O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, by his own foster-brother Con, the son of Hugh Roe, aided by Gerald, the son of Donal, son of Felim O'Dogherty, Bryan, the son of Mac Clancy, and others. The following were slain by Eignaghan, namely, Owen, the son of Torlogh Gallda O'Donnell, the son of Hugh, son of Torlogh Gallda; Owen, the son of Hugh, son of Donogh of the Wood O'Donnell; Felim, the son of the Giolla Duv, and Torlogh, the son of Cathal, son of the Giolla Duv O'Gallagher, Donogh Balbh O'Firgil, and many others not recorded.

The two O'Neills, i. e. Donal and Henry Oge, made peace with each other in the end of spring, and the son of Donal, namely, Hugh, was set at liberty without a ransom, and Henry Oge gave great presents to Donal, in horses and armour, for resigning the title of lord.

O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, resigned his lordship on the seventh of the Kalends of June, being on a Friday, at Templecarne, in the Termon, on account of the contentions which prevailed between his sons, and on the following Tuesday Con his son was nominated the O'Donnell.

Walter, the son of Rickard Burke, sailed with a fleet to aid young O'Donnell, i. e. Con, the son of Hugh Roe, against his brother Hugh Oge, and after having landed they were joined by Con, and both were defeated by Hugh, who took from them the greater portion of their arms, armour, and provisions, but Hugh himself was taken prisoner in two days after by O'Donnell, namely Con, and was sent to be imprisoned at Conmaicne Cuile (Kilmaine in Mayo), in Connaught, by Walter, the son of Rickard Burke.

O'Donnell, i. e. Con, marched with a force against Mac Dermott of Moylurg, namely, Teige, the son of Roderick Mac Dermott, and only a few from Connaught joined his forces on that occasion, namely, Felim, the son of Manus O'Conor, lord of Carbury, and Owen O'Rourke, tanist of Brefney, with his men. An immense force was collected by Mac Dermott in Seaghais (at the Curlew mountains), to oppose them, and the two O'Conors, with their tribes, marched to join his troops and expedition. A large portion of O'Donnell's forces, commanded by the son of Manus O'Conor, Owen O'Rourke, and Niall Garv O'Donnell, forced the pass of Beallachbuidhe on the Curlew mountains (borders of Roscommon and Sligo), where Cathal O'Rourke and many others were slain. The great force of Siol Murray (Roscommon), rose up in the midst of the armies and defeated O'Donnell, and the following were taken prisoners there, namely, Felim O'Conor, lord of Carbury; the two Mac Sweeneys, viz., Mac Sweeney of Fanat, i. e. Roderick, and Mac Sweeney of Connaught, i. e. Owen Mac Sweeney of Boghaine (barony of Banagh in Donegal); Donogh-na-nordog (of the thumbs), the son of O'Donnell; the two sons of Tuathal O'Gallagher, John and Torlogh; the two sons of Donal Mac Sweeney of Fanat; John and Donal Oge; the two sons of Mac Sweeney of Banagh, namely Niall and Owen Roe; Gerald, the son of Donal, son of Felim O'Dogherty; the physician of O'Donnell, the son of Owen Ultach (Mac Dunlevey); the Cathach of Colum Kille¹ was captured, and its keeper Mac Robartaigh, was slain, and many besides were either slain or taken prisoners, and Owen O'Rourke escaped without being killed or captured in that defeat.

Con, the son of Con, son of Niall O'Donnell, died.

O'Neill, i. e. Henry Oge, the son of Henry, son of Owen, marched with a great force into Tirconnell, and in the first place committed great depredations in Fanat; on their leaving Fanat, they were met by O'Donnell Oge, i. e. Con, at Belathadaire at Leanainn, and an engagement ensued, in which O'Donnell was defeated, and himself, with eight score (160) of his men, slain on the 19th of October, and his two brothers, namely, Niall Garv and Donal, with the son of

A.D. 1497.

1. The Cathach of Collumkille. The term Cathach signifies the Battler, or belonging to battles, and was the name applied to a very curious metallic box, containing a copy of the Psalms in MS. from the Latin Vulgate, written on vellum, and called the Psalter of Collumkille, and said to have been written by that celebrated saint himself, in the sixth century. The Cathach is described in that learned work, the Irish Antiquarian Researches, by Sir William Betham, who gives a plate of it, on which are inscribed several curious figures. It consisted of a brass box, 9½ inches long, 8 inches broad, and two in thickness; the top consisted of a plate of silver, richly gilt and chased, rivetted to one of brass, and on it are figures of St. Collumkille, the crucifixion, and other curious representations: on the corners, and other parts, were set crystals, pearls, sapphires, amethysts, and other gems, and the cover contains several curious Irish inscriptions. This remarkable reliquary got its name from being carried as a military ensign before the forces of the O'Donnells in battle, and was considered to insure victory. It was carefully preserved in that family for many ages from the time of St. Collumkille, who was the great patron saint of the O'Donnells, and of the same descent as those celebrated chiefs and princes of Tirconnell. It is stated in the Antiquarian Researches, that Colonel Daniel O'Donnell, an officer in the French service, in the year 1723, in order to preserve this relique, had a silver case made and placed around it, as mentioned in an inscription engraved on the cover. This box was placed for inspection in the hands of Sir William Betham, for some time, and it is at present the property of Sir Richard O'Donnell, who has deposited it for security in the Royal Irish Academy.

Mac Sweeney, and sixteen others, were taken prisoners. The following were the chiefs who were slain along with Con on that occasion, namely, Donal, the son of Manus Roe, son of Niall O'Donnell; Edmond, the son of Felim Riavach, son of Niall Garv; Bryan, the son of O'Boyle, i. e. of Torlogh, son of Niall; Donal, the son of Tuathal O'Gallagher; Edmond, the son of Donogh, son of Tomaltach O'Gallagher; Conor, the son of John, son of Conor O'Donnell; Niall, the son of Conor, son of Felim Riavach O'Donnell; Conor, the son of Hugh, son of Conor-na-laimhe (of the hand) O'Boyle; Conor, the son of Murrough Mac Sweeney, of the men of Fanat; and William Mac-an-Easpuig O'Gallagher, &c. That battle was fought on a Tuesday, being the 14th of the Kalends of November, and O'Neill, on his return home, took the castle of Derg, and having put Niall O'Neill in possession of it, he victoriously arrived at his home with great spoils; and Hugh Roe (O'Donnell), re-assumed his lordship by the will of God and of men.

The son of O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Duv, the son of Hugh Roe, was liberated from his imprisonment on the 7th of the Ides of November, and was accompanied to Tirconnell by Walter Burke. O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, proffered the lordship to his son Hugh Oge, namely, Hugh Duv, which, however, he did not accept, and after having refused the offer, they both conjointly commenced to govern their principality, to subdue both their neighbouring and distant opponents, who had become disaffected on account of the contentions which had been carried on between the sons of O'Donnell.

Felim the son of Murtogh Roe, son of Bryan Ballach O'Neill, was killed by Donal, the son of Hugh Oge, son of Hugh Buighe, son of Bryan Ballach, at Ros Earcain, and Donal himself was afterwards treacherously slain by the tribe of Donal Caol O'Neill.

Bryan, the son of Cu-uladh, son of Hugh, son of Owen, son of Niall Oge O'Neill, died.

Murtogh, son of Hugh Oge, son of Hugh Buighe O'Neill, was killed by the sons of Felim, son of Murtogh Roe, son of Bryan Ballach O'Neill.

Niall, the son of O'Neill, i. e. the son of Henry, son of Owen, died.

Elinora, daughter of Thomas, son of John Cam, earl of Kildare, the wife of O'Neill, i. e. Con, the son of Henry, son of Owen, died.

O'Ferrall, i. e. Cedach, the son of Thomas, son of Cathal, son of Thomas, and his kinsmen, were defeated by John Roe, the son of Carbray, son of Lisagh; and Cedach himself, together with his son Lisagh; Donal, the son of John, son of Bryan, lord of Clanawley; Gerald, the son of Hugh Oge, lord of Moy Treagh (both in Longford), and many others, were slain.

Glaisne, the son of John O'Hanlon, was killed by the sons of O'Byrne.

Murrough, the son of Conmac, son of John O'Ferrall, was killed by Bryan Buighe, the son of Roderick, son of John O'Ferrall.

Hugh Buighe, the son of O'Rourke, i. e. Felim, the son of Donogh, son of Tiarnan Oge, was slain by the son of Teige, son of Cathal, son of Tiarnan O'Rourke.

Eiver and Tuathal, the sons of Mac Mahon, i. e. Hugh Oge, the son of Hugh Roe, along with fourteen men of their party, were slain by the people of Orior (in Armagh); Manus Riavach, and Manus Oge O'Hanlon, with fifty of the people of Orior, fell by them (the MacMahons).

Donal, son of Rossa, son of Thomas Oge, son of Thomas Maguire, died.

Mac Donogh of Corran (in Sligo), i. e. Bryan, the son of Mulroona, son of Tomaltach, died.

Donal, son of Malachy O'Beirne, the fountain of hospitality of Hy Briuin of the Shannon, and Teige Roe, the son of Carbray O'Conor, died.

Teige, the son of Malachy Mac Rannall, was killed by the son of Murrough Mac Rannall, as he had deserved.

The Giolla Duv, son of Felim Buighe, was killed at Cluan Plocain, by the tribe of Teige O'Conor.

The Calvach, son of Carbray O'Conor (of Offale), was killed in prison by the cast of a javelin.

Teige O'Rodaghan, the coarb of St. Caillin (abbot of Fenagh, in Leitrim), a man whose worth could not be well described for its greatness and extent, died at his own house.

An awful famine happened in this and in the following year throughout Ireland, so that the people ate food which is not fit to be mentioned, such as was never served on dishes for human beings.

A. D. 1498.

Mac Maghnusa, of Seanaid, i. e. Cathal Oge, the son of Cathal, son of Cathal, son of Gillpatrick, son of Matthew, &c., a man who kept a house of general hospitality, and a Biatach in Seanaid Mac Manus, a canon of the chapter of Ardmagh and of the see of Clogher, parson of Iniskeen, dean of Lough Erne (dean of Clogher), a deputy of a bishop (or coadjutor bishop) in Clogher for fifteen years before his death, a patron of learning and arts in his own country, a chief conservator of the canons, a fountain of charity and mercy to the poor and unprotected of God's people, a man who collected and brought together many historical books, from which he compiled for himself the Book of Annals of Bally Mac Manus,¹ died of the small-pox, on the tenth of the Kalends of April, being on a Friday, in the 60th year of his age.

O'Neill, i. e. Henry Oge, the son of Henry, son of Owen, lord of Tyrone, was slain in the house of Art, the son of Hugh, son of Owen O'Neill, in Tuath Eachach (Iveagh, in the county of Down), by the two sons of Con, son of Henry, son of Owen, namely, Torlogh and Con Bacach, the sons of the earl's daughter (the earl of Kildare's daughter who was married to Con O'Neill), in revenge of their father Con, who had been previously killed by Henry, in the year 1493.

Donal, the son of Henry, son of Owen O'Neill, who had been nominated O'Neill previous to that, collected together his friends and connections, namely, the tribe of Redmond Mac Mahon, with whom he marched to Dungannon; they remained for some time about the castle, and a night at Cros Caibhdeanach (Crosse Kevin); Felim, son of O'Neill, i. e. Henry Oge, the son of Henry, who had been killed, brought Niall, the son of Art O'Neill, with all his forces on them, on a Tuesday morning, when he found them asleep, attacked them at the break of day, and defeated them, and many of the chiefs of the province were slain on that occasion, among whom were Henry, the son of the forementioned Donal; Mac Caghwel, i. e. Gillpatrick; Felim, the son of Redmond Mac Mahon; the two sons of James, the son of Eochy More Mac Mahon; and Malachy, the son of Felim Roe, son of Con Mac Mahon, along with a great number of the people and of the friends of the tribe of Redmond Mac Mahon; Hugh, the son of Mac Mahon, i. e. Bryan, the son of Redmond, was taken prisoner there, and they lost the most part of their horses and accoutrements; and the person by whom they were brought thither, namely, Felim, received a wound on his head by the thrust of a spear, from the violent effect of which he died.

Con, the son of Murtoigh, son of Owen O'Neill, was killed by the sons of Bryan Bacach, the son of Edmond Roe O'Hanlon.

Niall, the son of Hugh Roe, son of Niall Garv O'Donnell, died in his imprisonment; and Donal, son of Naghtan, son of Torlogh, son of Niall Garv O'Donnell, died of the small-pox.

O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, made an attack on the sons of Art O'Neill, and they had an engagement, in which the sons of Art were defeated, and Malachy, the son of Niall, son of Art, was slain by O'Donnell; and O'Donnell pursued them to Caislean Maol (Castlemoyle, in Tyrone), took the castle, seized on seventeen pair (or suits) of armour, and took fifteen hostages, along with the two sons of Henry Bacach, the son of Roderick, son of Eignachan O'Neill, namely, Felim and Hugh, and also Naghtan, the son of Owen O'Donnell, and the son of Eigneachan O'Donnell.

O'Kane, i. e. John, the son of Aibhne, died, and his brother Thomas succeeded him.

The castle of Dungannon was taken by the king of England's deputy in Ireland, the earl of Kildare, namely, Gerald, the son of Thomas, who had come thither at the invitation of O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe; of Torlogh, the son of Con O'Neill; of Maguire, i. e. John, the son of Philip, and of

A. D. 1498.

1. The Book of Annals of Bally Mac Manus was the celebrated work on Irish history and antiquities called the Annals of Ulster, of which a Latin translation was made by the learned and Rev. Dr. Charles O'Connor, and published in his great work, the Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores Veteres. The Cathal Mac Manus, above-mentioned, was Cathal, or Charles Maguire, an eminent ecclesiastic and learned man, who collected and compiled those Annals, as stated in the text, at Seanaid Mac Manus, a place situate in the county of Fermanagh; hence these Annals have been sometimes called Annales Senatenses, or Senatensian Annals, and sometimes the Annals of Bally Mac Manus. The Annals of Ulster contain the history of Ireland from the first to the latter end of the fifteenth century, being carried down to the time of the Author's death; but some additions were afterwards made to them, and they were continued to A. D. 1541, by the learned Roderick O'Casidy, archdeacon of Clogher, according to Ware's Writers.

Donal O'Neill, with his sons and friends; the greater portion of the Irish of the province were along with them, about the castle, which they at length took by great guns, and released many prisoners who were confined in it, among whom were Donal, the son of O'Donnell, who had been imprisoned there for a year, and Art, the son of O'Neill More, i. e. Henry, with his two sons, and many other prisoners besides. They took immense booty out of it, and slew Con, the son of Owen, son of Torlogh Roe O'Neill, in the castle; and after that they left the town in possession of Donal O'Neill.

Thomas Oge, the son of Thomas the earl, son of Gerald the earl, and Cormac Oge, the son of Cormac, son of Teige Mac Carthy, went in pursuit of Owen, the son of Teige, son of Cormac Mac Carthy, to recover a prey; and Owen himself, with his two sons; O'Sullivan Beara, i. e. Philip, the son of Dermot, with his son; Teige-an-Chaonaigh O'Sullivan, and Bryan Oge Mac Sweeney, with many others, were slain by them on that occasion.

Donogh, the son of O'Donnell, and the two sons of Tuathal O'Gallagher, namely, John and Torlogh, returned from Moylurg, where they were imprisoned.

Slaine, daughter of Mac Namara, i. e. Sioda

I. The Kingdom of Ulster.—The following account of the ancient history of Ulster has been collected from the works of the various old annalists and historians, and also of numerous modern writers, frequently quoted in the course of these annotations.

Name.—The name of Ulster, in Irish Uladh, and pronounced Ullagh, is derived, according to Keating and others, from Ollsaith, which signifies Great Wealth, the word Oll meaning great, and Saith wealth, and it was so called from the richness of that province in ancient times; or, according to others, the name was derived from Ollamh, a celebrated king of Ulster, and monarch of Ireland many centuries before the Christian era, who was called Ollamh Fodhla, a name pronounced Ollav Fola. It was also called Cuigeadh Uladh, which signifies the Fifth, or province of Ulster; the term Cuigeadh meaning a fifth part, being applied to a province, as Ireland was divided into five provinces or kingdoms, namely, those of Meath, Ulster, Connaught, Leinster, and Munster; thus forming a Pentarchy in the early ages. Ulster was also sometimes called Ullin by the bards, and the inhabitants were called Ulltaigh, meaning Ullonians. The name Uladh was in after times confined chiefly to the territory also called Dalaradia, which comprised the present county of Down and the southern part of Antrim, and this name has been latinised Ulidia, while Ulster was latinised Ullonia.

Extent.—Ancient Ulster comprised the following territories, namely, Oirgiall, now forming the counties of Louth, Monaghan, and Armagh, with some parts of Tyrone and Fermanagh; Dalaradia or Ulidia, now the county of Down, and the southern part of Antrim; Dalriada, now the northern part of Antrim; Tir Eogain and Tir Conaill, now forming the counties of Tyrone, Derry, and Donegal; and lastly, the present county of Fermanagh. The boundaries between the kingdoms of Meath and Ulster were the river Boyne from Drogheda to Slane and Navan, and the river Blackwater from Navan to Kells, and to Lough Ramor near Virginia, in the county of Cavan; thus ancient Ulster contained the present county of Louth, and that part of the present county of Meath north of the rivers Boyne and Blackwater, in the baronies of Slane, Kells, and Morgallion, and also a portion of East Breffney, now the county of Cavan, in the baronies of Clankee and Castlerahan, bordering on Meath; therefore ancient Ulster differed in extent from the modern province, as it contained the county of Louth with parts of Meath, now included in the province of Leinster, and also a small portion of Cavan, but the whole of East Breffney or Cavan, which mostly belonged to Connaught in ancient times, was, in the reign of Elizabeth, added to Ulster. In the second century the celebrated monarch Tuathal Teachtmair took a portion from each of the four provinces, which he added to Meath, and thus formed the province or kingdom of Meath; and he took from Ulster those parts north of the Boyne and Blackwater, in the present counties of Cavan and Meath; and on this portion was erected one of the royal palaces at Tailtean, near the river Blackwater, between Kells and Navan, as explained in the note on Meath.

Mountains and Scenery.—Many parts of Ulster abound in scenery of great magnificence and beauty, both in the interior and along the sea-coast. The Giant's Causeway, on the coast of Antrim, which consists of a prodigious collection of basaltic columns of immense size and of volcanic origin, but formed and arranged with such regularity, as to present the appearance of a vast work of art, is one of the most remarkable natural curiosities in any country. There are many majestic mountains in the different counties, as those of Mourne in Down, the chief of which, Slieve Donard, rises 3,000 feet above the level of the sea; Slieve Gullion in Armagh is also a very remarkable and lofty mountain; and in Antrim, Tyrone, Derry, Donegal, and Fermanagh, are many great mountains too numerous to be here mentioned; in Cavan also are many large mountains, particularly the towering Cuilcagh on the borders of Cavan and Fermanagh, at whose base is the source of the mighty Shannon, which rolls its waters along eleven counties, onward to the Atlantic.

The province of Ulster is remarkable as containing countless hills of various sizes, mostly of a conical form and very beautiful, not rocky and barren, as in many other countries, but covered with earth and exquisite verdure, and so fertile that to their very tops they are capable of cultivation. There are many fine and fertile plains, beautiful valleys, and romantic glens; and the country abounds in splendid seats and extensive demesnes of nobility and gentry, well wooded, and presenting magnificent and beautiful scenery along the lakes and rivers.

Bogs and ancient Forests.—In various parts of Ulster are extensive moors and wild heaths, famous for hares, grouse, and other game. The bogs in the different counties are numerous and extensive, and in the whole of the province estimated to contain about two or three hundred thousand acres. These bogs are chiefly composed of the remains of ancient forests of oak, pine or fir, yew, ash, alder, birch, hazel, thorn, willow, &c., which covered the entire of the country in remote times. Oak forests particularly abounded in Ireland in ancient times, and the Irish oak was so very durable, that it was found superior to that of any other country for ship-building, timber for houses, furniture, and various other purposes. In our old historians are accounts of the clearing of many great plains and cutting down forests in various parts of Ireland in the earliest ages, some of them more than a thousand years before the Christian era. In the clearing out of these great plains the forests were destroyed, and great quantities of trees are found deeply buried in the bogs; and in the formation of the grand canal, when cutting through the Bog of Allen in Kildare, oak, fir, yew, and other trees, were found buried twenty or thirty feet below the surface, and these trees generally lie prostrated in a horizontal position, and have the appearance of being burned at the bottom of their trunks and roots, fire having been found far more powerful Cam, the wife of Mac William of Clanriekard, namely, Ulick, the son of Ulick, died.

Sabina, the daughter of Art O'Neill, who had been the wife of Redmond, the son of Philip Maguire, died.

Margaret, daughter of Donal Ballach Maguire, the wife of O'Flanagan of Tura, i. e. Gilbert, died, and was interred at Donegal, after the victory of repentance. It was by this couple that a chapel was founded in honour of God and the Blessed Virgin Mary, at Aghamore, the town of O'Flanagan (in Fermanagh).

Maine, the son of Malachy, son of Matthew Mac Manus, was slain in Botha Muintir Fialain (Bohoe, in Fermanagh), by the sons of Cathal O'Gallagher.

O'Curnin, i. e. Conor Carrach (of Leitrim), died.

Mac Ward, of Oriel, died of the plague.

in prostrating those forests than cutting them down with the axe; and the great depth at which those trees are found in bogs, shews that they must have lain there for many ages.

The Irish Elk.—In Boate and Molineux's Natural History of Ireland, Ware's Antiquities, and other works, particularly by Dr. Hart of the Royal Dublin Society, accounts are given of the great Irish elk, or Moose deer, designated by Dr. Hart Cervus megaros, or the great-horned deer, the horns, heads, and bones of which have been frequently found buried from six to twenty feet deep in bogs and marl-pits, and also in lakes, in various parts of Ireland, which circumstances shew the vast length of time the ancient forests have been prostrated, and the bogs formed out of them, as well as the many ages those gigantic animals whose remains are found so deeply buried, must have lain in those bogs. The immense size and strength of the Irish elk is shewn by its huge broad and branching antlers, each of the two horns measuring five or six feet in length, and having ten or twelve branches on each, and measuring between the extreme tips of the horns on both sides ten or twelve feet, and these horns so large and massive as to be from sixty to eighty pounds weight, so that the animal capable of carrying them must have been of great size and strength, and is considered to have been eight or ten feet in height, and its body about the same length, being far larger than an ox, and next in size to the elephant. It resembled the great Moose deer or elk of America, and is considered to have been of the same species, and also had a great resemblance to the European elk or rein deer of Norway, Sweden, and Lapland; and it may be observed, that the huge skeletons of some fossil elks like the Irish, have been found buried deep in the earth in the Isle of Man, and also in France and Germany. The remains of the Irish elk have been frequently found in various parts of Ireland, but mostly in Ulster and in Meath; and its huge horns are to be seen at the Dublin Society House, and in other museums. No doubt great numbers of them are still buried in bogs, and these magnificent animals must have been very numerous in Ireland in remote times, but the race has become extinct for ages, and the era of their existence is beyond the reach of historic records, though once inhabitants of the great forests that waved upon the surface of the primeval lands.

In Boate's Natural History is also given an account of the bones and teeth of an elephant, found in the year 1715, on the bishop of Kilmore's lands, at a place called Maghera, about eight miles from Beltrubet, in the county of Cavan, near a small river that separates that county from Monaghan. These remains were found when sinking the foundation for a mill, four or five feet deep in the earth, in a bed which had been composed of ferns and rushes, and they consisted of four immense teeth, the two larger ones weighing about three pounds each, together with parts of the huge head of the animal, and some fragments of bones; and it is considered that this enormous animal must have lain there for many ages.

Lakes.—Throughout the province of Ulster are innumerable lakes, and many of them magnificent, as Lough Neagh, in the counties of Antrim, Tyrone, Down, Armagh, and Derry, the largest lake in the British Islands, being about 20 miles long, 10 or 12 broad, and 80 in circumference, and estimated to cover an area of nearly one hundred thousand acres. Lough Erne, in Fermanagh, is between 30 and 40 miles long, and from 3 to 5 broad in some places, and its shores, and many large, beautiful, and wooded islands, abound in most delightful scenery. Strangford Lough, in the county of Down, Lough Foyle, in Derry, and Lough Swilly, in Donegal, are magnificent sheets of water, or great lakes, formed by inlets of the ocean. Loughs Melvin and Macnean, between Leitrim and Fermanagh, are very fine and large lakes, and Lough Oughter, in Cavan, is a great chain of lakes, extending eight or ten miles in length; and in the same county is Lough Ramor, and on the borders of Meath the splendid Lough Sheelin. In Monaghan also are a great many handsome lakes, and throughout the entire of Ulster are vast numbers of minor lakes, abounding in beautiful scenery.

Eruption of Lakes.—Accounts are given by our ancient annalists of great lakes in various parts of Ireland having suddenly burst forth in very remote times; and in Ulster the following are the chief instances recorded:—More than a thousand years before the Christian era, Lough Foyle, in Derry, is said to have burst forth, overflowed the adjoining plain, and drowned in its waves Feabhal, or Feval, the son of Lodan, one of the Tuath De Danan chiefs, from whom it was called Loch Feval, now Lough Foyle. About eight centuries before the Christian era, in the reign of Fiacha Labhrúine, one of the Milesian monarchs, it is stated by all our annalists that the great lake called Loch Saimer, afterwards Lough Erne, suddenly burst forth, and overwhelmed an immense tract of land called Magh Geannain, or the Plain of Geannan, which was so named from Geannan, one of the Firbolg kings. In the reign of Lughaidh Riabhdearg, who was monarch of Ireland in the first century, the lake called Lough Neagh suddenly burst forth, A.D. 62, according to the Annals of Tighearnach, and overwhelmed in its waters the surrounding plains, with all the houses and inhabitants; and Giraldus Cambrensis, who wrote in the twelfth century, speaking of the Round Towers, states that a tradition prevailed down to his time, that when the fishermen sailed over Lough Neagh, they could, in the clear lake, in calm weather, manifestly see beneath the waters the Round Towers, which, with the towns, had been covered by its inundation; and this statement has been adduced as an argument to corroborate the vast antiquity attributed to the Round Towers. Moore, in one of his melodies, thus alludes to the subject:—

"On Lough Neagh's banks, as the fisherman strays,
When the calm clear eve's declining,
He sees the Round Towers of other days
In the waves beneath him shining."

About three hundred years before the Christian era, the great lake called Lough Melvin, on the borders of Leitrim and Fermanagh, is stated by our annalists to have had its origin by bursting out suddenly like the other lakes before mentioned, while the people were constructing a sepulchral mound there as the burial place of Meilge, monarch of Ireland, and hence the lake was called Loch Melge, now Lough Melvin. These accounts of our old annalists about the formation of lakes by the sudden flow of subterranean waters are not improbable, and the phenomena may have in some cases arisen from volcanic action, or earthquakes; and it may be observed, that basaltic columns, now admitted to be of volcanic origin, are to be found along the shores of Lough Neagh. Even in comparatively modern times similar occurrences to the bursting forth of these lakes have taken place; and in these Annals, at A.D. 1490, it is recorded that a sudden eruption of the earth took

A. D. 1499.

OGHLIN Mac Gillachalma, vicar of Cuilmaine, a learned and pious cleric, died.

O'Brien, i. e. the Giolla Duv, whose name was Torlogh, the son of Torlogh O'Brien, lord of Thomond, died, and was succeeded by Torlogh, the son of Teige O'Brien.

Teige Mac Dermott, the son of Roderick, lord place at the Ox Mountains, in Sligo, and a lake was formed called Lough Easky, which is still to be seen there, situated at the northern side of the mountains; and in this eruption it is stated that one hundred persons perished, along with the son of Manus Crosach O'Hara, and that many horses and cows were also destroyed. The phenomena which have so frequently happened in various parts of Ireland in modern times of moving bogs, which, by the action of subterranean waters, have suddenly burst out in a half liquid form, and overflowed extensive tracts of land, appear to have been something similar to the bursting out of the lakes in ancient times.

Rivers.—In the different counties of Ulster are many fine rivers, too numerous to be here mentioned, and several of them very large and beautiful. The Bann, in Antrim and Derry, and the Erne, in Fermanagh and Donegal, are famous for their salmon fisheries, and there is another great salmon fishery at Bundrowes, on the borders of Leitrim and Donegal; and it may be observed, that all the lakes and rivers of Ulster abound with fish in vast variety.

Mines and Manufactures.—In the county of Tyrone are extensive coal mines, and there are great collieries, iron works, and potteries, carried on at Coal Island, between Lough Neagh and Dungannon. In the county of Antrim there are coal mines at Ballycastle, and these collieries, formerly very flourishing, are still worked; and there are traces of coal mines having been worked there in the most remote ages. In various parts of Cavan are mines of coal and iron, but not worked; and there are lead mines, which contain some silver, at Cotehill and Ballyconnell; there are sulphur mines in the mountains of Glangevlin, and in various parts of the county are valuable quarries of limestone, freestone, and slate, and also ores of potter's clay, manganese, and other minerals. In the county of Down, the Mourne mountains are chiefly composed of granite, and also Slieve Gullion mountain in Armagh; and in the latter county there are fine quarries of freestone and slate, and also coal, iron, copper, and lead ores. In the county of Donegal, in the Rosses and other parts, are valuable quarries of white, black, and variegated marble, and also slate quarries; and there are ores of iron, copper, lead, and manganese, found in various places, and some mines were formerly worked. In Fermanagh are very fine marble, limestone, and freestone quarries; and on the borders of Cavan, at Cuilcagh mountain, are abundance of iron ore, and some coal mines, which could be profitably worked. In the counties of Derry and Antrim are vast strata of basalt, of which the Giant's Causeway is composed. Iron mines were formerly worked in the county of Derry, and there are also some mines of coal, copper, and lead. In Monaghan are very extensive quarries of excellent freestone, and of fine limestone, equal to marble, and also slate quarries; coal mines were formerly worked near Carrickmacross, and lead mines in the Creeve mountains. In Louth, the Carlingford mountains, a branch of the mountains of Mourne, are composed chiefly of granite, and there are extensive limestone quarries; there are ores of ironstone, and remains of some ancient iron works, found on the hills in various places; and there is a large pin manufactory at Dundalk. The of Moylurg, a prosperous, undaunted man, who spread terror into every neighbouring country, died on the rock of Lough Kea, after having gained the victory over the world and the devil, and was succeeded by Cormac, the son of Roderick Mac Dermott.

O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, went on amicable terms towards the English, to pay a visit to the king of England's representative.

Mac Donnell, of Clankelly (in Fermanagh), i. e. Cormac, the son of Art, a charitable and hospitable man, died, and was buried at Clones.

Bryan, son of Maguire, i. e. John, the son of extensive quarries of granite, freestone, limestone, marble, basalt, porphyry, and slates, found in various counties, are very valuable for furnishing building materials, millstones, &c.; and jasper, agates, gypsum or alabaster, chalcedony, garnets, and other precious stones, are also found in many places, and also pearls found in the Bann, and other rivers of Ulster; and the waters of Lough Neagh are famous for petrifying wood, and of these petrifications excellent bones are manufactured. If the valuable mines and quarries in the various counties of Ulster were properly worked, they would afford vast sources of wealth; but the mining and manufacturing industry of Ireland is yet in its infancy, though it is to be hoped that Dr. Kane's excellent work on the "Industrial Resources of Ireland" will awaken proper attention to these important subjects. The Newry and Lagan Canals, and navigation of Lough Neagh, and the Great Ulster Canal, recently formed, connecting Lough Neagh and Lough Erne, will do much to promote trade and commerce. But the inland navigation of Ulster is capable of far greater extension, along Lough Erne to the Atlantic at Ballyshannon, and on the south by the lakes of Lough Oughter in Cavan, with an additional canal to Leitrim, to communicate with the great coal works and iron mines of Arigna, and connect Loughs Neagh and Erne with the Shannon; thus forming a magnificent chain of navigable communication between Ulster and the other provinces of Ireland, and developing the vast but comparatively dormant resources of the country, in trade, commerce, agriculture, mines, manufactures, fisheries, and all other branches of industry. The formation of rail-roads now in progress, and many in contemplation, throughout Ulster, will still further promote these great national improvements. The linen manufacture was formerly the staple trade of Ulster, but has of late years greatly fallen to decay. Agriculture, though in modern times much advanced, is still extremely imperfect in Ulster, as in other parts of Ireland, and capable of immense extension, by draining, fencing, and other improvements. There are more than one million of acres of waste lands, mountains, bogs, and moors, in Ulster, capable of being profitably reclaimed, and the arable land could be made four-fold more productive than it is at present by proper modes of cultivation.

Antiquities.—In all the counties of Ulster are to be found Druidical remains, such as Cromleacs, and circles composed of huge stones, and remains of Druidical temples. Sepulchral Mounds, or Tumuli, commonly called moats, resembling hillocks, the sepulchres of kings and warriors in the Pagan times, are found in the different counties, and also those huge heaps of stones, called Cairns, likewise used as sepulchral monuments, are found on high hills and mountains in various places; and in that part of ancient Ulster now forming the county of Louth are many sepulchral mounds, and other interesting antiquities, of which accounts will be found in Wright's Louthiana. Those circular earthen ramparts called Raths are found in vast numbers throughout all the counties of Ulster. The term Lios, or Lis, is applied to these raths, and they are commonly called Danish forts, from some traditions that they were constructed by the Danes; but such opinions

Philip, was taken prisoner by the sons of Bryan Maguire.

Donogh, the son of Conor, son of Hugh Maguire, was killed by the men of Lurg (in Ferma-nagh), namely, the sons of Torlogh O'Muldoon.

Manus, the son of Geoffrey Oge, son of Geoffrey are erroneous; for, though some of them may have been made by the Danes, most of them were erected as habitations and fortresses by the ancient Irish many centuries before the arrival of the Danes in Ireland.

Round Towers still exist in almost all the counties of ancient Ulster. In Louth, there is one at Monasterhoyce, and another at Dromiskin; and there were in former times one at Drogheda, one at the town of Louth, and another at Heynstown, near Dundalk. In Armagh, there was in former times a Round Tower at the city of Armagh, or, according to other accounts, there were several of them there. In Monaghan, there are two at Clones, one perfect, and the remains of the other, and there is one at Iniskeen. In Down, one at Drumboe, and remains of another at Maghera; a beautiful Round Tower stood at Downpatrick, which, with barbarous bad taste, was taken down about the year 1790, when rebuilding the cathedral. In Antrim, there is one near the town of Antrim, and another at Armoyle; part of one on Ram Island, in Lough Neagh, and ruins of another at Trumery, near Lisburn. In Derry, there was one in former times in the city of Derry, at the ancient cathedral, which was called St. Columkille's Tower. In Donegal, according to the map of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, there are remains of a Round Tower at Braade, and another on Tory Island, called St. Columkille's Tower, and there was one in former times at Raphoe. In Tyrone, there was formerly a Round Tower at Erigal Kerogue. In Fermanagh, there is one on Devenish Island, in Lough Erne, near Enniskillen. In Cavan, there is one at the ancient abbey of Dromlane. Thus, in ancient Ulster, there are accounts of 23 Round Towers, including those now remaining perfect and imperfect, and others which have fallen or been thrown down; and no doubt, in remote times, there were many more, of which there are now no records; and it may be observed, that many of those Round Towers now remaining from barbarous neglect are falling into dilapidation and ruin, though if repaired, they would stand for a thousand years to come.

There are to be found throughout all the counties of Ulster ruins and remains of numerous abbeys, churches, and castles; and in that part of ancient Ulster now forming the county of Louth the venerable ruins of the old abbeys of Drogheda, and of the great Cistercian abbey of Mellifont, in Louth, together with the splendid antique stone crosses at Monasterhoyce, near Drogheda, the largest found in Ireland, and superior even to those found at Clonmacnois, present extremely interesting memorials of former ages; but the ancient abbeys and churches so celebrated in former times at Armagh, Downpatrick, Newry, Bangor, Derry Columkille, Louth, Mellifont, Monasterhoyce, Drogheda, Ardee, Clogher, Coleraine, Raphoe, Devenish, Clones, Cavan, Dromlane, and various other places, have fallen to utter decay, under the hand of time, or the more destructive fury of fanaticism and war. In various parts of Ulster have been found, at different times, a vast number of antiquities, buried in bogs, in the ramparts of ancient fortresses, in lakes, &c., such as spears, hatchets, and arrow-heads, of stone, granite, basalt, and flint; spears, swords, and battle-axes of bronze and iron; brazen war-trumpets, and various musical instruments; large pots, and other culinary utensils of bronze or brass; stone hand-mills, called querns; meathurs, or large drinking-vessels, made of yew; goblets, and various ornaments of gold and silver; torques, or golden collars worn by kings and chiefs, gold chains, large rings, balls, bracelets, crescents, and gorgets of gold, antique bells, gold and silver crosses, and numerous other articles belonging to remote ages, and shewing an early acquaintance with arts and civilization.

Ancient History.—The following sketch of the ancient history of Ulster has been collected from the Four Masters, the Annals of Ulster, the Annals of Tighearnach, O'Connor's Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores, the Dissertations of Charles O'Connor, O'Flaherty's Ogygia, the histories of Keating, O'Halloran, Mac Geoghagan, and others, and the works of Ware, Usher, Colgan, Lanigan, &c.

The Partholanians, called by the Irish writers Muintir Phar- tolain, or Partholan's people, according to our old annalists, and most accurate chronologers, came to Ireland about fifteen centuries before the Christian era, under a leader named Partholan, a Seythian, from the country on the borders of Europe and Asia, near the sea called by the Greeks the Euxine, now the Black Sea, and set sail from the country called Migdonia, part of ancient Macedonia or Thrace, and passing through the seas subsequently named the Bosphorus, the Hellespont, the Archipelago, and the Mediterranean, by the coast of Iberia, or Spain, landed at a place afterwards called Inver Sceine, now the Bay of Kenmare, and planted the first colony in Ireland. He was accompanied by his wife Dealgnait, or Elgnatha, and several sons and daughters, together with one thousand other followers. After traversing the island, or probably sailing northwards, he fixed his residence some time at an island, which got the name of Inis Saimer, or the island of Samer, from the circumstance of his having killed there, in a fit of passion, his wife's favorite dog, called Samer; and this place is still traditionally pointed out as the small rocky island near the cataraet called the Salmon Leap, a little below the bridge at Ballyshannon, in the county of Donegal. The river now called the Erne was, from the island of Samer, named in ancient times the river Samer, and is mentioned by Giraldus Cambrensis under the name Samarium, and hence the monastery near Ballyshannon, called Ashroe, is mentioned by Ware under the name de Samario. The name Loeh Samer was also the ancient appellation of Lough Erne, and according to Peter Walsh, in his Antiquities, quoting Camhrens Eversus, the lake got the name of Lough Erne from the circumstance of Erna, the favorite waiting-maid of Meiva, the celebrated queen of Connaught about the commencement of the Christian era, having been drowned there. Another remarkable circumstance may be mentioned as connected with the river Erne, namely, that the cataraet at Ballyshannon was called in Irish Eas-Aodha-Ruaidh, signifying the Waterfall of Red Hugh, from Aodb Ruadh, monarch of Ireland, having been drowned there about five centuries before the Christian era, and being buried in a mound on its banks; and hence Easroe, or Ashroe, was the ancient name of Ballyshannon. Another circumstance connected with Partholan in Ulster is mentioned: that one of his sons, named Slainge, was buried on a mountain, and a great cairn, or heap of stones, raised over him, and the mountain got the name of Slieve Slainge; it is mentioned by Giraldus Cambrensis as Mons Salanga, and is now known as Slieve Donard, one of the highest of the Mourne mountains, in the county of Down, and it got the name of Donard from Domangart, a disciple of St. Patrick, who in the fifth century built an oratory there, and it became a celebrated place of pilgrimage, and continues so to the present day. Partholan after some time removed from Inis Sauer, and fixed his residence at a place afterwards called Binn Eadair, now the Hill of Howth, near Dublin; and, after his colony had been thirty years in Ireland, and fought some battles with the Fomorians, as hereafter mentioned, himself and all his people, amounting to nine thousand persons, were all cut off by a plague, which circumstance, together with an account of their burial place, has been fully related at p. 266, in the notes on Moy Liffey and Bregia.

The Nemeditans.—After the death of Partholan and his people, Ireland was uninhabited for thirty years, until another colony of Seythians, called Nemeditans, and by the Irish writers named Clanna Neimhid, from Neimhid, or Nemeditus, their leader set sail from the Euxine sea, and arrived in Ireland in thirty-four ships, each containing thirty persons, thus making in all more than one thousand followers, together with his wife Maeha, and his four sons; and Armagh, in Irish Ard Maeha, signifying the height, or hill of Maeha, is said to have got its name from Maeha, the wife of Nemeditus, who was buried there. In the time of Nemeditus, several great woods are stated to have been cut down, and large plains cleared, in various parts of Ireland; amongst others, the following plains in Ulster: Magh Tochair, or the bog plain in the territory afterwards called Tir Eogain, or Tyrone; Magh Lugh-

Roe Maguire, was killed by the people of Tulaghaw (in Cavan).

The castle of Bundroos (in Leitrim), was taken aídh, in Hy Tuirtre, and Magh Seimne, both in Dalaradia, now parts of Down and Antrim; Magh Muirthemhne, now the plain of Louth, and Magh Macha, in Orgiall, now part of Armagh; but it is to be observed that all the places above-mentioned were not known by these names until several centuries afterwards, and they are mentioned by the names they bore at the time the writers gave accounts of them. Several great lakes are stated to have sprung out of the earth, in the time of the Nemedians, in various parts of Ireland, of which accounts are given by Keating and O'Flaherty. The Nemedians fought many great battles in Ulster, with the people called Fomorians, of whom an account is hereafter given, and after being vanquished by the Fomorians, it is stated that Nemedius, together with two or three thousand of his people, died of the plague, at a place called Oilean-Arda-Neimhid, now the island of Barrymore, or Great Island, near the city of Cork.

The Fomorians are called by the Irish writers Fomoraigh, which signifies sea robbers or pirates, and derived, according to O'Brien, from fogh, plundering, and muir, the sea, and the word Fomor also signifies a pirate, or a giant. The Fomorians are represented as African pirates of the race of Ham, who had come to Ireland to avoid the Israelites, or descendants of Shem, and to have arrived in great numbers, about the same time as the Partholians and Nemedians; or, according to others, they came before them, and were the first inhabitants of Ireland. They are considered to have come from the northern parts of Africa, called Lybia or Getulia, and to have been some of the Canaanites, or Phenicians, who had been expelled from the land of Canaan, or Palestine, by Joshua, about fifteen hundred years before the Christian era. A remarkable record of the expulsion of the Phenicians from the land of Canaan, and of their settlement in Africa, is mentioned by the historian Procopius, who was himself a native of Palestine, and wrote in the sixth century; he was secretary to the Roman general Belisarius, and in his account of the wars of the Romans with the Vandals, in Africa, he states, that in his own time there were, near the fountain of the Magi, at the place now called Tangier, on the northern coast of Africa, two marble columns with inscriptions in the Phenician language, to the following effect—"We fly from the face of Joshua the robber, the son of Nun." It may be further mentioned, that the people called Berbers and Kabyles, who now inhabit parts of the territories of Algiers and Morocco, are descendants of the aborigines of that country, and who were some of the Canaanites expelled from Palestine by Joshua. These Fomorians therefore, it is probable, were of the same stock as the Phenicians, Sidonians, and Tyrians, colonies of whom founded Carthage in Africa, and Gadhira or Gades, now Cadiz, and Kartabah, now Cordova, in Spain, more than a thousand years before the Christian era, and as Sidon in Phenicia was a great maritime city in the time of Joshua, fifteen centuries before the Christian era, and its people expert navigators, and as the Phenicians, Sidonians, and Tyrians, in those early ages, were celebrated for their commercial intercourse with Greece, Italy, Gaul, Spain, and Britain, there is nothing improbable in a colony of them having sailed from Africa or Spain to Ireland, and formed settlements there fifteen hundred years before the Christian era, the period assigned for those events by our ancient annalists. The Fomorians are represented as a race of giants, men of great strength and stature, which accords with the accounts given in the Scriptures, in which the Anakim Amorites, Amalekites, and Philistines, tribes of the land of Canaan, descended from Canaan, the son of Ham, are called the giant race of Ham, and were great warriors, celebrated for their immense strength and stature. The Fomorians are also stated by our old writers to have been famous builders in stone, and are mentioned by Keating and O'Flaherty as having been employed by Nemedius, and to have erected two great fortresses, one at Rath Ciombaoth, in Seimne, in Dalaradia, now part of Down or Antrim, and another in Hy Niella, in Meath. Conaing, a celebrated commander of the Fomorians, is stated to have built a strong tower on an island off the coast of Ulster, which was called Tor Conaing, or the Tower by the son of Donal, i. e. Donagh-na-nordog, the son of Hugh Roe, from O'Donnell's guards; O'Donnell himself, with his son Hugh Oge, proof Conaing, and the island got the name of Tor-Inis, or Tower Island, and is now known as Tory Island, off the coast of Donegal; and Balar Bemen, another famous champion of the Fomorians, who commanded them at the battle of North Moy Tuire, fought against the Tuath De Danans, in which he was killed, had erected another great tower on Tor-Inis, which was called Dun-ard-Balair, or the high fortress of Balar; and the place where it stood is still pointed out on Tory Island in the traditions of the people. Another circumstance connected with the opinion about the Fomorians as great builders, is mentioned by O'Brien in his Dictionary, at the word Fomor, and it appears that the ancient Irish called the Giant's Causeway Clochan-na-Fomoraigh, signifying the Causeway of the Fomorians, considering it to have been constructed by this gigantic race of men, who dwelt in that part of the country; for, though a production of nature, of volcanic origin, yet, from the regular formation of the basaltic columns, it has the appearance of a vast work of art. The four sons of Madain Muinreamhar, or Madan, the thick-necked, Fomorian chiefs, are mentioned by Keating as the master builders who erected the fortresses before-mentioned for Nemedius, and one of these builders was named Robhog, from whom, probably, the promontory called by the Greek geographer, Ptolemy, Rhobogdion, took its name; and it is now known as Malin Head, in the peninsula of Inisowen, in the county of Donegal, and the Greek name Rhobogdion differs very little from the Irish Dun Robog, or Robog Dun, which signifies the fortress of Robog. Ciocal, a Fomorian, is stated to have landed at Irios Domhnon, now Erris, in Mayo, in the time of Partholan, or, according to others, before Partholan, with six ships, in each of which were fifty men and fifty women, but Ciocal and all his forces were cut off in a battle with the Partholians. In the time of the Nemedians, other tribes of the Fomorians came to Ireland from Africa under a commander called Conang, with a large fleet and powerful force, and he erected the fortress called Conaing's Tower, as above-mentioned. Conaing and his forces fought several great battles with the Nemedians: one at Slieve Bladhma, now Slieve Bloom, in Ossory; one at Ross Fraochain, in Connaught; and a third at Murbolg, in Dalriada, a place near the Giant's Causeway, where Stairn, the son of Nemedius, was killed by Conaing; and at another in Leinster, the Nemedians were totally vanquished, and the Africans became masters of the country. The Nemedians were reduced to a state of slavery, and compelled to deliver up a great annual tribute on the first day of winter, consisting of corn, cattle, milk, and other provisions, and even some of their children, and the place where these tributes were received was named Moy Ceitne, signifying the plain of compulsion, and so called from these circumstances, and this plain was situated between the rivers Erne and Droghda, between Ballyshannon and Bundroos, on the borders of Donegal, Leitrim, and Fermanagh, along the sea shore. At length the Nemedians, unable to bear such slavery, collected all their people, consisting of, it is said, 60,000, both of land and sea forces, to attack Conaing's Tower, and fought a terrific battle with the Fomorians, in which Conaing the African general was slain, all his men cut to pieces, and the tower taken and demolished. The demolition of Conaing's Tower was a favourite theme of the Irish bards, and a poem on the subject was written by Eochy O'Floinn, a celebrated bard and historian in the tenth century, who died A. D. 934, and of whose works an account is given in O'Reilly's Irish Writers. Of this poem, which is contained in the Books of Leacan and Ballymote, and in the Book of Invasions of the O'Clerys, a translation was made by the translator of these Annals, from which the following passages are extracted:

"The demolition of Conang's tower by valour,
Against Conang the great, the son of Faobhar.
To which marched the men of Erin,
Under the command of their three brave chiefs.

ceeded to the castle, and were joined there by Maguire and Philip, the son of Torlogh Maguire. A personal encounter took place between Donagh-na-nordog and Philip (Maguire), in which they smote each other severely; but Donogh's horse however was killed, and himself dismounted and

"Erglan, son of Boan, the son of Starn,
Simeon, the son of Iarnan the fierce,
With ships, the hero of poetic strains advanced,
The son of Nemedius, namely Fergus of the red side.

"Sixty thousand of brave men,
Valiant forces both by land and sea,
Was the number of the army which marched forth
Of the Nemedians to destroy the tower.

"Tor-Inis, the Island of the Tower,
The fortress of Conang, the son of Faobhar,
By Fergus himself, who fought the foreigners,
Conang, the son of Faobhar, was slain.

"More, the son of Dela, came after this
With the intention to assist Conang,
But Conang was slain before he came,
Which was to More woeful intelligence.

"Sixty ships was the exact number
Which More had brought across the seas,
And they were opposed before they landed
By the Nemedian clans of bravery.

"After the arrival of the Fomorians
All the men of Erin in this battle
Were drowned by the sea tide,
Excepting thirty in number of their heroes.

"The children of Israel were at that time
On their journey from the land of Egypt,
And the descendants of Gadcluis Glas
Were then on their voyage to Scythia."

More, the son of Dela, as explained in the poem, arrived from Africa at this time, with a fleet of sixty ships, and a powerful force; and, having landed at Tor-Inis, they fought a tremendous battle with the Nemedians on the sea shore, and the conflict was so fierce that they did not perceive the tide flowing in, and great numbers of them were drowned on the strand; but the Nemedians were at length vanquished, and the Fomorians became masters of Ireland. The remnant of the Nemedians were again reduced to slavery; but some of them, under the command of Simeon Breac, son of Starn, son of Nemedius, sailed to Greece, settled there, and from him and his followers it is stated were descended the colony called Fir-Bolg, who afterwards came to Ireland. The Fomorians were, it appears, about two hundred years possessors of Ireland, and settled chiefly in Ulster and Connaught; and many places were named from them, as Magh Tuireadh, or the Plain of the Tower, called Moy Turay of the Fomorians, which was situated near Lough Arrow, in Sligo; and Conmaicne of Moyrein of the Fomorians, which was the territory about Fenagh, and adjoining parts of Leitrim, and is mentioned in the Annals of the Four Masters. The Fomorians are frequently mentioned by the Irish historians for many centuries after their battles with the Nemedians. About two centuries after the time of the Nemedians the Fomorians became connected by intermarriages with the colony called Tuath De Danan; and Breas, a Fomorian, by his mother's side a Danan, became king of Ireland for seven years over the Danans. And in the Book of Ballymote it is stated that the Milesians, under Heremon, their first king, fought a great battle with the Danans and Fomorians at the river Liffey. And about a hundred years after this time, it is stated in the Ogygia that Sobairce, monarch of Ireland of the Milesian race, who had his residence at the fortress called Dun Sobairce, now Dunseverick, near the Giant's Causeway, was slain by Achy Meann, king of the Fomorians; and, about another century afterwards, Aongus Ohmnochad, monarch of Ireland, is mentioned as having subdued the Ernaigh and Fomorians; and the monarch Sirna, two centuries still later, fought a great battle at Montraighe, in Cianachta, with the forces of Lugar, a prince of the race of Heber, who had brought foreign Fomorians to his assistance. In the account of the celebrated hero Cuchulain, who lived about the commencement of the Christian era, it is stated in the Ogygia that his mother-in-law was Tethra, the daughter of Ochman, the Fomorian. It appears from O'Flaherty, that the Scandinavian pirates, or Danes, and Norwegians, who in after ages infested the coasts of Ireland, were also called Fomorians, but of course they were of a different origin from the ancient Fomorians of Africa. According to Keating, O'Flaherty, and others, the Fomorians are considered to have been the first inhabitants of Ireland. They appear to have been of Phenician origin, and probably of the same stock as the Phenician colonies settled in Africa and Spain in very remote ages, the only people in those early times experienced to a great extent in navigation and commerce, and as they traded to Spain and Britain, they might easily have sent a colony to Ireland; and it may be remarked, that Biobhal, Beabal, and Mannanan, the son of Lir, of whom an account has been given in a note at p. 121 in these Annals, are mentioned by Keating, O'Flaherty, and other old writers, as Phenician and Danan merchants trading to Ireland in those remote ages. It may also be observed, that the Fomorians are mentioned by some ancient annalists as Fine or Feine Fomoraigh, which may signify either the Fomorian tribes, or the Phenician Fomorians; and O'Brien in his Dictionary, at the word Fearnmuighe, considers that the ancient territory of Fermoy, in the county of Cork, got its name from the Phenicians of Spain who settled there, and were called Fir-Muighe-Feine, i. e. Viri Campi Pheniorum, or the Men of the Plain of the Phenicians; and the term Feine, which frequently occurs in the old writers, was often applied as meaning Phenicians; and it is considered by some that the celebrated warriors in the third century, called Fiana Eireann, or Fenians of Ireland, derived their designation from the same source. The Irish language has also to a great extent been considered to be of Phenician origin by many learned antiquaries, as Charles O'Connor and Dr. O'Connor, O'Flaherty, Vallancey, Betham, and many others; and many arguments are given in support of this opinion by the learned Spaniard, Dr. Joachim Villaneuva, in his work, entitled "Ibernia Phenicea." In the learned preface to O'Brien's Irish Dictionary, the affinity between the Celtic, or Irish, and the Phenician and other eastern languages, is shewn from various writers; and in the learned notes, by Huddleston, to Toland's History of the Druids, is pointed out the great similarity, almost amounting to an identity, between the Irish alphabet and that brought from Egypt to Greece by Cadmus, the Phenician. The worship of the sun, under the names of Bel, Beal, and Baal, the chief deity of Druidism in Ireland, as amongst the Phenicians and Canaanites of Palestine, is also remarkable; and a similarity of language and religious rites is justly considered to demonstrate an identity of origin amongst different nations.

It is considered that some of those eastern colonies, Phenicians, Tuath De Danan, or Milesians, introduced the use of letters into Ireland in those early ages. The term Ogham was applied to the occult or secret writing practised by the Druids, and records of events were thus inscribed on stone pillars, of which many with Ogham inscriptions have been found in various parts of Ireland; but these inscriptions, from their great antiquity, are almost as unintelligible as the arrow-headed characters found on the columns and bricks in the ruins of Persepolis and Babylon, or the Runic inscriptions found on stone pillars in Denmark, Norway, Sweden, and other northern nations. Modes of writing were, no doubt, used in Ireland many centuries before the Christian era, and Duaid Mac Firbis, and other eminent Irish antiquaries, state that no less than 180 volumes of the books of the Druids were burned by St. Patrick at the assembly of Tara; though it has been absurdly asserted by some shallow antiquaries that the Irish had no use of letters before the arrival of St. Patrick; for, though St. Patrick is considered to have introduced the Roman alphabet and Latin language, the Irish had their own taken prisoner on the spot by Philip, who at once delivered him to O'Donnell; and on the same day the town was retaken. O'Donnell delivered

Donogh again to Maguire, who took him to his house to have him imprisoned; and O'Donnell afterwards gave sixty cows to the son of Celtic alphabet, and a written Celtic, or Hiberno-Celtic language, many centuries before that time. The earliest mode of writing was on stone, but afterwards the bark of trees, and smooth birchen boards, were used; hence, the first letter of the Irish alphabet, Beith, signifies a birch tree, and all the letters of the Irish alphabet take their names from different trees. In after times parchment or vellum, and lastly paper, were used, the name paper being derived from the leaves of a plant or reed found in Egypt, called papyrus, which was used for writing on by the Egyptians, Greeks, and Romans; and it may be observed, that the word liber, meaning in Latin a book, was also derived from liber, the bark of a tree, which was used as a material for writing, and buch in the German signifies a beech tree, from which was derived the word book, as beechen boards were used for writing on in that country in ancient times. Plates of copper, brass, and other metals, and also ivory, and boards covered with compositions of wax, were also used as materials to write on by the Romans and other ancient nations. It may be further observed, that the word Ogham, or Ogam, in the Irish language signifies occult or sacred, and is considered by Toland, in his history of the Druids, and by other antiquaries, to have originated from Gaul, as the ancient Gauls worshipped Hercules, as the god of learning and eloquence, under the name of Ogmios; or, according to the Book of Ballymote, the name was derived from Ogma, one of the Tuath De Danan chiefs, who had introduced that occult mode of writing into Ireland.

Together with those modes of writing and recording events, it is to be remarked that there existed in Ireland from the earliest times an order of hereditary bards and historians, who, along with the Druids and Brehons, transmitted traditionally from one generation to another, and preserved in their poems, committed to memory, records of events from the most remote ages; and thus, if modes of writing were even unknown in those early times, accounts of different events could be transmitted for centuries traditionally through successive generations.

The Fir-Bolg.—An account of the colony called Fir-Bolg by the Irish writers has been given at p. 97, 124, in the notes on North and South Connaught, and also at p. 217, in the note on Leinster. The name Fir-Bolg has been latinised Firbolgi, and anglicised Firbolgians and Belgians, as it is supposed by several antiquaries that they were originally Belgians from ancient Gaul, from the country called by Caesar and other Roman writers Gallia Belgica or Belgic Gaul, which comprised the present kingdom of Belgium, and some of the northern parts of France. The Belgians are celebrated by Cæsar and other Roman writers under the names of Belgæ, Bolgæ, and Belgii, as amongst the most valiant nations of Gaul, in their wars with the Romans. The name Fir-Bolg has been latinised by O'Brien and others, Viri Bolgæ, and Viri Belgici, that is, men of Belgium, considering that they were some of the Belgians of Gaul, and O'Brien, at the word Bolg, derives the name from Fear, a man, and Bolg, a quiver; hence, Fir-Bolg signifies men bearing quivers or arrows, and it may be observed that the Scythians, from whom they are said to have been descended, were famous archers. Various other derivations of the name Fir-Bolg, are given by Keating and different writers. Camden and other antiquaries consider that the Irish Fir-Bolg were some of the Belgæ of Britain, a powerful people who inhabited the southern and western parts of England, and who came originally from Gaul. Some of these Belgians are stated to have fled to Ireland in the first century, when Britain was conquered by the Romans, but though some of the British Belgians may have come to Ireland at that time, all our ancient annalists agree in their accounts that the Fir-Bolg colony came to Ireland many centuries previous to that period, and even more than a thousand years before the Christian era. The most probable opinion is, that the Firbolgians of Ireland were originally Belgians from ancient Gaul, who came here in very remote times; and it has been remarked by many modern travellers and writers, that there is a great similarity in manners, disposition, and features, between the Irish peasantry and those of modern Belgium. The accounts of the Firbolgians by the old Irish writers, are now to be considered. It has been in the present article explained in the account of the Fomorians, that when the Nemedians were conquered by the Fomorians, Simeon Breac, the Nemedian general, led the remnant of his people back to Greece, and the posterity of this Simeon Breac, and his Nemedians, having settled a long time in Greece, became a numerous people, but being reduced to a state of slavery by the Greeks, they resolved to leave that country and come back to Ireland, where their Nemedian ancestors had been settled, and they sailed from Greece to the number of five thousand, under their commanders, five brothers named Slainge, Rughradh, Geann, Geannan, and Seangann, and landed in Ireland 217 years after the first arrival of the Nemedians, or about thirteen centuries before the Christian era. One division of the Fir-Bolg under Slainge, landed at a place called from him Invear Slainge, or the Bay of Slainge, now the harbour of Wexford, and from this Bay the river Slaney also derives its name; another division of them landed on the western coast, at the bay called Iorrus Domhnon, now Erris in Mayo, probably in Blacksod Bay. At the time of the arrival of the Firbolg the Fomorians were masters of the country, and had reduced to a state of slavery the Nemedians who had remained in Ireland; but the Firbolg, together with their kindred race of Nemedians, again conquered the Fomorians, and became in their turn masters of Ireland. The five Firbolg leaders divided the island amongst them into five equal parts, and the colony appears to have been formed into two great tribes, namely, the Fir-Gaillian, a name signifying spearmen, who possessed Leinster, and are mentioned by different writers under the name of Galenians; the other tribe, called Fir-Domhnon, possessed Connaught, and are mentioned by O'Flaherty and other writers, under the name of Firdomnians and Damnonians. The Firbolg race, under nine successive kings, ruled over Ireland for a period of about eighty years, and some of their kings resided at Tara, in Meath, and others at Cruachan, in Connaught, until they were conquered by the colony of Tuath De Danan, as hereafter explained. When the Firbolg were conquered by the Danans they were reduced to a state of slavery under them for a period of about two hundred years; but on the arrival of the Milesians from Spain, the Firbolgians having assisted them in the conquest of the Danans, were partly restored to their ancient possessions by the Milesians, and were chiefly located in Leinster and Connaught; and some of the Firbolg race became kings of Leinster, and they were kings of Connaught, under the Milesians, for several centuries. In remote times, several centuries before the Christian era, accounts are given of many great battles between the Milesian monarchs and the Firbolgian forces, who were with difficulty reduced to subjection; and in their contests with the Milesians in those early times, they make a remarkable figure under the name of Martineigh or Martineans, chiefly located in Leinster, Munster, and Connaught, and under the name of Ernaigh or Erneans, tribes of them being so called from inhabiting the territories about Lough Erne, now forming parts of the counties of Cavan, Leitrim, and Fermanagh. It appears that the Firbolg race were very numerous, but brought into a state of vassalage, and formed the farmers, peasantry, and cultivators of the soil, while their Milesian masters ruled as the aristocracy of the country. About the commencement of the Christian era it is recorded that the Firbolgic tribes, residing in Leinster and Meath, under Cairbre Niafeair, or Carbury the Warrior, king of Leinster, held extensive tracts of land, but that he exacted such excessive rents from them that they were forced to give up their farms, and remove into Connaught, where they obtained lands on reasonable terms from Oilioll and Meva, then king and queen of that province: thus the system of rack-rents appears to have been of early date in Ireland. In the Books of Leacan and Ballymote is contained a poem on this subject, composed by Giolla Mac Liag, a celebrated bard in the beginning of the eleventh Torlogh (Philip Maguire), as a reward for his victory.

Malachy, the son of Murrogh, son of Teige Mac century, who was secretary and historian to the monarch Brian Boru, of which poem the following is a literal translation :

" Historic records thus testify,
And it is an indisputable fact,
That the earn erected as ordained by custom,
Is that of Conall, the comely, the son of Aongus.

" Aongus, the son of Umoir, came across the seas,
To him Conall was a son ;
To this Conall was granted by Meva
Delightful Aidhne for a certainty.

" They came from the land of the cruel Cruthneans,
Over the seas came the sons of Umoir,
They arrived at the seat of Carbry the heroic,
Situating in Meath, in the midst of the Gael.

" They obtained fair lands whereon to dwell,
Anastacach of Bregia, delightful were its forts,
Rath Cealtechar, and splendid Rath Conar,
Knowth, Rath Cenath, and the palace of Ealcmar's wife.

" The plain of Tailten, the land of Cearmna,
Tlaelitga of the three Fineamnas,
The ford of Sigi, in Meath and Bridam,
Were the territories which they possessed.

" It was then that Carbry demanded taxes
To be paid to Tara by these sea-faring men ;
For such was the law with all the tribes
On the plains of Erin of the swift steeds.

" They appointed four princes to guarantee
The payment of a stipulated rent ;
Carbry accepted those four chieftains
As sureties for their numerous possessions.

" Those were Ceat, the son of Magach, of the plains of Main ;
Ross, the son of Deagad, of the pleasant Dun Caoin ;
Conall Cearnach, whose fame spread from shore to shore,
And chivalrous Cuchullan, of numerous exploits.

" From the first settlement in the east
Of this tribe, at Tara of limpid springs,
Carbry the heroic so much increased
The taxes that they could not endure them.

" They fled from him with their property
To king Oilioll and queen Meva ;
They settled along the pleasant coasts
As far westward as Dun Aongus in Aran.

" Cime they settled at Lough Cime,
And placed Cutru at Lough Cutru ;
Aghar was stationed towards the south,
And Mil was located at Murbhaeh.

" Dala took the district of Dala,
Near to whom Eanach his brother raised his fortress ;
They placed Beara at Cinn Beara,
And at Moylin they planted Modh.

" Irgus obtained Morna Head,
Cing obtained the district of Oigle ;
At Laighliume's pleasant plains
Bairnech Barnbel was chief.

" Concraidh obtained a fair portion
On the mid island of Arran on the sea ;
Leathrach obtained Tulaeh Teand,
Tanian obtained the point of Tawin.

Rannall, was taken prisoner by Con Carrach, the son of Teige, son of Tiarnan O'Rourke, and by John, the son of Tiarnan O'Rourke ; and they took

" Asal took his residence southward of the Shannon,
In the pleasant plains of Munster,
A delightful residence he had chosen ;
From him charming Drom Asail derived its name.

" Conall obtained the land of Aidhne,
Conall, the comely, who was their chief ;
Such were the possessions held
By the entire race descendants of Umoir.

" From the day that Carbry heard of their flight
He was highly incensed in mind,
And called upon, as a matter of course,
His four guaranteeing princes.

" The two warriors of the Red Branch,
Marched to his palace at the peremptory call ;
Rossa came quickly from the south,
And Ceat arrived in haste from Connaught.

" Restore to me, said the vengeful Carbry,
The emigrant sons of Umoir,
Or give them battle, man for man,
Of those that dare resist my just demand.

" Then marched from Tara to Rath Cruachan
The four dread champions with their hosts,
Determined to conquer, they remained prepared
On Cruachan's plains in Connaught.

" The son of Magach granted to them
A cessation of arms for that night,
In order that Aongus, the king, might hold
A consultation with his friends.

" The questions were, should they go to the east,
Or should they remain as they were in the west,
Or should his three brothers and son
Decide the right by battle ?

" The resolution to which they came, was,
That Cing should be opposed to Rossa,
And that Cime Cetherchend should lead his troops
Against Conall Cearnach of an hundred hostages.

" That Irgus who fought in many battles,
Should command his men against Ceat, the son of Magach,
And Conal, alas ! a great loss to his tribe,
Was opposed to Cuchullan in that conflict.

" The champions who marched from the east,
To the east returned with warlike sway,
The renowned four by them were slain,
An unutterable loss to the race of Umoir.

" Conall and his father were buried,
Beneath this earn composed of stones,
Hence the heap derived the name
Of Carn Conall, as certified by sages.

" The three others were interred
In a tomb on Findmaighe,
Hence it is called the mound of chiefs,
At the strongly fortified Rath of Umail.

" May the merciful Redeemer from all evils,
Free Mae Liag, the historian of sages !
With unquestionable authority, as can be proved,
I have treated this subject as testified here."

Some passages and places mentioned in this poem require an explanation. The sons of Umoir were some of the Firbolg race, who, in their wars with the Milesians, had been expelled to parts him with them to Inishochta, on Lough-Mac-Nean (on the borders of Leitrim, Cavan, and Fermanagh). Roderick, the son of Torlogh Maguire, attacked the two O'Rourkes on the lake, and slew them, along with Mac-an-Chaoich Mac Clancy and his son; and he took Malachy, the son of Murrough (Mac Rannall), with him to his house, and O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, redeemed him from him afterwards; and the castle of Leitrim was again given to O'Donnell, by the son of Murrough, i. e. Malachy (Mac Rannall).

The earl of Kildare, i. e. Gerald, the son of of North Britain, as the Hebrides and the country of the Picts, who are mentioned in the poem as the cruel Cruithneans, and these Firbolg tribes having returned from the country of the Picts, got from king Carbrý Niafeair, in Bregia, or Meath, the various lands enumerated in the poem, amongst others, lands at Tailtean, now Teltown, between Kells and Navan; Tlachtga, the country about Atbboy, and various other places in Meath. The securities for the payment of their rents were Ceat, the son of Magach, a champion of Connaught, and Ross, the son of Deagad, a chief of Dun Caoin, in Kerry, together with Connall Cearnach, and Cuchulain, the two celebrated warriors who were chiefs of the Red Branch Knights of Ulster. As mentioned in the poem, king Carbrý Niafeair having exacted excessive rents from the Firbolg tribes, they fled to Connaught, where they got the following territories from Oilioll and Meva, king and queen of that province, namely, the districts about Lough Cime, now called Lough Hacket, in the barony of Clare, county of Galway; about Lough Cutru, also, in Galway; Murbhach, a place in the island of Aran, off the coast of Galway; and it may be here observed that the Firbolg chief, Aongus, above mentioned, built the celebrated Cyclopean fortress called Dun Aonguis, which still remains on the island of Arran. The Firbolg chiefs also got Cinn Bheara, now the headland of Kinvarra, at the bay of Galway, between Galway and Clare; and it is to be observed that the territory now forming the county of Clare, was in those times part of Connaught; they also got Moylin, a district, according to O'Flaherty, situated in the barony of Kiltartan, in Galway, and Morne Head, probably the place called Moher's Cliffs, in the barony of Corcomroe, county of Clare. The district of Oigle was probably Cruachan Aicle, at Croagh Patrick mountain, in Mayo; the district of Aidhne is now the barony of Kiltartan, in the county of Galway. After the great battle fought between the Firbolg tribes and the forces of king Carbrý Niafeair, Connall, and his father Aengus, the Firbolg commanders, were buried in the place where the great heap of stones called Carn Connall was raised over them as a sepulchral monument, which, according to Keating and O'Flaherty, was situated in Aidhne, now the barony of Kiltartan, in the county of Galway.

In the first century, the Firbolg race revolted, and having formed a conspiracy to wrest the monarchy from the Milesians, they invited their princes and chiefs to a great assembly and banquet in Connaught, where they massacred vast numbers of them, seized upon the sovereignty, and set up as king one of their own race named Carbrý Ceancait, or Carbrý Cathead, so called, it is said, from his ears resembling those of a cat; and he reigned, according to the Four Masters, from A. D. 10 to 15, as monarch of Ireland. The place where the Milesian chiefs were massacred was called Magh Cru, signifying the field of blood, and is supposed to have been situated near Lough Con, in Mayo. About thirty years after the first rebellion, a second revolt of the Firbolg tribes took place, in which they were joined by the Irians, or Clanna Rory of Ulster, and defeated the Heremonians in a great battle at Muighbolg, in which the monarch Fiacha Fionnoladh was slain; and Elim, king of Ulster of the Irian race, became monarch of Ireland. The Battle of Moybolg was fought, according to the Four Masters, A. D. 56, by whom it is mentioned as Orgain Moighe Bolg, which Dr. O'Connor translates Strages Campi Belgarum, or the Slaughter of the Plain of the Belgians. Sanb, son of Ceat, king of Connaught; Elim, son of Conrach, king of Ulster; Foirbre, king of Munster, and Eochy Ainchean, or Eochy of the Venerable Head, king of Leinster, commanded the Firbolg tribes and other forces against the monarch Fiacha Fionnoladh, whom Dr. O'Connor calls Fiachus alborum boum, or Fiach of the White Oxen; and almost all the monarch's forces, together with himself, were slain. The annalists state that the Athachtuatha were the chief instigators of this battle against the monarch, and the term Athachtuatha, which signifies, according to O'Reilly, the plebeian race, or, according to O'Connor, the giant race, was applied to the Firbolg tribes, and this name was latinised Attacotti, and anglicised Attacots; and these rebellions of the Firbolg race are mentioned by various writers as the Attacotic wars. This great battle was fought on a plain on the borders of Meath and Brefney, in the present county of Cavan, at a place now called Moybologue, which signifies the plain of the Firbolg, and got its name from the battle they fought there, and there is there, near the ruins of an ancient church founded by St. Patrick, a large earthen moat or sepulchral mound, which was probably the burial place of some of the chiefs slain in that battle. The celebrated Tuathal Teachtmair, son of king Fiacha Fionnoladh, was driven into exile to North Britain, but soon after returned, collected his forces, and having defeated the Firbolg tribes in various great battles, regained the kingdom, and became monarch of Ireland. The Firbolg forces or Attacots engaged in those insurrections were expelled in great numbers to North Britain, and settled in the Hebrides, and near the river Clyde in Caledonia, and becoming mixed there with the Picts and Scots, or Caledonians, assisted them powerfully in their wars with the Romans in Britain, in the third and fourth centuries, under the name of Attacotti, as stated by Dr. O'Connor, Pinkerton, Moore, and others; and the Attacotti in great numbers entered the Roman armies as mercenaries; and amongst the legions in Illyricum, Italy, and other countries, distinguished themselves amongst the most valiant defenders of the empire. In the third century the Firbolg champions of Connaught, under the name of Clanna Moirne, commanded by the famous warrior Goll, the son of Morna, make a remarkable figure amongst the Fenian heroes, and are highly celebrated, particularly in the Ossianic poems; and the Damnonians and Gamanradians, Firbolg tribes of Erris in Mayo, are mentioned in the Ogygia as famous champions and wrestlers in those warlike ages. The Firbolg kings, as before stated, ruled over Connaught for many centuries, and continued down to the third century, when Cormac, monarch of Ireland, attacked and defeated the forces of Aodh or Hugh, son of Garadh, king of Connaught, who was the last king of the Damnonian or Firbolg race, and the sovereignty of Connaught was transferred to the Milesians of the race of Heremon. The Firbolg race never afterwards acquired any authority in Ireland, being reduced to the rank of farmers and peasantry, but they were still very numerous, and to the present day a great many of the peasantry, particularly in Connaught, are considered to be of Firbolg origin.

As already stated, the Firbolg race were considered to have been originally Belgians from ancient Gaul, and the Menapii, who are placed on Ptolemy's Map of Ireland in the second century, in the territories now forming the counties of Waterford and Wexford, are considered by Camden, Ware, and others, to have been a colony of the Menapians from Belgic Gaul, who inhabited the territory now called Brabant, and the country about Antwerp; and the city of Menapia, on Ptolemy's map, is considered to have been either Waterford or Wexford. The Nemedians, of whom an account has been given in the preceding part of this article, are considered by some to have also come from Gaul in very remote times, and to have been a colony of the Nemetes, a nation of Belgic Gaul, or a race of Gauls and Germans, who dwelt along the Rhine in the territory which afterwards formed the province of Alsace in France. The history of Ulster, and its ancient inhabitants, will be continued in the next number.

Thomas, son of John Cam, the lord justice of Ireland, marched with a force into Connaught; he took the castle of Athleague, of Maonagan (on the river Suck, in Roscommon), from the sons of William O'Kelly, and gave it to the sons of Hugh, son of Bryan, and expelled the sons of William O'Kelly across the Suck, westward; the castle of Tulsk was taken by that force from the tribe of Felim Cleireach (O'Connor), and he delivered their hostages to Hugh O'Connor, the second lord who governed Siol Murray; and he also took the castles of Roscommon and Castlereagh on that expedition.

Hugh O'Connor was expelled from his estate eastward across the Shannon, by Mac Dermott, with the general consent of Siol Murray (the people of Roscommon).

Mac William Burke, at the invitation of O'Connor and of the sons of William O'Kelly, took the castle of Athleague, and gave it to the sons of William O'Kelly; and Conor O'Kelly, the second lord over Hy Maine, was made prisoner in it, and he was delivered up to Malachy, the son of Teige, son of Donogh, along with the hostages of Hy Maine, and he (Malachy) assumed the supreme government of Hy Maine on that occasion.

The castle of Tulsk was taken by Mac William and by O'Connor, and the son of Carbury, son of Bryan, was killed in it by the shot of a ball; and the hostages of the tribe of Felim, and their castle, were given to O'Connor. Mac William made peace between O'Connor and Mac Dermott, and received as hostages from both, as a security for their compact, Owen, the son of O'Connor, and Carbury, the son of O'Connor.

O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, marched with a force against Mac Dermott, namely, Cormac, the son of Roderick, and did not halt until he arrived at the Curlew mountains. Mac Dermott having received intelligence of this, mustered the forces of Moylurg and of the Tuatha (districts in Roscommon), of Connaught, to defend the pass of the Curlew mountains against O'Donnell, who having perceived this, proceeded round by Muintir Eoluis (in Leitrim), crossed the Shannon at the castle of Leitrim, and entered Moylurg; he seized on much prey and property, and commenced plundering the country. When Mac Dermott received intelligence of this, he came to O'Donnell and made a lasting peace with him, humbly paid him his tribute, and restored to him the Cathach (see note at A. D. 1497), and the hostages which he had retained in Moylurg, from the battle of Beallach Buighe until that time.

Bryan, the son of Donal, i. e. the O'Neill, the son of Henry, committed great depredations on Mac Donnell, of Clan Kelly (in Fermanagh), namely Gillpatrick.

A. D. 1500.

Donal O'Fallon, bishop of Derry, a friar minor de observantia, who had been industriously preaching and instructing throughout Ireland for thirty years to that time, died of an internal disease, and was buried at Trim.

O'Rourke, i. e. Felim, the son of Donogh, son of Tiarnan, died; and was succeeded by Owen, the son of Tiarnan, son of Teige.

Teige Oge, the son of Teige, son of Tiarnan O'Rourke, died.

Bryan Caach, the son of Niall, son of John Buighe, son of Owen O'Neill, was killed by Donal the son of John Buighe O'Neill, and by the people of Hugh, in the door-way of the castle of Cinard (Kinnard, or Caledon, in Tyrone).

Thomas, the son of Hugh, son of Bryan, son of Philip of the Battle-axe Maguire, was killed by Teige, the son of Thomas, son of Thomas Oge Maguire, and by Muintir Mucaidhein.

O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, marched with a force into Tyrone, burned the town of O'Neill, i. e. Dungannon, demolished the old castle, and burned the Cranoge of Lough Leary (the lake on the lower part of Lough Erne), and returned home safe to his house, without any battle on that occasion.

The lord justice, i. e. Gerald, the son of Thomas, earl of Kildare, marched with a force into Tyrone; and O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, with another force, joined the lord justice at the castle of the sons of John Buighe O'Neill, i. e. the castle of Kinnard, to which they laid siege, and took it; the town was then given by them to Torlogh, the son of Con O'Neill, and those noblemen then returned to their houses. After O'Donnell's return from that journey he marched expeditiously and actively into Tirerrill (in Sligo), where he plundered the tribe of Bryan Mac Donagh, who were in opposition to him, and after that returned home. The forementioned Torlogh (O'Neill), to whom the lord justice had given the castle of Kinnard, was taken prisoner by O'Neill, i. e. Donal, in O'Neill's own castle, about six weeks afterwards, and was deprived of his cattle, from which a great war arose in Tyrone.

O'Ferrall, i. e. Roderick, the son of Irial, was killed by James, the son of Roderick, son of Cathal, son of William O'Ferrall, on Inishmore, in Lough Gawnach (in Longford).

O'Byrne of Leinster, i. e. Cahir, the son of Dunlang, was killed by some of his own kinsmen.

Feradach, the son of Dunn Oge, the son of Dunn More Maguire, and Bryan, the son of John, son of Donal Ballach Maguire, were slain by the sons of Con O'Neill, at Belathanamarchluch, (in Fermanagh).

Gillcreest, the son of John Finn Mac Cabe, was killed in his own house, in a nocturnal attack, by Hugh, the son of John Buighe Mac Mahon, who also plundered the town.

The two sons of Donogh Oge, the son of Donogh More, son of Hugh Maguire, namely, James and Redmond, were killed by Owen, the son of Donogh More, the son of the same Hugh.

The tribe of Dunn, the son of Cuchonacht Maguire, went to attack the town of Mac Gillroy, and slew the Giolla Duv, the grand-son of Conor, son of Thomas Maguire; Donal Caoch Mac Gillroy, with his son, and Roderick, the son of Donal Girr Mac Gillroy, and many others.

Owen, the son of Feredach Balbh, son of Dunn, son of Cuchonacht Maguire, was killed by Geoffrey Mac Gillroy, in retaliation for the death of the forementioned persons.

The erection of a castle was commenced by Philip, the son of Bryan, son of Philip (Maguire), on the Rock of Lough Tarbh.

Gillpatrick, the son of Flaherty, son of Thomas Oge Maguire, was killed by Niall, the son of Art O'Neill, and his sons; and they carried away with them great spoils from the sons of Flaherty.

Sorcha (Sarah) the daughter of Philip, son of Thomas Maguire, i. e. the Gilla Duv, and Geoffrey Oge, the son of Geoffrey Roe Maguire, died.

The Barry More (of Cork) was killed by his own kinsman, David Barry, archdeacon of Cloyne and Cork; and David was killed by Thomas Barry, and by the O'Callaghans; and the earl of Desmond had David's body exhumed and burned in twenty days after his burial.

The Sionach (Fox), of Muintir Tadhgain (in Westmeath), namely Carbry, was killed by Con, the son of Art, son of Con O'Melaghlin.

A. D. 1501.

John, the son of Rossa, son of Thomas Oge Maguire, who was a canon of the chapter of Clogher, a parson and erenach of Aghalurcher, a profound and eminent scholar in the Latin and Irish languages, a man who kept a house of general hospitality for all those who wished to avail themselves of it, died in the Ides of June.

Niall, the son of Art, son of Owen O'Neill, died.

Roderick, the son of O'Conor Faily, i. e. the son of Cahir, son of Con, son of the Calvach, died.

Roderick, the son of Mac Mahon, i. e. of Bryan, the son of Redmond, was killed by the sons of Magennis.

An intestine commotion arose amongst the Orghallians, namely, the tribe of Hugh Roe, and the tribe of Redmond; Mac Mahon, i. e. Rossa, proceeded with his predatory troops against the householders, and expelled the tribe of Redmond out of the country into O'Neill's territory; Mac Mahon attacked the tribe of Redmond, and engaged with them in the battle called Cath-an-Choileir (or, of the Quarry). Torlogh, the son of Con, son of Henry O'Neill, son of the daughter of the earl (of Kildare), aided the tribe of Redmond; and Torlogh, the bravest lord's son of his age amongst the Irish, was slain by Mac Mahon in that battle, along with the son of Mac Donnell of the galloglasses, namely, John, the son of Colla, and many others.

The son of Maguire, i. e. Thomas, the son of Thomas Oge, son of the Gilla Duv, i. e. the Maguire, was slain on Sliabh Beatha (Slieve Beagh, in Monaghan), by the sons of Bryan, the son of Redmond Mac Mahon, and also his people who were along with him were slaughtered; the following chiefs were slain there, namely, Gillaisa, the son of Edmond; Thomas, the son of Dun, son of Edmond; and Cormac, the son of John, son of Edmond Maguire; Roderick Buighe, the son of Edmond Oge Maguire; Edmond, and Manus the Eugenician, the sons of Hugh, son of Bryan Maguire; Bryan and Donogh, the sons of Teige, son of David, son of Gillabuighe Mac Manus, and five more, of the same name, together with many others.

The castle of Sligo was taken by ladders, and the sons of Roderick, the sons of Torlogh Carrach O'Connor, and the sons of Felim, son of Torlogh Carrach O'Connor, who took it, descended from the top of it, and the Calvach Caoch, son of Donal, son of Owen O'Connor, was slain there; and John, the son of Roderick, son of Torlogh Carrach O'Connor, fell by the hand of the Calvach in that conflict.

Aibhne, the son of John O'Kane, was killed by his own brother, Bryan Fionn.

Mac Dounell of Clankelly (in Fermanagh), namely, Gillananeev, the son of Cormac, son of Art, was killed by Felim, the son of Donogh, son of Thomas Maguire.

Edmond, the son of Rickard Burke, was taken prisoner by Mac William of Clanrickard, on his return from the pilgrimage of St. James (at Compostella, in Spain), and he exacted a great ransom for his release, and good hostages from among his people, along with his son.

Malachy, the son of William Mac Rannall, chief of Muintir Eoluis, died at an advanced age.

Teige, son of Torlogh, son of Felim Finn (O'Connor), was killed by the sons of Roderick Mac Dermott.

Bryan, son of Roderick Mac Dermott, was slain by the east of a dart from the castle of Tulsk; and the person by whom he was killed was not discovered.

O'Connor plundered Conor Mac Dermott at Caisiol Bracain of O'Brogan (in Mayo), and burned the town.

Donal O'Higgin, chief professor of poetry over the schools of Ireland, died after his return from the pilgrimage of St. James (in Spain).

Donogh Oge Mac Carthy, the son of Donogh, son of Cormac, son of Donogh, son of Dermod, son of Cormac Finn, son of Donal More, who was lord of Ealla (Duhallow, in the county of Cork), died.

Torlogh O'Brien, lord of Thomond, burned the county of Limerick, and Coisimaighi (Coshma barony, in Limerick), in the winter.

A. D. 1502.

James, the son of Roderick Mac Mahon, abbot of Clones, died.

Art O'Gallagher and John O'Loiste, two abbots who contended with each other for the abbaey of Easroe (Ballyshannon), died on the same day.

The monastery of the friars, in Cavan,¹ was granted to O'Reilly from the see of Rome, for friars de observantia, in opposition to the friars de communi vita.

Teige, the son of Con, son of Donal O'Neill; Donal, the son of Felim O'Neill; Owen Bocht, the son of Henry O'Neill; and Donal, the son of Philip Maguire, died.

Teige, the son of Tomaltaeh the Hospitable Mac Dermott, tanist of Moylurg, was exultingly slain by the sons of Roderick Mac Dermott, in Coillte Cleirigh (or the Woods of Cleirigh).

The sons of Torlogh Oge, son of Torlogh, son of Niall Roe, gained the battle of Tulach Fine, against O'Boyle, their father's brother, i. e. Niall Buighe, in which Niall O'Boyle and his two sons Roderick and Donal Ballach, with many others, were slain; and O'Boyle himself was the person by whom that treachery had been accomplished against the sons of Torlogh, by which he himself was killed.

O'Reilly, i. e. John, the son of Cathal, made an attack on Philip, the son of Torlogh Maguire; he overran and burned the open plains of the country through Clanawley, and slew Edmond, the son of Philip Riavaeh, son of Awlave, with many others; in O'Reilly's forces, the son of O'Reilly himself, namely, Donal-an-Mhagha (of the Plain); and the son of Mac Mulmartin, namely, Conor, were slain.

Donogh, the son of Conor, son of Thomas Oge Maguire, died from the mortification of the wounds he had received in the battle of Slieve Beatha (in Monaghan).

A. D. 1502

1. The monastery of Cavan was first founded for Dominicans, A. D. 1300, by Giolla Iosa Roe O'Reilly, prince of Brefney, who is mentioned by Ware as Gelasius Rufus O'Reilly. In A. D. 1502, as above-mentioned, the Dominicans, who are called friars de com- muni vita, were removed, and the Observantine friars, or reformed Franciscans, were introduced in their place, in the abbey of Cavan, by John O'Reilly, the son of Cathal, who was then prince of East Brefney, now the county of Cavan.

Art, the son of Henry, son of Owen O'Neill, was killed by Art, the son of Con, son of Henry, son of Owen O'Neill.

Owen, the son of Hugh, son of Art O'Neill, was killed by Hugh, the son of Con O'Neill.

Cathal, the son of Malachy Duv Mac Gauran (in the county of Cavan), was killed by the sons of O'Reilly, at the instigation of the son of Bryan, and his sons.

Hugh Oge, the son of Hugh Roe O'Donnell, accompanied by Maguire, i. e. John, marched with a force into Dartry of Coininse (Dartry, in the county of Monaghan), to attack the son of John Buighe Mac Mahon, and they completely burned the town and the whole territory of the son of John Buighe. The people of the country fled before them with their cattle and property, and the Orgiallians, from the river of Eoghanach inwards, together with the tribe of Felim O'Reilly and the tribe of Donogh Maguire, overtook them; but the son of O'Donnell and Maguire made their escape valiantly and victoriously from them all, and slew many of their pursuers, among whom were Felim, the son of Conor, son of Felim O'Reilly, and many others, and they returned safe to their homes.

Donogh O'Brien died; he was the son of Bryan, son of Conor, son of Mahon, son of Murtogh, son of Torlogh, son of Teige, son of Conor na-Siudaine, son of Donogh Cairbreach, &c., the fountain of prosperity and wealth of all Munster; and this Donogh was lord of the country from Athdara² to Limerick, and from Bailenua to Mainistir-an-Aonaigh, and also lord of Eatharlach and of Coill-Beithe.

A. D. 1503.

O'Beolan, the coarb of Columkille, at Drumcliff (abbot of Drumcliff, in Sligo), died.

Maguire, i. e. John, the son of Philip, son of Thomas More, namely, the Giolla Duv, one of the most worthy of the chieftains of Ireland in his time, the most merciful and humane Irishman, and who best protected and defended his territory and estate, the most valiant in war against opposing tribes and distant enemies, the most distinguished for good government, laws, and regulations both in church and country, died in his own fortress at Inisceithlionn (Enniskillen), on a Sunday, after hearing mass, on the seventh of the Kalends of April, after the victory of extreme unction and repentance, and was buried in the monastery of the friars, at Donegal, he having selected it for that purpose.

The son of O'Donnell, i. e. Donogh-na-nordog, was taken prisoner by the sons of Con O'Neill; and some Scots who were along with the sons of Con conveyed him to the seat of O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe; and Donal, the son of O'Donnell, maimed Donogh, of which maiming he died.

Bryan, the son of Hugh Maguire, died.

Edmond, the son of Owen, son of Hugh Maguire, with his son; the son of Cormac, son of Hugh Maguire; and the son of Torlogh O'Muldoon, were killed in a nocturnal skirmish, by the sons of Bryan, the son of Hugh Maguire.

The son of O'Kane, i. e. Richard, was maimed by his own brother, Donal Cleirach.

Theobald, son of Walter Burke, lord of Conmaicne-Cuile-Tola, (barony of Kilmain, county of Mayo), the most distinguished man of the English of Connaught for humanity and hospitality, died at an advanced age.

Torlogh Oge O'Conor died at Ballintobber of St. Bridget, after a long affliction.

Mac William of Clanrickard gave O'Kelly, and a party of the people of Conmaicne Cuile, a great and awful overthrow, in which the greater portion of the galloglasses respectively of the Clan Donnell, and of the Clan Sweeney (Mac Donnells and Mac Sweeneys), around their constables were slain, and in which also fell Walter, the son of John Burke, a distinguished commander.

Theobald, the son of Walter Burke, lord of Musgraidhe Cuirc (probably Muiscrith Tire in Ormond, in the county of Tipperary), was killed by Donogh an-Chuilinn, the son of O'Carroll, and by Conor O'Dwyer.

The earl of Kildare, having gone to England,

2. Athdara, now Adare, in the county of Limerick, was in ancient times a town of great note, and contains extensive ruins of abbeys and churches, and remains of a strong castle. Mainistir-an-aonaigh is now Monasternenagh, a parish in the barony of Small

County, and partly in Coshma, county of Limerick, where there was a celebrated Cistercian monastery, of which some beautiful ruins still remain. Eatharlach is the Glen of Aherlowe, in the Galtee mountains, in Tipperary, on the borders of Limerick.

returned triumphantly, and brought his son with him, who had been imprisoned there by the king of England; and the same earl marched with a force of the English and Irish of Leinster into Moylinny (in Antrim), and to Carrickfergus, demolished the castle of Belfast, and appointed the son of Santalach (probably Sainthill), constable of Carrickfergus.

Niall, the son of Con, son of Hugh Buighe O'Neill, with all his English and Irish auxiliaries, marched with a very great force into Tyrone, overran the entire of Tyrone, and of Iveagh (in the county of Down), and carried off all their property to his residence.

The sons of Bryan, son of Niall Gallda (O'Neill), gave the English of Carrickfergus a defeat, in which all their officers were either taken prisoners or slain.

Rannall More, the son of Gillespie, son of Mac Donnell, the constable of the Scots of Ireland, died in the Duv Thrian of Ulidia (in the county of Down).

